In order that the territorial districts have an opportunity to avail themselves of the same opportunity of benefits of the area commissioner system, I have authorized that a survey of costs involved be prepared for the district of Cochrane. This survey is now complete, and officials from the assessment branch will shortly be meeting municipal officials from the district of Cochrane to arrange a pilot programme. In due course—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): That is both north and south?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, both north and south, yes.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It is a good place to start.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: A good place to start, and I might say that a number of municipal representatives in that area, including a number of assessors, have shown considerable interest in this idea. I am quite sure that when they see—as a matter of fact I was studying the figures today in this report—the advantages that would be available to the municipalities in that district, I would not be a bit surprised that they would buy the idea.

In due course of time—I am sorry I have not been able yet to present amendments to the various Acts under the control of my department to the Legislature for this session, but I will say that, in due course of time, I intend to introduce an amendment to The Assessment Act which will provide for the office of a district assessment commissioner. At the present time there is authority just for a district assessor.

I would hope that this programme would be acceptable to the municipalities and that, in the next few years, we will see commissioners not only in all the counties, but also in the territorial districts.

One of the features that I think I should perhaps outline, or underline, is that this system in my estimation would ensure that we would have an adequate tax base for local government which would provide for debenturing capacity at a reasonable cost.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the single most important activity of the community planning branch in 1963 was the placing of two planning advisers in district offices at the Lakehead and in Sudbury. It is the job of these planning advisers to advise local authorities in the solution of local planning problems, to expedite the processing by the branch of various types of applications under The Planning Act, to act as liaison between the branch and the communities they serve, and to keep the branch informed of planning developments in their districts. We know that this new service is successful from the favourable comments we have received about it.

The appointment of these two planning advisers is part of a general reorganization of the community planning branch. Two additional planning advisers are to be appointed as soon as persons with the requisite qualifications can be recruited and trained. The demand for competent planners far exceeds the supply.

Naturally, our strongest competitors for the available supply are the planning boards across the province. It is one of the principal jobs of the community planning branch to persuade planning boards to engage their own technically qualified planning staffs, where appropriate. Therefore, we are sort of caught in the dilemma of trying to bring the branch up to its full complement of staff without unduly inhibiting the hiring of planners locally.

Another feature of the reorganization of the community planning branch is the merging of the sections which deal with official plans and zoning bylaws. This move is designed to improve the effectiveness of the branch's advisory service in connection with official plans and zoning bylaws, and the quality and speed of dealing with applications for approval. Changes are also being made in the structure of the subdivisions section, with the same objectives.

The responsibility of the community planning branch for doing research in planning matters, and for carrying out special studies of various areas of the province as circumstances demand, has been manifested during the past year in the establishment of a separate research and special studies division. This division, currently working on a project of The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act directorate, is looking into subdivision agreement practices and is assisting in the preparation of a branch report on planning organization in Waterloo county.

Subdivision and official-plan activity continued at about the same pace as in 1962, although the character of this activity changed somewhat, especially in connection with official plans. During 1963 there was a decided increase in the number of new plans, major revisions and amendments submitted for review and comment before they were formally adopted locally and submitted for official approval. This is the product of a closer liaison between the staff of the branch on the one hand and the staffs of planning boards and consultants engaged by planning boards on the other. This, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, is a very desirable development and should result in better official plans as well as a reduction in the processing time for future applications.

The number of zoning bylaws and amendments submitted for amendment and approval has been increasing steadily over the past four years. They rose to an all-time high in 1963. During the past five years the number of committees of adjustment in operation has doubled. The number of decisions of these agencies submitted for review has increased slightly less than the same proportion.

Metropolitan Toronto and Trenton launched urban renewal studies in 1963 with provincial approval and financial assistance from the federal government. New redevelopment areas were designated in London, Midland, Ottawa and Peterborough and one previously designated in Toronto was enlarged. During the year the province made grants to a net total of almost $450,000 toward the acquisition and clearing of land by municipalities in approved redevelopment areas.

Since the beginning of 1964 the city of Toronto has designated the Alexander Park section of the city as a redevelopment area and this action has now been approved under The Planning Act. This project, like Hamilton's north end project, marks an important development in redevelopment policy and practice in this province because it includes the retention of some existing buildings, the rehabilitation of others and only the outright removal and replacement of structures whose condition demands this drastic treatment.

A conference for local planning staff and another one for planning consultants were conducted in 1963. A substantial number of planning workshops have been conducted in various parts of the province over the past few years but none was held in 1963, due to staff shortages. One was held in North Bay in January of this year, however, and arrangements are being made for another in northwestern Ontario soon and others will follow.

Unfortunately, the publications programme of the branch has lagged somewhat over the past year, partly as the result of the reorganization of the department and of the branch, partly because of the increasing work load. The new organization is now shaking down, however, and this, coupled with the fact that a person experienced in publications work has been added to the staff, should permit the department's publication, which is called Ontario Planning, to appear more regularly in the future. Its content will be improved also.

I do not want to leave the subject of community planning, Mr. Chairman, without complimenting those hundreds of men and women across Ontario who have agreed to assume the frequently frustrating and often onerous responsibility of serving as members of planning boards. Community planning is accepted in Ontario as a local responsibility. While the community planning branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs has important responsibilities in stimulating and encouraging planning, providing an advisory service and keeping local planning activities under review, it is to the members of planning boards and municipal councils, and to their staffs, that should go the credit for the successes that have been achieved. Their work is important work and I hope that the personal satisfactions they experience will go at least some way toward making up for the heavy personal sacrifices that are so often involved.

I would like to deal now, Mr. Chairman, with the accounts branch, which has a staff of 12 persons. In addition to the normal functions of payrolls, revenue and expenditures accounting, payments of bills, compiling estimates and forecasts, periodic statements to the Treasury, and so on, it also has the responsibility for processing and paying such amounts as our audits of claims for grants and subsidies, payments in lieu of taxes, and so on, and numerous other financial details.

On June 1, 1963, we started a new function, which was payment of grants under the new Drainage Act, which had been passed at the last session. Some 289 grants were paid to 96 municipalities from June 1 to December 31, 1963, amounting to over $350,000—all important contributions to the people of our rural municipalities. I am pleased to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have had no complaints from any of the people who applied for grants under this new Drainage Act and I am quite satisfied that the committee which was charged with the responsibility of preparing this new Act in 1963, and which was chaired by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), did a very complete job of this new Act.

The major contribution, of course, of our department is under The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act and it is anticipated that about $27 million will be spent in the coming fiscal year.

The law branch of this department was begun only three years ago and each year the area of its functions and responsibilities continues to expand and grow greater. Of course, the number one function of this branch is to carry out the legislative programme of the department, which includes the careful rewriting of the many private bills which are submitted each year to the House. Certainly this year, 1964, has been no exception. Generally throughout the year the branch provides legal services to all the other branches in the department as well as to assist municipalities through their elected or appointed officials. It endeavours to provide such legal advice as is consistent with the amount of legal assistance already available to these municipalities, without encroachment on the field of solicitors already practising in these municipalities with whom this branch is always very anxious to co-operate. The branch is always available for consultation with municipal representatives, including municipal solicitors. In addition to this it is often called upon to discuss with individuals problems with which the municipalities are involved.

Prior to the reorganization of the municipal organization and administration branch in 1963, it was known as the municipal administration branch. Its functions from the formation of the department in 1935 have been both administrative and advisory, although its prime responsibility for many years was the exercise of the department's supervision over defaulting municipalities.

There remains a continuing need for the provision of practical administrative services, particularly in respect to new municipalities and in respect to municipalities which from time to time, and as a condition of debt incurrence, are required by the Ontario Municipal Board to obtain departmental approval for certain of their financial affairs. These services encompass all phases and facets of municipal operation, entail visits to the municipalities and direct participation as required. They include, for example, the preparation and/or the approval of municipal budgets and levy bylaws, and insofar as improvement districts are concerned, the approval of all bylaws and disbursements.

This branch is responsible for processing submissions by municipalities and for giving approval on the department's behalf where such approval is required under the statutes. It also processes and approves the various forms used by the municipalities for the registration, redemption and/or sale of properties for tax arrears, and gives instructions and clarification as to the proper use of the forms and procedures.

In regard to the designated mining municipalities, which are those municipalities receiving annual grants pursuant to the regulations made under section 35 of The Assessment Act, the branch calculates the grants, and ensures that the conditions prescribed in the regulations are obeyed and fulfilled by the municipalities concerned. This includes the consideration and approval of the annual estimates of the municipalities and their local boards, the approval of the annual levy bylaws and of certain other bylaws and matters. There are presently, Mr. Chairman, 59 such mining municipalities.

Thus, with these and related duties the branch continues to provide administrative services. In recognition, however, of the increasing need for a more extensive and readily accessible advisory service to municipalities throughout the province, provision has been made to place the municipal administration personnel in the department's regional offices at Port Arthur and at Sudbury. At the present time an officer is already carrying out this service at Port Arthur and arrangements are well under way with respect to the Sudbury office. The services provided in these regional offices complement the already established advisory service maintained by the branch from head office.

It is true, of course, that as local government becomes more complex there is an ever-increasing need to institute and maintain examination of administrative practices and organization. With this in mind, the functions of the branch have been increased to include the continuous examination, study, reporting and recommendation in such matters as: (a) municipal organization functions and elections; (b) the incorporation of new and reorganization of existing municipalities, boards and commissions, and so on; and (c) the matter of municipal boundaries.

The branch has resumed, and is continuing the department's programme, with respect to the establishment of municipal boundaries, date of incorporation, and so on, which are pursuant to the provisions of The Municipal Corporations Quietening Orders Act. The operations branch was established last year. It includes personnel, services and supplies, library and files.

Personnel activities have greatly increased during the past year because of the need for up-dating personnel and attendance records, preparing and rewriting class specifications and charts, recruiting new personnel, counselling staff reclassification and other problems.

We have installed new procedures in order to more efficiently facilitate the requisitioning of stationery, supplies and equipment. The department files have been expanding at an increased rate. It was found necessary, due to the limited floor space available in our office, to devise a more efficient method of filing. This was accomplished by the installation of a lateral filing system, which reduced the floor space required by approximately 600 square feet and, I suggest, at the same time provided us with a much better system of filing than we had before.

The library, which is in this operations branch, is an information centre that primarily serves the department staff and other government officials. Secondly, it serves municipal officials in Ontario and other selected persons, including consultants in the municipal field. The library is also open to the public during office hours. In addition, it supplies answers to many telephone calls that we get for information. The present collection of material in the library includes a good selection of current and historical material on law, assessment, finance, municipal government and town planning.

I would like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, about the federal-provincial centennial grants programme. As the hon. members of the House are aware, the governments of Ontario and Canada have executed an agreement relating to the observance, in 1967, of Canada's centennial of Confederation. This province is co-operating with Ottawa in encouraging municipalities to undertake centennial projects of a lasting nature in accordance with The Confederation Centennial Act of 1962-63 and Ontario regulations of 1963.

The responsibility for administering this Act and the regulations has been assigned to my department. The centennial advisory committee, formed last fall, consists of an inter-departmental group of civil servants, who will assist the Cabinet centennial committee in considering applications for assistance under the federal-provincial centennial programme.

Applications will be processed through the secretary of the advisory committee, who is a member of my department. Application forms which were received about the middle of February from the centennial commission in Ottawa are being forwarded to all the municipalities requesting them.

To date, the secretary of the advisory committee has received approximately 300 inquiries from nearly 190 municipalities. Formal applications will be processed as soon as they are received.

The municipal accounting branch is a very important part of our department as well as accounting branches, similar to accounting branches in business in that it prescribes the classifications of accounts for municipalities and local boards, it promotes the use of accepted principles of municipal accounting. It is charged with the responsibility of reviewing the annual financial statements of the municipalities and the boards.

Due to the complicated structure of the municipalities and the local boards, the review of the annual financial statements brings forth a wide variety of complex accounting and financial problems. The principal problems which arise from this review are associated with development in urban centres, and with problems concerning the determination of varying mill rates for different classes of assessment with problems associated with the development of the principles to be used to charge abutting owners for the cost of municipal services, with the principles associated with subdividers agreements, provincial - municipal and municipal - local board relationships generally.

In addition to its responsibilities with regard to municipal accounting, the branch is charged with administering those sections of the Statutes of Ontario which require an annual audit of the accounts of each municipality and local board. In administering this responsibility, the staff of the municipal auditing branch works closely with the municipal auditor, who is licensed by the department and is appointed by the municipal council. It is also the arbiter for all the local boards.

The effectiveness of many of the programmes of the department depend on the knowledge of the municipal auditor and his ability to interpret and explain to municipal officials the requirements of the great number of statutes, regulations and instructions which apply to the preparation of the accounts, the financial statement and the various returns required of a municipality. It is a source of personal satisfaction that more and more municipalities have been able to secure, in recent years, the services of qualified public accountants to assume the responsibilities of the municipal auditor.

In 1963 all cities, and 80 per cent of the remaining municipalities, had engaged the services of a chartered accountant or a firm of chartered accountants to assume this responsibility.

In 1963-64, the estimates of the department contained a provision for the establishment of a municipal finance branch. With the establishment of a municipal subsidies branch and the transfer of the responsibility for the administration of The Municipal Works Assistance Act to that branch, it is my expectation that the municipal finance branch will be in a position to sharply increase its activities in the field of municipal finance in 1964.

I might point out, however, that the branch did carry out a full programme of activities with regard to municipal pensions. As the hon. members of the House are aware, the government has been very active in the field of municipal pensions in recent years. The branch has been very active during 1963 with many problems that have arisen in municipalities that have either elected to participate in the Ontario Municipal Employees' Retirement System, or who are contemplating making such a decision in the future.

The department has been successful in recruiting a number of municipal treasurers and accountants with municipal experience ranging from eight to 25 years, a number of chartered accountants and a number of other persons with formal qualifications and experience in the field of municipal finance. As a result of this success, the complement of the municipal accounting and finance branches is just about filled at the present time, and certainly will be by the beginning of the next fiscal year.

The assignment to the department of the responsibility to administer the system of loans and subsidies under The Municipal Works Assistance Act makes it necessary to undertake a reappraisal of the methods used to administer the shared costs of subsidy programmes assigned to the department for administration. To provide maximum assistance and service to the municipalities, a decision has been taken to establish within the department a municipal subsidies branch, and to transfer to that branch the responsibility for the administration of the municipal works assistance programme, the winter works incentive programme, the centennial grants programme, The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act and phases of other subsidy programmes for which the department is responsible.

I would like to make a few comments concerning The Municipal Works Assistance Act. This Act was designed to promote increased employment by the provision of loans and subsidies to municipalities, to enable the municipalities to augment or to accelerate municipal capital works programmes.

The amount of money which will be available for loans to the municipalities in Ontario under the programme is approximately $137 million. If the programme achieves its purposes, and the municipalities apply for loans equal to this sum during the next two-and-one-half years, the department will be required to administer a programme of loans which, on the basis of the public borrowing of the municipalities during recent years, will be less than one-quarter of the total requirements of the municipalities for capital funds during that period.

As of a few days ago, the department had received about 350 requests for information in connection with this programme and had received 36 applications for loans totalling about $38 million. Another large application came in within the last few days, from the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, for some $27 million. We had made about ten commitments for loans, or had accepted loans totalling less than $1 million.

With the introduction of the 1963-64 winter works programme, a number of changes were made: Namely, the curtailment of the programme by the federal government in order to relate it more closely to the winter season, and the introduction of the designated development area concept whereby those municipalities which participate in the programme and are located within certain areas will receive an additional reimbursement of 10 per cent of direct labour costs from Canada. The government of Ontario agreed to increase their labour cost subsidy in the same proportion: That is, another five per cent from Ontario, which results in a total remuneration of 90 per cent of direct labour costs to the municipalities undertaking programmes under the winter works programme in these designated development areas.

The province, in recent years, has sharply increased its payments to the municipalities and to the local boards. For instance, the amount of the subsidies and shared-cost programmes which were administered by The Department of Municipal Affairs in 1949 were $3,625,000 as of that date; and this rose to $37,537,000 as of March 31, 1963.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would like to say a few words about the Ontario Municipal Board.

The board, as you know, is for administrative purposes and is directly responsible to the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

However, the board is an autonomous body and not subject, in its decisions, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs. Decisions of the municipal board are subject to appeals as set out in the statutes dealing with these matters.

The board is a tribunal to which application is made for orders, decisions and rulings by many persons and corporations, under the provisions of many different Acts in the legislation of Ontario. It can be said to be both judicial and administrative. It does not initiate any matters, but only hears applications from municipalities and others. One of its cardinal functions is to provide a means through which all persons having an interest in the subject matter shall be heard.

The functions and jurisdiction of the Ontario Municipal Board may be divided into two general categories: First, responsibility for the sound growth and development of municipalities within the framework of the statutes with particular regard to economic stability. Second, jurisdiction as arbitrator in the first instance, or by way of appeal, to determine compensation to be paid by the Crown in the right of Ontario or its Crown corporations, by municipalities and other local authorities, and by certain private corporations.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to pay tribute to the sincerity and integrity of the thousands of elected and appointed men and women across the province of Ontario, for their continuing devotion to the cause of municipal government; and coupled with that, the sincerity of purpose and honesty and integrity of the people who work in the communities of Ontario and those who are members of the staff of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

It is quite obvious to me that the need to increase our services to the municipal corporations of our province, and to all the people of Ontario, is certainly the prime responsibility of our department and our prime interest. I now would hope that the hon. members of the Legislature will be charitable in dealing with my very necessary 1964 estimates.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult on this evening to compete with the prize fight that is going on at this very moment.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I thought, after our little passage today concerning the procedure of the House, that I might list the departments in the order their estimates will be presented—say, four ahead. I cannot say specifically when they will be presented because I do not really know how long-winded certain hon. members of the Legislature will be in dealing with the estimates, but at least they will know the order.

After The Department of Municipal Affairs, we will deal with The Department of Mines; after that, The Department of Transport and then The Department of Agriculture. Following The Department of Agriculture, the Treasury and the civil service. Now that will take us forward some few days.

Tomorrow I would like to proceed with the Budget debate and the order paper. In other words, tomorrow we will not deal with any estimates. There are six speakers who wish to speak in the Budget debate and when they are finished we will go to the order paper. We will complete the town of Cochrane bill, which has been dealt with on several occasions to date, and then there are second readings I want to deal with.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.35 o'clock, p.m.

DEAR SIR:

Re: Bill No. Pr13, An Act respecting the City of London

The undersigned, as commissioners of estate bills as provided by The Legislative Assembly Act, RSO 1960, chapter 208, section 57, having had the said bill referred to us as such commissioners, now beg to report thereon.

The only section of this Act which your commissioners are required to consider is section 8 thereof and schedule B referred to in section 8. The purpose of section 8 is to confirm an agreement dated August 8, 1962 between the corporation of the county of Middlesex, the corporation of the city of London and the London Chamber of Commerce, which agreement substitutes with respect to a trust fund new provisions in place of provisions heretofore maintaining which were set out in an agreement made December 10, 1898, and confirmed by 62 Vict. chapter 56, section 1.

In lieu of the provisions hitherto in effect, the agreement of August 8, 1962, provides for

- (1) The transfer of the sum of $15,600 to the Victoria Hospital Endowment Fund, the authority for the creation of which fund is 24 Geo. V, chapter 18, section 4, and
- (2) The return to the county of Middlesex of the sum of $15,000 which had been paid by the county of Middlesex to the trustees under the provisions of the agreement of December 10, 1898.

We are of the opinion that it is reasonable that section 8 of such bill do pass into law. We are of the further opinion that the provisions of section 8 of the said bill are proper for carrying its purpose into effect and that no alterations or amendments are necessary in the said section 8.

The bill duly signed by the commissioners and the petition for the same are accordingly returned herewith.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

DEAR SIR:

Re: Bill No. Pr16, An Act respecting the Town of Thorold

1960, chapter 208, section 57, having had the said bill referred to us as such commissioners, now beg to report thereon.

Upon the hearing before us with respect to section 1 of this Act and schedule A referred to in the said section 1, the petitioner informed us that upon the hearing with respect to this bill before the private bills committee, the petitioner would ask that the following amendments be made in the draft bill:

- (a) That in clause (2) of section 1 the words, "upon a valid and subsisting charitable use within the meaning of The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act" be deleted and in the place thereof be substituted, "as and for a public park";
- (b) That in clause (4) of section 1 the words, "upon a valid and subsisting charitable use within the meaning of The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act" be deleted and in the place thereof be substituted, "as and for a public park";
- (c) That section 1 of the agreement of November 1, 1963, appearing as schedule A to the said Act be amended so that the section as amended reads as follows:

"Until the disposition thereof by the grantee with the consent of the chairman for the time being in office of the Thorold Public School Board and the board of trustees of the Roman Catholic separate schools for the town of Thorold as provided in section 2 of this grant the lands shall be held, maintained and operated as a public playground and place of recreation for the use and benefit of the general public of the town of Thorold and in particular the young people thereof."

The purpose of this section of this Act is to make more effectual the intention of the original settlor in providing a public playground for the use of the young people of the town of Thorold. The original settlor failed to make any provision for the maintenance of the public playground and the same has required the disposition and use of funds raised for elementary school purposes. The purpose of this Act is that the maintenance will now be undertaken by the municipality.

Subject to the amendments aforesaid we are of the opinion that the provisions of the said section of this Act are proper for carrying its purpose into effect and that it is reasonable that such section of the bill shall pass into law.

The bill duly signed by the commissioners and the petition for the same are accordingly returned herewith.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

DEAR SIR:

Re: Bill No. Pr18, An Act respecting the Lillian Frances Massey Treble Trust

The petition for this bill is prompted by the fact that the trusts as expressed in the will of the testatrix are no longer capable of being carried out strictly in accordance with the terms of the will; the trusts to be substituted by the bill are in conformity with the intention of the testatrix as expressed in her will as nearly as the same are now capable of being carried out.

Mr. Mills has informed the commissioners that the petitioner is the successor of the Methodist Union of the city of Toronto and has undertaken to furnish proof before the private bills committee of this fact.

While we are not suggesting that the applicant's petition should not be granted, we are of the opinion that the relief sought by this Act could have been granted under the provisions of The Variation of Trusts Act, RSO 1960, chapter 413, by an application under the said Act. We draw your attention to this as the Legislature in future may not wish to entertain applications for private bills in matters that could properly be dealt with under this Act.

Subject to the private bills committee being satisfied with the evidence furnished with respect to the petitioner being the successor of the Methodist Union of the city of Toronto we are of the opinion that it is reasonable that such bill do pass into law. We are of the further opinion that the provisions of the said bill are proper for carrying its purpose into effect and that no alterations or amendments are necessary in the bill.

The bill duly signed by the commissioners and the petition for the same are accordingly returned herewith.

*Re: Bill No. Pr25, An Act respecting
The Norfolk Hospital Association*

The undersigned, as commissioners of estate bills as provided by The Legislative Assembly Act, RSO 1960, chapter 208, section 57, having had the said bill referred to us as such commissioners, now beg to report thereon.

This bill seeks to abrogate the terms of settlement of 13 donations, gifts, devises or bequests made in favour of the petitioner, the income of which by the terms of the settlement are to be devoted to various purposes of the petitioner.

The only valid reason for interfering with the trusts attached to a benefaction by the donor to a charitable institution is that due to the circumstances prevailing, the intention of the donor as expressed in the settlement is incapable of being carried out. No such reason is alleged by the petitioner with respect to the 13 trusts involved. The attempt to override in a wholesale manner the expressed wishes of the individual settlors completely disregards the basic principles of law applicable to trustee and cestui que trust. This bill is an attempt to permit the petitioner to devote to its own purpose monies entrusted to it for administration for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the settlors. The avowed purpose of the bill is to accomplish something which in our view should not be permitted.

We recommend in the strongest terms that the bill do not become law.

The bill duly signed by the commissioners and the petition for the same are accordingly returned herewith.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servants,

(Signed)

F. G. MacKAY
ARTHUR KELLY

Commissioners of Estate Bills.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Before the orders of the day I have a question for the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett). This question has been changed several times and more recently by somebody in his department. The question now reads:

"Is the hon. Minister aware that there are many persons holding a driver's licence who have not yet received an application for its renewal? If so, what action is the hon. Minister taking for these people whose expiry date is February 28?"

In addition, I might say that there are a great many people who have sent in the money for the renewals and have not got them.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Nipissing for giving me notice of this question. All hon. members can be assured that any person entitled to a driver's licence, who for any reason has not received an application for his new driver's licence, may, by presenting his 1963 licence at any driver examination office of the department, secure a temporary driver's licence without charge, which will entitle him to drive while his application is being processed.

During this first year of our driver licensing conversion we want to ensure that no Ontario driver entitled to a driver's licence is inconvenienced in any way. For the information of hon. members I would add that in reviewing the percentage of driver's licences issued at this time in previous years, I find that there are fewer licences unissued this year than in any previous year.

Mr. Troy: Does the hon. Minister realize the situation in North Bay? I understand there is a regular schemozzle there. They may have liked the hon. Minister in Sault Ste. Marie at the workshop but they are not going to like him in North Bay.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I beg leave to table the tobacco inquiry report submitted by the committee through the chairman, Dr. Ford Stinson. I might add, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, that additional copies of the report are available from the legislative attendant at the door for those who might wish to obtain them.

I realize that not all hon. members of the House will wish to obtain copies of this report. It is a substantial volume, but for those who do wish it, they will be available at the door.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. W. B. Lewis (Humber): Mr. Speaker, although I was not afforded the privilege of addressing you during the Throne debate, I would like to take this opportunity of complimenting you on the high and honourable office you have so justly obtained. I am sure you will maintain the dignity and fair play of your predecessor, and ultimately gain an indelible mark of approval from the hon. members of this House on your performance in that most important and dignified office which you now occupy.

Mr. Speaker, it is now about three-and-one-half years since I had the honour to be appointed by the government as a member of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. Previous to that I was co-founder of the Queensway Hospital in Metropolitan Toronto, and am at present on the board of governors of that hospital.

My experience in this period has convinced me that the government and people of this province have reason to be proud of the tremendous job that is being done on their behalf, by this very active, knowledgeable and dedicated government agency. At the outset of my remarks I would like to pay tribute to the excellent contribution that was made to the commission by Dr. R. W. Ian Urquhart who retired in May of last year. Dr. Urquhart assumed the office of chairman in December, 1958, just when the hospital insurance plan was about to be launched. I am sure you will join with me in wishing Dr. Urquhart many years of happy retirement.

The commission is now under the chairmanship of Dr. John B. Neilson, one of the original members of the commission, who assumed the heavy burden of this office upon Dr. Urquhart's retirement.

Before I outline some of the activities of of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, I would like to make clear the basic responsibilities placed upon the commission by this House, under The Hospital Services Commission Act. It is the function of the commission (a) to ensure the development throughout Ontario of a balanced and integrated system of hospitals and related health facilities; (b) to administer The Public and Private Hospitals Act and regulations thereunder, and; (c) to administer a plan of hospital care and insurance under an agreement between the province of Ontario and the government of Canada.

The details involved in administering these general responsibilities are, as hon. members will imagine, many and varied. It requires a large organization, with specialized personnel and departments, to do this very complex job. At the present time, the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, with headquarters at 2195 Yonge Street, Toronto, has approximately 800 employees serving some 300 hospitals, 27,000 employed groups, and 6.3 million insured residents.

While the Ontario Hospital Services Commission does not build, own, or operate hospitals, it has the responsibility for approving the number, type, location and quality of hospital facilities throughout the province of Ontario. The provincial government, through its programme of hospital construction grants, offers incentive for communities to provide for their hospital bed needs. The initiative, however, must come from the community. The commission is willing and anxious, however, to co-operate to the n^{th} degree in assisting a community explore and recognize its true need for hospital facilities, where such need exists. This is resulting in the gradual emergence of the required balanced and integrated system of hospitals.

The commission and the hospital building committee, or the steering committee if it is a new hospital, work together right from the beginning of the planning. The hospital group meets with the commission staff to discuss the need and preliminary sketches that may be available. Following agreement on the basic consideration, the hospital engages an architect and submits preliminary plans. Acceptance of the preliminary plans by the commission entitles the hospital to proceed then to apply for the applicable federal and provincial grants.

The next step is the preparation of working drawings and the calling of tenders. When tenders have been received, and all the information relating to the financing of the project is available, the chairman of the hospital board presents a final estimate of the cost and the financing of the building project.

It is important that, with every construction project, the hospital be fully acquainted with the significance of adequate financing. Before a hospital construction programme can commence, and before any building contract is signed by the board, the commission must be assured of the adequacy of the finances to complete and commence operation of the project.

To truly appreciate the situation regarding the provision of the hospital beds, it must be remembered that, prior to the establishment of the commission, hospitals were built and extended in most cases on the basis of local demand, or what was considered to be the community's needs. The detailed statistics which are now available did not exist prior to 1959. The result was that there had to be, inevitably, an undeveloped and uneven distribution of hospital beds in many areas of the province.

This is now changing as hospital beds are being added in keeping, not only with the needs of a particular community, but also with a greater appreciation of the needs of the surrounding districts and the province as a whole.

Some thought is now being given to the value of regional hospital systems under which the hospital needs of a number of communities are met by the co-operation of the various committees through a regional organization. Briefly, the results of such regional planning should overcome duplication of hospital facilities and a development of much more efficient and economical service for the sick and injured. The monetary value of such planning is easily recognized when it is considered that the provision of an active-treatment hospital bed, with the attending facilities, represents an average capital cost of about $18,000. The annual cost of operating this bed averages $8,000. Regional hospital planning, however, would require a great deal of co-operation at the regional level, and often subjection of local desires and ambitions to the good of the greater community.

In 1959 there were 39,945 beds in the province of Ontario. This included beds in public and private hospitals, federal hospitals and nursing homes approved on a temporary basis for Ontario hospital insurance purposes in those communities where shortages of accommodation for the chronically ill exist. Today, there are some 43,670 hospital beds in all, a growth of about 7,725 beds in four years. The commission's hospital planning formula considers a total of 6.25 hospital beds — active-treatment, convalescent and chronic—per 1,000 population as adequate for our needs.

As you know, an intensive study of hospital needs in Metropolitan Toronto is under way and some reports have already been made public. The commission is pursuing these needs vigorously and is encouraged by the anticipated re-entrance of the Metropolitan Toronto council into the field of hospital construction grants.

Several new hospitals, and a number of hospital extensions, are being planned and we can expect to see a great deal of activity in this area during the years to come.

Ontario has just come through almost two decades of the most energetic programme of hospital construction in its history. As I intimated above, there will be much activity in the Metropolitan Toronto area for the next few years. However, we are past the peak of hospital construction in other parts of the province, where facilities have been provided to take care of future expansion.

It is axiomatic that there is no point in providing hospital beds at a rate faster than trained personnel can be found to serve the needs of the patients. We read a great deal these days of the so-called shortage of nurses in hospitals. It is true that in some areas, particularly in the far north, there are needs for far more nurses.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Will the hon. member tell the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) that?

Mr. W. B. Lewis: It is true, too, that at certain times in any area there can be a need for more nurses, particularly in the summer vacation months. The real problem, however, is increased demand for nursing service. Significant advances in medical treatment, a changing concept of the nurse's role in patient care, the availability of more hospital beds, public demand for more and more hospital service, the shorter length of a patient's stay in hospital resulting in the treatment of more acutely ill patients, and a shorter work week are some of the factors which have made the demand for nurses almost insatiable.

It is very enlightening, however, to realize that in 1932 the hospitals of Canada employed one graduate nurse for every 32 beds. In 1955, they employed one graduate nurse for every six beds and in 1962, one graduate nurse for every 2.7 beds. In Ontario last year, the active-treatment public hospitals had a full-time graduate nurse on staff for every 2.3 beds.

Nursing service and nursing education staffs in the hospitals of Ontario increased by about 50 per cent in the years between 1959 and 1962, appreciably higher than the 31 per cent average increase in the number for all services in other types of industry. In the same period, the number of hospital beds rose by 17 per cent. About 70 per cent of the total cost of hospital care is to pay for salaries and wages. About half of this is paid to personnel in the nursing departments.

Prior to 1959, hospitals were often referred to as depressed industry insofar as salaries and wages were concerned. But with the dawn of a plan adequate to meet the financial needs of hospitals and the people they serve, hospital employees are now being paid, by and large, on a par with their friends in comparable occupations in the community. This, you will agree, is fair and reasonable. Not only are hospital employees better paid, they are now enjoying a shorter work week and receiving greater fringe benefits through the introduction of a pension plan, group life insurance and participation in the cost of premiums by the hospital for health and welfare benefits.

The Ontario Hospital Services Commission, as one would expect, is very much interested in the recruitment of capable students into specialized hospital careers by doing whatever is possible to create an atmosphere in which recruitment can flourish through the good offices of the various volunteer professional agencies.

At the present time there are 63 schools of nursing in Ontario, with a total enrolment of 8,299 students. The number of nurses graduating grows each year. To illustrate this, in 1961 there were 2,137 graduates; in 1963, 2,333 and 2,526 are projected for 1964. About 60 of these graduates will be from the Nightingale School of Nursing, which was established in 1959 under the auspices of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission.

One significant step in nursing education is the planned introduction of regional schools of nursing in selected areas. The regional school, operated by its own board of directors, would consolidate the administrative and instructional staffs so as to better utilize their services and those of the clinical facilities of a number of hospitals in the area.

This is a departure from the traditional hospital school of nursing responsible to a single hospital board. Three such regional schools are now being developed. One of these is planned by the Ryerson Institute in Toronto, and the first class is expected to open in the fall of 1964. A second regional school, it is hoped, will be launched in Hamilton this year. A third is planned for the earliest possible time in Ottawa.

Another school of the regional type is being planned for Toronto in the fall of 1964, but for the special purpose of making nursing education available to the more mature woman over 30 years of age who wishes to enter a new career, perhaps after having raised a family. Or simply, they may wish a change from the career in which they have been engaged. It is anticipated that graduates of this school will provide a stable group to meet nursing service needs.

I doubt if there is anyone in this House who is not aware of the fact that the hospital insurance plan in Ontario, like those in other parts of Canada, was established to deal with a chronic problem of rising hospital costs. This perennial increase in the costs of hospital care is not peculiar to Ontario or to Canada. Indeed, many other countries have had the same experience throughout the post-war years, one notable example being our great and friendly neighbour to the south, the United States of America.

The reasons for the continuing upward curve in the cost of hospital care are many. Some are obvious, others are not so apparent. The most obvious reason, of course, is the fact that hospitals, like everyone else, are obliged to pay more for everything they buy, whether it is the service of their employees or the commodities necessary for the care of patients.

As I pointed out earlier, when we compare 1964 with 1958, we find hospital employees are now better paid. They work a shorter work week and are enjoying much the same fringe benefits as their friends in industry.

It is no secret to the average householder that the cost of drugs, food, medical supplies, and other commodities have increased year by year. Hospitals, too, are not immune to rising costs and they cannot risk the cheaper commodities to save money at the expense of good patient care.

Two other important factors contributing to the increased costs of the plan are that we now have more people living in Ontario, but more people are insured and eligible for benefits, and we now have more hospital beds than ever before. More hospital beds, of course, means more patients are being treated and this adds to the total cost. As I said previously, there has been an increase of some 7,725 beds in this province over the past four years; and, as I also mentioned, the cost to service these beds is about $8,000 a year each.

Other factors, not so apparent, which contribute to the cost for hospital care are such things as: (a) new, costly treatment techniques which prolong life and improve health but require a greater use of hospitals, more skilled personnel, more facilities, more drugs, more expensive supplies; and (b) the greater medical use of hospitals because of increased public confidence in the services hospitals provide.

Many of the factors affecting the cost of hospital care are beyond the control of hospitals and the commission. However, in those areas where co-operation can cut costs, we find most hospital boards and their administrators not only willing, but anxious to work with us.

In 1959, the number of public hospital days used annually per thousand of population in Ontario was 1,627. In 1963, this was 1,812 days, an increase of 185 days.

The full meaning of this increase in the use of hospitals becomes clearer when we realize that, today, one day of care per thousand of population in the province costs the plan close to $150,000. Multiplied by 185, we find the total bill has gone up over $27 million for this one item alone.

Let us look for a moment now to what has happened in the cost to the commission for one day of care for an insured hospital patient, and what it adds to the total bill.

In 1959, the average cost per patient day in public, private and federal hospitals, and approved nursing homes, was $16.16. In 1963, this cost is estimated at $22. Here again, as a good Scot would say, many a mickle maks a muckle. In 1963, the residents of Ontario used just over 13 million days of hospital care, and final figures will probably show that some 12,750,000 were prepaid through the commission. For every ten cents per patient day increase in cost, therefore, the commission faces an additional expenditure of close to $1.3 million.

As the average cost per day has gone up about $5 since 1959, this item accounts for a further increase in cost to the plan of some $65 million. The commission takes very seriously the cost of hospital care, and is engaged in many activities designed to help hospitals keep these costs realistic and under control.

The first and most direct endeavour to maintain the cost of hospital care at a reasonable level is the encouragement given to all hospital boards, administrative and medical staff, to be prudent in their expenditures. Also, careful study is made of each hospital budget for the ensuing year.

I would be remiss if I did not, at this point, pay tribute to the conscientious effort to control costs that is put forth by the men and women of many hospitals. They are encouraged and assisted by visits of commission personnel both before and after their budget is reviewed. The hospital finance committee, which reviews each budget prior to approval by the commission, is made up of people who are widely experienced in hospital administration and finance. They take into consideration the projected costs for each department, in the light of past experience with that hospital and expected patient services for the coming year.

This is no rubber-stamp operation. Certain carefully developed standards are applied to ensure that the budget requirements are reasonable for that particular hospital. It is not the desire of the commission to be arbitrary or inflexible where special consideration is justifiable; but the commission never forgets its responsibility to the people of this province to exert every effort to keep costs within the funds available for health purposes.

Very often the difference between reasonable and unreasonable costs for hospital care is a matter of the degree of efficiency in the operation of the hospital, and efficiency can be affected by physical facilities or by the lack of an objective view of established methods of operation. To assist hospitals to attain greater efficiency and economy, the commission has a staff of consultants who have wide training and practical experience in such fields as hospital administration, hospital finance, medical service, nursing education and nursing service, medical records, nutrition, and architecture. Consultants in other specialties will be added to the staff as the needs arise.

These consultants visit hospitals regularly, and are providing assistance which is very valuable, not only to the hospitals but to the people of Ontario. As an example, the nursing consultants, in addition to their regular visits to hospitals, have conducted 150 extensive studies of nursing units in 48 hospitals. On the basis of these studies they have been able to make constructive recommendations to the hospital boards concerned.

Pervading all the activities of the commission, whether they be related to the provision of hospital beds, the review of budgets, or the provision of consulting services, is the philosophy of maximum possible autonomy for local hospital boards. The commission is convinced that maintaining the greatest possible degree of local pride and interest in community hospitals is the best means of obtaining efficiency and economy in their operation.

The problem of completely centralized control in such a complex and highly specialized service as hospitals will be obvious to the hon. members of this House. It is with a great deal of pride that the government of Ontario, with the unanimous vote of this House, passed the legislation which made possible the launching of the Ontario hospital insurance plan. It is with equal pride that we have observed, through the years since January 1, 1959, the smooth operation, in growth and in service, to the people of our province.

Beginning with an enrolment of 5,350,000 residents on January 1, 1959, or about 91 per cent of the eligible population, participation in the plan has continued to grow so that as of December, 1963, the number of persons insured was 6,370,168, representing 98.1 per cent of the eligible population. The total cost of the plan, because of the factors outlined a few minutes ago, has affected the cost of hospital care, the increased number of persons insured and the number of hospital beds available in the province, and has risen from $161 million in 1959 to an estimated $279 million in 1963. The estimated cost for 1964 is $320 million. These figures include administration, which is only about two per cent of the total cost of the plan.

I will not dwell on the financial details of the commission, as these have been dealt with by the hon. Minister of Health. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like you to think, with me for a moment, of the tremendous social benefit of a plan which relieves some one million hospital in-patients a year of worry regarding the care they receive. Averages do not mean very much to the individual who has a hospital bill two or three times the average cost per patient.

But just looking at the average cost in 1963 of about $270 per patient makes us realize what a feeling of peace of mind must come over the working man when he is told there is nothing for him to pay for even with this amount of service. Projecting ourselves, as it were, into the other fellow's shoes in situations like this can help us clearly understand the true value of this plan, which has been held as the most significant step in human betterment taken in Ontario for many generations.

It might be appropriate for me to explain briefly the cost per day now, as compared with the accommodation rate charged prior to the introduction of the plan. If you were admitted to hospital before the end of 1958, you would have paid a daily rate for your accommodation, meals and general nursing service; plus additional charges for special services you receive, such as use of the operating room, X-rays, drugs, and so on. If you were in hospital ten days and your bill was $170, which was not uncommon in those days, you had paid an all-inclusive rate of $17 a day. Because practically every hospital bill is now paid by the commission, the cost per day is figured on an all-inclusive basis, with the special services averaged over all patients rather than specifically charged to an individual.

This is the most efficient method under today's circumstances. I explain this because when the all-inclusive rate was first introduced many people thought standard ward costs had jumped from $9 a day to $17 a day. I am afraid this impression still holds in some quarters. It is the commission's policy to administer the hospital insurance plan in a manner that will enable the residents of this province to obtain maximum benefits when the need for hospital care arises. To this end, a constant endeavour is made to increase the number of persons participating, and to help those already registered, to maintain their eligibility for the very comprehensive benefits of the plan.

Large though it is, this plan is not without a heart. The specific circumstances of the individual are carefully considered in cases where there is some doubt as to a patient's entitlement to the benefits of the plan. I know that I, personally in a number of instances, have had occasion to ask that an individual case be studied in the light of extenuating circumstances. I have always found that the special committee which handles these compassionate situations has always been most fair without, of course, loosely paying a bill when there is no basis for doing so.

The commission conducts a regular public information programme each year to inform the public of how the plan works under changing personal circumstances. One of the highlights of this programme is the annual mailing of literature to high schools, colleges and universities to alert senior students to the action they should take when they turn age 19, if they marry or if they take vacation employment. This involves mailing some 150 thousand pieces of literature to 640 high schools and 200 other educational institutions. We are very grateful to The Department of Education, the boards and principals of high schools, and the administration of colleges and universities for their co-operation in making this programme the success it is.

In summing up this very general outline of a most detailed operation, I would like to say there is no simple answer to the problem of providing hospital care in Ontario, or anywhere else. It is a very complex community service because you are dealing with sick people, you are providing round-the-clock service and you are faced with a very costly operation under the best of circumstances.

The maze of consideration of problems involved in the provision of hospital care is beyond the ken of most laymen. However, the people of this province have every reason to be confident in the quality of the organization to whom they have entrusted the recognition and solution of these problems, namely, the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. Through the commission for the first time in our history we have the knowledge that something constructive is being done towards providing for the people of Ontario the best possible system of hospitals, in keeping with sound, efficient, economic administration. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this Budget debate, having not taken part in the Throne debate, I wish to give you my congratulations on being elected to this high office. Knowing you since 1955, I knew you were well prepared to fill this honourable position. You have demonstrated to us, over the last number of weeks, that you are fair and impartial. Mr. Speaker, I wish you well.

As for the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), a man for whom I have the highest respect, I wish to congratulate him on his presentation of the Budget within the last few days. It seems to me that every time he presents the Budget, he improves. The Budget this year was different from last year with the announcement of more taxes which will fall very heavily on a large segment of our population. In the increase in tax monies, with other increased revenues, this government will take from the people of Ontario an estimated $136 million more in 1964 and 1965. With the increase in gasoline tax and fuel oil and licence fees, the revenues from highways in this province will exceed expenditures this year by an estimate of $10 million. This is the first time this has happened since I became a member of this Ontario Legislature.

With expenditure up over $100 million, and with these increases in revenue, the province still will have nearly the same deficit as it did in 1963 and 1964. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we still have increased taxes and still deficit financing in the same way in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of this province were surprised to learn of these new taxes and deficit financing, after hearing so much about good government, and so many things done, in September.

Mr. Speaker, I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) that we have a planned Budget to develop the province of Ontario. Then, Mr. Speaker, it would give some hope to the people of Ontario that something was being done to get away from this continuous deficit financing, increased debt, and increased taxes.

Mr. Speaker, since the last time I spoke on the Budget, we have come through a provincial election. The people have spoken, and I abide by their decision. However, I would like to relate one of the tactics used, during the last election campaign, in my part of the province. It was a surprise to me and a disappointment to a number of people who supported the Conservative Party.

Because of the building of part of Highway 401, a four-lane expressway in the riding of Kent East this last year, some of the township roads across this provincial highway had to be closed. It was impossible to keep all these roads open due to cost. As the province could not afford to build flyovers over every road, the ones less travelled were closed.

The road to which I refer is a county line between two great counties in this province, the county of Kent and the county of Elgin. We appeared before the municipal board and protested the closing of this county line. They went along with The Department of Highways and said there were sufficient roads in this area to take care of the traffic.

After some time a citizen from the area wanted to discuss this with the former Minister of Highways, the present hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass). We contacted the hon. Minister; he agreed to meet a delegation; we were well received and treated with courtesy, but the hon. Minister said it was impossible to keep all these roads open and there were sufficient roads in that area to take care of the traffic.

After some time had passed, a reshuffle of the Cabinet had taken place, and the present hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) took over the portfolio. The citizens, after hearing this, were of the opinion that maybe the new hon. Minister of Highways might have a different opinion as to the opening of these roads. I was asked to make an appointment with the hon. Minister, a delegation came to Toronto, and again we were informed that the situation would be looked into and we would be informed. A short time later we received the following reply: "There are sufficient roads to take care of the existing traffic and this road will be closed." Up went the signs, "Road Closed," on a certain date.

An election was called, and during the election campaign some of the municipal officials contacted the Tory candidate and asked him if he could do anything to keep this county line open. In a few days, Mr. Speaker, the signs were down. Then the news spread; if this Tory candidate can do this he can probably do many other great things. So they said they would vote for him.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that great wagering went on between Liberals and Conservatives during the election campaign over the signs being removed—the Liberals wagering that the signs would be erected one day after the election on September 26, the Conservatives wagering that these signs would never be erected. I must say, Mr. Speaker, no one won their bets, because these signs were placed on that road two days after the election, on September 27.

Mr. Speaker, the government misled voters who supported its party all over Ontario. I know these people very well—you only mislead them once—and I know they will not support the Conservative Party when the next election comes along.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Has that fellow been appointed sheriff yet?

Mr. Spence: Not yet.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something about Highway 401. The Department of Highways, this past summer, completed the two north lanes of this expressway. Now we have two lanes completed from the Quebec border to Windsor, a distance of 520 miles. There is nothing wrong with these two lanes whatsoever; they are exceptionally well built. But it was our hope the four lanes would be completed before this highway would be officially opened.

However, it was not; and we had a situation there where The Department of Highways was funnelling four-lane traffic into two-lane traffic—from Windsor at one point, and Toronto and London from the other point—at a speed of 60 miles an hour. In this portion of the two-lane link there were two provincial highways which crossed this expressway, with no interchanges built. Public school children had to cross this expressway in order to attend public school.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that 22 hours after this road was officially opened, a little girl was killed. This shocked the whole community. There have been too many deaths, too many accidents, in too short a time, on this two-lane link of Highway 401 in the counties of Elgin and Kent. I find, as well as many other citizens, that when I start to cross this highway it is very hard to judge the distance of on-coming vehicles at a speed of 60 miles an hour. I would say, Mr. Speaker, better planning is needed by The Department of Highways in the province of Ontario.

I say this for two reasons. In the county of Elgin, two county roads are slated for interchanges. Land has been surveyed, fenced, and some work done, but the interchanges are not there. Two businessmen applied for permits from the department to build places of business outside the future interchanges. Permits were granted by The Department of Highways, buildings were erected, and these men are now operating in full swing. Then, less than a year after these places of business had been built, The Department of Highways notified these businessmen that, "We need your land for a newly designed cloverleaf." These businessmen will demand the cost of these buildings, plus inconvenience, loss of business, which is estimated on two county roads in the county of Elgin to be in the neighbourhood of $100,000. We read in the press that this change may take place at every cloverleaf of this design right across the province.

A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Provincial Treasurer announced increases in taxes. If planning like this is going on across the province, it is no wonder we need more money.

A few years ago we listened to this government tell us that it had a 20-year highway programme for this province—and now it is opening a two-lane highway link with four-lane traffic coming into it, thus creating a hazard to the travelling public.

Only last year The Department of Transport gave in its estimates $325,000 for highway safety yet the department itself is creating a hazard. I would say this for the hon. Minister of Highways, he came down in this area and said that Highway 401 was delayed by costs. I do not blame the hon. Minister, Mr. Speaker. I blame the government.

Mr. Speaker, we have a new hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). I was impressed a few days ago to hear his maiden speech in this honourable assembly. I was somewhat disappointed that he did not say anything about future decentralization of industry in this province.

This province of Ontario, I would say, is out of balance. We have cities, towns and villages greatly in need of industry. This problem has been with us for many years and this government is not doing anything to correct the situation. We are fast becoming like some of the South American countries. Oh yes, we hear the hon. Provincial Treasurer say decentralization of industries is a benefit to all. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking about our towns, villages and cities that are standing still as far as industries are concerned. The people of these communities are determined to educate their children, and give them the best education possible. But with the building of new schools, the high cost of education and therefore the increase in their taxes, many feel they cannot afford much more taxation.

These towns and villages need water and sewage systems and other improvements, but the citizens vote them down because they feel they are unable to afford any new taxes. They lack industries in their towns. The high cost of education and the increase in hospitalization payments has overtaxed their budget.

Another beef of citizens is that after they educate their children there is no employment in their community. In order to make a living, they have to be exported to the fast-developing areas or go to the country to the south where wages are very attractive. It costs a great deal to educate a child, and when they are qualified to contribute to the municipality there is nothing there to encourage them to stay. This is the condition of a great many of our towns and villages. There is no assurance in the offing that this condition will be remedied.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago we heard a great oration in regard to the Ontario Water Resources Commission, which now comes under The Department of Energy. These speeches are very convincing and well prepared—as if the water problem in this province is solved. Moving the Ontario Water Resources Commission from one portfolio to another is not the answer and it certainly is not going to improve the situation.

A few years ago we learned, in this honourable assembly, that the first water system built under the Ontario Water Resources Commission was built in the great county of Essex, for which at that time the government had a member on their side of the House. After September 25 last, Essex South elected a Liberal member, Mr. Speaker. This makes me believe that this government has not the right solution for the water problem of our many municipalities.

Just a few words, Mr. Speaker, about agriculture in the province this past year. Agriculture has suffered from the lack of sufficient rainfall during the past year. This was one of our driest years in many parts of the province. This created a great hardship on many of our farmers. They had to draw water for their livestock. But I know those farmers who had to draw water will appreciate that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) is going to try to give them some assistance. However in many cases, this is not a permanent solution to our water problem.

Another great problem that the farmers faced was the shortage of farm help, especially in southwestern Ontario. They needed help to harvest the fruit and vegetable crops. This was a great loss to many producers and a great concern as well. They also have this concern for the coming year, Mr. Speaker. In 1963 some of the producers were unable to harvest some of their crops. These conditions also existed to some extent in 1961, worsened in 1962 and became very serious in 1963.

With the shortage of farm labour, wages skyrocketed. Some producers paid wages so exorbitant that when the harvest was completed they had little left from the crop proceeds. Also, these producers, after paying such high wages to harvest the crop, in some cases found out the processors were unable to take this crop at that time since they did not have sufficient labour themselves to keep their plants operating at full capacity.

The reason, of course, for the shortage of farm labour is the lack of workmen's compensation benefits in cases of accident. Also, there is no unemployment insurance. Naturally, those in the labour force make every effort to secure employment in industry and construction, where they are covered by these benefits. If nothing is done to provide a good labour force to harvest these crops in southwestern Ontario in 1964, Mr. Speaker, there are many of these producers who are not going to plant crops. This will be a great loss to the producers, processors and to the economy of southwestern Ontario.

I ask the government, Mr. Speaker, to set up a committee to study the feasibility of a select labour corps. I would also like to say that high school students have been very satisfactory in the past, but they have to return to school in the middle of the harvest and this leaves the producer crippled and without help at all. This problem has to be solved, Mr. Speaker, before another crop is planted. A sufficient labour force to harvest these crops is needed in southwestern Ontario. I will say the national employment offices in southwestern Ontario have made a great effort to solve this problem. I think it is a problem for the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) to give some assistance to the national employment offices and see that there is a select labour force made available from August 15 to October 15 to take care of this problem facing the fruit and vegetable men in southwestern Ontario.

I ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of Labour to call a meeting of the federal people, the provincial people, the producers, the processors and make every effort to solve this problem before the harvest in 1964.

I would like to say, too, that there is a tremendous cost involved to plant these crops. It involves hundreds and hundreds of dollars to produce a crop up to harvest time. Then you find when it comes to harvest there is not enough help available and it can be very bleak for the producer. I know these cash crops are not grown in all parts of Ontario, but there could be a labour force available in northern Ontario. We read that there is a large Indian population in the north. I would suggest the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Minister of Labour and the federal people, the processors, the producers and all concerned, arrange a meeting to discuss the problem. I think there is a possibility that if they do this they could solve the problems of the fruit and vegetable growers in 1964.

I would like to say here before closing, Mr. Speaker, that I was somewhat disappointed when just before I started my remarks I received the report of the inquiry committee of the Ontario flue-cured tobacco industry and did not have too much time to study it. But maybe there will be an opportunity to do so in time for the estimates of The Department of Agriculture.

Another matter I would like to discuss is a uniform date for the adoption and discontinuance of daylight saving time in this province. In my part of the province this time is very confusing. A few days ago one of my hon. colleagues on this side of the House, and an hon. member on the other side, made some statements along the line that I am thinking. I think it is time this government made up their mind to make an effort to have a date set for the adoption and a date set for discontinuing daylight saving time right across the province. This leaves great confusion in our part of the province. It certainly affects the manufacturing industries that are situated in that area. We find one county on standard time, another county not reverting back to standard time, one reverting back to standard time on September 1, and another county on the other side of us not reverting to standard time until the end of October. This has caused confusion in homes. This makes double meals in many homes. Many of the district high schools last year were on standard time and many of our public schools were on daylight saving time. This is one of the greatest confusions that we have in that part of the province. I ask this government to make up its mind and do something to have a uniform date for adoption and discontinuance of daylight saving time in this province. I thank you.

Mr. F. Guindon (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, first may I take a moment to pay tribute to you on your elevation to such a high office? Things will not be the same around the St. Lawrence Parks Commission, sir. We will miss you, but your many friends wish me to convey their best wishes for your continued good health and success.

I would be remiss at this time if I neglected to congratulate the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts), not only on his great victory at the polls, but even more on the calibre of our new members. Throughout the debates, it has been a delightful and refreshing experience to listen to such well prepared and well delivered speeches. The many good points that have been brought out, and the energy and zeal in their presentation by our new members augurs well for the future of our party and the government of Ontario.

I know how many of our new hon. members feel, because, in a way this is also my maiden speech. There is a difference, however, because today I will not be making my first maiden speech, but I sincerely hope that this, my maiden speech from the government side of the Legislature, in behalf of the county of Stormont, in 13 years, will be my last "maiden speech" and that I will now become known as that perennial member for Stormont.

Mr. Speaker, may we pause here, and let us remember that our democratic way of life makes for changes, yes, even in this Legislature. Today I would like to pay tribute to my predecessor, Mr. Peter Manley. Although we are of different political views, we were and are good friends. He is a true gentleman and I, together with all hon. members, wish him well for the future.

The impact made by our Conservative victory in Stormont has had a resounding effect on the federal Liberals, and their surge of activity throughout the county bears mute testimony of this fact. There has been a ready flow of guest speakers from Ottawa, and at this very moment they are promising a federal women's prison, to be built in Cornwall. I believe, however, that Stormont has realized the meaning of good government and will long be one of our strongholds. The efforts of this government will assure continued loyalty.

I would like to present, briefly, some facts concerning the county of Stormont, which I now have the honour to represent. When the seaway and power projects were started in 1954, the county of Stormont was faced with many developments that kept it at a standstill for some time. Because of the land needed for the creation of the headpond, for the Robert Saunders Generating Station, industries were closed and moved to other locations. Sixty-five hundred people were uprooted and moved into the new townsites; much valuable industrial riverfront property was lost to the area. During the construction period, a short-lived boom took place. This only lasted for the duration of the projects. The whole area was in somewhat of a turmoil. Major changes of planning could and did take place before the completion that discouraged business enterprise.

Therefore, it was next to impossible to entice private industry into the area until the work forces completed their task. Then, all of a sudden, the contractors were laying off workers by the hundreds. Yes, and hundreds more left the area for greener fields. Unfortunately, these represented the upper class income bracket, a further loss to the area. Stormont was hit with a recession of the worst kind. Finally it was proclaimed a "depressed area" and plunged to a nine-percent unemployment mark. Some industries have been attracted to the area since, but these have not kept pace with the job requirements. We are working hard to lure industry which will mould a sound economy for the county of Stormont. Our new townsites of Ingleside and Long Sault need industrial help to replace their losses in their former locations, and I am asking this government to help in this important issue.

At one time, Cornwall was connected by railway to the nation's capital, Ottawa. Of course this went by the boards with the erection of the new international bridge, which caused the demolition of the previous railway bridge. We never did enjoy a direct highway link with the city of Ottawa. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, Stormont is the only riding in eastern Ontario that does not enjoy the connecting highway between highways 17 and 2, or have the benefit of a direct route to Ottawa.

If we are going to expand our industrial scope and better our economy, this highway is a must, and I would ask the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) to give this matter his very urgent attention.

As hon. members know, we have the new St. Lawrence Parks Commission in our area, and presently I have the honour of being the acting chairman. Much credit is due the hon. George Challies, the original planner and the first chairman, for his foresight and the history-making achievements of the commission throughout the St. Lawrence valley. His judgment, wisdom and patience will allow future generations to relive their proud heritage by visiting places like Upper Canada Village, which depicts life in Ontario from 1784 to 1867, and commemorates the Battle of Crysler Farm. Then, too, there is Fort Henry at Kingston and many beautiful campsite areas and beaches reaching from the Bay of Quinte to the Quebec border.

However, I was keenly disappointed to find a substantial reduction in our budget for 1964. Eventually our parks, which are government built, owned and operated, will be a revenue producer. We will be called upon this year to run a project, still only 75 per cent completed, with a sum inadequate even to cover operating expenses much less provide a reserve to complete the job. In 1963 we were unable to meet the demand for campsites. More of these should be readied at once. We are presently building an 18-hole golf course which should prove a major attraction. A vintage cheddar cheese factory and darker bake-ovens are under construction and because of the necessity of period authenticity, the cost of construction is somewhat higher. It is hoped that our budget will be looked upon favourably to allow us to complete the job without delay.

A higher proportion of educated people is a must for the future welfare of Stormont. The Eastern Ontario Institute of Technology has been located in Ottawa. There are many students in Stormont who will have to forego the available training, due to the high cost of commuting to, and living in, Ottawa. May I direct a request to the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) to explore the possibility of helping students, by approving a vocational centre for the city of Cornwall?

Our hon. Prime Minister deserves much credit for his stand toward national unity. His visit to Quebec City last year has given him the stature of a statesman. His programme has endeared him to the hearts of all French Canadian people. His efforts, of course, were certainly remembered in Cornwall. We believe Stormont to be the showcase of Canada in proving beyond theory, that people of different racial, religious and cultural backgrounds can live side by side in happy harmony, enjoying each other's cultures and beliefs. Race, religion, colour and creed are just so many words in Stormont. We believe people are people, to be treated as one, without fear or favour. This is just another reason why the county of Stormont is so important to the future welfare of our province.

The county of Stormont ranks high in the dairy industry in Ontario. During 1963, 11,000 milk producers shipped their milk daily to our nine cheese plants. In the first ten months of 1963, Stormont produced almost 8,000,000 pounds of cheddar, a production second in Ontario only to that of the county of Prescott. Cheese makers of Stormont won many honours for the county during 1963, both in Canada and overseas. They have won top prizes at the Western Cheese Show held at London, Ontario, in January, 1963, the cheese shows at the Ottawa Winter Fair, the Royal Winter Fair, Toronto, and at the Belleville cheese show. Stormont cheese has won many prizes in the past at the Royal Dairy Show which is held annually in London, England. We are also very proud of the fact that a Stormont county girl, Miss Carolyn Murray of Martintown, is this year's Canadian Dairy Princess.

Stormont's cheese production in 1962 was almost 9,000,000 pounds and in the first ten months of 1963, this figure showed an increase of 9.6 per cent over the similar period of 1962. Yet, we still have lots of room for prospective manufacturers and for all types of dairy industry in Stormont and will welcome any and all newcomers. We are very conscious of our cheese markets abroad. Our cheddar cheese right now is at a premium on the British market. We cannot afford to lose this market. Recent happenings in cheese manufacture in one of our plants show some cause for alarm and in this vein I would ask that both federal and provincial governments get together, at once.

There are several active local associations in Stormont such as the Eastern Ontario

Development Association; the Seaway Valley Travel Council; the Cornwall Board of Trade; the Long Sault Chamber of Commerce; the Ingleside Chamber of Commerce and the Cornwall Tourist Association, all working to promote more industrial and tourist activity throughout Stormont. This is one of the reasons that makes me press so strongly for the completion of the St. Lawrence Parks campsites. I believe that we must get these groups together and better co-ordinate their efforts. But first we must ensure that we have enough accommodation to look after the added number of tourists that could result. I will be asking the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) for some assistance in this vein in the very near future.

A major problem still confronts the area at the western approaches to the city of Cornwall, where Ontario Hydro built the dyke enclosing Lake St. Lawrence. Efforts will be made to have a joint meeting of all interested parties, such as Ontario Hydro, Cornwall city council and Cornwall township representatives, to see what joint action can be taken to clean up this mess. The Ontario Water Resources Commission could well be interested in the green sludge water which remains in the excavations left by the borrow pits used in the dyke erection. Once drained, this could be usable land, providing a scenic route to the city of Cornwall or the Robert Saunders Generating Station.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the situation in Stormont. We have a magnificent valley of hope, shadowed over by the clouds of recession. We feel that we have gone through unusual and trying times, have been pushed and jolted by forces beyond our control. To some degree, Stormont has been the victim of the rest of Ontario's progress. We have no intention of sitting in a corner whimpering about this. We realize that nothing can come about unless we, the people of Stormont, bend every effort to assure our own future. Our location is ideal for any type of industrial or agricultural development. We urgently need the help such ventures can give. God knows, we need the help—now.

Mr. Speaker, with the aid of this government in securing such industry for Stormont, I can promise a future for our county unexcelled in Ontario. I fervently hope that I can count on the support of the hon. members to achieve these aims.

Mr. Speaker, Stormont is considered the most bilingual county in Canada. As such, one would expect the member to speak in both languages as I have done on many occasions. However, I do not want to take too much time of the House and I will close my remarks with a few words of praise for your kind gesture, Mr. Speaker, in making bilingual stenographers available to many members.

Monsieur le Président: L'une des qualités précieuses de la culture française c'est sa sensibilité qui lui permet le vibrer au diapason de la délicatesse qu'on lui témoigne. Cette délicatesse vous l'avez manifestée ouvertement lorsque, pour la première fois dans l'histoire de cette assemblée législative, le Président a décidé, de son propre chef, de mettre à notre disposition deux charmantes sténographes bilingues.

Je serais un bien pauvre héritier de cette culture, Monsieur le Président, si j'oubliais de signaler combien votre courtoisie à notre égard nous a profondément touchés. De ce fait, vous avez rendu notre travail non seulement plus agréable mais aussi beaucoup plus efficace. Je suis donc très heureux de vous rendre ce témoignage public de notre reconnaissance et j'ose espérer que vos successeurs se feront un devoir d'en perpétuer la tradition.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am going to be on as long this afternoon as I had planned. I do not like speaking to an empty House, so maybe you and I can have a friendly chat. We have done it on many occasions, and so we will take it from there.

I want to compliment you on the position you are at least holding for the afternoon. You are doing a mighty good job, I may say, and after Mr. Speaker comes back you can convey to him my best wishes for a good job being well done up to the moment. What can happen from here on in, one does not know, but you can rest assured that if he is off base at all we will be the first to criticize him.

However, I would like to compliment the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), too, for coming up with a majority of something like 77 members in the last election. He must have promised the people of this province a lot of good, because in his speeches around the province—I know he came down into that great riding of Niagara Falls in the county of Welland.

I did not know whether I should speak to the hon. members from some notes—I have bags full of them—or whether I should speak from practical experience, from things I have heard from the people pertaining to how this government treats them.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): That is the better way.

Mr. Bukator: That is the better way, the hon. leader of our party agrees with me, and maybe that is the proper approach. Except one should have a few notes to get the show on the road.

I will refer to a little clipping I picked up in the local paper. As a matter of fact, maybe I should make reference to Bill No. 163, An Act respecting medical insurance. That came into existence just about a year ago, for the first reading on April 23, 1963. I took it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Prime Minister himself must have passed this for the next two readings because I was not in the House at the time, and I am very seldom out. I thought possibly the bill had received its second and third reading, and we had Medicare, simply because there was a bit of a clipping in the local paper, with a nice picture of the hon. Prime Minister, and it says something like this:

ACTION ON MEDICARE

Everyone has talked about it. Your Conservative government took action. Everyone, regardless of age or health, will be able to participate in the full non-cancellable medical coverage without compulsion.

Mr. W. B. Lewis (Humber): Done! It is done.

Mr. Bukator: All they did not say, in that particular account, is that one would have to pay for it. We took it for granted then that some people would get relief, at least the ones who are entitled to it, so I read on a little farther and it says:

Where necessary, the provincial government will pay the cost for those unable to do so.

This increase in the rates for hospitalization—I would like to say to the hon. member for Humber who made reference to that particular commission this afternoon that he did a very good job, on behalf of the commission, that is.

But let us look at it from the point of view of the man in the street. The increase in his premium is at least 50 per cent. I did not get down to the final cent because so many have already done that, and it is in the record anyhow, but it is a mighty large burden for people to bear. I do not think a person who is on a pension plan, I do not believe that an individual who is on a fixed income, I do not believe that people who are getting $65 or $75 a month, are getting too much.

They did get an increase of $10 from the federal government, I might say, after a bit of prodding. They did give it to the people, and then along comes the province and takes at least 25 per cent of it away from them by way of a premium on hospitalization. So I would think that when the hon. Prime Minister himself had this in the paper he should have checked to find out whether this really did exist.

We do not have a medical care plan in this province. The only ones that we have are the ones that we had before he made his speech. We could have bought them, and we have bought them, so under the circumstances we have nothing more than Bill No. 163, which has had its first reading and is since waiting for the committee to come to some conclusion.

An hon. member: He is going on a trip now, he has got a folder there.

Mr. Bukator: I hope the hon. Prime Minister makes that first stop in Niagara Falls. He will find it very pleasant there this time of the year. If he is looking at the possibility of travelling, one of my colleagues—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I have been in Niagara Falls before.

Mr. Bukator: Has the hon. Prime Minister?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I know what it is like.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): No use going back; he is here forever.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Pretty sterile.

Mr. Whicher: Did he call on Judy over there?

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this a bit further and in a more serious vein. There are a lot of people who cannot afford to pay the premiums for hospitalization. They need assistance.

I hope, before this session is over, that this bill will come into existence. I hope this committee can report and tell us that the ones who are needy should get the required assistance financially. I have always said that people who are on fixed incomes, who have to pick up the increase in taxes annually—and most of the increases today are for school purposes—these people of the past, the older people, the senior citizens, have paid their bill for education and I do not believe that they should be constantly burdened with added expenses when they have a limited number of dollars to go around.

As for the medical plan and the promises of this government—they are not really. I would like to read that because it impressed me and I felt good. It said, about action on medical care, that everyone has talked about it but the Conservative government took action. Action they took, but the results of their action we have not yet come by.

On the question of minimum wage, I mentioned this in the House before, but I think it bears repeating: "Minimum wage is set"—this was put in our local papers again. I might say, for the benefit of those who live in part of this "golden horseshoe" from Oshawa to Hamilton, I do believe the minimum is 85 cents per hour for ladies and $1 for the men. That exists only in that small portion, or half of the "horseshoe." The rest of the area has not—

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): It is a question mark, not a horseshoe.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, that is right. My hon. colleague says it is a question mark, not a horseshoe.

Niagara Falls has a large tourist industry, as most of you know. They hire summer help and they hire these people at below the minimum wage. I believe that they should get some recognition. I believe the hon. Minister did promise that before the session was over we would get a report from him. I hope that it is spread out a little bit more, possibly across the province as a whole.

I would like to mention that many of our people were very disturbed about a report in the paper last year which said the minimum wage would apply, and then we did not get it.

I first started out to speak, not in a general way for the Legislature of the province, for I felt that many of my hon. colleagues are very able to do just that and to deal with the bills. I feel that I am a little bit more at home when I speak about my own riding. So with your indulgence I would like to get on the record again some of the speeches that I have made here for the last four years, and apparently which have fallen on deaf ears.

Maybe in this instance I can persuade you to see the plight of our people, to see the position that some of them are in pertaining to some of the problems that we have that are in direct relation to this government.

There are many departments of the government that do a lot of the business of the province in Niagara Falls. One of them, Mr.

Speaker, is The Ontario Department of Transport. For the information of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett), being the gentleman that he is, I am very pleased to tell him that an error was made on some of his publicity. I am now speaking about a card or little calendar that I have in my hand. Now, according to a calendar that we have on the table, it is February 26, yet after looking at it just a little closer we find ourselves with two 25th's of February. Would it not have been an awful tragedy if we had had two 25th's of December? We would have had two Christmases. A lot of people in this day and age, with the wages they are making, can hardly afford one. However, I suppose this will be rectified. It only proves one thing: That from time to time this government makes mistakes. This is a good indication because it is on paper.

I was reading an exceptionally fine book that was presented to me by the hon. member for Sudbury entitled The Queen Victoria, Niagara Falls, Park, 1895. It will only take me three or four hours to read this book but I think you should know what is in it, so I am going to start to read:

The Duke of Argyll said at that time when we stand at any point near the edge of the river—and he is making reference to the Niagara river:

—and look upon the course of the stream, the foaming waters of the rapids constitute the skyline. No indication of land is visible, nothing to express the fact that we are looking at the river. The crest of the breakers and the leaping and the rushing of the water are still seen against the clouds, as they are seen in the ocean when the ship from which we look is in a trough on the sea.

And that is the way this particular body of water looked.

That is a portion of it. Maybe I should read a little more:

It is impossible to resist the effect on the imagination. It is as if the fountain of the great deep were being broken up and the new deluge was coming on the world.

Some of the hon. members have been to the falls on a little trip that the vice-chairman of Hydro arranged for us. They have watched the mighty Niagara, the rapids that the Duke speaks of, brought down to a couple of what look like brook trout streams. You could almost wade, you could play Uncle Tom's Cabin, you could jump from rock to rock and get over to the American side. I do not know why the people pay the fee on the bridge in the winter time because the hydro takes the water off the crest of the falls.

On that particular trip, you might have noticed that as you drove up to the intake to the control dam that the waters were depleted, naturally, because they take the water into two tunnels to develop power. I am sorry that the vice-chairman of Hydro is not here, because when I mentioned this during our tour he said, "Well, you say it in the Legislature, tell that to the hon. members."

Now I know again that I am taking a chance of being criticized by the people of the riding I represent, but let us look at the possibilities of building another powerhouse in the Niagara district. There are two power projects, one on the American side and one on the Canadian side. They have developed big tunnels that you could drive a train through, similar to the tunnel that goes under this building. I recall that, Mr. Speaker.

I hate to miss an opportunity to put the record straight, but some two years ago the hon. Prime Minister himself got to his feet here, and I want to make this point before I go on since I was thinking of tunnels. We were told that the vibration in this building would be done away with when the subway goes through, but if you listen now you can hear a car going through. Now, I know that the hon. Prime Minister meant well. I know that he was assured by the engineers that this would be done. But that is one of the things he cannot take credit for and say that it was "done". We still have the vibration. I hope that they can do away with it in some way because this historic building should not be shaken up by transit cars going underneath it.

I only wish that the area of Niagara Falls would again rumble like it used to when those mighty waters would fall over Horseshoe Falls and travel on down. You can hardly believe this, but when they take the water into the tunnels the water below the falls recedes at last 18, yes, 20 feet. It is a fantastic sight. It just falls away and the rocks are exposed. But this water is doing a lot of good. It is being taken into tunnels, into two artificial lakes. The pumps are reversed and in the daytime they develop power from the water that they store up through the night.

Now then, the amount of water that goes over the falls, at least according to the new treaty, is 25,000 cubic feet per second into the American tunnels and 25,000 cubic feet per second into the Canadian tunnels. This means 50,000 cubic feet per second is bypassed and does not go over the crest of the falls. It goes into the artificial lake and is dumped in the river below the Queenston powerhouse or the first Sir Adam Beck generating station.

In April, when the tourists are there and they want the people to see the falls as they used to be, or almost the way they used to be, the full amount is allowed to fall over the falls after eight o'clock in the morning. Now with the 50,000 cubic feet that they must allow to go over the falls, plus the 50,000 feet that is diverted back from the tunnels into the Niagara river, you have at least 100,000 cubic feet per second running down the river. The water again comes back to its level and the whirlpool again comes to look like a whirlpool. I believe that at a point just before the power houses, both on the American and Canadian falls, they could build a dam and utilize that water continuously. Without diverting it off the Niagara, you could bring it back almost to its natural state. You could get the power you are looking for from the water because it is cheaper than coal power, they tell me, than coal-operated plants.

I know there will be a lot of people in Niagara Falls believe that their member has sold them out by talking about another power house. But if the power house is built down in the Queenston area—there is a lot of vacant land there that the Hydro still owns—the waters will come back again to almost their natural state. I do not think anyone would have anything to complain about.

If the engineers of Hydro take this dream—and I am sorry to tell you that it is not mine; there were other people who said this in the past—and develop this power house and put people to work, then I would think that this government would be fair enough to say that at least in the Legislature the member for Niagara Falls, sir, even though he is in the Opposition, brought this about. So you see I am helping this government rather than criticizing them. The criticism comes later.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, I am glad the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Boyer) is back. I have got on to the power project again. I have made every point that I mentioned to the group of people that were on that tour with us. I do believe that that water can be put back into the Niagara river. Let it go over the falls and build a new power house at a point where the water will not recede and we would have another development equal to what you have there now. It could again restore the natural beauty of the mighty Niagara.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I tell you what, I have one in the Legislature who is interested and that is the hon. member for Muskoka. Remember, you are riding in the future now because we are on mutual ground. We are thinking the same way and so I want to repeat this because I think it is most interesting and I think it is feasible.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We are interested.

Mr. Bukator: I am pleased to hear the hon. Prime Minister say that they are interested.

I mentioned this one day at a luncheon with some of the Hydro engineers—not knowing they were top men of the Hydro—and they asked me as a layman, a simple question: “How would you block the water in that canyon, in the narrow portion of that river to build your dam?” This is a sensible question to ask, with the water being diverted through the tunnel beyond the point where the dam would be built. I believe the Niagara River could be made almost stagnant from the foot of the Horseshoe Falls to the area where they would build their dam. I would like to be corrected if I am wrong and I am sure your people will take a look at it. It will put thousands to work.

For that concession—being so good to you when I have not touched the tax question at all yet, except maybe in a minor way—I should briefly touch on it. Your garage, Mr. Speaker, is assessed more on a square-foot, one-floor basis—if you are assessed by the provincial manual—than the Hydro establishments with all their beautiful structures as high as they go are assessed in any part, because they give grants in lieu of taxes. Can you imagine that? Compare these beautiful buildings made of stone and brass and Lord knows what, to a small garage that you drive into every day, and you are assessed on the same basis as they are for grants in lieu of taxes.

If we are going to let you build this monstrous powerhouse and you are going to make a lot of money out of it—and I am going to go into some of the figures on that because they are most interesting—then at least you can give the people of Niagara Falls an area in which they can bargain on their own behalf.

You built a canal back—oh, I do not know what year, I would guess about 1921, as I recall. It was cut a couple of miles beyond Niagara Falls through what was nothing but waste land and you could have bought it, I suppose, for $1 an acre. You put this big gap for about eight miles through the city of Niagara Falls, and since that time you built this tunnel, 325 feet down underground, below and under the waters of the Niagara, alongside of them, at least parallel to it. You have built these tunnels and you have disposed of the rock in dumping areas, where you have taken up valuable lands. On the American side they did it a little differently. They cut it out. They put a cap on it and then they covered it. Now this is feasible to build new construction. Would it not be feasible to put a cap on that bit of the canal that runs through that city, at least where it is built up?

There have been lives lost. People have had their property ruined. Cars have run over the bank—I do not know what they were doing out there, but they have run over the bank—I would like to know sometimes if someone could tell me, I think it would be most interesting. However, if the canal had not been there they would not have lost their lives and they could have told their own story. I have quite a brief on that. It was sent to me by one of my constituents, and I did not think I should miss this opportunity to read it into the record. I only wish I knew which file—if I had had a secretary here, she would have numbered all these papers and then I would have had them just about right. My goodness, I am in The Department of Highways—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: I am coming to that, too. That will take an hour or two—Department of Highways, Niagara Parks Commission, Hydro-Electric Power Commission—here we are.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: I am glad to see the hon. Minister back because I am coming to him a little later.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): He missed that part about the falls, tell him.

Mr. Bukator: I do believe that the hon. Minister himself has some beautiful quarters at what is known as the Rainbow Bridge. I am glad the hon. Minister mentioned that—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: The hon. member for where? St. Andrew. I shall remember that. The hon. Minister from St. Andrew (Mr. Grossman) says I should tell you again what I said about the falls. You have brought up a problem that is very, very serious — that Rainbow Bridge. Have you ever driven over that on to the American side from the Canadian side with its bell tower? Beautiful stores underneath that The Department of Highways rents to tenants, and would you believe it—a substantial rent they collect too, and they do not pay any taxes on those stores. Now you would think in all fairness—no wonder you did not win Niagara Falls back—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Parasites.

Mr. Bukator: Parasites, or something similar to that. You could call them—what do they call these fellows who come in and pick up a piece of land and stay over seven years?

Mr. MacDonald: Squatters.

Mr. Bukator: Squatters, yes they have squatters' rights apparently, because they do not pay taxes. Can you imagine those beautiful stores — making a lot of money these people are, but they themselves because they are in business pay the business tax, which is fair. But for the land and the buildings—now I am going to give the figures on this. I do not have them here because I would have had so many files before me that you would be unable to see who was speaking. I am going to get the figures on that and show you how the city of Niagara Falls is being treated not just quite right.

To think that they can do business in these stores in direct opposition to the man up the street who pays all of these taxes. They pay nothing, they just collect the money. There was a time—for the benefit of the older hon. members—in that area you had the Clifton Hotel, you had the old Queen's Hotel, you had the LaFayette and some of the younger men might have liked to dance, and you had the Prince of Wales. The hon. Minister from St. Andrew remembers that — he used to dance there no doubt. And all these buildings were taken out, razed by the parks commission, by the bridge commission. No more taxes are being collected. All these structures have been built there in the city from which they have not collected one cent in lieu of taxes.

I say one cent, but when those estimates come up I will tell you why you have given them a small portion of money. So much for that interjection from the hon. Minister from St. Andrew. If he keeps it up, I will have material to keep me going for about three days.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: It says here, and this might make the hon. members smile for the first three words, but after that it gets serious—"operation canal cap." Now that sounds rather silly, does it not? But we want that canal covered up. It is as simple as that:

The Hydro power canal is very conspicuously mentioned in the traffic report and survey of H. G. Acres Limited, submitted to council on July 5, 1963. Equally conspicuous is the absence of any mention in the report that the canal should be capped over and lands from which the "ditch" was dug restored to their former state.

Can you imagine that, the man makes reference to that as being a ditch? This is a revenue-producing strip of ditch that this province has benefitted by for many years—and I am going to give you some of the figures on that—but we still do not collect taxes.

It is difficult to conceive that any long-range planning, especially that which would involve the building and rerouting of the highway, could ignore this glaring impediment. This brief is not intended to criticize the report, by so reputable a firm of consulting engineers, and Niagara Falls may be proud of such a firm being located within its boundaries.

The Acres report does, however, recall to the memories of those interested citizens of Niagara Falls that in 1958 a brief was presented to the Stamford township council that would start negotiations of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission to cap the hydro canal and reclaim the lands that were gouged out in that area to allow the 8.25-mile canal to bring water to the Forebays of the Queenston power plant.

That is Sir Adam Beck No. 1. This is a great engineering feat.

Construction began in 1917, 46 years ago, and since the electrical utilities harnessed the power of the mighty Niagara, the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow has been abundant.

This is true; the government has collected millions of dollars from that area.

Much history has been written since 1917, including two world wars, and the story of unparalleled expansion of the Niagara peninsula in population, industry and agriculture. There has been no period of expansion in this century to rival that of the last 15 years in Niagara. Engineering feats in this area within that period would dwarf "operation canal cap" to the proportion of merely back-filling the foundation of a residential home site.

And I believe that all it would require would be a concrete cap and you could take the fill out. I understand there is an agreement now with the city of Niagara Falls—they have not made me acquainted with it except that I read it in the paper—whereby they are going to shut that canal off to clean it out, because in 40-odd years silt has washed in and rocks have tumbled into it.

I would imagine all they would have to do is put a top on it, take out the fill and throw it behind them, just like a mole digging a hole—except those people have a very valuable one that they are making a lot of money out of. I do not think this an unreasonable request.

Experts advise, and opinion is of course needed in this important endeavour, but it should not be so difficult a task when we consider that, in 1955 two great tunnels, which conduct four million gallons of water per minute, each tunnel large enough to float an ocean liner, were mined 300 feet below, and for five-and-a-half miles through the city without one blade of grass being disturbed.

I think the man who wrote this brief stretches it a little more than I did, because I think they did disturb a bit of grass; I am not sure but I think they did.

An even larger project has recently been completed by our cousins in Niagara Falls, New York. This project perhaps emphasizes more vividly the futility of our city, having lived for 45 years with such a scar traced across its middle, just because no attempt has been made to rectify the situation. The New York State Power Authority adopted a different engineering technique to construct their tunnel through the city of Niagara Falls, N.Y. Theirs was the "dig-it-out-and-fill-it-in" method. The net results were the same as those at the Sir Adam Beck project, nothing disturbed on the surface.

Niagara Falls is a magical name. It is known in every corner of the globe as a symbol of beauty and power. We have been the hosts, for generations, to those who have come in millions to admire the grandeur and beauty with which we are so richly endowed. It is only fitting that we present a city worthy to have the eyes of the world focused upon it.

The provincial government enforces the right to insist that all structures on park property do not in any way detract from the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls. These structures include the hydro-electric stations and the Canadian approaches to the international bridges spanning the Niagara River. The parks commission and the Niagara Falls Bridge Commission have indeed carefully preserved the conditions that were originally laid by the hand of nature. Yet the Hydro canal remains as it was dug 46 years ago.

This division of policy, between three provincial government commissions within our boundaries, is a sure-fire implement to retard the growth of Niagara Falls' number one industry—tourism. The citizens of Niagara Falls owe no sentimental allegiance to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, especially to the Hydro canal. It was built to serve the province of Ontario, and the residents of this area have been penalized while providing this service.

How often do visitors, after seeing Niagara dressed in all its splendour, exclaim: "What is this hideous ditch which seems to run right through the heart of the city?" Through the heart of the city it runs, indeed, cutting in half Ontario's sixth largest city.

I did not know that until I read this account; I knew we were getting bigger there all the time. We grow so fast—one comes here for a week or two and finds that we are now in sixth position. If the people of Niagara Falls continue their operation, who knows but what we will have these new buildings for Parliament down by that mighty Niagara; and that would be a good location to have the hon. members—so much closer to the concession where they make so much money.

When the canal was started in 1917, the project was applauded because it would provide much employment to the soldiers returning from World War I. This feature of the project was fulfilled and Canada was grateful for the contribution. The site chosen was to skirt the then city of Niagara Falls, approximately two miles from its western extremity.

We are talking about the canal. They built it out of the city some two miles, and it did not seem like a bad idea of that time.

With the amalgamation of the city and Stamford township in January 1963, the site now runs dead centre through the new city. An aerial view of that area gives one the impression of a beautiful landscape painting that has been mutilated by a jagged-edged knife across it middle, from end to end.

To provide a disposal area for the rock and earth which was removed from the canal bed, over 300 acres of valuable centrally located property, once fertile farm land, the Hydro dump, was transformed into what are now rodent infested waste lands. These areas should be the first to be cleaned when "operation canal cap" is realized, and Niagara Falls will have this choice land back again. This property is ideally located for any project—industrial, residential or parkland. It would not require the medium of super salesmanship to interest the officials of the Oneida Community Ltd. or Rogers International Silver—too late now—in this extremely accessible industrial paradise bordering the Queen Elizabeth Highway and, in the case of the McLeod road dump, within a stone's throw of the Welland river where Ford of Canada has seen fit to locate.

They make reference to the fact that one of our plants left the area in a fashion that we are not too happy about. They could have built on some of these lands along the way, rather than have them used for dump purposes for these many years.

If the Hydro-Electric Power Commission is adamant in its attitude that "operation canal cap" is an impossible project, perhaps history is repeating itself. In 1816 a bill was introduced to the Parliament of Upper Canada to provide funds to survey the possibility of building the Welland canal. This was, for years, dubbed as Merritt's Folly, and given little consideration. It remained for the people of the Niagara district, under the inspiration and energetic leadership of the hon. William Hamilton Merritt to build the first Welland canal.

And I hope he was a Liberal. Was he?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, he was. A man with an imagination like that must have been a Liberal, to form the company to build the first Welland canal.

On November 30, 1824, the first sod of the Welland canal was turned and Merritt's Folly became a reality. Of course, following the exercise of business ethics, the full report should be submitted by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission to council regarding its attitude towards capping the hydro canal. The council would then be in a position to point out that it would entail the building of eight aerial bridges at a cost of millions of dollars.

By the way, they had a report on the road survey by this company of H. G. Acres, and as the city grows they feel that bridges should be built. If the canal cannot be completely capped—and I realize that eight and one half miles of capping a canal in areas where there are very few people would be a large expenditure to the province—but if, eventually, according to this report there will be bridges built there, it would seem to me that if that area were capped for a block or two, or whatever the case might be, the project could be started on its way.

As money came in from this new powerhouse that I speak about, we could cover the rest of it. So you see I am a generous little man today; I have not been at all critical. As a matter of fact they tell me that a member of the Legislature in the Opposition, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, should criticize the government at every turn but then in turn bring in something constructive. The government officials who find that it is constructive will naturally bend, and say:

This man has something. That area needs it. They have been penalized and they have paid the shot for the province; now we are going to show them that we are fair with them. Even though it is in the riding of the member for Niagara Falls we will bring this about.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): That is right.

Mr. Bukator: I showed the government a place where it could make money—I show it a place where it can spend a few dollars and make the people, 100,000 people, of that particular riding, very happy.

Now then, another four pages of this particular report and we will go on to the next item. Where did I quit?

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Start over again.

Mr. Bukator: I am glad the hon. member appreciates it. I thought he would, but I was not quite sure.

Council would then be in a position to point out that the building of eight aerial bridges at a cost of millions of dollars [The Acres report] would be eliminated if the canal gorge was not there. The huge sum of money that will have been spent on the building of these bridges will go a long way toward the cost of "operation canal cap". If, then, Niagara Falls becomes a city of 100,000 population and accommodation for visitors has increased 100 per cent [the Acres report] and discretion dictates then that the canal should be capped and the land reclaimed, what of the millions of dollars that were spent on bridges that would no longer be used?

Alternatively. If capping the entire length of the canal does prove too costly a venture for one complete undertaking, then an excellent alternative is suggested by this report. The advice of H. G. Acres, together with the advice of Hydro consultants, should be sought to consider the possibility of capping and refilling sections, perhaps a quarter of a mile of the canal, where it is intersected by highways instead of bridges at these points.

And I made reference to that a little while ago.

Regardless of the angle at which the highway approaches the canal, the bridge at that point must, for efficiency and cost purposes, cross the canal at a right angle to it. With the canal capped and refilled at these points, the highway could cross at any angle, oriented with the direction of the highway.

Imagine the transformation of the landscape at the Dorchester Road crossing where Stanley Avenue and No. 8 highway cross the canal, to say nothing of the tremendous winter works programme that could be created.

If the life of but one more man, woman or child is spared from drowning or mishaps by capping the hydro canal, "operation canal cap" will then have more than served its purpose.

Here is a little bit of flattery in this report. That is why I read so quickly to get to this particular spot.

Our member of the legislative assembly and his predecessors have championed and have fought for years on the floor of the assembly, to have this project undertaken. It has fallen on deaf ears. Why?

Annexed is a postscript telling me what a good fellow I am. I will not read that.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Read it, read it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: That brief was sent to me by a very fine gentleman in the city of Niagara Falls and I feel I should mention his name, Arnold McAdorey.

These notes of mine that I wrote a few days ago are rather hard to make out. One should read them the same day that he writes them. One portion of this particular bit of notes that I have written myself is most interesting, since I wrote it. It says Hydro is in direct competition with private companies who pay full taxes. It says here the suggestion I have made to the House could be quite contentious. I am sure it could be, but I believe some relief should come to the people of Niagara Falls for the inconvenience that Hydro imposed on these people for many years. I know that in the last project they have done a good job of cleaning up after themselves.

I recall the first Hydro. For many years, cables and buckets and old poles and whatever lay there for years and years until they were taken up or deteriorated in the place until the people of the village were ashamed of it and took them away. Hydro—

Mr. R. J. Boyer (Muskoka): We are going to take that up.

Mr. Bukator: You already have. The vice-chairman is a little behind in that particular area. It is excellent and I am only asking for the final job and that is the capping of that canal. For that reason, I would like the vice-chairman to meet with his engineers maybe tomorrow morning. I am not in too big a hurry, because we have lots of time off around here. We meet in committee at ten like we did this morning and stay until one. We do not eat because we have to be in caucus at one, and then we come at two till six and I suppose we will come in again tonight at eight, or do we have a free night? I was asking, when this was imposed on us, what are we going to do with all our spare time? But I do have spare time to sit with your people and discuss this. I would believe that the point that I have made, both on the trip and here in the House this afternoon, is feasible and it could be very profitable.

I might say that the city of Niagara Falls is very pleased, and I think I should put this on the record, that Hydro will extend pipe lines for the city. It is very pleased about that. But I am a little bit puzzled. I live at the intersection of the Niagara River and the Welland Canal. The water is taken now out of the Welland Canal or the Chippewa Creek—it is better known as the Chippewa Creek—for the Niagara Falls pump house is quite adequate. It would handle the proposition for many years to come, but because they are going to close it off and bring all of those polluted waters out of the riding of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar) into my riding and by our doors, by our filtration plant, a fresh source of water must be found for them, according to the release. So Hydro is going to hook into the tunnel, one of the first nearest to it, some 300 feet away, I would guess. It is just back of where I live, so by making a mess of the water, or by polluting the water on the one side, Hydro is giving them fresh water on the other. I cannot see where there is any concession, but Niagara Falls council is exceptionally good to Hydro and thanks Hydro for that concession anyhow.

Now then, what file would be appropriate next? Is my time pretty near up?

Mr. Spence: You have lots of time. Keep going.

Mr. Bukator: I think the Niagara Parks Commission could come in here very nicely.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bukator: Yes.

Mr. White: Since I will be following the hon. member, could he give me some indication whether I will be speaking later today or at some later day in the month, so I can make my plans accordingly?

Mr. Bukator: The hon. member for London South is as sarcastic as ever and he is running true to form. He will not be missed by this member, I can assure him. He can take his time and go whenever he pleases and never come back again, that will be soon enough.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: The mayor of Niagara Falls, in his inaugural address on January 7, 1963, said the council will again have to consider the grants paid in lieu of taxes by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission and the Niagara Parks Commission. He said that the former Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Macaulay) indicated to Stamford council in a letter dated November 21 that he would like to go into the matter of Hydro grants after the completion of the annexation. The mayor said that as soon as was convenient a further meeting should be arranged with Mr. Macaulay to discuss the problem. Now this was by the mayor himself, and you are all acquainted with him on that side of the House, and what he said on January 7, 1963.

Why would the mayor and his council think that the legislative assembly or members of Parliament should be approached to pay taxes or grants in lieu of taxes if they felt themselves at least worthy of coming to the government with what I consider reasonable requests? The Clifton Gatehouse is a store, a souvenir store and lunch counter at the foot of Clifton Hill built by the Niagara Parks Commission many years ago. As a matter of fact, it operates all winter, and so first I will get these on the record and then I will comment on them a little later. The Clifton Gatehouse assessment for land and buildings was $21,260. The golf club, that is the building itself, was assessed at $27,400. The Niagara Glen, land and buildings—and I am talking about the land on which the buildings sit and not the whole area—is assessed at $21,500; the Princess Elizabeth Building, $25,700. Many of the hon. members know where the refectory is. Many of the hon. members have been visiting there, they have plush quarters above the restaurant where commissioners can entertain and be entertained, and that particular unit makes a substantial amount of money. It is assessed at $245,225. Table Rock house and warehouse—that is a building in front of the falls—is assessed without new addition, at the moment without the new addition they are putting on, at $178,900.

They have the whole area assessed for land and buildings at $519,985, and business purposes, $133,818. They now pay the business tax portion of it. At 68.56 mills, that is $68.56 per $1,000. It is over $500,000—you can see I have not taken the time to put these figures together, but from that particular area the parks commission makes a lot of money. Just two years ago that commission made net profits from its concessions of $860,000. And I am talking of a figure of not much more than $60,000 for tax purposes. Mr. Speaker, since the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) looked in my direction, and appears to be interested, I am not one to say that the government of Ontario has overspent its budget, which it has. I am not saying that it should cut corners and give that particular area something it is entitled to. These particular concessions are making money and lots of it. We are just asking for a fair share for tax purposes only. Every one of them is in direct opposition, or the Parks Commission is in direct opposition to them. Why should they be penalized, or why should the Parks Commission have this concession over private enterprise, which has to pay all of these taxes? It is as simple as that.

I have said this here many, many times and I can assure you that it does not have to be said in too many areas where the people of a particular riding will say that their member, at least, has brought this before the Legislature. It is not fair to those people because the profits are there. I was amused when the hon. Provincial Treasurer got up here and, in his statement—I do not have the exact note, but I am not far out—said they gave to the Parks Commission $57,000 toward the park at Stoney Creek. The province of Ontario gave to the Parks Commission $57,000.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Did the hon. member not want that fixed up?

Mr. Bukator: Oh, I did not say anything about fixing it up. But the hon. Provincial Treasurer did not say a thing about the fact that because of the water rental at $1.25 per horsepower generated that Hydro pays to the Parks Commission, that in turn they are penalized. Just two years ago, when the former Prime Minister was here, he said to the Parks Commission: "You are making much too much money in those particular areas, you have too much, so would you not give it to us"—I do not know whether he asked for it, or said "give it to us", or in his pleasant way say "would you not consider it?" But from the Parks Commission alone, this government has taken $625,000 annually. If you are taking $625,000, surely you can give them $57,000 to develop a park. I do not object to that.

But at least you should tell the whole story. Annually you take from the Parks Commission more than $600,000 because they have more than they know what to do with. All our people are asking for is to get the few dollars they are justly due. You are obligated to pay the taxes in that area. Why should you be in direct opposition to private enterprise and sit back, smugly, enjoying those beautiful quarters, drinking the best of ginger ale and milk, I suppose, and enjoying the best of meals just by signature in the bell tower or in the refectory and wind up by not paying your just dues as any other taxpayer in the province should pay?

Let me say for the benefit of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Welch) if he is here—

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): He just left.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I do not care if the hon. member goes and never comes back. Apparently the hon. member for London South has left, Mr. Speaker. I am not concerned about whether the hon. member stays or goes. I have a job to do here and I can assure you that this government has not treated that area right. You cannot tell me that the mayor of the city of Niagara Falls, who opposed me in the last election, in his own city with 117 polls, only won 18 of them. They have not been treated right and they are protesting against the treatment they are getting from this particular group.

I might say on behalf of the mayor of Niagara Falls, that I have never met a finer gentleman. The man is a good man and he is trying to do a job. But there was a vote of protest simply because at every opportunity—and I am going to continue to do this—I bring to the people of that area the injustice, the imposition, the constant—yes, I would call it in a very rank term—robbery. This province is robbing the riding of Niagara Falls.

Let me tell you another interesting item of the Parks Commission, the Hydro and the funds that have passed through the hands of that particular group and filtered again into the hands of this particular government. An interesting paragraph in the history of Ontario Parks, by Roland L. Way, MA, historian for the then Niagara Parks Commission. Between 1925 and 1928 the power commission paid arrears for rentals owing by the Ontario Power Company to the Electric Development Company in the amount of $545,997. In addition, when they got through with their court cases and battled this thing out, there was $1,455,000 paid for a settlement of all rentals owing in the case of the Chippewa development up to and including the year ending March—and mark this, if you will, that they owed that money back at October 31, 1928. The following sentence I find most interesting:

While appearing on the books of the Niagara Parks Commission, the latter amount was paid directly to the Treasurer of the province of Ontario.

The latter amount was $1,455,000. These are facts. These are established facts. And you have constantly milked that cow and you have not paid your dues. I am hoping the day will come when this government, or any other government, will see fit to pay their just dues to the people of that area.

Recently, and I might say this in passing, the Parks Commission purchased Oakes Hall, a beautiful home. They bought it for $375,000, if I recall. They purchased it and then the government was criticized for spending the money on that particular unit by decision of committee alone. And I not only came to the defence of the committee, or the government, but in all fairness to the government I said they did not pay too much for that particular establishment. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars for that beautiful home they are going to convert into another restaurant, which will again compete with local enterprise and no doubt their taxes will be cut off too. Now this is not being fair.

Now, The Department of Highways. The Department of Highways, according to some of the most recent local papers—I pick these up daily in the mail box down here—I did not intend to devote too much time to that subject, but when in the light of what has taken place I would like to say at the very outset, Mr. Speaker, that this in no way reflects on the present hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton). I have considered the hon. Minister a friend and a very conscientious gentleman. For the sins of omission in the past he should not be condemned. I do not believe that these things have been brought before him.

I could say this, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to him, I could have gone to him and shown him this copy of the paper with some of the conditions of the Queen Elizabeth Way, but I felt I should get this into the record. As a matter of fact, one of the editorials I thought was a little extreme. As I try to unravel this story for you, if I can without too much confusion, I would like to correct the editorial. There is such a thing as being fair, and I would like to read this particular portion of the paper with the four pictures on it to you. It is a review by Ron Roels. He shows the Queen Elizabeth highway and it says:

The Dorchester Road traffic circle on the Queen Elizabeth Way, one of the most heavily travelled arteries in the city, offers motorists a view of four major traffic hazards due to the prolonged state of disrepair. The lack of attention the highway receives, evidenced by these photographs, appears to be confined to the portion of the Queen Elizabeth Way the authorities describe as the Niagara Falls take-off or Niagara Falls extension between the main traffic circle and the Rainbow Bridge.

Now many of you travel down to the Rainbow Bridge to get to the commissioner's quarters and to that bell tower that I speak about. Very restful area to spend a bit of time in. I would like to continue:

Distracting to motorists with a high degree of driving dangers is a section of knocked out railing on the hydro canal bridge, a badly cracked abutment, a series of deep potholes and rough pavement and a section of concrete retaining wall knocked out last spring. The closest The Department of Highways has gotten to repairing the safety hazard was the stringing of a light snow fence along the missing section of the bridge railing with two cables to apparently restrain both pedestrians and wayward motor vehicles. The bridge railing was knocked out by a car more than three months ago. The concrete retaining wall was smashed early last spring. And the cracked abutment antedates them both. Westbound motorists leaving the city, round the curve entering the traffic circle—photo at upper left—view the almost year-old accident scene in which a vehicle plowed through the concrete retaining wall.

On approaching the canal bridge they observe a huge separation in the concrete abutment of the span. It has broken away to some degree and exposed are the steel reinforcing rods of the block—photo at upper right—the motorist is in. Then, further distracted by the large section of the bridge railing that was torn out on a vehicular accident more than three months ago, should he accidentally strike the same spot, odds are he would find himself in the centre canal below.

Three small sections of the snow fence have been wired to the open area of the railing—photo at lower right. The only measure of safety in retaining pedestrians and motorists alike are two cables strung behind the patchwork repair job. If the motorist finds The Department of Highways obstacle course visually interesting he had better get his eyes back on the road surface due to the portion of the highway he must now pass over. Ahead is the broken and cracked pavement of the northern end of the canal bridge with its king-size potholes—photo at lower left.

The poor attention the road surface receives is reflected in the workout car springs and shock absorbers get. The Niagara Falls take-off of the Queen Elizabeth Way retains, in 1964, the original concrete surface it had when it was opened by the Queen Mother in 1939, a quarter of a century ago.

The asphalt road surfaces of the canal bridge do not appear to have fared any better.

There is another—the date of that particular paper that came to me while I was here was February 11, 1964, and there is another picture here showing a large portion of the guard rail knocked off a concrete abutment. It says something like this:

Shattered Queen Elizabeth barriers, a danger and an eyesore on the Dorchester Road traffic circle, were left, for lack of maintenance, on the road surface of the canal bridge, point of lack of attention by the provincial Department of Highways.

Then we have an editorial in the same paper. As I said before, this in no way is meant to criticize the hon. Minister but I think his people should get onto this and at least find out whether these people are being extreme. I do not think they are.

The editorial reads like this:

Last Tuesday's Evening Review carried four pictures showing disgraceful conditions on the Queen Elizabeth Highway and the Dorchester Road traffic circle. The cracked road pavement resembles a bumpy checkerboard. The broken metal barrier on the bridge over the Hydro-Electric Power canal is hidden from view by the flimsy snow fence that would not hold a bicycle let alone an auto.

The concrete barricade, supposedly placed around part of the circle as a safety measure against cars running off the pavement into soft earth, has a big gap in it. Another section is broken in two, resting on the ground.

Since the Queen Elizabeth opened in 1939, this traffic circle has been considered a death trap. Innumerable accidents, some of them fatal, have occurred on it—

I would say at this point that that particular part of the highway—I would venture to say and will stand to be corrected—has caused more property damage and bodily injury than any other particular portion of the Queen Elizabeth Highway—the full length of it.

This is a terrible death trap. There is no question about it. We have accidents there from time to time that could be prevented—I do not know what the department's engineers would do with it. Certainly, in the first instance, even though it was originally built by the Liberals—that is the only place where I will make a concession to this government; the Liberal government, at the time they built the Dorchester circle, were wrong.

An hon. member: Very early days.

Mr. Bukator: That was a long time ago. I say that, at least to display his calibre, as I thought he would, he would look into this and straighten out a mess that we have made. I would accept that concession from him with thanks.

Now let me continue with this particular editorial:

The broken bridge and shattered concrete road barriers are evidence of accidents. How long must we tolerate this obstacle course?

Even in good repair the traffic circle is a menace to modern-day traffic. The circle has not been repaved since the highway was put down.

For some unknown reason it is like a forgotten child whose clothes are never changed. But this child is a dangerous one, it can kill.

It should not be the responsibility of Niagara Falls municipal officials to keep The Department of Highways alerted to the dangerous condition of this provincial highway but we suggest that municipal pressure should be brought to bear—

And I am amused by this portion. They say that municipal pressure should be brought to bear. They have by-passed me, Mr. Speaker; they feel that my words fall on deaf ears in this area. I hope that is not the case in this particular instance.

I am sure that the hon. Minister will look into this thing, at least. And when he looks into it I know there is only one solution, and that is to repair them. The pictures are indicative of the negligence of this particular Department of Highways.

I would like to finish the rest of this paragraph, and I would say to you that:

Municipal pressure should be brought to bear without any delay, because evidently Department of Highways engineers are either shutting their eyes to this end of the highway east of St. Catharines, where so much new work is going on, or they are shrugging at their responsibility to keep it in repair. The circle endangers many local motorists who have to use it day to day, not to mention thousands of international travellers.

I would say that strangers would have a little more difficulty with it than the local people who are acquainted with it. I am going to send this paper over to the hon. Minister and have him look at it.

There was another letter to the editor that I did have before me. It indicated that the work quit at the boundary of the Lincoln riding. When it hit Niagara Falls they would do no more work, simply because the riding was represented by a Liberal in this House. I take exception to even that bit of complimentary criticism—it is not complimentary to me.

I approached this government when I was first elected—the Queen Elizabeth Way, the one lane was not paved; it was a tar road—and I mentioned at that time that the county of Welland built better roads in their county system than The Department of Highways did on the Queen Elizabeth Way at that point.

Some two years later, the Minister of Public Works brought in his estimates, and there was a figure of some $7 million to resurface the portion of road from Fort Erie to the Stamford line. That was done, and done exceptionally well, and for that I thanked the Minister. I am sure that The Department of Highways will not ignore the request of the city of Niagara Falls, as far as this particular circle is concerned. I am looking forward to the day—I would hate to come back here another year and say the only reason the government did not do it is because there is a Liberal member in a Conservative-dominated government. I do not think the government conducts itself in that manner, but this remains to be seen, naturally. I would not condemn it. I will give it just one more chance to make things right. That is being more than fair.

Asked if I would speak in this session I said no; I did not think I would. I would let the new hon. members speak because many of the new hon. members who have come into the Legislature in the last election, the young men and the older men with experience, have made wonderful contributions in their speeches. There were times when they were quite critical of the Liberal Party, or the Opposition parties, but as a whole I think the people have chosen a fine group of people to represent them. I want to compliment the young men who have come into this House in the last election, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that they will make a good contribution, I am sure.

I say this personally, because that is just the way I have found them—and as time goes on, if need be, I can mend my ways too and I can criticize them and be just as nasty with them as they can be with us, because I am an old pro at it. But I feel that this bears saying, and I repeat it again to the fair lady from Hamilton Centre (Mrs. Pritchard). I withheld my comments to the last because I never knew just what contribution she was going to make; so I felt that I should withhold my criticism or praise. And let me tell her that I was proud of her when the Hamilton bill came before the private bills committee and she stuck by what she considered were her convictions and what was right at that time. It is rather difficult for one to get up and speak against the majority in the presence of a group of people who came there well prepared to tell the truth as they saw it. For this I would like to compliment her and wish her well in the coming sessions. I am sure we are going to have many debates, but I can make this promise: I can conduct myself as a gentleman if needs be and if I have to criticize, that I can do also.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my hon. friend from Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) was offended by my question. He took it more seriously than I ever intended. He is well liked in this House and we always enjoy his speeches. We would miss him very much if he were not here.

Sir, may I congratulate the Speaker on his election and commend him on the magnificence of his work since that time. I should like to thank you also, Mr. Speaker, for the help which I have had from your office from time to time during the past year.

My congratulations go to the deputy Speaker also, to the new hon. Ministers and to the new hon. members, and I join the previous speaker in congratulating the new hon. members on their vitality and their dedication to the cause of Ontario.

You will forgive me if I single out my hon. friend from Middlesex South (Mr. Olde). He is a worthy successor to the late Harry Allen and I would be remiss if I did not mention how deeply we miss Mr. Allen's counsel, particularly those of us who come from the London area. He did not say much in this House, but his advice in the committee work of the Legislature and in the daily activities of its members was a tower of strength to all of us.

I would like to thank the electors in London South for having sent me back here to carry on with this most interesting and most rewarding work in politics. I am very much indebted to them for giving me another opportunity to speak on their behalf.

My theme today, sir, has to do with government fiscal policy and democratic processes, which I think are closely linked. I think it is fitting that this should be the theme because today is the day of the largest tax cut in the history of free enterprise. But before I embark on my theme, you will excuse me if I compare for a moment or two the present Legislature with the one that preceded it.

I am thinking in particular, Mr. Speaker, of the frequent jibes we used to hear from hon. members of the New Democratic group about the similarity of Liberals and Conservatives. We do not hear that any more. A couple of years ago, I attempted to prove that the similarities between the NDP and Liberals were very hard to detect and I remember quoting on that occasion from certain Liberal spokesmen who thought that the two parties should be joined. Now we have the remarkable sight of two parties living together though not yet married—a common-law arrangement, sir, that leaves them with uneasy consciences, as the protests would indicate—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. White: —an uneasy and may I say an immoral relationship which can give little pleasure to the participants and which fills the electors of this province with grave disquiet. The moral judgment of the electors sir, I say, will be vested on these parties whether or not they legitimize their relationship. In that same speech, some of the older hon. members will recall, the leader of the Opposition of the time was challenged to repeat a speech that he had made in the House. He did so, with dramatic consequences, and sometime afterwards he was good enough to thank me for having helped him to get so much publicity, which he was sure would be very helpful to him. The hon. member for Kent East (Mr. Spence) will recall that the member of the day for Oxford was good enough to say to me on the train home that Friday night, "You have been a very great help and we will never forget it." I want to say that I am glad to have been a help to the previous member for Oxford and to the previous member for Waterloo North.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): The hon. member talked about medical insurance in his maiden speech.

Mr. White: I am going to talk for a minute or two—the hon. member for Dovercourt is quite right and I will be dealing with that again. I would like to talk—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): They did not appreciate that on that side of the House.

Mr. White: I would like to talk for a moment or two about some of the remarkable developments taking place in the area of London, and I should like to thank the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) for expediting and pushing ahead the rebuilding of the Ontario Hospital in that area. As the hon. members know, this has been promised for 35 years, but what they may not know is that the foundations were built in the early 1930s at a cost of $170,000. A gentleman named Mr. Hepburn from Elgin became Prime Minister and those foundations were abandoned, with the hospital being built some close distance from St. Thomas. It is hard to believe, but it is true.

Now the long promised addition and improvement to the Ontario Hospital in London is taking place and I am very indebted to the hon. gentlemen on that account.

I am similarly pleased, sir, with the vast progress of the provincial institute of trades and I am glad to learn from the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) that it is planned to have one- and two-year technician training courses in the vocational centre. This programme as well as the grade 13 technological engineering course already in operation at the H. P. Veal Secondary School in London, will provide the equivalent of a first-year provincial institute of technology course. Successful students of both these programmes, in addition to being qualified for entrance into the second year of a provincial institute of technology, will have academic qualifications for certification as an engineering technician grade 2 by the Association of Professional Engineers in the province of Ontario. That is in keeping with the recommendations of the committee on manpower training and I welcome that news.

May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend from Muskoka, who is vice-commissioner of Hydro (Mr. Boyer), consider the London area when the location for the new Ontario museum is decided. I suggest that London would be a most fitting location for the reason that Sir Adam Beck, who was the founder of Hydro, was a prominent citizen and long-time member for the riding of London.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member has a better reason than that.

Mr. White: I congratulate the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) on this year's Budget. I am going to be saying in a minute or two that Canada should follow the lead of the American federal government by reducing personal income taxes and corporate taxes. But I think it must be recognized by hon. members of this Legislature, as it is recognized by virtually every economist interested in the problem, that a province or a state or a large municipality cannot unilaterally adjust its revenues and expenditures in an effort to assist the fiscal policy of a nation. And so I say that in the present circumstances the intelligent increases in the expenditures and the modest increases in taxes, coupled with the sensible increase in debt, quite in keeping with the resources of the province and quite in keeping with its credit, is a realistic and business-like approach to the very pressing problem of government revenue and expenditure.

I think perhaps there is a better way of doing this; I think perhaps the provinces should persist in their attempts to consult frequently and regularly with the federal government so that a co-ordination of expenditure and revenue could be planned. This is very difficult to bring about. The federal government fears that such a committee of 11 representatives—of 11 financial Ministers and Treasurers—would leave them with one vote against ten. We have to start some place. My thought is that we should start with regular conversations between the Treasurers of the provinces and the federal Minister of Finance in the hope that these regular conversations and exchanges of information might lead to something more concrete in the way of co-ordinated fiscal policy.

Mr. Speaker, the enlarged economic powers and the increasing economic activities of the government are reducing in a certain sphere of human activity the rights and privileges of the individual. Quite frankly, I see no end to this process, and quite frankly I think that it is incumbent on us, as legislators, to broaden democratic processes in other directions so that these broadened democratic processes will offset the encroachments of government economic activity.

I have here an article—I will not read it—which reports a speech of Dr. Jan Deutch, the new chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. It was in the London Free Press yesterday and the heading is: "National economic plan said necessary for growth". I expect that this is right. There is quite a lot of evidence, although no proof, that economic planning in Europe has increased the economic growth and the standard of living in many of those countries. I say no proof because, while France's standards have risen dramatically and with a great deal of government economic planning, West Germany's standards have risen also in the absence of this type of economic planning.

I myself would like to see the federal government continue with this particular laissez-faire economic planning, and I would like to see the provinces once again participate.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. White: I quite agree, it is a peculiar phrase. I will take that phrase back, if I may. I will rephrase it. I would like to see some economic planning, providing this is a definition of goals and objectives and providing it is the bark method, as it has been called, rather than the bite method of government control. I would like to see government encourage those sectors of the economy where growth is desirable, but I would not like to see the overriding government controls that are being experienced in so many European countries.

I am concerned, sir, about increasing government control because of a number of rather isolated incidents which weave into a pattern of reduced liberties for its citizens. I am going to mention one or two of these very briefly.

We have had an experience in London where a board of the city council has built a fence illegally on property which did not belong to it. Residents in the area complained bitterly at the time and yet the board concerned took no action. The city council, for reasons I do not quite understand, incorporated a section in a private bill a couple of years ago which would have made that fence legal. Members of the private bills committee unanimously rejected that section of the bill, but the fence still stands.

A number of citizens in the area have gathered themselves together and are prepared to post a sum of money to implement a Supreme Court action, which is necessary in these circumstances. The leader of the group, however, took sick and the plan has not been fulfilled. One of the suggestions I would like to make to the Legislature is that the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) or the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) be empowered to take action on behalf of citizens where a flagrant abuse of power has occurred.

I am distraught, sir, that there were no voices raised against the SIU trusteeship plan introduced by Ottawa. It may have been the best solution to the problem. But I am shocked that there was no voice of dissent raised in this country, that the four parties represented in Ottawa would not stand up and question its merit, having in mind that it is the first time in the history of the free union movement that a government has imposed this type of trusteeship over a free collection of its workers.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That is what our friends to the left here have wanted.

Mr. White: Yes, indeed, they did, and that is one of the things that disturbs me. So did the Liberal Party.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): And so did the Tories, too.

Mr. White: Well, there were a couple of Tories who had the courage to vote against it. Yes, there were a couple of them. But where were the NDP representatives, with all their high ideals? And where were the spokesmen for the great Liberal cause?

At any rate, sir, I am not sure that this was not the best method. But I am sure that it was a very grave departure from the accepted practice in this country. I am astonished not to have heard from some of the hon. members opposite and perhaps some of my colleagues as well as the federal members of Parliament, on that subject.

Mr. MacDonald: Would the hon. member permit a question? What is his suggested solution to this problem? I can assure him a lot of soul-searching went in before this one was advanced. What is the hon. member's solution, if this is a bad one?

Mr. White: My solution is not to single out one person or one group for special legislation. If the general legislation in this country is not sufficient to control this type of abuse, the obvious answer is improved general legislation. But to single out one union for special rules, or one fraternal organization, or one corporation, or one citizen, is the antipathy of democracy. My hon. friends opposite should know it.

I am concerned about the added discretionary powers, sir, given during the last session of the federal government to the Minister of Finance. While the arbitrary action against this particular union has shocked thoughtful unionists, the added arbitrary discretionary powers given to the Minister of Finance have shocked those people who are connected with corporate activities because, as the hon. members will know, the federal Minister of Finance now has power to decide whether a matter is taxable or not in a way that he did not have before.

Mr. Thompson: You tell us about economic planning—

Mr. White: I am convinced that additional legal services will have to be provided to citizens of modest means in fighting civil matters.

As some of you may know I have a clinic every Monday night in London. People in my riding are invited to this clinic and they come in one at a time, as at a dentist's office, and they tell me their problems. I can say there is not a Monday night goes by that somebody does not come to me with a pressing legal problem. They cannot find help and have not got the money and do not know what to do. I am witness to many episodes where justice is not done as a consequence. I will leave it to the lawyers, my hon. friend from York—

Mr. Singer: Downsview.

Mr. White: Downsview. To the hon. member for Downsview, who is so very critical of the medical profession, I will leave it to my hon. friend from Downsview and certain other lawyers in the House to provide some suggestions as to how that very bad situation might be remedied.

An hon. member: I told you yesterday. Do not leave it to the lawyers—

Mr. White: Incidentally, I think I might at this time pay tribute and give thanks to a number of London lawyers who have volunteered their services to me in cases of this kind.

Mr. Sopha: They always look like a well-fed group.

Mr. White: I have a very long file here, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the new arrangement in London which relates to the medical profession there. I am not suggesting and I am not implying that doctors are not able men. Of course, they are. I am not implying that the profession is in any way in disrepute, because of course it is not, nor is the legal profession. I am not going to parade out a half a dozen mistakes in a province of 6.5 million people and suggest that this proves that the profession is evil because, of course, it is not. But there is a development here which deserves the attention of the Legislature.

The Legislature in its wisdom has granted very wide powers to a number of professional associations, none stronger, I suppose, than the medical profession.

The anaesthetists in London have banded themselves together in what is known as the Anaesthesia Associates of London, Canada. This group, which is given direction by some of the leading members of the specialty, assigns the work load at each of the London hospitals and it tells each of the practitioners when they will work and what they will be paid. The file which I hold here was sent by a Dr. A. G. Morris who has asked me to use his name in making this protest. I know nothing about this gentleman's medical qualifications but I do know he is a doctor and I do know that he has a specialty certificate. I know further that he was assigned certain limited hours at one of these hospitals at a restricted rate of pay that might be 20 per cent of what the leading practitioners of this specialty are getting.

I am not in a position to sit as judge and jury but I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that this particular arrangement could be examined, and if it is found that arrangements of this type are unduly restricting the activities of the practitioners, or if they are foisting disadvantages on to the citizenry, I hope that the appropriate Acts will be changed to remedy the situation.

I am a little concerned, sir, about the teaching profession too. I do not know all of the details but I did read some of the news articles about the Lakefield teachers and the problems which they had had—the columns in the Toronto Globe and Mail and the letters in the various papers protesting this situation. So I join these several professions and others where appropriate, and suggest that the Legislature should give very careful thought to powers entrusted to groups such as this, and that continuous policing is necessary and remedial action where needed.

In conclusion, sir, may I summarize the suggestions which I wish to put before the Legislature. I suggest that the provincial government make a very determined effort to initiate regular and frequent conversations between the hon. Provincial Treasurer and the federal Minister of Finance, to exchange information in the hope of co-ordinating fiscal policy in an evolutionary fashion as time goes by.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the hon. Attorney General or the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs be entrusted with the power to initiate suit on behalf of citizens where municipalities, or their agencies, flagrantly abuse the law.

I would hope, sir, that a continuing committee of the Legislature or a person like an ombudsman might be established in this province to review citizens' complaints and to initiate action.

I think I should say, Mr. Speaker, that although the hon. Attorney General is out of the House at the moment, that I am aware that he is extremely conscious of the rights of appeal and that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) and the hon. Attorney General and their colleagues in the Cabinet have done a lot to broaden appeal provisions in various statutes, and they have been extremely conscious of this right of appeal in new legislation. So we have—yes, sir—we have made some progress and I look for more to take place later.

Mr. Sopha: We are with you.

Mr. Singer: Like The Operating Engineers Act.

Mr. White: I think we should examine the legislation empowering professional associations to govern its members and perhaps provide an appeal provision whereby members like this doctor, or the Lakefield teachers, who think that they have lost certain of their rights as citizens because of the activities of the leaders of their associations, may be given some assistance and protection.

Sir, I would not want to conclude leaving any impression that I am pessimistic about these matters because I am not. I think we can build a Canada great and good. I think by use of proper economic implements combined with the broadening of democratic processes, we can build a nation the like of which has never been seen. I have no doubt in my mind about that.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. member is on the wrong side of the House.

Mr. White: Yes, sir, I have no doubt that the economic advances, the tremendous increases in education, the additional leisure that is being made possible for people, the heightened political awareness and participation, can build a great province and a wonderful country for the full and free use and enjoyment of all of its citizens.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, I would first offer to you, sir, my congratulations and best wishes in your position as Speaker of this Legislature. I am sure that all hon. members must agree now that you have demonstrated your capabilities of performing the task assigned to you by this House.

I would first, sir, ask the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) to tell me after I get finished speaking if some of the things I have mentioned might be what he meant by the broadening of our democratic process. I am not going to speak at any great length, as I feel one can be more effective after having some experience in the House in dealing with particular matters affecting his riding and the province under the appropriate estimates as they come up. But I do feel I would like to take the opportunity to say a few things.

Up to now during this session we have heard many times from the government benches through statements of the hon. Ministers. We have been told what great development has taken place in this province in the past years and in particular the last couple of years. It is pretty hard to dispute that when we read papers and look at financial news and listen to the economists who do the analyzing of the situation in the country.

Certainly we cannot deny that we saw in 1963 one of the most so-called prosperous years of the postwar years. We saw a record in corporate profits, which in turn meant a record in production. And we saw a great increase, almost a record I believe, in retail sales. We also saw last year a substantial increase in the cost of living. We saw also last year increases in medical costs, the PSI medical costs. We saw increases in car insurance and we also experienced the first full year of the three per cent sales tax imposed on the people by this government some two years ago.

Political, business and statistical predictions tell us that 1964 is going to be a better year and I would say, and I think we all must say, that so much the better. But the question arises in my mind as to whom this increase is going to benefit. Where does the wage-earner, the producer, share in what we call the great increase in the welfare of this province? I read in December that there was a six per cent increase in the provincial wealth. I am not an economist so I cannot tell the hon. members just exactly what that means, but I would take it as a layman that the wealth of the province, the economy of the province, had increased some six per cent over the year before.

But I have to ask myself, not being an economist, as many of the thousands of wage earners and consumers across the province ask themselves, "Where is my share of this increased prosperity?" Why is it that when we are told that we have had the most prosperous year in the postwar years, we also know that we have had increased costs for the whole year, and we are faced with increased costs for the coming year—particularly the increased cost of the hospital insurance programme, increased cost in gasoline, the predicted increase in the cost of living, and likely we will have some federal taxes imposed upon us for this year?

Mr. Speaker, I think we have to agree that the great majority of wage earners, the consumers, across this province, are the most disorganized and exploited in our society. The large majority of the wage earners, consumers, are in hock almost continually to mortgage companies and finance companies in this province. I am not going to argue as to the merits, or the pros and cons, of people being forced to obtain what they need under the credit system; but if this is the way that our society decrees they should obtain the things they need, then I think the government has to take some responsibility in making sure that they have adequate income at all times as well as adequate medical and hospital insurance care.

Thirty-one thousand, or 28 per cent, of the wage earners in Hamilton made less than $3,000 in the year of 1962. Forty-eight per cent made less than $4,000 in 1960, based on the 1962 taxation statistics department of The Department of National Revenue. So here we are, faced with people living on the credit system, being told that the economy of the province is the best we have had since World War II, that the unemployment has decreased to what some would say is almost a perfect figure—I will not agree—and where are we heading? I want to make two suggestions that might take the burden of increased costs off the group which is least able to afford it.

In regard to the increased cost of hospital insurance—it now totals $78 a year—I would suggest that the first thing the government should do is pay the complete cost of hospital insurance for all people on pension. There is a group that has been put on pensions, some of them on a means test, others through the principle developed over the years by governments—that they should contribute a certain percentage of their income so that they would have an old age pension at age 70—and then at the same time we impose costs upon them that reduces the income we tried to provide.

I think that we should first pay the complete cost of the hospital insurance to all those on pensions.

Before someone says they do not do this in Saskatchewan, I would say that they should do it in Saskatchewan also, if we found that their basic costs were beyond the ability for all to pay. But I do not think the cost in Saskatchewan has reached these proportions yet.

If we relate the cost of hospital insurance and medical care in Saskatchewan to that of Ontario, we would find a difference. In Saskatchewan, the total cost of medical coverage and hospital insurance was $72, now reduced to $52. And the cost of the medical coverage is $12 for the family. If we take that from the $52, we find their hospital insurance is $40. But I would add that if we looked at the statistics of income in Saskatchewan, we would find that, on the average, the minimum is much higher than it is in Ontario. So this would justify the fact that there is a basic cost for everybody, and I do not believe it is above their ability to pay.

But in Ontario the situation is different.

I might say, first, that when the federal government wants to raise money to carry out the business of the country, it has the income tax structure. Essentially, the exemptions are developed so that a man with a large family pays less than one with a lesser number in the family, or one without any family at all. This is the fair way to assess costs to keep the government going. So I would suggest that if we pay the full cost of the hospital insurance plan for all pensioners in this province, we should then pay the rest of the cost on an "ability-to-pay" basis.

This could be done. Everyone is aware of the financial structure of paying by the NDP's programme for medical care, based on a flat basic premium that all can afford, and then the balance obtained on the ability to pay—the income of the individual. I think that is a fair way to pay for a compulsory government insurance hospital plan in this province.

I would suggest another method by which we could help to maintain the income in this large group which has such a low income to start with; that is, with an accident and sickness insurance programme. This insurance programme should be an extension of The Workmen's Compensation Act and should provide 75 per cent of the employee's wages, when he is off work because of accident or sickness not covered by the present Workmen's Compensation Act.

The financing of such a plan should be by a percentage of payroll contributions by employers and employees. Self-employed persons could be covered by paying total contributions. We have, for many years, accepted the principle of workmen's compensation, and unemployment insurance. We praise

The Workmen's Compensation Act in Ontario as being the best in the North American continent. It was provided to provide for the employee who was injured in his occupation in a plant: First, the best of medical care; and second, an amount of his wages so that he or his family would not suffer because of a reduction in income. That is based on 75 per cent of his earnings to a maximum of $6,000 at the present time.

Of course we have, for some time, believed in the principle of unemployment insurance for the worker. If he is laid off his job, under certain conditions, he received an amount of money. Inadequate as it is today, it still is a way of easing the burden and helps in maintaining the income of the workers. Nothing disrupts the harmony of married life more than having the breadwinner's pay cheques stop.

With present-day cost of living, loss of income brings hardship under any circumstances. It creates an even greater hardship when the loss of income is accompanied by doctors' bills, medicine, and all of the extras needed in time of illness. Without income, the family gets behind in its mortgage payments and taxes, food and clothing allowances are reduced, and often the end result is that the family has to accept municipal welfare and, of course, the loss of dignity that goes with it.

Many thousands of families in Ontario have no income protection, and cannot afford the high premiums for the inadequate benefits at present offered by private insurance companies.

For example, and as I have said before, 31,000 or 28 per cent of the taxpayers in Hamilton earned less than $3,000 in 1962. The burden of obtaining sufficient food, clothing and decent shelter is heavy enough without loss of income, especially due to illness and accident. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I happened to pick up a report from the Continental Casualty Insurance Company, a progress report for January 28, 1964, and it seems now that insurance companies realize the need for income maintenance programmes and are going into this field. I might quote from a report in the Globe and Mail of January 28, 1964:

CONTINENTAL'S PILOT PROJECT WILL BE RUN IN ONTARIO

"Without his income, a man has nothing. He can't pay for rent, mortgages, taxes, food or clothing, let alone doctors' bills," says Ronald Story, 29-year-old Canadian manager of Chicago-based Continental Casualty.

Story and his counterparts in other health insurance firms describe loss-of-time coverage as primary insurance. It comes first. Medical-surgical coverage is nice to have, but it is essentially a luxury, and thus secondary in importance.

This is quite a switch for an insurance company to say that proper surgical and medical insurance coverage is a luxury and comes secondary in importance. I would further quote:

Early next month, Continental Casualty Company, originator of Medical, the blanket medical insurance plan offered periodically during the past two years to all Ontario residents, will introduce a new plan called RediReserve to all 10,000 employed residents of an as-yet-unnamed Ontario community.

The month-long pilot project, if it proves successful, could lead to mass marketing of income replacement coverage by Continental Casualty, perhaps on a province-wide basis.

Details of the new plan: For about $4 a month, subscribers will receive, if they are disabled and unable to work, $25 a week for up to 13 weeks. The plan will be open to any employed person regardless of health condition or type of occupation.

This is surprising, Mr. Speaker, this pilot project. The company says that for $4 a month it will pay $25 for 13 weeks, while at the present you can obtain, and could two years ago, from Travellers Insurance, $50 a week for 26 weeks for $3.50 a month. So this pilot programme is not just as nice as one might believe in reading it first hand. But of course the gimmick is in here and will be explained a little later on. I further quote:

Unlike most group loss-of-time policies on the market now, RediReserve will cover disability due to on-the-job accidents.

Here is a gimmick. What they are saying to the prospective client is, "we are going to help you make a little money, because you are ill or out of work. Because you can get coverage by workmen's compensation, if you are hurt, we will pay you also." I do not think this is a good way to look at insurance in any sense. I further quote:

If, as we hope, we can insure about 25 per cent of the 10,000 eligible workers under RediReserve and provide them with basic coverage, we are then in an excellent position to go back to the same community with a resident agent, who will approach the same persons about additional loss of income coverage to supplement RediReserve.

This again shows the gimmick in this kind of a programme, Mr. Speaker. First, they try to convince the community that they will give a person $25 a week for 13 weeks for $4 a month. We already know that you can get $50 a week for 26 weeks for $3.50 a month. Then they say that once they get people on this low-cost and inadequate coverage, they can send their agent back in again and talk them into paying them more money for extra coverage. I hope that the government really moves in this direction of providing maintenance of income. This is one area where it will pay off in great dividends to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity also of congratulating the new hon. members to the House, and I hope that they will continue to be progressive in their outlook and in presenting the problems of the province and their ridings to the government as well as the Opposition is expected to do. I was quite interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Peck). He is not here but I would like him to know that I paid attention to what he said and I would like to quote what he said and make some comment on it. It is in Hansard, page 416. The hon. member for Scarborough Centre says this:

Mr. Speaker, I have noted with some interest the reports we have been hearing since last fall of the possible union of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party. I do not feel that it is too facetious an idea to suggest that if the New Democratic Party really feels that we should return to the two-party system, perhaps its true home is with us on the government side.

Mr. Bryden: Everybody wants us.

Mr. Gisborn: Why do you not toss up?

Mr. Sopha: Be my guest, take 'em.

An hon. member: It has got them thinking.

Mr. Peck: Many of the unions they depend upon for support have become so affluent under the prosperity and the favourable labour laws of the Conservative government that they no longer believe in socialism. Indeed, in the only jurisdiction in North America where there is a socialist government, socialism became such a failure that it was discontinued and the movement now seems to be one merely of social reform.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Party also believes in social welfare and perhaps it is not too radical to suggest that the New Democratic Party join with us under the free enterprise system in a more efficient free enterprise system to help bring the people of Ontario unprecedented prosperity.

Mr. Whicher: You can have their members, we will take their votes.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer just one or two of those suggestions. To be a little bit on the lighter side, I would say to my hon. friend and any of the others who offer the same invitation, that when the time comes that I feel that I want to bask in the sunshine of the status quo Conservative establishment, I will take the opportunity. But I want to assure them that that time will not come until I no longer have any concern for the unemployment problem; until I no longer have any concern for the plight of the aged; until I no longer have any concern for decent housing for all the people in this province; until I have no further concern for the orderly development of the provinces, the nation and a fair distribution of the wealth; until I have no further concern for some shifting of the emphasis on to human values rather than on material gain.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, if there is still a Conservative government around, I may take the opportunity to recline with it as the seal basks on the ice floe.

In relation to the comments on the trade union movement, I do not know where the hon. member has been for the last 20 years but I assure him that the trade union movement did not progress and reach the point where it is today, to make the contribution it makes to our society today, because of the favourable labour Acts that we have in this province and in this country. It was despite the labour Acts of this province.

Unions have reached the position now through many sacrifices—many sacrifices on the picket lines.

If the hon. member had read the history of the trade union movement in this province he would find without contradiction that almost every one of the major unions in this province had to strike more than once, for extended periods of time, first to get recognition then to get what they felt was a fair share of the product. They did not receive any help from the antiquated labour laws of this province. I hope that the day will come when the Labour Act will be revised to the position that it gives impetus to the great number of unorganized workers to get into the trade union movement of their choice, to take their part in the society.

Now about the Liberal-NDP merger. Certainly in recent months there has been some discussion along this line. As far as I know there may be still discussions going on between individuals in the Liberal Party, or in the NDP. As far as I am concerned that is their right, their democratic right. But I am sure it has been made very abundantly clear by both the federal executive of our party, the provincial executive of our party, and the leaders of both the federal and provincial parties, that the possibility of a merger of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party is almost an impossibility.

You see, we formed a New Democratic Party to provide an instrument for those disenchanted politically thinking people in the Conservative and Liberal ranks. Those who were disenchanted with the philosophies and indecisive programmes and policies of their particular party. And many have come in. Let us not disregard the fact that there are thousands who are just on the verge now. They just have to see the enlightenment and they come into our party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gisborn: But I would like to give an illustration of why I say some of these things, because—and I do not want to do this disparagingly—in the last few weeks there has been some enlightenment of the group on my right, the Liberals. There is hope that they will improve in the way that I think, maybe, they should improve. I will read a clipping from the Hamilton Spectator of February 4. This would be my analogy as to the reasons why I could not be induced into the Liberal Party at any time. The clipping is dated New York, Associated Press, and I quote:

Clare Boothe Luce took dead aim at the 1964 crop of presidential candidates today and unleashed a platform to end presidential platforms.

It was strictly tongue-in-cheek. Or dagger-in-cheek.

The former Republican Congresswoman and one-time Ambassador to Italy said in an interview: "I'd enter the New Hampshire primary in a minute if I had a campaign manager, an organization and a political base. I've certainly got the programme."

The programme?

"I am for the 35-hour week without any increase in labour costs.

"I favour a college education for everyone regardless of race, creed or pre-entrance intelligence quotients.

"I am for lifting everyone off the social bottom. In fact, I am for doing away with the social bottom altogether.

"I am for victory in Viet Nam without any increase in U.S. casualties or expenditures. I am also for neutralization of Viet Nam as soon as Gen. de Gaulle apologizes for having suggested it.

"I am for raising living standards of the world by deep and judicious pruning of U.S. aid.

"I am for licking the stuffing out of Krushchev while relaxing U.S.-U.S.S.R. tensions.

"I am for supporting the European Common Market as an outlet for more American chickens and British agricultural products.

"I am for the independence and sovereignty of the young, immature African nations and the abandonment of the independence and sovereignty of all the old, mature European nations.

"I am for the occupation of Germany by U.S. armed forces for the indefinite future while slowly withdrawing American troops.

"I am for the sovereignty of Panama in the Canal Zone under the American flag . . .

"In relation to Cuba, I am for the liberation of Cuba without firing a shot. I feel that it is wholly possible we soon will be able to shave Castro's beard by means of laser rays.

"I am for putting men on Venus by 1975 or vice versa.

"I am for birth control methods acceptable to all nations and religions, this to be reached by international agreement safeguarded by regular inspection of the reproduction mechanism of the population bomb.

"I am for harmless cigarettes, still using the same old rich, flavourful tobacco . . ."

Without causing any commotion, that was my interpretation of the philosophies and indecisive policies of the Liberal Party in the past. I am hoping that the new look will develop into something else.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I was quite proud of the continued confidence of the electorate of Wentworth East in returning me to the Legislature in 1963. I want to say that the Conservative candidate and the Liberal candidate ran, with myself, a very fair campaign. I had a terrific disappointment, though, with both of them because of my inability to induce them to deal with the issues of the day, to debate them on public platforms. My campaign's organization issued three challenges to each of them and provided a meeting hall, but all to no avail. They just said that we are going to trust in the record of our great leader and that was it. But that was not it. That was not the reason that we did not get into dealing with the real issues during the campaign. It was the way the campaign was played down by the Liberal federal party, the leadership of the provincial Liberal Party and the Conservative leadership. It was played down and the real issues were over-shadowed by the phoney inter-controversy about the national federal pension plan. The press, in Hamilton at least, did the same thing.

I was never more at odds with the press as I was with the Hamilton Spectator, the only paper we have in Hamilton, at the way they played down the 1963 provincial campaign. It is all very well for the press to say that while there is no news there is nothing happening, that there are no meetings taking place. I think it is the democratic right of the press, and particularly where there is only one in a locality, to bring the issues before the people and not to let the people raise them themselves. The press has the ability to get out and dig the issues. They know what the issues are between the three parties and I think that press has a responsibility in this area to put the issues before the people so that they know just exactly what they are getting into.

But I do say, outside of that, the campaign was fair. I would like to put on the record in Hansard some comments of the Conservative candidate after the election because, as he says here, he has been asked to be the candidate again. But if he keeps running in Wentworth East I do not think he will have the chance to get anything on the record in Hansard himself, so I am going to do him this honour of putting this quote in.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Hear, hear! That is generosity.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Now, be generous.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. member is being generous. He is putting his comments on the record. His only chance.

An hon. member: What did he say?

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Ramm said this, and I quote:

First of all, I would like to congratulate Mr. Gisborn on his victory. I fully realize that winning this election would have been very desirable; however, I was well aware that this was not going to be—

Mr. A. V. Walker, (Oshawa): The NDP man did in my riding. He has not spoken to me since.

Mr. Gisborn: The hon. member for Oshawa says the former member has not spoken to him since; I think he left town on a prearranged visit to Europe right after.

An hon. member: Two months later.

Another hon. member: The Tory I defeated in 1959 has not talked to me since.

Mr. Bryden: What is the hon. member complaining about?

Mr. Gisborn: I think the hon. members of this Legislature could assure the hon. member for Oshawa that the defeated NDP candidate for Oshawa, Tommy Thomas, was not the kind of gentleman to snub a candidate.

Mr. Walker: Nevertheless, he did it.

Mr. MacDonald: I have not had a Tory candidate come to see me after an election for ten years.

An hon. member: Well, the hon. member may have the chance.

Mr. Gisborn: I would suggest that the hon. member for Oshawa may have the chance to not speak to the NDP candidate that defeats him in the next provincial election.

Mr. Walker: I will be the first man there if it happens.

Mr. Gisborn: I will continue my quote from Mr. Ramm.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): My CCF candidate wanted to know how I did it.

Mr. Gisborn: He says:

I was well aware that this was not going to be an easy job. I am most happy with the results, for one or two obvious reasons:

Firstly, approximately 2,500 more people voted this time. Mr. Gisborn's actual vote was reduced by some 650 votes or so.

My Liberal opponent was stronger this time, being the present reeve of Stoney Creek. He polled 2,000 more votes than the Liberal candidate in '59 and a thousand more votes than the Liberal candidate in 1955. This had a great effect on my chances of beating Mr. Gisborn entirely.

I would say that Mr. Gisborn should thank Mr. Sharp for winning the election for him. I am most happy about the fact that I polled 1,400 more votes than any other candidate of our party has polled in any other election heretofore.

I reduced Mr. Gisborn's majority from 3,880 votes to just over 1,700—

I would just pause here to say that he did not check very closely, because my plurality was 1,970, almost 300 over:

—which is something to take into consideration. I don't believe we should overlook the fact that in 1959, if the Liberal and Conservative vote were added together, the total vote would not have exceeded the NDP vote.

However, in this election, if the two votes had been added together, Mr. Gisborn would have been beaten by 3,500 votes. And it is quite obvious, of course, that I could have beaten him if the Liberal candidate had polled the same number of votes as the Liberal candidate in 1959. Taking all these things into consideration, I feel that the results are very gratifying.

Mr. Bryden: This guy is married to a calculating machine.

Mr. Gisborn: I continue to quote from Mr. Ramm:

As far as my future plans are concerned, it is a little too early to say, but the Conservative organization in Wentworth East, together with representatives of the party in Ontario, have already asked me to be the candidate in the next election and, all things being equal, I intend to consider this very carefully.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Stoney Creek News for their fair and unbiased approach to this election, also the many people who supported me. I will, in the days that lie ahead, do my utmost as representative of the government in this area, to take care of the various matters which come to my attention and promise to serve this community as best I can, as and when the opportunity arises.

Now the only question I can raise with that is that, first, I am not sure that the candidate,

Mr. Ramm, lived in the riding; and I would ask the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) to send over by note, some time or other, just what assignment he has given to Mr. Ramm to represent the government in my area.

We should have some co-operation. If he is representing this government in Wentworth East I would like to know about it, and I might be able to give him some work to do once in a while.

Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, I feel that one can be more effective in any of the particular problems facing a community and riding, in the appropriate estimates, where it is more direct and one can get the answers. I intend to raise several questions regarding some serious problems in the Hamilton area, the city of Hamilton. I expect to solicit, and expect to receive, support from the hon. members in the Hamilton area who will be aware of the problems as well as I am myself, and I hope that we can co-operate to present to the government some of the serious problems affecting a growing, large city like the city of Hamilton.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, which will be followed by The Department of Mines. As I announced earlier, there is a night session tomorrow night.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's third report as follows:

In its preliminary consideration of Bill No. 37, The Operating Engineers Act, 1964, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

That this committee request the House to constitute an appropriate committee to study Bill No. 37, The Operating Engineers Act, 1964, to hear representations with respect thereto and to report to the House thereon.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE MINING ACT

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Mining Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, a short explanation is necessary. The amendments to The Mining Act may be divided into three parts and it is hoped that some of the changes may help to encourage prospecting in the province.

First of all, there are some housekeeping amendments that are necessary, as a result of the changeover last year from patents to leases as the form of title that is granted to the claim holder after he has completed his assessment work.

The second group of amendments is intended to improve administrative processes. Finally, there is a group of amendments which have to do with assessment work on mining claims. An attempt has been made to modernize our legislation in line with technological advances and new developments in explorations for mineral deposits.

I might say that this bill was drawn up after discussion with all the mining industry, and agreed to.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS AND BOARDS OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, by way of a short explanation of these three bills, the first Act really is not directly related but it does provide for payment of the trustees of this province. This Act is being introduced after polls were taken of the trustees, and the information received by the Trustees' Council. The polls indicated that approximately 75 per cent of the trustees in this province now felt that some form of honorarium would be in order.

The other two Acts, Mr. Speaker, are more directly related. The first Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act generally provides that those areas which are, presently, not in secondary or district areas will, after this Act comes into effect, be required to become part of a district or high school area in this province. This means that, generally speaking, schools of the secondary level shall now be part of, or all sections in the Ontario counties shall be part of, secondary school districts.

The other bill, Mr. Speaker, deals with the elementary schools of this province. As many hon. members know, we have made very substantial progress over the past number of years in the creation of township areas but this Act will provide, generally speaking again, that the township shall become, as at January 1, 1965, the smallest unit for school administration in this province. This will mean, roughly speaking, Mr. Speaker, that there will be a reduction in the number of boards in Ontario of between 1,500 and 1,600.

It also provides on a permissive basis, Mr. Speaker, the right to the township areas to join two or three areas into a larger unit of administration upon the mutual consent of the townships. It also goes one step further, Mr. Speaker, on a permissive basis, allowing the townships to enter into an agreement with the district or local high school board to form a board of education of one, two or three townships, together with the unit of administration for secondary school purposes.

I think, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will agree that these amendments mark something of a milestone in the administration of the school boards of this province.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), notice of which has been given to him.

Has the Ontario Hospital Services Commission carried out a full-scale and thorough investigation of the explosion at the Grace Hospital in Windsor on November 28, 1963?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the only answer I can give to the question of the hon. member is, "Yes". And this answer has to be of this nature because I am advised that legal action has now been taken by the widow; and since it is in the courts I have been advised that it would be improper for me to give further detailed information.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to make a statement concerning the reimposition of tolls on the Welland Canal.

On December 23 last, the hon. George J. McIlraith, then Minister of Transport in the government of Canada, made an announcement that the government of Canada and the government of the United States had exchanged notes by which it had been agreed that the suspension of tolls on the Welland Canal had been repealed and that tolls would be reimposed as of April 1, 1964.

To go back to the time of the original imposition of these tolls in 1959, the government of this province of that day lodged very strong opposition to the imposition of tolls and this opposition was embodied in a telegram which was sent by my predecessor to the then Minister of Transport in Ottawa, the hon. George Hees. I would like to read that telegram because I think it is as applicable today as it was then:

FOLLOWING MY VERBAL REPRESENTATIONS MAY I REITERATE IN THE STRONGEST POSSIBLE TERMS THAT THE GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO STRONGLY OPPOSES WITHOUT RESERVATION THE IMPOSITION OF TOLLS ON SHIPPING USING THE WELLAND CANAL.

OVER HALF A CENTURY AGO IT WAS DEFINITELY ESTABLISHED THAT THIS WAS TO BE A TOLL-FREE INLAND WATERWAY. THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY DOES NOT ALTER THIS PRINCIPLE ONE iota.

THE IMPOSITION OF TOLLS WOULD SERIOUSLY AFFECT SHIPPING AND DISCRIMINATE AGAINST AND RETARD THE GROWTH OF ESTABLISHED INDUSTRY, IMPEDE THE NATURAL DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHERN, WESTERN AND SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO, AND WEAKEN THE USEFULNESS OF OUR GREAT INLAND LAKE SYSTEM AS AN INSTRUMENT OF EXPANDING COMMERCE. WITH ALL THE FORCE AT OUR COMMAND ON BEHALF OF THE PEOPLE OF ONTARIO THIS GOVERNMENT DEMANDS THAT THE WELLAND CANAL SHOULD CONTINUE TO BE TOLL-FREE.

That is the end of the telegram, Mr. Speaker.

With these sentiments this government concurs wholeheartedly. We feel that the return of the imposition of tolls in the Welland Canal is a retrograde step, the effect of which can only weaken the usefulness of our inland lakes as an instrument of expanding commerce and growth.

From the very first days of the Welland Canal it was established that this inland waterway was to enjoy toll-free status. The original tolls were imposed on March 9, 1959, some four of five days after that telegram was despatched from here, despite representations made by the government of Ontario of that day, and by other representative groups affected.

Subsequently, after being imposed in 1959, the tolls were suspended on July 18, 1962, and with this action at that time we were in complete agreement.

The decision of the Minister of Transport to reimpose these tolls was taken without reference to this government. This is an action much to be deplored. We would have appreciated an opportunity to make our opinions known on behalf of the people and industries of this province prior to the conclusion of the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States.

Tolls on the Welland Canal vitally affect every province in Canada and, in our opinion, will be detrimental particularly to the people of the western provinces and many industrial concerns and their employees in the province of Ontario.

I am, therefore, objecting most strongly to the reimposition of these tolls and we are asking the federal government to reconsider their decision in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The thirty-sixth order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

On vote 1401:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, this I believe, is the fifth year in which I have had the opportunity to address some remarks immediately following the introduction of the estimates by the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

I thought earlier this afternoon that perhaps we had been making some progress in some of the suggestions we have put forward over these years and I want to compliment the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), who is not in his seat at the moment, for the content and the new principles that are being established in the legislation he has just introduced.

The idea that we have had far too many units of local government has been one of the criticisms that we have put forward over these many years, and which the government seemed to blithely ignore.

At the time of introducing this legislation, we have some 3,500 separate educational jurisdictions in the province of Ontario and almost 1,000 separate municipal jurisdictions. As I understand from the remarks of the hon. Minister of Education, we are going to reduce the number of educational jurisdictions by approximately 50 per cent, and certainly this is a step long overdue.

I am pleased that we are not hearing the fatuous remarks that we heard over these many years about the glories and the importance of the great democratic principles lying in local autonomy. Certainly, there is no group in this House stronger than ourselves in believing that the people should have a voice in their government. But merely because in 1849 when The Baldwin Act was introduced and units were set up of local government, both for educational purposes and for municipal purposes, merely because these were the Acts of an earlier day when transportation was by horse and buggy and there were no roads, does not mean that this method of procedure should be enshrined in our statutes for all time. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that I compliment the hon. Minister of Education in taking this most forward step.

I cannot resist either, a remark or two in connection with the other bill he introduced, that of paying trustees, while it is not strictly relevant to these estimates. I remember that was another idea that we put forward from this side of the House over these many years. I can remember the hon. Prime Minister's (Mr. Robarts') predecessor giving one of his impassioned addresses on the glories of public service and how these trustees really did not want to be paid. All they wanted to do was serve, he said, and it would detract from their ability to give service if anybody introduced anything as crass as money into their consideration of service.

As I say, I am pleased to see these two steps being taken.

Really, the purpose of my remarks insofar as the bills the hon. Minister of Education introduced, is to focus attention on the fact, Mr. Chairman, that we have had no real departures in our municipal legislation at all. The hon. Minister of Education said we are setting up a new milestone in educational progress and I would have hoped that we would be setting up some new milestones in the progress of our municipal affairs.

We are under a very substantial handicap at this time, Mr. Chairman, in commencing on these estimates because we do not have before us any legislation from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner). I know there is some coming—the hon. Minister has told me this—but it is difficult, it is impossible, to comment on new "milestones" if you have not even seen the concrete which is going to hold the milestones into the ground. It places the Opposition in an almost impossible position in reasonably commenting on the municipal affairs of this province when these estimates are called before the legislation has been brought into the House. We have to presume.

My criticism this afternoon is going to be on the basis, Mr. Chairman, that really municipal affairs are not going to change substantially over what they were a year ago, or two years ago or even five years ago and if there is information to the contrary, I would be delighted to hear from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs that he is going to set up a few milestones in the municipal procedures. I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. Minister when he introduced his estimates the other evening. Really, all he has done is give us a summary of this 30th annual report of his department. This report runs some 109 pages and the hon. Minister boiled down the summary into a half-hour speech. There is really not a new word in what the hon. Minister said when he introduced his estimates the other evening, that was not in this report. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I would have hoped that we would have had a few indications of radical change in this department for the betterment of the people of Ontario.

I do not think I can call a better witness to my defence in suggesting that the time is long overdue for municipal reform than the gentleman who is quoted in this news clipping. I notice my hon. friend from Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby) is here. He is not listening, but I am going to refer to another news clipping.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): A lot of people have wished you went west.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Yes, that is for sure.

Mr. Singer: The gentleman is referred to in a clipping headed:

"LET'S BE FRIENDS," ROBERTS TELLS CITIES AND TOWNS

"Relations between the Ontario government and its cities and towns are a patchwork system," Premier John P. Roberts yesterday told the association of mayors and reeves.

Premier Roberts hinted he may call a Queen's Park conference of the municipal heads of the province to sit down "seriously" and discuss ways of remedying the situation. He said the urgency and volume of resolutions from the association had convinced the government that such a conference was necessary.

That is the view of the hon. Prime Minister apparently, if he is correctly quoted in this clipping. And with those views I agree. We have a patchwork quilt in our provincial-municipal relations and it is high time somebody did something about changing this. It is high time somebody—to use again the words of the hon. Minister—somebody began setting some new milestones in this sort of development and relationship.

But notwithstanding the hon. Prime Minister having hinted he might call a conference, and notwithstanding the fact that he is deploring, apparently, the present system, we have not had any indication of any change in direction of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, why the government has not seen fit to do the sort of thing that some of the municipalities have done. I have a report here in my hand called "The Report on Planning and Development Procedures and Controls of the Township of North York" prepared by MacDonald, Currie and Company, dated December 1963.

Now the council of the township of North York saw fit to inquire into, or to cause an inquiry to be made into, its planning procedures and it retained the firm of MacDonald, Currie and Company, chartered accountants, to prepare a very comprehensive report resulting from its examination of this procedure.

MacDonald, Currie and Company advised it prepared its report with the assistance of such people as Professor Adamson of the School of Architecture, a well-known planning consultant; Dr. Redfern, Bousefield and Bacon, planning consultants; and Messrs. Bacon and Bousefield of that firm; Mr. D. M. Treadgold, QC, a gentleman who is well known in these buildings, who gave excellent service while he was in government employ and who is certainly recognized as a very able man in the particular fields in which he specialized over the years; Mr. Sloan and a Mr. Kirkham of Urwick, Currie Limited, management consultants; and so on.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, the point I am making here is that the township of North York saw fit to cause this type of an inquiry to be made and they hired people who have some knowledge of business procedures to carry on this inquiry. These people who had knowledge of business procedures called in planning consultants, legal consultants, and so on. They emerged with what I think is a very useful document and I commend it to the attention of the hon. Minister and to his staff because I think there are some excellent planning suggestions in this report—I do not know if the department has seen it.

This is the sort of thinking, this is the sort of investigation, Mr. Chairman, that I believe this government should have embarked on long ago. In this annual report of the department the hon. Minister has told us that he has set about to try to get better procedures within his department and I think that is long overdue. I think he is making some very substantial progress in this regard. But these procedures are still being tailored to make work the outdated and almost inappropriate statutory provisions that are still being carried on without any real basic change in our approach to municipal affairs.

Even in our planning statutes, Mr. Chairman, which are comparatively new, the time for an examination of this type is here. These things to work properly must be constantly reviewed. Some of the suggestions that are put forward in this MacDonald and Currie report run along these lines; that representations be made to the provincial Legislature allowing The Planning Act to be amended to permit those municipalities which so desire to transfer to council, subject to the approval of the Minister, the functions now vested in planning boards.

That, Mr. Chairman, if you will remember, was a recommendation that was contained in the second interim report of the select committee on municipal affairs.

It is more than a coincidence I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the people on that committee made that recommendation and that these very competent investigators made that recommendation as well. But what government reaction have we had to any of the things that are in this report? There may be a reaction and it may be contained in the forthcoming legislation, but if there is we certainly have not seen it up till this day. They suggest that the municipality—in this case the municipality of the township of North York—consider dispensing with the planning board and establishing a planning committee of council to deal with planning matters. They suggest that the township recommend to the Legislature that The Planning Act be amended to permit council, where it assumes the functions of the planning board, to vest in a committee of adjustment the consent functions permitted under section 26 of The Planning Act.

There are several suggestions here that I think make abundant good sense which would improve our whole planning function here in the province of Ontario. They are somewhat new departures. They are new ideas, but it is so long since we have had a new idea expressed in legislation in our municipal statutes that we have almost forgotten what they sound like.

Further suggestions that the township recommend to the Legislature are that The Planning Act be amended to permit bylaws to be passed pursuant to section 30, to come into force without the approval of the municipal board. To avoid delays—and the hon. Minister was concerned with delays—the suggestion here is made that these planning procedures be allowed to carry on locally and that there need not be constant reference or automatic reference to the municipal board in every zoning matter. Then when the local council has made up its mind that a certain zoning step is reasonable and logical, that it be allowed to proceed with this unless there has been some objection. If there is some objection, then let the municipal board sit and hear these matters.

Surely that makes some reasonable common sense, and surely that would fit in with some of the ideas of local autonomy that exist here.

There is a suggestion that the township recommend to the Legislature that section 28-7 of The Planning Act be amended to permit a part of a proposed plan of subdivision to be referred to the Ontario Municipal Board. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the procedures are now that the Minister deals with the proposed plan of subdivision all by himself and that there is available a procedure whereby the plan of subdivision can get before the municipal board if there is some disagreement or argument about it.

But the whole plan—and the plan may consist of four, five or six hundred lots—has to go before the board, and hours and days are often wasted when the point in dispute can perhaps involve only a small corner of that plan. Surely that is a logical and sensible suggestion.

A further suggestion that the township recommends to the Legislature is that changes be made to permit a plan or part of a plan to be sent back to the Minister for final approval pursuant to section 28 (13) after a decision in respect to the disputed matters has been handed down by the municipal board.

These are suggestions that seem to me, in any event, that if adopted, would rapidly speed up planning procedures in this province and would take out of The Department of Municipal Affairs a lot of the unnecessary paperwork that it now has to wrestle with, and wrestle with for no apparent purpose. There is a suggestion that the Minister require all persons and agencies to whom a plan of subdivision is circulated, to send a copy of their comments to the local municipality and that such persons be requested to discuss directly with that municipality in order to save time and eliminate duplication of work.

Now, you are aware that when a plan of subdivision comes in and the Minister circulates it to all the myriad of authorities that might be concerned with it, that all those reports come back in to the Minister. Then he has a department or subdepartment that tries to compile them and then eventually they get up to the local municipality with the Minister's comments, or the comments of someone on behalf of the Minister.

Then the subdivider is called in and there are discussions and arguments or agreements or disagreements about each one of the things. The length of time needed to process subdivisions has to be lengthy by this awkward procedure and it really achieves very little.

My point in referring to this MacDonald and Currie report is not particularly to stress any of the recommendations they have made, other than in their nature. They are reasonably sensible recommendations. My point in making reference to this report at all, Mr. Chairman, is that to my mind—and I have said this before—there is in this whole field of municipal law the real need to have a proper investigative body sit down and study what is wrong with our procedures. This body, to my mind, is not in the nature of a select committee, it is in the nature of a group of experts. Here is a group of experts who have worked hard and produced a report that makes some good common sense.

Certainly any radical changes in our municipal legislation should not be done solely at the behest or on the recommendation of any group of experts. But such a group of experts might well be constituted and should be constituted, to report perhaps to the select committee and let the select committee study their recommendations and encourage the government to act on them or discourage the government from acting on particular ones.

In the field of research, in the field of study, there is no field that cries out more for immediate action than this whole municipal-provincial field of government. Our municipal affairs, Mr. Chairman, in my mind are not running properly. We live along from day to day and I suppose, in the minds of some people, as long as we get along this is reasonably all right. But we are not getting along well because of all of these conflicts that we have to resolve between different jurisdictions, because of the fact that our economic ways of life change, because of the fact that the automobile has so changed our way of life that these artificial municipal boundaries that have existed over 110 years no longer have any meaning or sense, because of the fact that we have a science of planning now which, in its very nature, commends the idea of regional planning rather than artificially restricted municipal planning.

There have been so many recommendations, so many suggestions given to the government in connection with implementing planning by regional areas. And really there has been no progress in this. As soon as you begin to talk about regional planning, Mr. Chairman, you are talking about regional government, because there is no real point in trying to plan regionally unless you have the local government on the same basis that it is going to be able to implement that sort of planning.

The sort of thinking that I am referring to, Mr. Chairman, is set out to some extent in a brief submitted to the select committee on The Municipal Act by the Town Planning Institute of Canada. I think this was an outstanding brief and I think that the ideas set out in here could well form milestones of development and progress for the government of Ontario in its provincial-municipal relations. This brief suggests a provincial planning agency responsible to a Cabinet committee, which will encourage and guide and supervise physical planning by all provincial and municipal agencies and deal with federal activities bearing upon physical development. It should co-ordinate and undertake and finance all necessary research as well as co-ordinate provincial activities in economic development, population distribution, resource development, industrial location, agricultural policies, local government organization, financial arrangements, housing, education, health, conservation, highways, transportation, water and sewage.

Mr. Chairman, it is so obvious that this whole field is so badly distributed through the Cabinet that we do not make any sense out of planning. When the hon. Minister of Energy Resources (Mr. Simonett) had assigned to him the water resources commission and several other agencies that deal with matters that are so important to municipal affairs, I expressed the view and I still express it this afternoon, that the government is making it that much more difficult for proper planning that co-ordinates all of the government activities.

It is awfully hard, Mr. Chairman, to understand how these different ideas are brought together within the Cabinet and how, when a matter concerns the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs such as these matters do, he and his civil servants can make plans that are going to be in accordance with the thinking of the hon. Minister of Energy Resources and his civil servants, or are going to be in accordance with the thinking of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) because he has got into the scene now, he has got into the picture.

There was a news story in the Toronto Globe and Mail on November 20, 1963, which suggested that a long-term plan for land use is urged for the Niagara fruit region. A study by The Department of Economics and Development says the fruit belt area contains ample room for urban and industrial growth as well as increased fruit production.

This is a good idea, and I spoke about it a year ago at some considerable length. I gave to the government a history of all the plans and the studies and the efforts that had been expended to try to bring some order out of the chaos that exists in the Niagara peninsula. I had hoped that The Department of Municipal Affairs would have taken the initiative to do something about it. But apparently the hon. Minister of Economics and Development or someone in The Department of Economics and Development thought this was a great idea to do a little study of his own on. So he embarked on it and prepared another report, adding to the long, long list of reports that are outstanding in connection with the Niagara peninsula. But nobody brings these things together, nobody brings in a plan for proper land use in the Niagara fruit region.

Mr. Chairman, what better example could we have of haphazard handling of our municipal affairs—to use the words again of the hon. Prime Minister, the patchwork system—than in the way we are dealing with fixed assessments in this House? Surely, there is some need for proper development and encouragement of industrial development in many areas of our province—in northern Ontario, in Windsor, Cornwall, and many other places. But you are not going to do this unless there is some plan in which the municipal authorities can work in co-operation with The Department of Economics and Development, and which will produce, Mr. Chairman, a joint effort inspired by all of the departments of our government to provide better municipal management within Ontario.

This brief of the town planning institute suggests a framework for local planning that there be provincial-initiated regional planning. That is what I have been talking about just now, Mr. Chairman—that there be more provincial assistance, technical and financial, to municipal and regional planning authorities; that there be longer council terms; that there be defined planning processes and the establishment of councils as planning agencies—this is the third time that recommendation is before us—that there be a delegation of certain planning powers to municipalities without the necessity for the constant review; that there be simplified procedures for redevelopment; that there be a system of replanning whereby land may be re-subdivided with the approval of a proportion of the owners involved, and that municipal powers to preserve sites or buildings of an historic nature be given. And so on.

This is the sort of thinking that the government should be paying some attention to. This is the sort of thinking, unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, that the politicians really are not able to do at any great length. Politicians, no matter what part of the House they sit in, are going to have certain ideas about municipal improvement. But this is a field that cries out for detailed expert examination and this is the sort of thing that the government has to initiate. It is with much regret, Mr. Chairman, that we have come to the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs for yet another year and we have heard none of these ideas at all.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there are a few other things here that I thought I would mention this afternoon. Oh, perhaps there is one more editorial comment that is worthy of note here, which highlights some of the need for municipal reform. This is from an editorial in the Toronto Telegram, headed: "Civic Crisis." It talks about the damaging effect of high property taxes, and says that another result of this is that these high property taxes defeat the purpose of increasing civic revenue. They drive industry into the suburbs where taxes are lower.

The loss of assessment coupled with increased civic costs, results in another rise in taxes, accelerating the exodus of industry and exerting heavier pressures on home owners and small businessmen. To the urban community this spiral spells decay, homes in disrepair, slums, deterioration of the central city, and a lengthening backlog of public works.

The editorial suggests that the property tax is no longer adequate or suitable to pay for all responsibilities imposed on municipalities, because it draws upon the one source of revenue. Property assessment is too rigid. It is unrelated to wealth and is not a true measure of income. It is obsolete and it is inequitable, because it is required to pay for such services as education and welfare, which are not services to property and are unrealistic. To that, certainly, you can add such services as cost of the administration of justice. I noticed in the paper just today that a delegation was received by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) and, I think, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, from Metropolitan Toronto, asking for some assistance in the building of courtroom facilities.

Certainly the costs of the administration of justice are costs which concern all of the people of Ontario, and certainly those are costs that should be shared by all of the people of Ontario.

One of the reasons, unfortunately, why we have poor court facilities in many areas, is that there is not a real interest—a financial interest, I mean—taken by this government in making sure we have adequate courtroom facilities and adequate jails. The reports of the various committees, over the years, on the situation that exists in our jails, certainly should have indicated to any reasonable government that there had to be some real reform in this field. This, again, is part of the old-fashioned, outdated, outmoded municipal idea of local autonomy, going back 110 years.

The only action we have had out of the government, even in this field of jails, was the fantastic change that was wrought by the former Minister of Reform Institutions, sir, when he cleared up any doubt and said that the jails should go back to the municipalities and that the civil servants are the responsibility of those municipalities. He said, at least, there was some doubt about it before, but he set the clock back another 110 years.

If that is the policy that is going to be continued, Mr. Chairman, it is hard to see how we can have any hope or any expectation of a real analysis of the faults of our municipal set-up, or a real hope that we are going to have some improvement.

Mr. Chairman, there are a few references I did make when I went through this report.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Could you try to be a little more cheerful?

Mr. Singer: Yes, yes!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): You feel downcast?

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for High Park says, "Try to be a little more favourable," and I think I will.

Mr. Cowling: Cheerful, cheerful!

Mr. Singer: Cheerfull

On page 2 of the report there is reference to improvement districts. I remember one of the officials of The Department of Municipal Affairs coming before the select committee and telling the members about improvement districts.

We were advised, sir, that there were some 22 at the time this gentleman came before the committee and that, in his opinion—he is one of the senior officials of the department—there were too many improvement districts being subsidized by the province, by all the rest of us. He said that some of them could afford to stand on their own feet and that letters had, in fact, gone out to some of them suggesting that this be done, and asking them to take the initiative to become responsible self-governing units and get out from under the skirts of the government and get out from under the subsidy.

Mr. Chairman, it was somewhat hopeful, I would think, to write that sort of a letter because any municipal area that is getting a subsidy is not likely to get out from under that subsidy unless the bait is very attractive. These improvement districts were set up to encourage areas to start on the path of municipal government. But there is machinery—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): May I interrupt for a moment? Could I ask you a question?

What subsidy are you talking about that goes to improvement districts?

Mr. Singer: The subsidy of having available all of the resources of The Department of Municipal Affairs to run their business. Where, in other municipalities, you have to pay your civil servants, in improvement districts the province pays for their civil servants.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is not right. You know better than that.

Mr. Singer: Certainly it is right. The budgets are drafted in your department, the controls are there, all of the advantages. You have whole groups of civil servants who do nothing except the municipal business of the improvement districts; those are the subsidies, the very substantial subsidies. The hon. Minister knows this.

But the point I am making, insofar as improvement districts are concerned is this: There are many of them, at least in the opinion of one of the senior officials, that can stand on their feet. They write polite letters to them saying, "Please stand on your own feet, get out from under our skirts, and go on functioning as though you were grown up." They refuse, almost without exception; I think maybe one of them did come off.

But surely, if this is encouraging procedure, if there is any reason to write those letters, there also should be some amendment to the Act, or there should be some flexing of the muscles on behalf of the hon. Minister in saying, "The time has come when you must stand on your own feet." This is the sort of thinking that I think should be going on in the department.

Then, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister spent some time in talking about assessment. He referred to the new manual that is coming off the press, and I am delighted to see that there will be a new assessment manual. We did not hear whether the manual is going to be made mandatory, as so many people have suggested, or whether it is going to continue to be just a guide. We heard the hon. Minister talk about the advantages of better trained assessors, and to this we say "Amen". Certainly you need better trained assessors. We heard about the efforts that are being made to encourage the appointment of assessment officers over larger areas, counties; and the new experiment that is going to be made now in the northern part of the province so that there can be district assessors. To this we say, "Good!" But, Mr. Chairman, we are still encouraging the 976 municipalities to have their own assessors, and we are encouraging the appointment and reappointment of badly trained assessors, or assessors with no training, because we have this great myriad of municipalities which are unable to pay properly trained people because they have not enough assessment to do it.

There have been many requests, Mr. Chairman, that no one should be allowed to be made an assessor unless he qualifies to the satisfaction of The Department of Municipal Affairs in the same manner as accountants are qualified. No one can audit the books of the municipality unless they have a certificate of satisfaction from the department; this is as it should be. Well, surely there should be as strict a system of qualification for municipal assessors? So much of our local government depends on the ability of these assessors to distribute the municipal tax burden equitably. But again we do not see any positive direction from this government. And we are going to have our unsatisfactory system until there is positive direction from the hon. Minister.

There has been comment about municipal investigation, and the investigations that were made over the last year, and I think this is as it should be. There has been some slight change, and perhaps some slight improvement, in that the government, in recent months at least, has not needed quite as much pushing to carry on an investigation as it needed in former years. There is no point—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The same legislation.

Mr. Singer: The same legislation, but the legislation, surely, Mr. Chairman, is only as good as those people who administer it. I say, in recent months, there has been a change; and under the same legislation the present hon. Minister has not needed nearly as much pushing to inaugurate an investigation, where there seemed to be a prima facie reason for it, as his predecessors. His predecessors had to be beaten over the head to get some of those investigations under way, which is well known. I think this is a step in the right direction.

But I have in hand here, Mr. Chairman, the auditor's report of the township of South Gower. This was published in the Kemptville Weekly Advance on July 11, 1963. And I just wonder with all the checks and balances and investigations, and so on, how the government reacts when it sees a report such as this relating to the financial affairs of the township of South Gower. The auditor says:

We have endeavoured to ensure that all receipts have been properly recorded in the accounts but, as usual in an audit of this nature, it is not possible to verify the receipts from all sources. The corporation does not maintain a general ledger, a tax arrears ledger or an adequate tax collection cashbook.

In the absence of adequate records or duplicate receipts showing the date of payment, we did not attempt to verify the accuracy of discounts allowed or the penalty and interest charged in the collection of taxes. Adequate vouchers were not available for our examination in support of all expenditures. We were unable to verify the revenue from dog licences, permits, road work and fines. The certificate of the clerk was not attached to the roll. The oath of the collector was not attached to the roll return during the year. Satisfactory vouchers were not submitted covering all payments, although we examined pay cheques for all disbursements. The minutes of the board did not include the authorization of all payments made by the secretary-treasurer. There were no surety bonds in force covering the treasurers of public school sections.

And then there were a series of recommendations from the auditors after they discovered all these unusual procedures. I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that anybody has been doing anything dishonest in the township of South Cower, but I am suggesting that this is no way to run anybody's business. And I am suggesting that, since the hon. Minister accepted the responsibility of looking after our municipalities, that when he sees a report like this, something should be done to change procedures so that this sort of thing cannot go on.

I would think that there must be responsible, Mr. Chairman, someone in The Department of Municipal Affairs to establish procedures so that at least proper business methods can be brought to our municipalities. And when you see a report like this published in the newspaper, one wonders really what all of this reorganization in The Department of Municipal Affairs is achieving.

I compliment the department on establishing regional offices. I think this is good. And I compliment the new direction that the department is taking in sending its municipal people into the municipalities rather than forcing everyone to come down to Toronto to get advice and direction. And we are just starting on this. The making available of planning advice in other sections of the province by establishing local offices is a very sound idea and certainly should be extended.

The question of assessment I dealt with a few moments ago but certainly it is obvious to bring order out of the chaos in our assessment field, we are going to have to be a little tougher. We are going to have to insist on some sort of mandatory system of assessment rules, we are going to have to insist on some series of qualifications for assessors and we are going to have to insist on larger districts so that there will be financial resources made available to pay assessors. And then, if all these things are done, there will be reasonable equality in assessment and taxation procedures.

Payments or grants in lieu of taxes: It is very interesting that over the years my good friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls

(Mr. Bukator), talked about this and I am sure he will talk about it before this session is over. But again I can see no reason why some sections of this province should be penalized because they have an abundance of provincial establishments and they should not get full grants, including a portion for education where they have these provincial installations in their municipalities.

The federal government does it, and if the federal government does it there is no reason why the provincial government cannot do it as well. It is unfair, and the most dramatic incident of the unfairness and the inequity of this exists in the city of Niagara Falls. My hon. friend from that area will undoubtedly be talking about this before these estimates are finished.

This is a long report, Mr. Chairman. There are many things of substantial value in it and many criticisms that must be made as a result of reading it. I note something new that I think is very good too. The department apparently is now sending its officials to the municipal board to present their ideas in connection with annexation. These officials are going into the witness box, I gather, as witnesses, and allowing themselves to be cross-examined. And I say this is as it should be because if matters are going to be referred to the municipal board and there are opinions from the department—and there should be opinions from the department on annexation, zoning matters or anything else—those opinions should be brought before the proper authorities in the form of evidence and the people giving that evidence should be compellable witnesses and be available for cross-examination. There has begun, sir, to be a movement in this direction and I think this is a good thing.

There is a section in this report at page 72 that deals with urban renewal, and again we have overlapping jurisdictions here. Urban renewal certainly concerns municipal affairs, and apparently it concerns The Department of Economics and Development. There are references here to Toronto's Moss Park. There are no references to housing because again we are in another department. But why anyone in this government should pat themselves on the back for their role in the Moss Park development escapes me completely. If ever there were a series of hideous mistakes made, it was in connection with that Moss Park development and this must be well known to government.

But again we get into these overlapping jurisdictions. We have part of the responsibility in municipal affairs and part of it in economics and development. Housing concerns economics and development, but does not concern municipal affairs. There seems to be no co-ordination and it is very hard to follow the thought processes, if there are any, that lead to these decisions.

There is a comment about certain conferences the department has held and tried to hold during 1963—branch workshops—which, due to a staff shortage, they were not able to hold. Now I am going to urge upon the government again, Mr. Chairman, that the time is long overdue for a careful review of the salaries paid to the people who work in The Department of Municipal Affairs, and probably to the people who work in all the other departments. You are not going to get competent people to come and work for the government just for the glory of it.

This government should have the best advice that is available and it is only going to get the best advice available if it pays good salaries. People are not going to come in and work for this government, or any other government, unless they are going to be adequately paid. One of the reasons over the many years that we have not had full staffs within the various branches of The Department of Municipal Affairs is that they are not paying them enough. If you pay enough you are entitled to demand higher qualifications. If you want better planners, if you want people who have taken a master's degree or a doctorate in planning, you are not going to get them for the amounts that are now being paid out in salaries.

It is only recently, only in the last year or two, that you have had any competent legal advice in The Department of Municipal Affairs. It was only two years ago, Mr. Chairman, that there was not a lawyer in that whole department. Now there is a legal branch and this is a substantial improvement. The reason you have not had these people is that you will not pay them and if you want competent people within The Department of Municipal Affairs and in the other departments, you are going to have to realize that you are going to have to pay good salaries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I notice the hon. Minister made brief reference to it, that he has the responsibility for the federal-provincial centennial branch programme. That is quite a mouthful. I was hoping that he could have cleared up some of the doubt that some of us from Toronto have in our minds as to what the province's plans are for the federal-provincial centennial grants in the Metropolitan Toronto area. There was a reference made by the hon. Prime Minister a short time ago that there are plans in somebody's mind—I presume the government's mind—for some sort of a development in Metropolitan Toronto in connection with the centennial. I think the hon. Prime Minister went on to indicate that it was not the same as what the city has been talking about. The city has the St. Lawrence programme for the arts, but it is not that—

An hon. member: That is one of its ideas.

Mr. Singer: Yes, that is one of its ideas and I think that moved on a further step just yesterday in the Toronto council's thinking. But it would seem logical to me, Mr. Chairman, that if the city of Toronto has a number of ideas and one of them is the St. Lawrence programme for the arts, and if the province has some ideas, it is high time the city and the province started talking to each other about what they are doing and that if the province intends to spend a substantial sum of money—and this is what I gathered from the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister—to commemorate Canada's centennial, and to spend a substantial sum of money in Metropolitan Toronto, then surely a joint plan should, and could, be worked out. This is 1964 and the centennial is only three years away now. If there is going to be any programme that is going to make any sense and to take full advantage of the dollars that this province is putting up, to take full advantage of the dollars that the city of Toronto and the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto are putting up, surely there should be some co-ordination. Surely the time has arrived now that the province can say that these are our plans and get the city to help, or the province can say that we like the city's plans, or some of its plans, and we will help with them. But let us get on with some finality in this programme.

On page 97 reference is made to the operations branch. Along the line of my previous remarks, I believe that we have to do everything in our power to encourage professional training through our universities of competent men to work within The Department of Municipal Affairs and to work in the various municipalities throughout the province. I would like to see a system of government grants made to the various universities to encourage training in the municipal field. I would like to see a system of in-training to university students who are studying municipal administration or public administration—perhaps a series of scholarships to encourage this sort of thing. But all of this academic type of direction I am suggesting is going to be of no importance, Mr. Chairman, unless in the province of Ontario we are prepared within this government and within the municipal governments, to provide decent salaries for these young men and women who will emerge from these training courses and work either on the provincial level or on the municipal level.

Those, sir, are the remarks I wanted to address in connection with the estimates this afternoon. I hope I am going to be pleasantly surprised when the hon. Minister brings in his legislation. As I said, to date we do not know what is in the legislation and must presume the worst and hope for the best. If we hope for the best, maybe we are going to achieve something. At least we heard the hon. Minister of Education stand in his place this afternoon and acknowledge there are going to be some changes. I would have hoped he would have acknowledged that perhaps some of the inspirations for these changes came from the remarks we have addressed from this side of the floor to the other side of the floor over these many years.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, one of the disadvantages of a third party in a House such as this is that following the presentation of the hon. Minister, the official Opposition has the opportunity to make one's speech for one. I was very interested this afternoon in hearing the hon. member for Downsview put forth certain ideas which I admit are good ideas and I congratulate him on the speech which he has made.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: I am glad there is enthusiasm here because I was very much afraid that when the hon. member for High Park mentioned that he should be a bit more cheerful I thought perhaps the reason for his lack of cheerfulness was that he was perfectly aware that he did not have the support of his own party in the programme he was presenting this afternoon. At least, as I heard this I wondered why it was that in other provinces where we have Liberal governments these ideas have not already been implemented. They should have been long ago.

I realize, sir, that in the province of New Brunswick, where some changes have taken place recently, they have moved in this field and they now have a report which has some very interesting aspects in it. I am waiting with bated breath to see whether this report is going to be implemented as far as legislation is concerned. Or is it going to follow the pigeonholing which has taken place in the case of so many other reports of this nature in years gone by?

I am sorry the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) is not in his seat because I would like to tell him something this afternoon. He intimated there is a bit of snuggling up that should be done between these two groups, and this afternoon might indicate that. Certainly, the kind of policy I am standing for, and this group stands for in the municipal field, has been enunciated in large measure by the hon. member for Downsview. But I say the problem, if we do snuggle up the way some of the newspapers say we ought to do and become real cosy, is that we are not sure that once Oppositions become governments that these policies are going to be implemented.

We were also told the other day that we ought to snuggle up in this direction. That would lead to improvement, my hon. friend said. Here is our problem. We just do not know. We are left in a desperately difficult position. The other day we had a vote, on Medicare, which the hon. member for London South mentioned. The hon. members on this side voted with our group. In Ottawa the other day something else happened—according to the Toronto Daily Star of February 22. The Liberals promised a national Medicare plan in the 1962 and 1963 election campaigns. Then in the amendments to the Speech from the Throne which called for a government-sponsored and operated Medicare programme, the 71 Conservatives present voted for the New Democratic motion, and the Liberals voted against it. So this is the problem. If we are going to snuggle, who are we going to snuggle up to? Because provincially the Liberals snuggle up to us here, and federally, the Tories snuggle up to us there. So the only answer I see is that we have to keep on maintaining our position and hope that we can provide some ideas for both sides over the next four years, since the people have spoken so recently in both Houses, and we can see no change in the present situation.

And so, having said this and having expressed interest and delight in what was said by the hon. member for Downsview this afternoon, I hope that if ever, God forbid, the Liberals form a government in this province that it will implement the kind of things which were enunciated here this afternoon.

I would also say, to the Liberal group, that it is obvious that its search is ended. When you have a man as progressive in municipal affairs and as progressive in other fields, too, then your search for a leader is ended. Obviously the choice is here with the man who has enunciated his ideas which are so close to our ideas. At that point, when this kind of leadership is provided, maybe we can talk about snuggling a little more realistically.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this afternoon—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): This is leap year, you know.

Mr. Young: When is the day? We will listen, we are interested in the proposal.

This afternoon I want to say to the hon. Minister that as far as this group is concerned, we feel that there has been progress in the field of municipal affairs. We heard the other day about how this government is a new government and how this government is without question moving forward to the '70s with a realistic programme, and we hope this is true. Believe you me, this group will give you every support when you demonstrate that this is, in effect, the case.

I do think, sir, as the hon. member for Downsview has said, that there are many things now happening in The Department of Municipal Affairs which are good. This idea of regional offices, where help is now being afforded, is good; and I hope the Sudbury office can open very quickly and can be followed by other offices. Certainly the university training, and the in-service training, which is being undertaken by this department, is something which deserves commendation and deserves extension. The assessment manual, which is now almost ready for us, is good; and it should mark a real step forward in this province in this whole field of assessment, which has been so upsetting up to the present time.

The financial assistance which is being granted to the municipalities for waterworks and sewage works, and this sort of thing, is all to the good. We put our stamp of approval on this kind of activity.

But after all, when this is said and done, the fundamental problem remains. We have today, around most of our municipalities, what I might call "quadruped" boundaries. They have been established, based upon the distance that a horse could travel—the distance over which councillors could get together easily, riding on or behind the animal which served for transportation for so many years. These kind of boundaries are, today, confining the activities of our municipalities. They are holding us in, and holding us back, and restricting us. The motor car, as has been mentioned so many times, has made obsolete the old boundaries that we know.

We saw this afternoon where the hon. Minister of Education brought us a new concept which the hon. members to my right have talked about, according to the hon. member for Downsview, for many years. But I might say, before they talked about it, I remember talking about it on public platforms; and certainly this group has discussed it many times. So we believe this is a step forward. The township, as the smallest base now for school operations, is good; and this process ought to be pushed further as time goes on—it is a step in the right direction.

We find the boundaries of our regional high schools, today, are spilling over the municipalities. No longer do most municipalities hold within them sufficient area and population to properly service the educational needs of our young people. We find this whole business of conservation spilling over boundaries. No longer can municipalities undertake it.

Then there is the smoke abatement question, which we heard discussed the other day. Again this is not something which one municipality alone can properly look after. Dr. Langford mentioned—I saw him the other night on television—that we perhaps have ten years before the pollution in the Great Lakes reaches very dangerous proportions, and that something dramatic must be done within that ten years if we are not to face disaster here.

No municipality alone can do anything significant toward the solution of this problem. Then I think of the whole problem of garbage disposal which we face. Many of our small municipalities cannot set up proper land-fill disposal units. They cannot possibly build proper incinerators, and so they must come together if these things are to be done. Perhaps the garbage disposal problem is going to be solved in days to come, as atomic power can provide the heat and the destructive capacity to do this job for us. This may come. In the meantime, small units cannot possibly face this problem.

At the present time our burgeoning subdivisions around our cities are presenting us with all kinds of problems.

Last Thursday night, I attended the opening of two schools in my own riding. One school has ten rooms, with a class already in the auditorium, and that school is built in an area where, 18 months ago, there was nothing but pasture land. The second school has eight rooms; and not one of the people who attended that opening — and it was jammed—lived in that subdivision a year ago. In that township from which the hon. member for Downsview comes, and of which he was reeve for some time, we have seen—over the past period of time when some of us in this House sat on that council—20,000 people per year, on an average, added to the population. A city in itself. An explosive situation. And believe me it blew up in the faces of the reeve and the councillors a good many times, because we just could not possibly keep up with that kind of a situation and do it in an adequate way; although I think, by and large, it has been done very effectively within the limitations under which we had to operate.

This is going on, and as the post-war generation starts to form families—as they are now commencing to do, and will be at an increasing rate over the next few years—then we are going to find a building explosion such as we have not known for a long, long time. These explosive suburbs demand services, and services mean taxes on the homes, and the homes cannot possibly bear the taxation that is necessary. So there is a scramble for industry, that we heard so much about in this House, because industry does not demand schools and other services.

When the industrial scramble means giving concessions at the expense of the taxpayer, we find the province having to step in, as it had to, with legislation, which is not yet fully into effect, but which will prevent municipalities giving this kind of concession. And even then, with this preventive measure, municipalities remain in desperate straits; subdivisions are built in areas without proper industry, and small municipalities around our towns face sad situations.

I have a few figures here from around the area of my good friend, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent). In the township of Sydenham, the tax rate is $49.50 per person. Derby is $64.32. Sarawak is $75.23. And Owen Sound pays $104.30 per head. Now this means, of course, that Owen Sound had much industry to assist it. But there is a very great difference in the tax rates in the surrounding areas there. And there is very great concern, I suspect, in those townships, as there is in many others.

On the other side, we have a situation where a town like Leaside, in the Metropolitan Toronto complex, well endowed with humming machines, by its planning and zoning makes certain that people who work in the factories cannot afford to live in the town. And so Leaside escapes the welfare costs and the unemployment costs that go with industrialization, and so tax rates can be very low.

So we have the provincial government stepping in with the foundation plan to assist certain areas, so that the educational costs can be met, in some measure at least, from the overall income of the province itself. But, by and large, all these devices which are being used today by the province are simply props to shore up a tottering system of municipalities, and they cannot continue to effectively do the job they are designed to do. We are facing, in spite of this help that is being given, a very serious situation.

Industry first comes into the city, like Owen Sound or Metropolitan Toronto. Then perhaps it seeks the suburbs as we heard a while ago. Some suburbs get it, some do not. And so you get the kind of imbalance which we see all over the place.

In the report of Mr. Smallwood on the Metropolitan situation in Toronto a decade later, he takes into account the fact that an attempt was made here to even out the situation. But the fundamental job was not done. So over the years, because each municipality had too much local autonomy—each financed its own welfare, education, and other costs, and brought in its own tax revenue from industrial assessment and all the rest of it—the result has been a very great increase in the imbalance. And so he says this:

If one views the expenditure side of the record both with respect to the local municipalities and with respect to the larger Metro organization, it becomes increasingly obvious why the financial imbalance between the local municipalities has been growing over the years. Yet the real crux of this problem is actually to be found not in expenditure policies, but rather in the variations that exist in the revenue basis of the 13 communities. And unfortunately Metro has been able to accomplish little to remedy the basic inequity that exists with respect to the different municipalities' assessment position.

And then he says:

An uneven distribution of population and of commercial and industrial assessment resources has tended to turn Toronto municipalities into have and have-not members of a larger metropolitan community.

And he gives the table showing the comparison of per capita assessment figures for all 13 municipalities. Leaside, assessment per capita, is $4,052. At the other end of the scale is East York with $1,787.

In the economic survey issued by The Ontario Department of Economics and Development in 1963 we have this statement regarding the Niagara region:

There appears to be ample room for urban and industrial growth as well as for increased production of fruit on the fruit belt. The pattern of urbanization in the peninsula has been to a large extent that of haphazard, low-density type. This kind of urban sprawl might be channelled into an orderly and compact urban development which would not only save the fruit lands, but also be advantageous to both urban and rural municipalities. Planned development of this nature cannot, however, be successfully administered solely at the present municipal level. This type of planned development requires that some planning organization be given statutory authority to devise and implement our regional land-use programme on a long-term basis.

And so it is that we are facing today, the necessity of regional planning such as has been mentioned in this House by hon. members from all sides of the House. That we must plan ahead has been indicated in this Niagara report. Larger planning areas must come and those planning areas backed up by larger governments which, perhaps, will maintain, to some extent at least, some of the present municipal areas as smaller boroughs. These will be parts of a larger organization and they will administer certain services in connection therewith.

Today we see on every hand—and I want to bring it before this House—some of the factors that are driving us toward this business of larger regional units. In the report of the Ontario Municipal Board on page 4 we have this statement:

Given in schedule A of this report is a list of one amalgamation and 13 annexations ordered by the board during this past year.

Now what is happening is a very simple thing. The cities, the large municipalities of this province, are trying to rationalize their existence and are blindly reaching out and groping for more territory from the suburban areas and the smaller municipalities around them so that they can bring into harmony, once more, the problems they face. We have sitting in the gallery to my left, a reeve of a municipality, a man who was a member of this House for some years. I understand that he has been in a border skirmish with the city of Kitchener recently in the matter of amalgamation or annexation, or something of that sort, as the city is reaching out to get more territory to do its job more properly.

I have in my hand a publication by, of all people, Sears Roebuck, called the A B C's of Community Planning. And they say this:

Increasing mobility and population growth are swiftly erasing the distinction between city and country life. Growing numbers of city people regularly move to rural areas for recreation and seasonal living. Cities are increasingly dependent on the maintenance of lakes, rivers and whole rural regions for dependable supplies of water, of milk and of other foods. Country people, too, travel freely to cities to obtain medical, educational and a wide range of other services they need that enrich their lives. Newspapers and TV also bring them into constant contact with the ideas and news and the services available in the city. Thus urban and rural interests are coming ever closer together. What affects one is important to the other.

And so we are facing this blind outreach of the larger municipalities, trying to bring the city and the hinterland closer together, and the time is here when we see the real need to encompass the whole economic region within one municipal government evening out the benefits and the liabilities over the whole area. The cities and the hinterland around them are thus drawn together in a common destiny.

Schools can be planned rationally for the whole area. Hospitals and the variety of types needed can be properly planned and placed. Sewage disposal can be ordered so that river pollution is minimized. Conservation can be planned comprehensively. Parks and recreation areas developed where they should be. Purchasing could be more centralized with attendant savings, and all the other municipal functions could be more effectively carried on.

Regional planning and regional government of this kind simply carries forward what is already taking place in the realm of education, in the realm of health units, welfare, conservation and all the rest of it. I think the time is here when we recognize the outreach that is taking place, and that the larger units are coming in scores of different areas of community life. These ought to be brought into harmony, and some sense brought into the whole field.

The second field which is making this kind of regional planning extremely important is in the matter of staff. In the report—and I am simply going to point out a few places here in the report from the hon. Minister, where he points to certain things that are happening—the hon. member for Downsview dealt with this matter of assessment. On page 34, section 93A provides:

That a county may appoint a county assessment commissioner who shall have all the powers, duties and privileges of an assessor.

The adoption of this system has a number of advantages and benefits. The commissioner will be in charge and so on, and the hope is expressed here that the county units will now become everywhere, or as universally as possible, the basis for assessment. By sharing costs, as pointed out in the report, a county can afford to adopt up-to-date procedures, and techniques, including the latest data processing equipment.

Then on page 46 of the report, we have this:

The inquiries investigations that were conducted during the year were attributable to certain things; a lack of knowledge of the elementary principles of municipal accounting on the part of certain municipal officials; the increasing complexity of accounting interrelationships of the provincial and municipal local boards and the great volume of statutes, regulations and instructions with which the municipal official must be familiar.

And then again on page 47:

The municipal auditing staff examines the audited financial statement of municipalities and local boards thereof, all of them across the province, and from that we find there are certain difficulties that emerge. The staff of the branch refused to accept for publication the financial statements of 47 municipalities. These statements were returned.

The points at issue were thoroughly discussed with either the auditor or the treasurer, or with both officials, and all statements were revised to conform generally with accepted accounting principles of municipal accounting. And the staff of a branch carries on a large volume of correspondence with auditors and treasurers concerning accounting problems, which are either indicated by the auditor in his report, or were disclosed by an examination of the financial statement.

And then again, we find that the growth of this programme—the winter works programme now throughout Ontario—with the assistance of a field staff of The Department of Public Welfare and The Department of Highways, required a visit by a member of the staff of this branch to approximately 100 municipalities.

Mr. Chairman, I read these excerpts to point out the problem which is being faced by the provincial staff in supervising the multiplicity of small municipalities, and the difficulty of a small municipality to get staff which adequately can deal with the bylaw situation, with the accounting situation, with the inter-relationship situation between province and municipality. I think we have to face the fact that, with larger municipal units, it will take less staff at the specialist level; and while staff has a habit of growing regardless, as municipal procedures become more complex, the fact remains that in this field trained staff is not as plentiful as it might be, and we should be using that trained staff to the maximum of its ability.

Specialization becomes much more possible with fewer municipalities and with real rationalization of this business, not only with staff you see at the top level—the departmental level—but staff at the accounting level, and at the machine level where accounting machines, and all kinds of procedures, can be brought to bear in the larger units, machines which the small municipalities just cannot afford and which, today, they are frustrated without.

It is in the field of planning, particularly, that this is true. Planning staffs are at a tremendous—well, they are scarce today—premium, is the word I think I was searching for.

On page 63 you have this:

Of the ten new planning areas, four contain more than one municipality. At the end of 1963 there were 163 single independent planning areas containing one municipality each; 134 subsidiary planning areas containing one municipality each but located within a joint planning area; and 79 joint planning areas.

In the Municipal World, January, 1963, Mr. Cumming at page 1756 says:

We have today 80 to 90 planning boards active in Ontario, and only 23 of these with proper staff.

This, in a province with something like 978 municipalities, becomes a very serious situation. Then, updating Mr. Cumming's report, on page 65 of the report which I have been quoting—the annual report—we have this:

Our records indicate that four municipalities secured permanent staff in 1963, bringing the number of municipalities having staff up to 40.

I point out the seriousness of this kind of situation because we are coming into an era when community planning is accepted by all groups, in all political faiths; when we are driving hard, in the community planning branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs, to set up planning boards and planning areas across this province. And yet we find that the staff to match our ambition is desperately difficult to come by.

In my own municipality last year, and over the last five years as a matter of fact, the turnover of senior technical people in our planning department has been two-and-a-half times as great as it has been in the other departments of the township. This is because, everywhere, municipalities are seeking planning directors and planning staff who know their business; and I suppose it is a compliment to North York that they come to us, but we do not like what is happening.

The hon. Minister points out that he has a very difficult time maintaining staff in his own department, because that staff is being constantly drawn off by municipalities and by other agencies, private and public, wanting to enter the planning field.

Again there is a drive to use available staff to the best advantage because, if we put a planning director in a small municipality, what is he trying to do? He is trying to create a community where there is no rational basis for that community, and he is trying to solve problems, many of which are created by the fact there is no basis there and that his boundaries are running up against the boundaries of other municipalities—with the friction that is inevitably bound to occur there. So if we are going to do this job properly, if we are going to use available staff to the best advantage, then we must give our planners scope to plan on an overall basis, in a regional way, and then underpin them with other staff who can fill in the regional details as they need to be filled in.

The fourth thing which is driving us toward rationalization of our municipal set-up is this business of industrial development. I have already mentioned this and I am not going to dwell on it too much.

We see today this scramble for assessment and the desperate problems which are being faced by many small suburban municipalities. The Niagara area, in this report, has the problem that is presented by pollution of the rivers, by factories being built where they have no business being built on some of the best fruit lands, and then subdivisions of housing to back up those factories in the same fruit lands.

We see, going across the north of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, a railway line, and hump yards being built there. This may well change the whole planning concept as to where industry ought to be in Metropolitan Toronto. Instead of each one of our little municipalities scrambling for industrial assessment, it may well be that industry now should be placed more and more within reach of that railway line. And then low cost housing, which again our municipalities are scared of because of welfare costs and unemployment costs, should be within reach, so that people do not have to commute from the slums of downtown to work in those factories and back down again. This is the kind of planning that needs to be done.

So the industrial development of our municipalities, I think, is driving us more and more toward larger regional units. Basic, I think, to this is the whole business of where the taxes go. One of the fundamental problems, that I pointed out a few moments ago in the Metropolitan area, is the lack of one treasury; and I think we have to face the fact, as we revamp our municipal set-up, that the assessment monies must come into a central treasury for the whole region and out of that central treasury will flow the welfare costs, the education costs and these other costs that small units today are afraid of. Fundamental to this whole business is this matter of a central treasury, and of a regional apportioning of costs.

These are simply a few of the driving forces that are pushing us toward larger municipal regional units.

It is not going to be easy. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail of October, 1963, in which Dr. Mayo, head of the political science department of the University of Western Ontario, told the annual convention of the Ontario Association of Urban and Rural Municipalities that if regional government is to happen it will only be brought to life by action of the provincial government. He lays a big responsibility on the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. He says:

The history of local government in Canada shows that little initiative for any large-scale reform has come from the grass roots.

Dr. Mayo said that although there has been a widely recognized need for joint planning, and despite prodding by the municipal affairs department, there is very little effective joint planning in Ontario or any other province.

And so, he says, if it is going to happen, it likely will have to have the aspects of a shotgun wedding. He lays the responsibility back upon the department itself.

So this afternoon I would make this proposal to this House, that The Department of Municipal Affairs should immediately initiate a study of where such regional governments ought to start. One such study is underway. The Goldenberg commission is now working in Metropolitan Toronto. I hope out of that will come something of a pattern which might be looked at by other areas. But I would also suggest that The Department of Municipal Affairs immediately initiate a study of these regions—at least the Hamilton region, including the whole Niagara area, upon which we have a basic study. Then it could cover the Windsor area, the London area, the Kitchener-Waterloo, Galt, Guelph complex, and the Oshawa area. Because of a difference in emphasis as far as Ottawa is concerned, I would recommend that my enthusiastic friends here to my right confer with their confreres down at Ottawa and suggest that this kind of study be undertaken in the Ottawa region. So this gives them a job to do, Mr. Chairman, as well as this job which I have suggested for the hon. Minister's department.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: They should talk to the National Capital Commission.

Mr. Young: Yes, that is right, this is a job for it, and we hope it will undertake that job as quickly as the hon. Minister is going to undertake the other job which I have suggested this afternoon.

We also have The Department of Economics and Development outlining this regional development, which gives us some clue to the regional planning in this province, so I think this could well be undertaken and gone forward with.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is the fundamental thing which I want to say this afternoon. There are other matters which I think should also be looked at and matters which I hope the select committee will deal with expeditiously and perhaps this House will look at very carefully.

I am taking for granted that the new hon. Minister is getting his feet on the ground and getting his teeth into the problems. I hope by next year when this House meets that he will have a whole bundle of legislation which will be ready for this House to implement.

The matter of staff training is something which I too would like to emphasize. The start which has been made in the various universities and in in-service training is good and many of the municipalities are now taking advantage of it. This, I think, must be stepped up and perhaps assistance by way of bursaries moved forward so that more municipal people both at the elected level and at the technical level can get the training they ought to have. There is this matter of four-year terms of office for the elected officials, which I stress again as I stressed the other day. I think it is very important if we are going to do long-term planning. If we are going to have any consistency in planning and administration of larger units, then the four-year term of office should come.

The assessment manual is coming. I think the assessment ought to be based across this province on 100 per cent of a value of the property. This is a complete mix-up that we have. If I say to you that my assessment is so much and my mill rate is so much, it does not mean a thing to somebody outside North York or the Metropolitan Toronto area, because we assess in the Metropolitan area on the basis of about a third the value and then set the mill rate on it. Other areas assess on half, three quarters, or whatever fraction may be good to them. I think to bring stability and to bring real harmony across the province, this business of 100 per cent should be considered very seriously and should be adopted.

There is the matter of subdivision standards. One of the things which I think is unfortunate is the permissive nature of subdivision standards across this province. I think the standards in the municipality of which I form a part—a very small part now, but I had something to do with raising standards there, I hope—are high among the best in the province. Certainly in areas of our cities, where there is a basic sewage system, we should no longer allow installation of septic tanks. We should make sure there is underground wiring. This is something that has happened in Europe for two generations and yet in a rich nation like this, in a rich province like Ontario, we have not yet made mandatory the burying of our wires. Certainly we should have mandatory conditions such as sidewalks and pavement in new subdivisions in areas where already the beginning has been laid. Personally I would like to see these mandatory conditions of subdivisions everywhere in this province because people sooner or later have to pay for the laying down of these services. Far better to have it come out of the increased land values. As we see in so many of our suburban areas, there is land speculation. Then following that, subdivision, where fortunes are made out of increased land values. Then the people, after that has happened, have to pay for basic services within the subdivisions.

One other thing that I want to mention here is this business of five-per-cent land. As the House is aware, any municipality which is subdividing is entitled to take five per cent of the land so subdivided for municipal purposes. I have talked to many municipal councils and they thought that the law was so framed that they had to take the five per cent which the subdivider wanted to give them and they have taken it. Often it has happened that it is side hill. When some of us got on to council in North York we found you could not get to the top of land that had been taken in previous years because it was the backyards of homes, and you could not get to the bottom because the subdivider still owned the bottom land in the ravine.

So we have in North York, as I have seen in many other municipalities, side hills that the municipality cannot possibly get into without buying its way into it and then it is no good when it gets there. And we have swamp land and ravine land and all the rest of it. We have worked out a device in my municipality where, if we need ravine land and figure it is worth having, we take 20 times as much as the five-per-cent area because it is 20 times less valuable than the land at the top of the subdivision. We make sure that we have flat land for kids to play. If we want the open land, as we have taken many acres along the river valleys, we have worked out a plan of $1,000 an acre there. That would have to be adjusted to the land values in your own municipalities, but we take it on that kind of a basis. I think the five-per-cent land should be rationalized this way.

But there is another emphasis here.

You see, the present legislation is predicated on horizontal subdivisions. We spread out single-family or dual-family homes, and we take the park land or the land for municipal purposes based on that. But today, particularly in the larger cities, we are now subdividing vertically; we are putting in high apartment blocks. The people who live in those high apartment blocks can no longer be served, parkwise, by five per cent of the land that is there. So I hope that the hon. Minister and this government is giving very serious consideration to this business of vertical subdivisions.

International standards have been laid down which say that we should have at least ten acres of open land within the city for each 1,000 of the population. And at least 2.5 acres of that should be play space where kids can play; that is, fairly level space where recreational sports and all that sort of thing can be carried on. But this standard is not yet met, and certainly the revision of the statutes which recognizes only the horizontal subdivision today, is overdue. I would hope that we think in terms of basing our park land or land for municipal purposes upon density of population where such a basis is necessary.

Mr. Chairman, what I have said this afternoon I feel very strongly about, and I feel these things are fundamentally necessary. But the thing which is making the rationalization of our municipal life extremely urgent is the post-war explosion of population. You see, if we continue to set the pattern on the old quadruped boundary lines, and try to plan within those lines, if we try to build up our municipal services for this day and age within those boundaries, then this population explosion which is coming, as these youngsters begin to form new families, is going to blow us completely out of kilter.

Yesterday morning I took my wife up to the new Yorkdale shopping centre. She did not get home until 9:30 last night. I am hoping now that March 31 comes awfully fast. But I had a look at that shopping centre. It is a tremendous development which has been a long time in planning, and has incorporated many of the good ideas of the European malls and all the rest of it. There is a roof over the mall here, and it is a new design; something very exciting in the realm of the business life of our community.

The thing that struck me is that this inevitably must become the centre of a new development; and around that new industrial complex must be a new city centre and development which, in the days to come, will change the whole complex of that area. With this huge younger crowd coming up, what is going to happen to the older city areas? Inevitably, unless we redevelop, unless we plan regionally and rationally, we are going to find that these new centres will explode planlessly in our present municipal boundaries, and as far as the city centres are concerned, we are going to find ourselves in real trouble in planning changes in the days to come.

If we set planning along present lines, without doing the job that has to be done, then we are going to be in desperate straits within the next generation. To do this, we have to budget for it. I would hope within this budget, which is being presented to us, there is provision for many of these things that I have outlined; and I would hope that as the new hon. Minister finds his way through the complexities of his job, and as this government, as was said the other day, plans ahead for the '70s, budgetary provision will be made next year in the 1965 budget for carrying out fulfilment of many of these things of which I have spoken today.

I can only say that we hope, in this group, that the challenge of the '60s is going to be met in this field of municipal development. We hope that provision is being made, here and now, for the kind of growth which must come if we are not to be stifled and shackled within the obsolete boundaries of our present municipalities.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

At this time I would like to remind the House that the arrangement which has been agreed upon and followed for several sessions is that, after the Minister has completed his presentation, he is followed by one member of each Opposition group, who may make general comments on departmental activities, after which the committee confines itself strictly to a discussion of the actual vote under consideration.

We will now proceed with vote 1401 and the items thereunder. The member for Grey North has the floor.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, speaking on vote 1401—is that correct, Mr. Chairman, 1401?

I would like to commend the previous two speakers, the hon. member for Yorkview and the hon. member for Downsview. Their thoughts are identical with mine, but not as radical as mine in this regard.

At the outset, I would like to commend the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. I have known him for many years—he was formerly the mayor of Timmins—and since then I have been impressed by his administrative ability and devotion to the municipalities which he heads up; and also for the fine staff he has under him in the Ontario Municipal Board. Although I may admire the hon. Minister, I think the policy that he is attempting to administer is greatly outmoded and, as I said before, Mr. Chairman, the Tories here in this regard are like riding a tiger—they cannot steer this problem and they cannot get off.

Each of us must realize that the most important item in the business of this House is in this department, because it affects every home owner in the province of Ontario. Realizing that it is much easier to be critical than to be correct, I suggest to all of us here that everyone who should know the tax mess at municipal level will agree that nothing has been done to basically change the system since 1904. For over 60 years we have been doing the wrong thing, and we all agree that drastic action is needed, so probably we have here an area for agreement. Our differences are politics, but our agreements are principles. I think that we should assess the position and principle, and we must take the tax load off real estate. That is, we must cut the real estate tax in half—and there is one way that we can do it in Ontario.

We can look at a plan which can reduce the real estate tax for every homeowner in Ontario by 50 per cent. As I have said before, we have been doing it wrongly for 60 years. We have to start somewhere to correct this mess. As most municipalities are approaching insolvency today, we have been put on a five-year plan by the Ontario Municipal Board, under strict surveillance. I think you will all agree that the large grants from the province to municipalities are obviously wrong and in need of reform. And the fact is, gentlemen, the very simple fact is, that the money comes from the municipalities in the first place; and when it gets back to them in watered-down form in grants there is very little left.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs that this grant system is the same as it would be for your physician to offer to give you a blood transfusion by taking a pint of blood out of your left arm and spilling about 91 per cent of it on the floor and then putting the pitiful remainder in your right arm.

As my colleagues have already mentioned the inequities, I contend that the present tax and revenue system is not equitable, efficient, adequate, not conducive to the sound growth of this province. The growth of public services with the object of improving the individual standards of living has placed an increasingly heavy burden on governments to provide the financial needs to support services—which all have come to expect—and this has caused substantial tax increases for everyone. The governments are able to provide such financing by graduated and diversified taxes. Moreover, the major sources for those governments are accelerated automatically as the volume of business increases.

The municipal government, however, by its limited field of taxation is being compelled to impose every increasing tax against owners of real estate. These taxes are not based on the ability to pay to the same extent as income or estate taxes. The owners or tenants of land and buildings represent only a part of the population.

Many persons receiving income, either from investment or employment, contribute little or nothing to real estate or business taxes. A person with a small office may earn as much as a person who requires a large building in which to carry on. A farmer must have a large area of land compared to the householder, and real estate taxes, therefore, are based on the value of the land occupied—not on the ability of the occupants to afford the taxes imposed. For instance, Eaton's and Simpson's have mail order houses in all the small areas across the province and are doing a large volume of business, but they are escaping relatively "scot-free" as the taxation they will be charged under a proper revenue system as a base.

I know that the hon. Minister knows. I know the hon. Prime Minister is aware of the inequities. While, granted, the Ontario and federal governments have collected more taxes and made more funds available to municipalities by contributions to education, roadways, unconditional grants and payments in lieu of taxes on some of their properties, these have not been nearly sufficient to meet the increased costs of services demanded by municipalities. And the financial position of municipalities continues to deteriorate to the point where many are facing bankruptcy within three or four years.

For instance, in our municipality—our city hall burned down—we have $130,000 in the the fund to rebuild a new city hall that will cost around $300,000. But the Ontario Municipal Board will not let us build it because we do not have the financial ability to pay it off. Now, municipalities lost the right to collect personal income tax in 1936, and to collect corporation tax in 1944, when these were assumed by the senior level of government. It became an obligation to provide other revenue for municipalities. These two sources of revenue have grown automatically and substantially in the period of economic expansion since World War II because of the tremendous increase in the gross national product. The municipalities receive a very small part of their fair share of the increased revenue now derived from these sources by the federal and provincial governments.

In 1951, if I may speak in the first person, I was president of the Ontario Mayors Association and we continually confronted the hon. Mr. Frost with the situation, and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs knows this. So, in 1951, Mr. Frost appointed in Ontario the Provincial Municipal Committee. This committee came to certain definite conclusions which I think we are back to again, Mr. Chairman, and I quote the findings of this committee set up by the government.

It is a long quotation, so I will forego all the quotation and give you the last paragraph:

The present emphasis placed on the right of every inhabitant to what is considered a minimum standard of living has meant that all governments have been faced with demands for new, more comprehensive and improved social services, and such social services should be financed by taxes based on the ability to pay. The property tax is not an appropriate means of financing increased social and welfare services. The burden of this programme is now imposed upon a limited group of taxpayers, the owners of real property. This suggests the necessity of reviewing the municipal function if municipal tax sources are to continue as at present.

The result of that was that we had the unconditional grants system come into effect which gave, I think, the city of Toronto about $4 million right off the bat.

Two major concessions were granted by the province to municipalities: (a) the enactment of The Municipal Tax Assistance Act 1952, which authorized payment to the municipalities of the equivalent of the general municipal rate in respect of properties owned by the province and its agencies; and (b) the enactment of The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act 1953, which provided for grants without condition to local governments on the basis of population.

Now these were the steps taken by the province in 1951-2-3. They were in the right direction, but fell far short of an overall adjustment of the municipal tax structure. I still contend, Mr. Chairman, that municipalities should be substantially relieved of the cost of what the 1951 Ontario provincial municipal committee defined as being non-basic municipal services.

Now an analysis of municipal expenditure indicates one great fault in municipal financing. The fault is the growing cost to municipalities of services that do not have a direct bearing on property and that do not benefit property, which services will be referred to hereinafter as basic services. The cost of these services has created a burden on the owners of the homes and real property. This has made municipal financing inequitable and municipalities have no authority to raise revenues from other sources, as is the case of the province or the federal government. The municipalities have been compelled to absorb the residual responsibilities not provided by other governments. The revenues available for basic municipal services and projects have been curtailed by the pressure of mandatory obligations laid down by this government. The limited municipal resources have been squeezed to provide non-basic services.

To remedy this situation; to reform the municipal taxation system as follows: to define specifically those basic municipal services which are primarily a service to property and which are provided by municipalities; and to define specifically non-basic services now rendered at the municipal level, having a wider than local scope and jurisdiction or of general benefit to the citizens. We all know these basic services: water, sewers, street cleaning, garbage, street lights, local improvements and their financing, police and fire, parks and recreation, certain health, municipal administration and roadways, and traffic control. But the non-basic services are as follows: education, public welfare, hospital construction, housing subsidies, administration of justice, the provincial highways through municipalities, and emergency services.

Municipal councils are required to levy and collect taxes for school purposes and pay their boards of education and other school boards and trustees the amount they require in their annual budgets. The most significant factor of this, Mr. Chairman, is that the levy in 1947 for schools in municipalities was $44 million. In 1962 it amounted to $313 million and during the same year the debenture debt for education increased from $46 million to $586 million. So more than anything else this has affected the tax rate.

I could say a lot more about this and what figures could be submitted. But the fact remains that many other municipal services are suffering because of these increases for the costs of education. So it is in this field that we must look to the province for relief. It has been estimated, Mr. Chairman, at the Canadian conference on education that by 1979 .6 per cent of all our national income will be consumed by education. So there is little sight of relief. I do not suggest that municipalities should invade these tax fields that the senior governments have. This would cause duplication and perpetuate the inequality of revenue between communities. The provincial and the federal governments must pay a much greater share derived from their ability to pay tax revenue. In this way the educational opportunities would be equalized.

Real estate taxes are used to a very minor extent, if at all, in Europe, the western nations, Australia and New Zealand to finance education. I recognize that there is a strong argument in favour of some degree of local autonomy in regard to education. There is merit in the continuance of community participation and direction. Complete centralization at the provincial level is therefore not advocated. However, the provincial government should establish grant schedules which would ensure that the major portion of the funds for elementary and secondary education would come from the higher levels of government.

I respectfully submit that on the average, 75 to 90 per cent of the costs of elementary and secondary school education should be provided from other sources of revenue, new revenue, business tax.

Now we all agree, Mr. Chairman, I think, that education, administration of justice and welfare are non-basic services and not a responsibility as far as being charged against real estate. By the province taking these three services over, it would reduce the load on real estate by 50 per cent across the province, a plan that would benefit all people and not only a few.

The government back in 1931 took over income tax. The revenues today in this field are so great that municipalities are in the position of beggars, so this leaves business tax to municipalities. I suggest the government take over business tax and raise the rates to look after education and welfare, because business tax is the result of all the purchasing power of all the people of this province, and along the same line education is an asset of all business concerns. I suggest to you that it is more reasonable to recover taxes as non-related costs from business than it is from real property, the homeowner.

If a man has his wealth in the form of real estate, he pays a fair load for education costs, but if he has his wealth in the form of stocks and bonds, he escapes education costs. Further, business tax is deductible. It is a business expense. I suggest the greatest need right now is for all three governments—federal, provincial and municipal—to sit down and as the hon. member for Yorkview stated, to take an accounting of all revenues and fix the responsibility for each.

Mr. Chairman, a large part of this budget that we are evaluating, insofar as municipal affairs is concerned, is grants to municipalities. Along this line we are being asked to give to the city of Toronto $20 million for a subway—a Toronto subway. In Ontario—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It does not come under this vote.

Mr. Sargent: I am talking about grants to municipalities. In Ontario there are 363 municipalities, 31 cities, 54 villages, 123 towns, 143 townships, one Metro government and the counties. Two-thirds of the people of this province are putting $20 million of this budget into a subway for one-third of the people. This amounts to a per capita grant of $15 per head. I suggest to the hon. members that if we are going to be completely fair about this matter, we will not complain about it at all if the government gives $20 million to the city of Toronto for a subway—we do not complain a bit if the government gives Toronto a $15 per capita grant, if it gives us the same. This will amount to about $3 million for Hamilton, $300,000 for Owen Sound, $150,000 for Elliot Lake, $4.5 million for Ottawa—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: What about Timmins?

Mr. Sargent: I have not got around to that. $1.5 million for Windsor. So how do we assess the fairness of this? The subject of highways will come up, but this is a grant system I am talking about. We have been told that possibly the subway will negate some of the needs for expressways in The Department of Highways. I just noticed in the paper that the city of Toronto got its first payment of some $6 million on the grant toward the subway and that is the first payment. They say this is a grant toward highways.

In 1958, a highway-needs study was set up, and projected to 1977 that all the needs for highways and expressways in Ontario would be more than looked after by the revenue forthcoming from the gasoline tax and all the other things. A brief submitted to the Ontario Good Roads Association yesterday says in part:

In brief, the conclusions from the later report were that for the 20-year period covered by the reports, highway-user revenues would be sufficient to pay the estimated cost of provincial and municipal needs for Ontario roads and streets as shown in the report thereon, submitted to the Prime Minister of Ontario, 1959. As a result it would be possible to make very substantial increases in the portion of highway-user revenues made available to municipal road authorities in the form of subsidies.

Someone is wrong some place. So I suggest in the way of grants, if this is going to be a $20 million subsidy or grant to the city of Toronto, I do not think there is an hon. member in this House, a backbencher on the Tory side of the House, or in the NDP, or this side of the House, who cannot expect fair and like treatment in the form of grants of $15 per capita.

You have been very patient with me, Mr. Chairman, and I hope I have got the point across that there is great inequity. The parallel here is that—being very critical and being very unpopular—of the two monkeys in the space capsule who went around the world. One monkey said, "This is an awful way to make a living", and the other monkey said, "Well, it sure beats the cancer clinic."

We feel, Mr. Chairman, that there is a real need for revision in municipal affairs, on basis of taxation for municipalities, and I sincerely hope, if the $20 million subway grant goes through to Toronto, that you will see fit to give a $15 per capita grant to the rest of the province.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, if you would permit me to speak for a few moments. I have heard some very interesting presentations by the hon. members and I would like to have the opportunity to reply, if you do not mind. Would that be acceptable to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman)?

I would like to thank the hon. members, who have spoken in a general way on these estimates, for the suggestions which they have made. I want to assure them that all of the matters which they have discussed—I should say most of the matters which they have discussed—are matters which are known to me and known to the officials of my department. It is perhaps easy to say that a Minister should do this or should do that, but you have to bear in mind that one must not turn out to be a little dictator—and certainly I would not want to have the reputation of being that.

Talking about the number of municipalities which we have in this province is perhaps a popular thing to do, but most of them are there for a purpose, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman—and there are areas where there have been annexations and amalgamations, and so on and so forth, throughout the province. Last year, for instance, was the first time that a Minister of Municipal Affairs of this province made an application to the Ontario Municipal Board for the purpose of a hearing respecting the amalgamation and the annexation of several areas to one municipality.

The municipal board took a great deal of time to study this—it was highly involved—and eventually came up with a decision, after all interested parties had been heard and every facility made available to the parties involved, sir, that if The Department of Municipal Affairs could provide information of value to the residents of that general area, that information was made available to the Ontario Municipal Board. The board did issue an order last fall providing for the amalgamation of two municipalities and the annexation of a portion of an area that had not had any municipal organization before.

I am aware that there are other areas of the province where perhaps some saving might be made in the cost of administration of local government. There might also be some greater efficiency to be achieved, and I have ideas of the way in which these things can be handled. My staff is being decentralized. We have co-operated in a number of studies in different areas of the province, dealing with matters of this kind of thinking: That the number of municipalities might be reduced. However, we want to be very certain, if and when we do go into an area and make representations to the municipal leaders and community leaders, that we know that we can be of some service to them.

Of course, as you know, Mr. Chairman, the different Acts, under which we operate in the department, provide many powers to local municipal councils to join together in projects which are of mutual interest and of service to the communities. This, in many cases, has been done in the past and no doubt will be done in the future.

The hon. member for Downsview had a number of comments to make about some delays in the operations of government departments, particularly with respect to the planning and subdivision approvals. In last year's session, you will remember that we amended The Planning Act to provide that the portion in dispute of a subdivision plan, or the subject in dispute, could be referred to the municipal board for consideration, and not the whole matter. That, I suggest to you, has been of service to the municipalities involved.

In connection with zoning bylaws, again there has been a recent amendment which provides that it is not necessary that the application be heard by the municipal board at all, unless after it has been advertised, there are some serious objections. In that case, the board arranges with the municipal clerk that anyone who has an objection to a zoning bylaw can appear before the municipal clerk and file his objection. Then that is sent to the municipal board; and if the objection is serious, of course the persons objecting are entitled to a hearing. I think that we have sort of smoothed down some of the arguments we had—

Mr. Singer: It is better than it was but—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, we are trying that out to see if we can make some amendments again that will be of service in that regard.

The North York planning report, from which you quoted, was purely a municipal endeavour. There are reports of other areas which are prepared by a co-operative agreement between the municipalities involved and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; and a number of those have been entered into. In the case of North York, of course, that is purely a municipal endeavour and we have just recently received copies—as a matter of fact I think I received mine the first of this week. We have some people in the department who are going to examine this report and will be reporting to me before long.

I cannot say too much about the "quadrupled" boundaries which my hon. friend from Yorkview mentioned—I think that is quite a descriptive adjective to choose there and I agree with him that in many cases it may be quite applicable. But, there again, I mention to you that the local people are entitled to govern themselves to a certain extent, and that I have a lot of faith in municipal councillors.

I found most of them—and I was on the council, as my hon. friend from Yorkview was—I was on a council one time with a man who could not read nor write. I was quite surprised that he always did forget his glasses and I used to have to read things to him. He sat next to me at the council table and, you know, the other people on the council never knew that that man could not read nor write; but he was one of the smartest men I ever met. He was a sort of a father to me on this council.

He was a person who could go out and look at a pile of lumber and he could tell you to within, I suppose, one or two per cent how many thousand feet of lumber there were in that pile. I had taken a note, when I was doing assessment work in the agricultural areas, and had him estimate the size of fields, of farmlands. We checked them to make sure that he knew what he was talking about and he could measure land by sight—he was a remarkable person.

I think that that could be said about most of the members of municipal councils in the province. They have a deep appreciation of their responsibilities. If they think that they and their neighbours can get along in some sort of a project which would be mutually advantageous, there is nothing to stop them now from providing themselves with municipal services on an area basis.

Mention was made of Metropolitan Toronto and I am sorry that I cannot make—I do not intend to pass any remarks about Metropolitan Toronto and its future because the commission headed by Mr. Goldenberg is studying this whole question and will be reporting in due course.

In the matter of assessment of farmlands, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Grey North, that is a very interesting subject. It may be that some assessors, instead of using the economic factor of assessment value in establishing value, have only used a yardstick which says, "So many acres of land, $50 an acre. The next group is $40 an acre," and so on and so forth. I think that if you find a municipality where that condition exists then there is the responsibility—perhaps of the member for the constituency—of getting someone to appeal an assessment to the court of revision and explain these things so that the assessor does not run wild.

I would hope that, with our system, we are now attempting to improve the standards of qualifications for assessors in the province; and I might tell the Legislature that I have gone to the meetings of the assessors association and I have told them quite frankly that, in my opinion, the day may not be very far off when assessors will be licensed. We did start, some years ago, to license auditors; and I made some mention in my remarks the other day, that the great majority of all the auditors—the municipal auditors—today, are all properly qualified chartered accountants who, by and large, are doing a good job.

I think that the assessor's function is a very important one. It is most important because it is the basis of municipal financing. With the leadership the department can provide, and with a course of instruction we have supported—we have paid the cost of preparing the new course—we have gone so far as to say to the assessors who are employed by municipalities, "We will refund you 60 per cent of the cost of the course if you pass the necessary examination."

I think the municipalities could show, by the same token, that they have some interest in this, and put up the other 40 per cent to give some remuneration to the person who takes the courses and passes.

Mr. Singer: They have got to have a good job for him, too, when he finishes the course.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh yes, sure. I hope to institute the same system with respect to clerks and finance officers. I now have had meetings, and my staff have had meetings, with representatives of the clerks and finance officers association, which is a very important organization. There again we are going to deal with them, and with the university, to see if we can come up with a course that is going to be valuable to the people who are in that field of municipal administration.

My friend, the hon. member for Downsview, passed a remark about an audit report, which had been published in a newspaper, involving the municipality of South Gower. That is only one of the examples of the 47 audit reports which we would not accept. When this report was received it was examined by our officers in the accounting and auditing branch. The accounting adviser was instructed to call the treasurer of the municipality. This was done and the municipal treasurer was instructed, and was given very lengthy advice on accounting methods and practices, and so on and so forth; and arrangements were made with the municipal auditor, whom I understand is a responsible person, to set up a proper system of accounts for this municipality. He was to see to it that those accounts were kept up to date.

I think there is a great responsibility on the part of the auditors, the municipal auditors in this province, and I am sorry to say that the very odd one does not seem to have accepted these responsibilities to the fullest extent. I hope, later on this year, to have the opportunity of attending the convention of the chartered accountants association, to tell them a few things about the facts of life with respect to municipal auditing; because I maintain that the municipal auditor should not wait until the end of the year, or the beginning of the next year, before he starts looking at the books. He should be in there at odd intervals. He should go in and count the cash to make sure that all the cash, that is supposed to be there, is there.

I had an experience like that at one time when I was mayor, when the cashier in the town of Timmins got away with about $2,600 on a weekend. It is pretty easy. You see there are always a number of people who think that they can get away with these things. It was fortunate that our auditor, a man who was always on the job, caught it just like that because it could have been $25,000.

In the next little municipality, next door to Timmins, the loss was $22,000 and extended over more than one year. I think that the auditors have got to learn that when they accept the responsibility of being the auditor for a municipality they have to do the job completely, and do it so that none of these things will happen again.

Publication of the auditor's report is going to show the ratepayers how the municipal clerks and treasurers keep the books and particularly show who does not keep proper books. This auditor here, in this particular case of South Gower, has done a very good job by bringing it out to public notice.

I do not think The Department of Municipal Affairs should have to examine every audit report; I do not think so. We are going to do it, but I think it should come when there is sufficient sense of responsibility on the part of the auditors to see that they are the ones who should tell us that these things do occur. However, at the moment, we are examining every one of these things; and we hope in that way we will not run into any more defalcations, such as has occurred in the past.

The hon. member for Downsview has made some mention regarding the matter of investigations. I may tell you, sir, and tell the Chairman and the Legislature, that I will be bringing in some amendments to legislation to provide greater authority on the part of the Minister to order investigations. I think there are two sections of The Municipal Act and one in The Department of Municipal Affairs Act, but they are rather restrictive in my estimation.

We will go back to the case of White River. I had two investigations in White River but they were not of a legal nature, shall we say; they were investigations made by employees or staff people in The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Singer: Why bring that up?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I am not going to bring it up, except to say that if I had had the authority I suggest to you that a better job could have been done. Yes.

After receiving a petition, then, I have certain authority to do certain things.

Mr. Singer: You should not have to wait that long.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, that is just the point. I think when you see the amendments I am going to bring in you will be satisfied with that. So I leave this.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Grey North has made some recommendations in connection with the—as he called it—subsidy to the subway in Metropolitan Toronto. Well I do not know; I am sorry he is not here at the moment and perhaps we will have the opportunity to discuss this matter with him when this particular item comes up in the estimates.

I prefer to leave it until he is here. Thank you, sir.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, may I bring up the problem of annexation in my community at this time?

Mr. Chairman: What is the item number?

Mr. Newman: Commissions and investigations, under item 4.

Back in 1962 the city of Windsor made application for annexation of the surrounding municipalities. Board meetings were held in the community starting about the 10th of September and lasting approximately 22 days. In all, a little over 1,200,000 words were recorded; the costs to the municipalities involved were well over $250,000. On November 15, approximately two months after the start of the hearings, the Ontario Municipal Board made its report. The report is quite an interesting one from the fact that it recommended the amalgamation of certain services in the area. For example, it suggested the creation of a new organization called the Essex Border Municipal Commission, which would take over industrial promotion, sewer and sewage works, planning, as well as certain other civic services in Windsor, Riverside, Ojibway, Sandwich East and Sandwich West townships. And the second is the creation of a new public utilities commission that would take over the sale of water and electric power in Windsor, Riverside, Sandwich East and Sandwich West.

The board report set a precedent in dealing with annexation cases. This was the first time in several years that an interim annexation report had ever been issued. This interim report said that the problems involved were quite serious in nature and that the recommendation it made was very urgent—needing attention. This was on November 15, 1962.

From that time until January 16, 1964 when I brought it up in the House, the area was at a loss. No one knew just exactly where they were concerning the problem of annexation. Nerves became extremely jangled on both sides of the fence on the city of Windsor side, and likewise the municipalities that were asking to annex.

This was the reply to my question to the hon. Minister on January 16, and I am going to read:

Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member I would say that the government does not consider that the situation in the Windsor area justifies the establishment of any new special purpose authority on a regional basis. Even as a temporary measure pending the final disposition of the city's application for annexation.

No one has any quarrel with the hon. Minister's answer thus far, except for the fact that the period of delay between the original report of the board and the hon. Minister's reply now is about a year and two months. Reading on from the hon. Minister's remarks:

At the same time it should be understood that the government has no intention of interfering with the jurisdiction and powers of the Ontario Municipal Board, or directing the manner or the time in which it should finally dispose of the application in question.

Well, the interference was a fact because the municipal board did come down with a report and the government in its consideration turned down the report. This leaves the municipalities up in the air. They do not know just exactly where they are at. However, the latest report is that there is going to be a new annexation report. The municipalities now are going to be involved in the expenditure of large sums of money because now the problem of the revision of school grants comes into play.

Can the hon. Minister give me some type of assurance that the municipal board's report would not take as long this time as it did previously where we waited 13 months? Surely if they could have come down with a report in two months, now that they have had this problem in their laps for a year and a half—I should not say one and a half years, about 15 months—they should be able to give us a final report that much sooner.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, before answering that question, would the hon. member advise me if he is still a member of the city council in Windsor?

Mr. Newman: No, I am not, sir.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: You have not been since when?

Mr. Newman: Since I was elected to the House in 1959.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I have already answered the hon. gentleman's question. I would say this, the Ontario Municipal Board made an interim report which was made available to the government of Ontario and to the municipalities involved in the Windsor area. The municipalities involved were advised by the government that the government had no intention of supporting the recommendation made by the Ontario Municipal Board with respect to this area-type government at that time.

What we did was bring the attention of the municipalities to the present legislation which provides authority to the municipalities to enter into agreements to provide themselves with certain municipal services which they feel are required in that area. We advised them on methods of financing and matters relating to that. I appointed my deputy, Dr. Cumming, to meet with these people on these joint municipal projects and the ideas involved in them—the most important thing being sewage works—and Dr. Cumming has met with these people. They have been meeting between themselves and they are on the verge of coming up with certain agreements. That is correct.

Further to that, the municipal board still has the application before it and if the city of Windsor, which initiated the application, wishes to proceed with the application before the board, it can so make its wishes known and the board will deal with it. The board has the evidence before it, having heard evidence, as you said, for 22 days or something like that, and I have no intention of interfering with the work of the Ontario Municipal Board in this matter, or at any other time. So I would suggest to you that the best thing with respect to the problems in the Windsor area is to leave the matter stand in the hands of the people who are responsible for it, and I am quite convinced that the thing will straighten itself out in due course of time to the satisfaction of the people involved.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear the hon. Minister reply. May I simply read from page five of the report of the Ontario Municipal Board concerning the Woodstock decision. In the Woodstock decision the board laid down two principles which might be said to be of general application. The first is of no significance, but the second:

The controlling factor should not be the need of the applicant but rather what is for the greatest common good in the whole area under review.

The greatest common good, Mr. Chairman, is to have the problem solved as quickly and expeditiously as possible. The longer we delay, be it one way or the other, the more complicated, the more difficult the problem becomes, the greater disadvantage it is to all of the areas concerned. As a result of this delay you have "Annexation Wait Jangles Councils' Nerves".

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am sorry that councils' nerves are jangled but I have met many of the councillors and the mayor, and I suggest their nerves are not jangled at all.

Mr. Bryden: Just you that soothed them.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I just soothed them. Since the city of Windsor council met with a representative of the government of Ontario, it has been co-operating in the matters which have been recommended to them and they have made no application to the municipal board for a continuation of the hearing, so I can only suggest to you that they are making progress among themselves and that in due course of time the thing will straighten itself out to everyone's satisfaction.

Mr. Newman: Everything straightens itself out in due course of time. I have another problem I would like to bring up concerning my community.

The board of education made application one year ago under the winter works incentive programme to construct an addition to its administrative facilities. At that time the application apparently was approved and the subsidy was estimated to be approximately $90,000. The board found it could not carry on with the programme at that time and this year once again reapplied to the winter works programme and apparently were turned down. Could the hon. Minister explain the reason for the refusal this year and acceptance one year ago?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not think I can give the hon. member the actual reasons for the refusal, but I can suggest to him that the rules of the game in effect in 1962 were not necessarily the same rules of the game in 1963. We do not set the rules of the game. They are set for us by Ottawa. I will check into this particular item for the hon. member and I will give him the information as soon as I have it available. I think he will find that the conditions of agreement are not the same in 1963 as they were in 1962.

Mr. Newman: Thank you. There is one more question and that is concerning the small businessman.

It seems most unfair that a fellow operating a business in any community has to pay a business tax in proportion to the area of the space occupied, yet there is no relationship between it and the amount of business he may do. For example, Eaton's and Simpson's may have an order office in town and the square footage of the business may be the same as the square footage of the small grocery store. We know that the small grocery store has a most difficult time in an attempt to meet its business assessment, whereas Eaton's and Simpson's in that community certainly take advantage of the assessment tax when it comes to such a situation. I think there should be some consideration given to a small businessman in The Assessment Act, if only for the sake of preserving that small businessman, otherwise we are going to end up with just so many giants controlling our economy.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, the matter of taxation in this province is now being studied by a committee appointed by the hon. Prime Minister, headed by Mr. Lancelot J. Smith. I believe that a number of the municipal associations and retail merchants associations and chambers of commerce and people involved in the very subject which you have discussed with me, sir, are making representations to the Smith committee. There have been representations made to me by some of the groups that I have mentioned and I have referred them to this committee in order that the committee may study the whole subject.

For instance, there are varying rates of assessment for business purposes in The Assessment Act. They run from, I think, 15 per cent of the land and building assessment to 150 per cent. There are many different classes in that wide area. I would suggest to you that the small businessman may be having a hard time, but in most cases the business assessment does not mean very much in the way of dollars and cents as far as taxes are concerned.

However, the matter is under review and it may be that we will get some recommendations from this committee or from the legislative committee headed by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Beckett), the report of which committee I am awaiting from day to day.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister says that the business assessment tax is a small factor. I will have to disagree with him completely because to the small businessman—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: How much does it amount to?

Mr. Newman: Sixty-eight dollars a year may not be much money to those of you on that side of the House but it is a lot of money to those of us on this side of the House.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think you are stretching it a little bit. Now, let us be reasonable.

Mr. Newman: This individual pays approximately $20 a year—not business tax, but sales tax—so you can see that sixty-eight dollars business tax is substantial.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He does not pay the sales tax.

Mr. Newman: I happen to be well informed as to this business.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He collects it, that is all.

Mr. Newman: It is unfair that this man should be taxed to the same extent as some big chain is in the community. I helped the fellow appeal and the appeal board said there is nothing they could do. The Assessment Act says this is what you have to pay.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville asked me a question about the fact that the board of education administration building project had been approved in 1962 and was not approved in 1963. I am sorry to tell him, sir, that it was approved in 1962 in error and when the decision was taken by the board of education not to carry on with the project, it was advised that if another application was made that it would be turned down. The officials of the government of Canada agreed in this refusal.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to protest to the hon. Minister at the practice of his department, when preparing estimates, of scrambling the whole department together like a goat's breakfast in one vote. I may say it is a big goat, a big breakfast because it costs almost $50 million. This is one vote, covering about ten branches and a substantial number of grants, some of them quite significant ones. I would suggest that the department might take a look at the estimates of, shall we say, The Department of Health or The Department of Education.

There are two things that are objectionable in this practice, as I see it, Mr. Chairman. The first is that it militates against orderly discussion of the estimates. Upon the conclusion of the introductory statements, you made what I thought would, at any other time, have been a very apt statement. You said that it had been agreed that in the estimates there are three lead-off speakers and then we get down to the individual votes. Here, when you get down to the individual votes you have got the whole department in front of you, everything except the Ontario Municipal Board. It is very hard for members to know when to raise any points they have in mind.

The second objection I have to this practice, Mr. Chairman, is that, in my opinion, it militates against adequate control of expenditure. As I understand the information given to us by the provincial auditor in the public accounts committee, the auditor's practice is that he authorizes expenditures if they appear to be reasonably related to the vote, up to the limit of the vote. When you have ten branches of a department operating under the one vote, it is a very easy thing to shift funds back and forth among them. If they have their own separate votes, then if there happens to be a surplus in one of them it stays a surplus; it cannot be made available for another branch unless the other can give reason why it needs a supplementary estimate. At a time when I think all people are concerned about maintaining adequate controls over expenditures, I think this sort of practice should be looked at. A department should have to come in with votes for each of its main branches, plus such other items as may be appropriate.

Mr. Chairman, there are two or three things that I would like to raise under this vote. They are quite unrelated to each other, although I think they are all related to the vote, but in view of the way the vote has been presented, I think, perhaps, I will give some other hon. members a chance and bring mine in at different times instead of making a great, long speech—of the type I have no doubt you object to—after the introductory speeches have been given. So, at the moment, I will content myself with that point. But I would appreciate it, and I think that the House would appreciate it, if the department would, in the future, consider a different method of presenting its estimates to this House.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question, I have been assured by our chief accountant that these accounts are all kept separately. You will notice that the total of main office accounts, community planning, law, municipal accounting, municipal assessment, municipal finance, organization, and so on, total these figures here. But the accounts are kept separately. We do not prepare this; this is prepared by the Treasury, and that is the way it does it.

Mr. Bryden: The Treasury ought to have a conference with itself, because it has a different way of presenting these estimates from the estimates of most of the other departments, although there was a time when other departments' estimates came forward in this form. However, I am sure the hon. Minister can get this sorted out at the appropriate place within the government.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, to revert back to that discussion that the hon. Minister had with my hon. colleague about business assessment, there are some five pages in the second interim report of the select committee dealing with business assessment.

It occurred to me a little surprising that the select committee on taxation the hon. Minister referred to is covering, apparently, the same ground and hearing, apparently, the same representations. It seems to me this is one of the real problems. Three or four different groups are investigating the same thing at the same time and making different types of recommendations. Certainly there is something wrong, in my opinion, and, I think, in the opinion of the committee, with the way business tax is being looked after today.

I would like to have heard the hon. Minister's reaction to the 100-odd pages of recommendations in this second interim report. I think there are some very far-reaching ones there, and I would have liked to have seen some of them reflected in legislation. But how long he is going to delay—by the time the Royal commission on taxation is over, we are probably going to have a Royal commission on something else which will take the same briefs and go over the same ground all over again. Somewhere along the line we would like to see some action. Here are five pages of recommendations just on this one particular subject, and apparently the hon. Minister is still waiting.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, I am not prepared to look at a subject as involved as this with only an interim report. I have been assured by the chairman of this legislative committee that the final report will be available on December 31, on January 31, on February 15, and now, at the end of February. When I have that I am going to arrange to have some staff, because I have not time to look at all these things, I am going to arrange to have some staff who are going to study every one of those recommendations, and they will, in due course of time, come to me with it.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, let me give the hon. Minister a little hint of what that report might say. It is not going to take back one word that is in the second interim report.

Mr. MacDonald: He resolved the differences.

Mr. Chairman, on this business of interim reports and final reports, and when the government acts, I must say I am getting more and more intrigued at the arguments advanced by the government for inaction. For example, sir, the other day when the hon. Attorney General was speaking to his estimates in The Department of Insurance, he advanced the argument as to why he should not move with regard to coping with some of these areas of racketeering—because he had only an interim report. Yet before he was finished he said that there were some things on which it looked as though the committee was not going to report this year, so he was going to act anyway. So apparently, whether it is interim or final or not, you act when you please; therefore we are pleading that you act now rather than later.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are now getting into legislation. In due course of time—in the fullness of time—I will bring some legislation here and we will have an opportunity to discuss this.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good.

Mr. Chairman, there were two points I wanted to raise. The first one is in reference to item 10 under estimate 1401—payments to mining municipalities. The two questions I wanted to ask in connection with this, Mr. Chairman, are: What percentage of the municipal tax, that would be paid if mining corporations were paying on a normal basis, does this $6 million represent? It may be that the hon. Minister would not have that calculation immediately at hand.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We would have to know the municipality, but in total we could take it from—we now have 59 designated mining municipalities to which we pay these mining revenue payments, but I do not think that you could ever develop a figure to show what the municipal taxes would be if the mining plant was assessable at the municipal level. I do not think that was ever done. We do not have the valuation; we do not have that assessment anywhere, because from the very early days mining has been treated in a different way so far as municipal taxes are concerned.

What we have done with the mining revenue payments is that—and it is a complicated calculation and I have a statement prepared on it. If it is of interest to the House I will be glad to give it to you. But what we have done actually, in principle, is that by the development of this system of distributing these taxes we are providing revenue to the municipality where the employee resides. In other words, we are spreading the industrial assessment into the area, or into the municipality, where the miner or the employee lives. That, I think, has been a desirable feature of this system of distribution for these taxes since it was introduced about ten years ago.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister: Is this $6,350,500, that is paid to mining municipalities, in addition to royalties?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, that has nothing to do with royalties. Royalties do not go to the municipality anyway—they go to the province.

Mr. MacDonald: The second topic, Mr. Chairman, on which I was curious to get some information from the hon. Minister, is the winter works incentive programme. In previous years we have usually been regaled with figures as to the amount of work that this provides, the number of jobs that it provided. What are the figures for this year, and how do they compare with the last few years?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: In 1963-64—these are figures on applications approved December 31, 1963. There were 284 municipalities involved and that includes conservation authorities and the Ontario Water Resources Commission. Nine hundred and fifty-one applications—a total of 903,169 man days, and the direct labour cost is $25,657,000. Canada is putting up $8,234,000 of the subsidy; Ontario, $4,057,000; and the municipalities, $3,821,000.

Mr. MacDonald: Do you have the previous year's figures?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, the previous year. All right, I will go back now to 1962-63. There were 1,265 projects; the total payroll cost was $13,750,000; and the total reimbursement was $10.3 million. In other words, the municipalities put up $3,450,000. The year before that, that is 1961-62, there were 1,270 projects; direct payroll cost $11 million; the reimbursement was $8,150,000.

Mr. MacDonald: In round figures, how many jobs, short-term jobs—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: According to this figure, 15,117 men; 903,169 man days; 15,000 people.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the hon. Minister commented on the comments made by the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Yorkview. He told them, Mr. Chairman, that he knew of many of the problems the hon. members had raised and that he also agreed with many of the recommendations, and the things they felt should take place in the province, in particular the need for municipal development and administration on a larger basis, a regional basis. Then the hon. Minister went into that tirade of talking about the sacred cow—that we cannot do anything at this level because of the autonomy of the municipalities.

I certainly do not think this is good enough. If we can agree that there is a need for a new approach to municipal problems, that we should be looking very closely and seriously at larger administrative groups in the municipalities, then we should start to do something about it. I say the provincial government, and the department, has a responsibility, not just to say we agree with something but we are going to have to leave it to the municipalities because of local autonomy. I am convinced that most of the municipal councillors have not got the enthusiasm to break away from the political tie-in on a municipal basis, to really give consideration to what we need in regard to a new approach to municipal problems.

I am not saying that the government should be dictatorial in its approach but certainly I think that we should do the research—we have the experts—next an investigation, surveys and studies and then go to the municipalities and lay it before them and say: "This is what the experts feel would be of benefit to this municipality."

We should try to raise public opinion; try to encourage councillors in the municipalities to get together—it is just not enough to say that we have to leave it to them. In the Hamilton area we had a gentleman by the name of William McAdams, who was the assistant director to the Hamilton Wentworth Planning Board. Myself and others in the Hamilton area who are interested in municipal problems were quite pleased with his approach to the problem. We were quite pleased that he was conducting a serious study in regard to administration of the municipalities on a larger basis, on a regional basis. Now we are a little bit disappointed.

The same gentleman—and I do not blame the government for taking people on staff that are dedicated in this field and have the knowledge to contribute to the province—is now working for The Department of Municipal Affairs and from this we find now that the good work he has done was dropped. Planners in the Hamilton area, and some of the people in the municipality, are concerned that this study has now completely stopped.

It has been said that it was one of the largest and most important studies of this nature taking place in Canada. I would hope that Mr. McAdams will continue his belief in this type of municipal administration. I would think that we should set up and expand the commission that was mentioned last year. I understand that there was a commission established to investigate the whole Metropolitan Toronto situation as to its further development, and what is going to happen.

I think this department should set up a commission, send planners into the field, decide what should be done and then get all of the groups interested to raise public opinion to bring about the proper type of planning.

I was a little disappointed when I read about the job of Mr. McAdams—and I think this would be the policy of the government—that his office will investigate and study all major municipal and regional planning moves in Ontario. I do not think study is enough.

I take it that this means that once the municipalities make a move, or have some plan on tap, the government goes in to see if it agrees and if municipalities are within their rights and within the Act to do certain things.

I do not think we should wait until this time. I think the government should provide initiative in this most serious and important matter of regional development in the municipalities, and then sell it to the municipalities with all the force we can use. I think this is the approach.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise one other question I consider serious. I would like some answers to it. In the township of Saltfleet—and I do not know whether the investigation I want to mention is completed as yet or not—a short time ago a group of 50 citizens petitioned the department to make an investigation of the office of the township of Saltfleet. My understanding, and I have it from good authority, is that even the reeve was well aware of the petition and had some discussions with the people that signed the petition—I do not know how direct his participation was. But what happened was that the petition was received by The Department of Municipal Affairs, the investigators went in and were investigating the office—going through the books or whatever method they use—and council was not aware of it. Now, I do not think this is right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The petition was received by me in my office on a Friday morning. At 10.15 on that Friday morning I had already appointed the investigators and at that time I wrote a letter to the reeve of the council. I advised him what was to take place. Now, if the reeve did not notify the council, I can hardly be blamed for that.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, that answers my question and I will provide the answer to the councillors who asked me to raise it. But at least three councillors did not know of the investigation and it must be the reeve's fault for not informing them. I do not know whether the reeve is the proper person to send it to. Is the reeve of a municipality the one that receives the official correspondence?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The head of the council.

Mr. Gisborn: I am glad that that is the answer and I will let the reeve answer to the council. I think this is a sort of backward dealing and I would not want to think that this was allowed by the department. I am satisfied if the hon. Minister tells me that, when a petition is presented and he intends to send in investigators, he officially notifies the council so that it is aware of what is going on.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would say this to you, sir, that when I receive, or when the department receives, a petition of the kind that was presented to me by the petitioners of Saltfleet township, I do not think it would be right that I should go out and notify everybody I think is going to be investigated because that is just the time that they might put the cash back in the cash box. I think that if you will study this a little bit you will realize that my responsibility is to advise the head of the council, and the head of the council only. If he did not advise the councillors, that is his business and his responsibility.

Mr. Gisborn: That, Mr. Chairman, is all I was interested in, that council should be entitled to be advised that it is being investigated. Otherwise, as has happened in this case, up until at least a week ago, a couple of councillors were pretty embarrassed. I think when it comes to their knowledge that there is an investigation going on in their office that it casts aspersions on them as councillors when at least 50 of the ratepayers know that it is taking place.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, the 50 ratepayers did not know any more about it than anybody else. The 50 ratepayers had just signed the petition and they sent it in through a solicitor. It was acknowledged and acted upon immediately. The 50 petitioners are the people that the councillors can look to. They are the ones who asked for the investigation and they, in their wisdom, had certain evidence or suspicions or whatever it may be and as a result of that they signed the petition.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I would point out to you, sir, that they have already had a speaker and the hon. member has spoken once already in this connection.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question or two regarding the municipal loan fund. The report which we have in our hands makes the statement on page 54 that:

If the programme achieves its purposes, the department will be required to administer a programme of loans which, on the basis of borrowings made by municipalities during recent years, will provide approximately one quarter of the requirement of municipalities for capital funds during the next 2.5 years.

The understanding that we had when the loan fund was passed in the fall about the conditions under which the loans are made to the province, was that this was to be in addition to the regular on-going work of a municipality in order to provide extra employment. These are projects which ordinarily would not take place until after the end of March, 1966, or some date like that.

This almost reads as if it is going to provide part of the on-going capital funds. In that connection there is an article here in the Financial Times of February 24, 1964, which states:

To simplify operations the department has no intention of policing loans. The word of the local council or school board will be accepted as a guarantee that the project is an eligible one. Under winter works assistance, the municipal treasurer must certify that a project is eligible. It is considered that councillors may be more easily persuaded to certify marginal projects.

This seems to hint that it might be easier to overcome the post-1966 nature of a project by leaving it here and not policing it; and that there may be some way around the immediate intention of the loan to provide more employment than the on-going capital works. I wonder if the hon. Minister cares to comment on the substance of this article?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, Ontario is following the instructions given us by Canada, and these loans made available to our municipalities in a total of less than $137 million for the period ending March 31, 1966, will be in addition to the normal borrowings of our municipalities. The statement I made was to indicate that this was not a particularly large amount of money for the Ontario municipalities.

Insofar as the article appearing in the financial newspaper is concerned, I can only suggest that the reporter might have checked with our office and have read the instructions which went out to the municipalities. I will read to you from a bulletin which I sent out on November 4. It is a bulletin of 12 pages giving information as to the loan scheme and included in the instructions was the form of a resolution which has to be passed by the council of the municipality and submitted as part of the application for a loan. The form of the resolution reads as follows:

Resolution (the place and the date to be inserted).

Moved by (certain member of the council).

Seconded by (another).

Whereas the council or board of such-and-such a municipality or school board (whatever it may be) deems it expedient to apply for a loan under the federal-provincial municipal works assistance programme as described in the memorandum of the Minister of Municipal Affairs dated November 4, 1963, in respect of the following project, namely: (and then they describe the project) hereinafter referred to as "the project."

And whereas the project is in the opinion of the council (or board, whichever applies) a municipal project within the meaning of the Minister's recommendation; and whereas the project or part of it would not, without the assistance under the programme, have been included among the capital works projects to be undertaken within the calendar year or years in respect of which application for assistance is made, and no other capital works project has in consequence been replaced or deferred until a later year;

And whereas the project had been included among the capital works projects to be undertaken during the calendar year or years in respect of which application for assistance is made by virtue of the elimination or postponement of another project, details of which are shown in Item 11 of the application, but now, because of the assistance available toward the project under the programme, the project will be the second project deferred will be reinstated among the projects to be undertaken during such period;

And whereas the other requirements of the Minister's recommendation memorandum had been complied with, now therefore be it resolved that application be made to the Minister of Municipal Affairs for a commitment for a loan in the amount of (blank) dollars to assist in the financing of the project under The Municipal Works Assistance Act.

And that carries the certificate of the municipal clerk.

Mr. Young: Then these meetings—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Then I want to explain to you about the inspection of projects. This information is in the same bulletin and it reads as follows:

The municipality will be required to make arrangements to enable representatives of the province and, if necessary, of the federal board—remember that the federal loans are made through a board, not through a department of government:

(a) to enter upon any project in respect of which a loan has been made for the purpose of inspecting work and

(b) to examine the books, records and accounts maintained by the municipality in respect of the project for the purpose of verifying the cost thereof.

To facilitate the verification of projects, municipalities must retain for examination the following:

(a) invoices, progress certificates and vouchers for all items of costs chargeable to the project;

(b) payrolls and other evidence to support a charge for wages and salaries of municipal employees while wholly engaged in the design and supervision of the project;

(c) copies of contracts and purchase orders issued for material, professional services, contractors, equipment rentals, etc.;

(d) such other records pertaining to the project which will be of assistance in verifying costs, and

(e) reconciliations and worksheets used in preparation of the statements of costs.

So I think we have all the authority we require there to verify these accounts.

Mr. Young: Thank you very much. Could I ask further then, in connection with this matter, what staff is available for this kind of inspection, and has the inspection service actually started?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: At the present time we have only approved commitments involving less than $1 million. That is about seven or eight projects. We have a number of applications on hand that are being investigated. We have the application of Metro Toronto for some $29 million, I think it is, which, of course, has to be approved by Ottawa before we can approve it because it is over $5 million. And that is in the Ottawa Act. We have the staff, who are the accounting and auditing branch. We have the necessary staff to look after this when the time comes for us to verify the accounts.

Mr. Young: I understand then, that there is quite a considerable number of first-time inquiries?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. Young: The amount is something under a million but your hope is that the full amount will be taken out?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh yes, oh yes.

Mr. Young: And that will be excess work?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I observe under item 10 of this vote that the grants to mining municipalities are increased by $600,000 for this year. Of course one who studies this thing knows there is no relationship—or little relationship—between the estimate and the amount actually paid, as I have said heretofore. May I inquire from the hon. Minister whether the provision in the estimates of the additional $600,000 reflects any change in the amount of the grants that will be paid to these communities, and in particular the quantum to be paid to the one which I represent here?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The estimate, Mr. Chairman, for the mining revenue payments in 1963-64 to Sudbury is $1,902,843.56. The actual payment has been made. That is the 1963 payment. We cannot give you an estimate for 1964 because we have to get the information as to the number of miners who are involved, the number of miners who work in the municipality and live within the municipality, and those who live in and work out. We have not that information and we will not have it for some time.

Mr. Sopha: Since the increase over the previous year was of the order of some $300,000—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Was how much, sir?

Mr. Sopha: I think it is about $300,000. I think that, in the previous year to that which the hon. Minister stated, the payment was $4.6 million. Then I must infer, from what the hon. Minister has said, that he does not anticipate any radical approach in the method of making this payment to these communities.

At this time I do not intend to review the considerations I have placed before the House and the various Ministers of this department, although it is inviting to do so, bearing in mind that I took the time of the House to make 11 speeches on the Sudbury-Timmins road and finally, this year, see its fruition. It is encouraging to know that if you speak a dozen times around here, on a subject which is dear to your heart, eventually one is going to get through to sympathetic ears in the government. All it requires is a bit of patience, which is of course a good Christian quality for anyone to have.

I do not intend to review those considerations. In particular, I have told the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) on many occasions that there is a great deal of difference between putting in municipal services through the hardest rock in the world, the Pre-Cambrian Shield, compared to the sand on which his constituency rests; with all the frightful aspects of the increased costs which must be borne by the ratepayers of our community. But I do want to tell the hon. Minister, through you, sir, and to prepare him for events which are going to take place in the next few months so far as he is concerned.

I want to, in that regard, remind him that we had our municipal elections in December past and a new council was elected to office for the ensuing two-year period. I did note, with considerable interest and considerable encouragement, that during the very hard-fought municipal election campaign, in which no fewer than five candidates offered themselves for the position of mayor—it shows what an honour it is to be mayor of Sudbury. Five of them went to the polls and, of course, only one of them was victorious. He won, to continue the parlance of the racetracks, by a scant nose over his closest pursuer.

During that campaign a great deal was said about the treatment of our community by the government, in the way of payments of these special grants to mining municipalities in lieu of the assessment which we do not get, that is to say our inability to tax the large mining installations. Because of that inability to tax them we, of course, then are the victims. Perhaps that is too strong a word; we then, perhaps, are at the mercy of this government in making payments in lieu of industrial assessment; and that, of course, is quite a unique thing in the province. To my knowledge there are no other municipalities in quite the same position as the mining municipalities.

However, as I was saying, this was a very live issue during the municipal campaign and all candidates appeared to have something to say about it. The resolution was that, after the new council took office on January 1, 1964, immediately the new mayor and the board of control informed the ratepayers and the people of Sudbury that they were going to embark most expeditiously on the preparation of a brief for the hon. Minister and were going to, in the most detailed fashion, set out for him, for his own information, Sudbury's plight—especially that aspect of it which has become exacerbated as the result of the amalgamation which occurred on January 1, 1960.

I might say there are some very competent people on the council—not to indulge in any comparisons, which are said to be odious—who are able, in the most expert way, to prepare such a brief for the edification of the hon. Minister and the government. In particular, there is a chartered accountant who occupies the post of deputy mayor, who is very competent, very capable, and very learned in that unreal world of statistics and figures. I am sure he will serve the citizens of the community very well in making this presentation to the hon. Minister, whensoever it may come about.

Heretofore, in the history of mining municipalities, in view of this special treatment that they get, as in item 10 of this vote, Sudbury has aligned itself with the other 57 mining municipalities in the province. They have made a concerted approach to the government on many many occasions. Sudbury, I take it, is not going to adopt that approach this time, but is going to come, hat in hand, to the hon. Minister, and point out for him the special needs of the community.

Of course, I do not want to prejudice, nor do I want to precipitate any argument that that delegation will make. I do want to say, in regard to it, about the formula under which these grants are paid, that I think the hon. Minister had a hand in its creation; I believe he did. I think he claims a little bit of the authorship of that formula which is to be found in one of the regulations in The Assessment Act. If any hon. member will take a look at it in an idle moment, of which there are so few around here, he will see that that formula, from the point of view of simplicity, absolutely defies understanding. It defies understanding.

A statistician from Philadelphia, with all the qualities of a Philadelphia lawyer, could not understand that without devoting a week of serious contemplation and reflection to it, because so many things are brought into play. I have often suspected that that formula is complex by design. It is not meant to be understood by anybody. But if I ever got started into that, that would be a long story.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): We have lots of time.

Mr. Sopha: I would not want the hon. Minister of Mines to put his foot in his mouth at this time because we are going to hear from him a little later in the evening.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: The hon. member will be going home.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, no. I am staying to watch the hon. Minister.

Mr. Singer: We would not want to miss that.

Mr. Sopha: I am staying to watch the hon. Minister, but it would only take about an hour a week if he was the only one I had to watch.

I have felt, Mr. Minister—before this unauthorized interruption by your hon. colleague—that it would be far more reasonable, and in line with common sense, to take the approach of calculating what would it be if the mining municipality could assess the industrial installations and the plants to calculate how much in taxes those installations would pay. That is in the realm of the hypothetical, but it is a simple thing to do.

Then, in order to equate the position of a mining municipality such as mine and other municipalities in the province, translate that into a simple per capita payment based upon the number of miners who live within our dormitory municipality and work without it. Of course, part of the formula now encompasses that because you do make such a payment—it is $45, is it not? $45 per head?

If the amount were then found to put Sudbury on a par with, let us say, Peterborough—or St. Catharines is closer, St. Catharines is a better example. In order to put it on a par with a municipality like St. Catharines you would pay that amount of money based upon the per capita residents living in and working without—without taking all this artificiality of a fixed assessment and creating the most obtuse and complex equation that you do now in order to arrive at the amount.

Then let me say, finally, that I take it from the answer the hon. Minister made, that it is not anticipated that anything in excess of $200,000 or $300,000 or $400,000 will be paid to Sudbury this year than was paid last. Well, through you, Mr. Chairman, I say to the hon. Minister that he had better prepare himself for a shock when the delegation arrives—and I anticipate it will be ushered into his chambers—is that what you call them, his chambers—by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Demers). I hope it is, because there is the significant thing, I will tell you.

I wish he were in his seat so that he could hear this compliment that I pay him. As long as the senator was here, you know, before the senator was elevated—is that the word?—if he did discover it, he never let on that he represented part of the city of Sudbury. He never told anyone that, and I never heard him particularly say anything on behalf of Sudbury as an urban municipality, as an urban unit. But the senator represented all those good people who live to the east of the town; that is to say, those people who live in the west half of Neelon township.

On the contrary, my hon. friend from Nickel Belt, who has succeeded the senator and now sits on the government side, has recognized that part of his stewardship is to represent those people. That is why I say that I hope he will be shepherding the delegation to the hon. Minister's door. And if I am invited to go along, well, I know where the hon. Minister's office is and I will just go along and maintain, if you can believe it, Mr. Chairman, an attitude of discreet silence and contemplation.

But when they come, and however they get over to 801 Bay Street to see the hon. Minister surrounded by all his assistants, as I am sure he will be—though I noted today that, like a boy with a new bicycle, three or four speakers spoke over here before the hon. Minister summoned his lieutenants to their chairs. It is like a boy with a new bicycle, who says, "Look, Ma, no hands".

It is unusual, because normally this innovation of only six or eight or ten years here—that is it when started, only that long ago—normally, as soon as the Minister sits down, they come down from the wings to their place here so I commend the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, for that. His qualities of independence and being on top of his department are well known.

But then, to get to the coup de grâce, whereas the hon. Minister anticipates an increase of $200,000, the amount the delegation from Sudbury is going to be asking for is perhaps as high as $1 million. That is what they want as an increase. Because, the truth is—it is the solemn truth—that Sudbury, having to suffer this beneficence of this government in this way, because mining installations are not capable and susceptible to taxation, has not been treated fairly by this government. The citizens of that community have had to bear on their shoulders the fact that they are a dormitory municipality providing all those municipal services to people who work in these large industrial installations outside their boundaries, have had to bear an unfair burden of taxation. And we are told—I hope I am wrong—that whereas each preceding year has seen a drastic increase in the mill rate in our community, we are being prepared now for a five or six mill increase again.

These statistics, when they are prepared, will demonstrate to the hon. Minister that, compared to people who live elsewhere in the province and are able to tax their industrial installations, the burden is unjust and oppressive and it is inequitable and harsh in Sudbury. Now that is all I am going to say on it. But we will watch, and it is part of my duty here to be vigilant, and see how the hon. Minister receives that delegation and how the government, and particularly the Treasury board, of which the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is a member, I do believe, views that request. I am sorry I did not quite catch that bon mot from the—

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member missed nothing.

Mr. Sopha: No, I am quite sure I did not. Well, I am going to watch; it is part of my duty. I have the faith, finally, that if I stood here as I did and complained on 11 different occasions about the needs of a link from Sudbury to Timmins, via a road which is now being built or has commenced—and I used to criticize the hon. Minister because he built his road first—he built the one to Foleyet and then to Chapleau first before we got ours and I know that patience is always rewarded, and if I have to make 20 speeches here—heaven forbid—Mr. Chairman, that someday, justice will be done to this community and an appropriate and fair amount will be paid to it out of the mines' profits tax that this government receives from those industries, over and above, of course, all the corporation and income taxes that they have to pay as any other industry in the province.

Mr. Chairman: It is now six of the clock. I am leaving the chair. We will resume at eight.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Has the hon. member for Sudbury completed his remarks?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Yes, I have.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, you will remember, when we rose at 6 o'clock, that the hon. member for Sudbury had been speaking about mine revenue payments and the concern of the city of Sudbury and its municipal administration with their financial position.

On February 15 last, a meeting of the Association of Northern Mining Municipalities was held in Timmins, at which meeting there were representatives from a large number of the mining municipalities of the north country. Included among them were representatives from the city of Sudbury. The mayor himself travelled to Timmins; as a matter of fact I met him when we disembarked from the plane at the Timmins airport. He was accompanied, I believe, by one of the members of the board of control and also by the clerk-comptroller of the municipality.

The meeting of the association, as I say, was held on February 15, which was a Saturday. Unfortunately the mayor of Sudbury must have taken ill because he was not able to attend the meeting of the association, at which time most of the day was spent in discussing a brief which was being prepared by the association for presentation to the committee on taxation.

This brief had been prepared at the request of the association by a committee of five which had been named some several months before. This committee, in turn, had engaged the services of a well-known chartered accountant, who has had much experience in dealing with matters of this kind and who assisted in the preparation of the draft of this brief. The draft was discussed at great length by the members of the association present and, after some amendments had been made to the draft, the brief was accepted. The representatives of the city of Sudbury present at this meeting at least gave me the impression that they were satisfied with the brief, and now the hon. member has said that Sudbury may be presenting a brief of its own. In this case, if they wish to present the brief to me I will be very happy to receive them, and will certainly do the very best I can to be of assistance to them.

Mention has been made that it is difficult to understand the method of apportioning mining revenue payments, and perhaps a short review of this might be of benefit to the membership of the House. I do not know that it is so very difficult to understand. Certainly the accountants have no difficulty in understanding the calculation.

However, the computation of the amount of mining revenue payments to a designated mining municipality is based, in part, on the total of all the estimates approved for the purpose of mining payments. This, briefly, means the total amount, which would have been levied in the preceding year for all purposes of the municipality and its local boards if no mining payments for that year were received less the portion of the payment for that year in respect to miners resident in and working outside the municipality.

Prior to 1962, capital expenditures out of current revenue in all budgets, except those for schools, were deducted and amortized over a five-year period. One-fifth of such expenditures was then added to the total of all estimates approved for the purpose of mining payment during the amortization period.

I changed that regulation in 1962, so these periods of amortization in the past, which apply to past budgets, will expire in 1966. Capital expenditures out of current revenue now are given full consideration in the computation of the mining revenue payments, as also are reserves and reserve funds.

Prior to 1962, these funds were amortized over a five-year period also.

In computing this payment, allowances are permitted in the amount of $1,800 for each miner working and residing in the municipality, and $900 for each miner working in and residing outside the municipality. The municipality's local assessment is equalized by applying the equalization factor determined by the assessment branch of the department. The municipal mines assessment and the local assessment, as equalized, are totalled—we use two figures there—then an adjusted mill rate is determined by dividing this total into the total of all estimates approved for the purpose of the mining payment, subject to the few adjustments I have mentioned. Then the municipal mines assessment is multiplied by the adjusted mill rate, and the product is the amount payable to the municipality with respect to the operation of the mines within its boundaries. A municipality may also receive a payment of $45 in respect of each miner resident in and working outside the municipality.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that gives a short explanation of the manner in which these mining revenue payments are calculated. I would think, in discussing the situation with respect to the finances of Sudbury, that we should also bear in mind that although Sudbury did receive $1,903,000 in 1963, large amounts of money were also paid in the way of mining revenue payments to the municipalities in the Sudbury Basin. For instance, Chelmsford and Levack got $177,000; Blezard, Capreol, Casimir, Jennings and Appleby, not very far from Sudbury—no mines within its boundaries, but because miners are living within its boundaries—received $3,195. Drury, Denison, Graham—a municipality in that general area, sir—the township of Dowling, Falconbridge, Hagar, Hanmer, Neelon, Garson, Rayside, Waters township and the improvement districts of Onaping, itself received over $81,000. So a fairly good distribution of these funds has been made in that Sudbury area.

Going back to this subject, much of the financial problem existing in Sudbury has been greatly alleviated by the institution of mining revenue payments, and Sudbury has been receiving these payments for some six or seven years. Before the advent of the mining revenue payments legislation the city of Sudbury itself, not having any mines within its boundary, received no revenue from the mines. So in this particular case, we would argue about the amount and that is a matter of opinion. The fact that almost $2 million was paid into Sudbury last year no doubt has helped the city considerably in its financing.

I do agree with the hon. member, however, that Sudbury, because of its location on a rock pile, has to go to very expensive projects to provide municipal services.

And I would hope the representations that the city wishes to make would be made as soon as possible, so that we would have an opportunity to examine them and, also, to have our experts in the department study the figures given in the hope that we might be able to be of some service to Sudbury.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, the township of Widdifield is in the riding of Nipissing and adjoins the city of North Bay. This township has grown very rapidly in the last few years and it now has a population approximating 15,000. According to section 32 of The Municipal Act of the Revised Statutes of Ontario 1960, Chapter 249, in unorganized territories the council shall consist of a reeve and four councillors.

The township, and organizations within the township, have given some thought to this because the municipality has all the services of a town, and even of a city, and the council and councillors feel it would be advisable that the Act be amended to enlarge the number of councillors.

I notice here tonight members of the municipal select committee considering The Municipal Act and related Acts—the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle); the hon. member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. Evans); the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling); the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McNeil); the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young); and the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer). The chairman is not here, but it was stated in the House that the report would soon be in for consideration by the hon. Minister. Mr. Chairman, I hope that—I want to get this on the record—the committee may consider this resolution of the township. The township representatives to the federation of northern municipalities' meeting presented a resolution asking the endorsement of the request of the township—that is, in townships of over 10,000—that the number of councillors be increased to six.

I find in my own riding there are towns having a mayor and six councillors with populations—one, I think of 6,000; the other of 3,400—and I notice that in the district of Timiskaming there are towns with a population of 166. Another has 2,251. So I think this is a very reasonable request of the township—as I say, they presented their resolution to the northern Ontario municipalities' meeting in Garson. That federation endorsed their resolution, then they carried the resolution forward to the meeting of the Ontario reeves and mayors in Pembroke last summer. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs was at that meeting, and it was endorsed wholeheartedly by the association.

Unfortunately for the purposes of the township and its aims, the executive council of the Ontario association did not present it in their brief to the department. The hon. Minister was quite gracious to us in a delegation last week, meeting us in his spacious office over at 801 Bay Street, but he said that he would not initiate it, it would have to be up to the committee. He said the committee was now considering all amendments to the Act, he did not want to impose his authority on it, and when the report was presented to him—that is the final report—he would have his experts in his department—and they are many—give their views on these amendments. So I asked then whether the members of that committee would consider this resolution. Not only does it refer to my own riding but to other areas in unorganized territories. The councillors feel that although this is a resolution of only a small municipality in northern Ontario, and described in section 32 of The Municipal Act as an unorganized territory, it is of vital importance to a township such as the township of Widdifield to serve the people as they ought to be served.

The council is quite concerned with the welfare of its people and feels that it, and other townships similarly situated, can do a much better service for the people of their townships if the council is increased. The hon. Minister pointed out that maybe the councillors were taking too many duties on themselves. That is possible, but, nevertheless, I think it would be much better for townships similarly situated, like the township of Widdifield, to be permitted to increase their number of councillors eligible to a total of six.

As the Act now reads, this is impossible. The township feels, and personally I think rightly, that the council numbers should be increased. As I say, the population now is some 15,000. It is growing rapidly and, as you know, within the township is that great complex of the Sage and Bomarc installations and the air force at the RCAF station. Unfortunately, too, the township is again faced with the fact that most of the assessment is residential.

However, that does not appertain to this point. I suggest then, to the hon. Minister, that he give consideration to this request, and if the select committee approves of it, that he so endorse it. Thank you very much.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the courts of Ontario have handed down a ruling in a case involving the township of Brantford that the township cannot charge a fee in connection with a granting of severance. The township had a bylaw in this connection and collected quite a number of these fees before the bylaw was quashed in the courts. On appealing to the municipal board it was instructed, I understand, that such a fee could be collected by the planning board of the area.

It endeavoured to have this done but an appeal to this was also lost. Evidently, according to the courts, no fee can be collected in connection with the severance. As far as the township of Brantford is concerned, this is very serious since it has collected quite a large sum in the past and I understand that this is true of many townships in the province. I was wondering what action the department is going to take in order to remove this difficulty.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I was unaware of this case. The ruling that is referred to is from the Ontario Municipal Board—the Ontario Court of Appeal, was it?

Mr. Nixon: Right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The matter has never been brought to my attention so I cannot give you an answer. I shall be glad to have my law branch look into it and advise you.

Mr. Nixon: I would appreciate it if you would do that as soon as possible because the lawyers are proceeding with other cases along this very line.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of items in the estimates on which I would like to question the hon. Minister—number 4, for example: Commissions and Investigations. In 1963 the amount spent there was $11,491. In last year's estimates we had an item of $15,000 and this year we have $130,000. Can the hon. Minister explain the difference here and what is contemplated with the very much larger amounts being spent?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Most of the funds in that vote now are for the Royal commission in Metro Toronto. They are being spent right here. The rest of it is for usual expenditures.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Not paying Goldenberg all that, are you?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are estimating an amount of $105,000, that is exactly it, for the Goldenberg commission.

Mr. Young: Well, that comes pretty close to it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Sure.

Mr. Young: The other question is in connection with payments under The Drainage Act of $665,000. The hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) might well be interested in this item. In our discussions in the House some time ago, it was brought to our attention that one of the problems regarding the water table in Ontario is the matter of draining our low lands and swamp lands. My question is: Is this item now put here in the estimates with full knowledge and with consultation with the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management or is this a further threat to our water table in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This is to provide grants paid to municipalities for the drainage of agricultural land. The branch in my department which looks after that is aware of the problem which you mentioned, respecting the lowering of the water table in certain parts of the province. These matters are always considered prior to the projects being undertaken. I can assure the hon. member that there is communication through The Department of Agriculture and now to The Department of Energy and Resources Management headed by my friend the hon. Minister of Energy Resources.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister could give me an idea of the number of people involved in the estimates for salaries under the heading of law. The salaries total $35,000. Could you give me an idea how many people are involved? I imagine there would be lawyers involved in this estimate?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: At the present time there are two full-time lawyers and one stenographer and we plan on engaging two more lawyers during the coming fiscal year. We made provision for that.

Mr. Kerr: Another item, Mr. Chairman—item 8, Aid to Municipalities in Respect to Bounties Paid for Destruction of Foxes. Has the hon. Minister had any request from any municipality regarding the payment of bounty for the destruction of porcupines?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There is no authority under The Municipal Act for me to make such a grant, but I have had no requests for that since I have been in The Department of Municipal Affairs. I know there are hon. members in this House, as a matter of fact, who have had plenty of trouble with porcupines and they mentioned it to me when I was in The Department of Lands and Forests. I do not know whether you could ever develop a system of grants to assist in the—shall I use the word eradication—of porcupines? Really, a porcupine is rather an important animal in the cycle of nature, so I am told by the biologists, and I think that the matter, for the moment, will have to rest as it does.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to get away from the porcupines and back to the lawyers for a moment. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Minister's answer to the first question of the hon. member for Halton. As I understood it the hon. Minister told us that for $35,000 he was paying two lawyers—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, that is not what I said.

Mr. Bryden: —and he was going to hire two more.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am paying two lawyers now, full time. During the next fiscal year I have made arrangements to engage two more but I have not provided for a full year's salary for four lawyers.

Mr. Bryden: Oh, I see. I take it then there is a full year's salary for two lawyers?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Two lawyers, that is right.

Mr. Bryden: And you have not necessarily allowed anything for the salaries of the men you are planning to take on, or have you just allowed a small amount?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The two lawyers we now have take up better than $20,000 of the total salary budget.

Mr. Bryden: I noticed that in the public accounts, I do not know if this covers the salary of the general municipal counsel—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, no.

Mr. Bryden: It is not in that vote. I see.

However that is not the point I am mainly interested in, Mr. Chairman. I want to raise a matter that I have raised twice before. I felt a little discouraged when I heard the hon. member for Sudbury stating it required 11 speeches before he got the road he was looking for. I think the point I have has sufficient merit that maybe three references to it might persuade the hon. Minister and the government. This again is the question of the Metropolitan Licensing Commission in Toronto.

I asked the hon. Minister a question about it at the beginning of the session before the orders of the day. He very kindly gave me quite a full answer explaining what the present situation is. I raised the matter also when I spoke, I think it was in the Throne Speech debate, and I am sufficiently concerned about it that I am going to raise it again now, although I hope I can keep it brief.

I rather regret that the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) is not here tonight, because I had judged from the speech he made in the House yesterday that I could enlist him as an ally in the matters that I want to urge upon the government. The hon. member quite properly laid stress on the need, and the growing need, in this complex society to ours, to protect citizens from arbitrary conduct by officialdom. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest protection against arbitrary conduct is to try to avoid, if at all possible, setting up bodies with purely arbitrary powers. I admit that that is more easily said than done. Difficult problems arise in this whole area of administrative law or whatever you want to call it, but there are some situations that seem to me to be clearly wrong, and the situation relating to the Metropolitan Licensing Commission I would like to submit to this House is clearly wrong.

Here is a body that has the power to make laws, and for the group to whom they apply they are quite important laws. In other words, its law-making functions relate to laying down conditions under which people can obtain and retain licences, the fees they may pay, and so on.

There are two magistrates on this commission. So if a fellow is charged with a breach of one of the regulations of the commission, he may very well appear before one of the magistrates who made the law. Then to compound the matter, if he is convicted he can be hauled back before the commission to show cause why his license should not be cancelled, and appear again before a magistrate who has already had more than enough to do with his case.

This sort of power, in my opinion, is unreasonable and should not exist. I stated earlier, and I repeat, that I do not think that anybody should have legislative power unless he is responsible to the people. This commission has power to make regulations, which are legislative in their character. It is accountable to absolutely nobody for the exercise of its legislative powers. Its regulations are not reviewed by the Metropolitan council or any other elected body. I think that clearly ought to be changed.

I would not be as concerned about this matter, even though I think the constitution of this commission and the powers it exercises are wrong in principle, if I had felt it was not acting in an arbitrary way. But in my opinion, this commission has demonstrated time after time that it cannot be entrusted with the kind of arbitrary powers it has. It has been exercising these powers in a most arbitrary way, in a way that has caused very great concern to many citizens, law-abiding citizens, who I think should have a greater opportunity for redress than they seem to get from this commission.

Apparently the commission has cooled down a little bit and has decided that it has to pay a little bit of attention to the people who are subject to its laws. It has indicated that in the last month or so, but it still is a thoroughly bad situation that I do not think should be permitted to continue in our law. I think that Part 12 of The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act should be amended at this session, at the very least to make the regulations of the licensing commission subject to approval by some elected body. I would think the appropriate body would probably be the Metropolitan council.

I would also suggest that it be amended to make magistrates actually sitting on the bench ineligible for the commission. The law, as I recall it, makes members of any of the councils in the Metropolitan area ineligible to sit on it, but I think that magistrates actively sitting on the benches at the present time should also be ineligible to sit on it. This practice was started by the government itself when it first passed the Metro Act, or when it first passed this part of the Act. It decreed what the composition of the commission would be, and it decreed that two of the members would be magistrates. It later gave power of appointment to the Metro council, but the council continued the practice as it had already been provided in the law.

It may be that the hon. Minister is going to say to me that this is essentially the situation all over the province, that in other municipalities the police commission exercises the licensing function; in Toronto there is too much work for the police commission to do so a separate commission has been set up to deal with licensing only, but modelled to some degree at any rate on the police commission.

I am going to suggest to him that I have heard him say that—I know that is the reasoning behind the legislation as it stands but experience has shown that it is not the right approach. I am not suggesting that in other municipalities licensing powers should be taken out of the hands of police commissions. That may work well in other municipalities, I just do not know. But I know that this system does not work well in Toronto. And I do not have to tell anybody because there has been real turmoil in this area through the arbitrary actions and attitudes of this commission.

Men who are honest law-abiding citizens with small investments in their own businesses—as taxi drivers—and doing their best to earn a living honestly, have been put to, I would say, serious emotional strain, as have their families, because of the threats this arbitrary commission has posed to them. When I say “threats” I do not mean threats in—I suppose I should be more careful in using that word—I do not mean that any of them have been threatened, but there has been a threat to their livelihood because of the conduct of this commission and I would hope that the hon. Minister would see fit to amend the law to set up a body that is more accountable to the public and would therefore act in a less arbitrary way.

I also suggested to him on a previous occasion that there should be an investigation into the taxi industry in this city and the regulation of it. I still think that would be a useful development. Whether this government should take responsibility for it, or the Metropolitan council, I could not say. I am not quite sure what powers the Metro council might have in that regard. But at any rate, whatever the hon. Minister might think on that point, I would hope that he would still consider amending Part 12 of The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act at this session.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Chairman, at times I am accused of not acting fast enough in providing amendments, but obviously there are some people who do not read the amendments I do bring in. The matter of the appointment of the members of the Metro Licensing Commission is entirely in the hands of the Metropolitan council—

Mr. Bryden: I said that, I read it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Now, just a minute, I did not interrupt the hon. member. In the last session, 1962-63, The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act was amended to provide that two persons could be appointed by the Metropolitan council, two persons who are not members of the council of an area municipality. But until such a time as the Metro council took action, that the present members of the Licensing Commission shall remain in office until they or their successors are appointed. So I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is no amendment required to The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act at the present time.

Now, the Metropolitan council in its wisdom—and after all it is entitled to have some wisdom—has decided that it is going to remain with the licensing commission it has. And when it pleases council, the amendment is there, already in the Act. We have not disturbed the Metropolitan Licensing Commission at all. The present commission remains in office until successors are appointed. And if the Metro council wishes to change the members of the licensing commission, it has all the authority required. No amendments are required.

Now, in due course of time, we will no doubt be presenting some amendments to the Metro Toronto Act, but I think in the meantime it might be worthwhile to pass a few remarks about the problem that the hon. member has mentioned, and that is the operation of the taxi industry in the city. A lengthy report was prepared by the Metropolitan Licensing Commission in connection with this matter. I have examined it very thoroughly and I would suggest to hon. members that the matter is in good hands at the present time.

The great complaint has come from certain operators of taxi cabs that the licence fees have been increased, but when you examine this report it says that:

The increase in the annual renewal fee is directly attributable to increased costs incurred by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Department, who have recently assumed enforcement of the taxi-cab by-law at the request of cab owners. In addition, each area municipality provides at its own expense, and not chargeable to the licensing commission, inspection services of all licensed premises and inspection resulting from new licence applications.

In further justification for the increase in renewal fee, it should be pointed out that the taxi-cab owner-operators are not subject to business tax and, under powers granted by The Municipal Act, a licence fee may assume the nature of a tax in respect of any privilege which is conferred. We believe that there is no question of the legality of this fee.

The basic issue in this matter is between independent operators and fleet operators. It is highly questionable whether a licensing commission should impose such restrictions or conditions on either group as to attempt an elimination of competitive enterprise, particularly when it is realized that only the fleet owners can provide taxi-cab service on a 24-hour basis.

Now since this report was presented to me, a special meeting of the commission has been held at which representatives of the taxi-cab industry of Toronto have been heard and so I leave the matter in the hands of the Metropolitan Licensing Commission and the Metropolitan Toronto council.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make one or two comments in view of the hon. Minister's suggestion that I had not taken the trouble to read the amendment that was passed last year. I would point out that I quite clearly indicated that I had, in the comments I made, both—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, the hon. member said—

Mr. Bryden: The trouble is, the hon. Minister did not listen to what I had to say, he did not answer what I said, he answered his own preconceived notion of what he thought I might say. Certainly I quite realized, and I think I indicated, that the Metro council saw fit to retain these people on the commission who had been originally appointed by statute. I think that indicates that I was aware they were appointed by Metro council.

My complaint, however, was not that they are appointed by the Metro council, it is that their regulations are not reviewed, or subject to approval, by any elected body. The only supervision the Metro council has over them is the indirect and extraordinary supervision that it can fire them. That is an extraordinary remedy under any circumstances.

I still say to the hon. Minister that it is a sound principle that laws should be made by elected people, or at any rate elected people should have to take responsibility for them, and if any powers are to be delegated to an appointed body at least the laws it makes should be subject to review by an elected body.

The hon. Minister now refers to a report he received from the Metropolitan licensing commission. I hope that that was received some time ago. I hope the commission has not gone back to the sort of attitude demonstrated there because that just will lead to hopelessness in the taxi industry in Toronto.

As the commission said in that report, there is to a certain degree a problem between independents and fleet owners. As far as the conduct of the commission in the past has been concerned, they could not care less about the independents. These men have been paying a $50-a-year licence fee and nobody has really demonstrated that that is not quite adequate. It is not the function of this commission to raise revenue for the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Its function is to regulate the industry and what they have done—mind you, it is only now coming into effect—the various things that they have done are weighing very heavily on the independents. I suggested, when I spoke about this in the House before, that if the independents are to be dealt with in the way they have been dealt with up to now, the entire industry is going to be handed over on a platter to the big fleet owners. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that would be disastrous for the industry.

I think these independents have made an important contribution to the industry and I think they will continue to make an important contribution. The policing function will be a lot easier if a substantial segment consists of independents who have their own money tied up and who, therefore, are very anxious that the industry should have a good reputation, and that they as individuals should have a good reputation. The policing function will be much simpler than if you have the whole thing turned over to fleets who hire people, half of them moonlighters, or many of them moonlighters—maybe here today, gone tomorrow with no real stake or interest in the industry at all—then the policing problem will become acute.

Yet as far as I am concerned, what the Metro licensing commission has been doing over the past year has made things very tough for the independents, and it is going to make it even tougher unless there is some change in the regulations they have approved. Apparently they have, up until very recently at any rate, indicated they are going to stubbornly proceed regardless of consequences. The fact that they had a meeting a week or two ago—and I think it was adjourned for a week and they are going to have a further meeting—showed that they were finally prevailed upon after extreme pressure from the independents in the industry.

They were finally showing some willingness to listen to these fellows.

Even so, Mr. Chairman, I was told that, in the interval between the first meeting and the adjournment a week later, all the boys were notified that if they did not renew their licences by a certain date—I have forgotten what date it was, but anyway it was in between the two meetings—they were out. Their licences would be awarded to other people.

This is the kind of outfit we are dealing with. They are having a hearing to hear the grievances of these people, and in the middle of the adjourned hearing the men are told, "If you have not renewed your licences by a certain date, you are out, and your licence will be awarded to somebody else, and your livelihood will go down the drain, and your investment with it."

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Those are the 1964 licences that you are speaking of?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, one of the big disputes has been the doubling of the fee from $50 to $100, with the men protesting it. They delayed paying the new fee in the hope that it would not become applicable, and so they had a hearing. Then, when they are in the midst of a hearing, when their case is to be considered, they are told in the middle of it, "Pay up for this year or out you go." At the $100 fee, not the $50 fee. If they had been told to pay at least $50 on account by such and such a date, I could understand. But no; what they were told was, "If you do not pay the whole fee—the whole $100 that you have been complaining about all these months and on which we are supposed to be now listening to your objections—if you do not pay that, you are out."

Most of these regulations were passed by the commission in the first half of last year; the independents did not even know about them for a long time after they were passed. The business of increasing the number of cabs on the street—they did not find out about that until a long time after the regulation was passed. I think it is just starting to happen now. The commission is issuing new licences right now.

I would certainly say, Mr. Chairman, that everything this commission has done up till now indicates an arbitrary attitude. I had hoped that they were perhaps relenting a little bit although I am beginning to think, especially when I hear about the memorandum they sent to the hon. Minister, that they are just as pig-headed as they were, at any time, if that memorandum represents their current attitude.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the same subject on which the hon. member for Woodbine has just been speaking. I want to thank him for bringing this matter up again before the House. I may say to him that I agree with most of his comments. It disturbs me, as I think it disturbs some other hon. members of this House, to realize that, due to legislation passed through this House, the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission does exist in its present form with very little appeal procedure from their decisions. I say very little because I know that there is still the power of appeal to a Supreme Court judge in regard to the revocation or cancellation of a licence.

As I understand the history and theory behind the licensing bodies throughout the whole province, initially the licensing powers were given to the municipal council concerned. In some of the larger municipalities, over the years, that did not work out. Those powers were then delegated to a police commission. But always, as I understand it, there was an appeal from the police commission to the municipal council solely and simply on the basis that this was a delegated authority and the municipal council at any time could take back those powers and overrule its own delegated group, namely, the police commission.

Then we come to the Metropolitan Toronto situation. This Legislature, in its wisdom, set up the Metropolitan licensing commission but forgot, at least—I hope it was not done intentionally—that the licensing powers delegated to the police commission were appealable to the body that normally had those powers. Here the Metropolitan licensing commission can act quite arbitrarily in these matters, as the hon. member for Woodbine has pointed out to the House.

It is fine to say that there are still safeguards built in; that there are still these appeal procedures to a Supreme Court judge, but they relate exclusively to the revocation or cancellation of a licence. They do not relate to some of these other matters which can affect the rights and the livelihood of these men in almost the same way as the revocation and cancellation of the licence could.

For instance, in this latest keffuffle—and I am afraid I cannot call it anything but that—this doubling of the licence fee; the hon. member for Woodbine stated that there have been threats made to these taxi people. That is perfectly correct; they have interpreted these statements as threats. The commission, in no uncertain terms, has told some of these independents, according to these men, to either shut up and keep quiet or, within the next couple of months, they will authorize 400 new taxi licences in the city of Toronto. In other words, the word is, “Boys, stop putting the heat on us, stop bringing the pressure on us, or we will make the taxi industry in Toronto so untenable for you that you small independents will be driven out of business.”

I agree with the hon. Minister when he says it should not be the function of any licensing group, or any legislative group, to attempt to discriminate between the forces of private enterprise in such a field as this. In other words, he is saying, “Fine, if the commission in its wisdom increases the licence fee and this in itself is a hardship on the independent, that is too bad for the independent.”

I do not feel yet that the case has been made by the licensing commission that this increase in fees was, in fact, necessary. I have watched the situation pretty closely because being a member for the downtown area where a lot of these independents earn their livelihood, I have become involved in the controversy. I do not think that the case has yet been made for the increase in the fees, but the fact is that the increase in the fees does militate against the independent and favours the fleet owner. This in effect is just exactly what the hon. Minister says should not happen.

There should be an appeal. I definitely feel there should be an appeal from the decisions to Metro council. Metro council really should have authority to regulate and control the licensing commission.

As a matter of fact, I really thought that council did have that control. I thought if the matter became contentious enough the Metropolitan council could overrule the licensing commission. From what the hon. member for Woodbine has said tonight, I was a little bit disappointed in the hon. Minister's reply because he did not seem to indicate that there was a situation where Metro council could overrule the licensing commission.

Mr. Sopha: This is courage.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Metro council should be able to overrule the licensing commission and if there is no legislation available at this session, I certainly hope that—I know submissions along this line are going to be made to the Goldenberg commission—the Goldenberg commission will present its report to the government and perhaps incorporate that as one of its recommendations.

But the dangerous point, Mr. Chairman, is this: by the time the Goldenberg commission reports, there may be very few independents left in the taxi business in Toronto. Look at the history of these fee increases in the taxi-cab licences since Metro was instituted. It was at the very beginning, I think, some absurdly low figure. I believe it was something like $15. But to have it bounce, right now at this time, from $50 up to $100 does militate against the independent. I think the situation is such that it requires a very close look right now by the government and by the hon. Minister involved, rather than waiting for the Goldenberg report to come in.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, one question. Since in the year of public accounts 1963, the Ontario Water Resources Commission was under this department, what is the daily allowance? I know the total allowance given there, but what do the members of the commission get per day? Apparently they do not get a yearly salary.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Who was that?

Mr. Troy: Members of the water resources commission, who reported to you in the fiscal year 1962-63.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am sorry, I cannot give you the particulars of the Ontario Water Resources Commission because that is going to be handled by the hon. Minister of Energy Resources and is not in my vote at all.

Mr. Troy: I know it is now, but it was under your department until just recently. It was during the fiscal year 1962-63.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I replied to the House. I presented the estimates of the water resources commission last year, and when those estimates come up for discussion it will depend on what time of the year it will be as to whether I shall present them at this session or the hon. Minister of Energy Resources and you will get the answers then.

Mr. Troy: This is a simple question and you should be able to answer it, no matter if they are changed over. Do they get salary or are they paid by a daily allowance?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I cannot tell you that. I think they are all paid on a per diem basis. I will get the information, or the information will be available to you when the estimates of the Ontario Water Resources Commission come up.

Vote 1401 agreed to.

Vote 1402 agreed to.

On vote 1403:

Mr. Young: On vote 1403, Mr. Chairman, I noticed the first item, investigating design, development and servicing of townsites. The amount has gone up from $10,000 in 1963 to $666,000 in this estimate. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on this?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: In some areas of northern Ontario, recoverable funds are required to assist in the early development of municipal services until normal community financing is feasible. This would apply particularly in the Kapuskasing area where we have had the amalgamation and annexation take place effective the first of this year.

Mr. R. W. Gibson (Kenora): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you might just tell me what is included in the investigation of design, development and servicing of townsites.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, that is just the matter I explained.

Mr. Gibson: What do you call the groups that do this? Does this include the examiner of surveys?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, no, this is work which is done by officials of The Department of Municipal Affairs. There might be planners, there might be engineers, there might be municipal accountants, etc. Could be loans to assist in the development of municipal services that are required until the community gets on its feet.

Vote 1403 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF MINES

Mr. Chairman: On vote 1301:

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that you caught me rather by surprise. I thought from the way it looked when I left the House that it was going to take a great deal longer to go through the estimates of municipal affairs. I suppose I should give my thanks to our hon. friends in the Opposition for not taking any longer than they did. I would suggest that they be kind enough to me to do the same thing.

In presenting the estimates of The Department of Mines for the coming year, I do so with mixed feelings. I do so in the full recognition that in 1963 the production of Ontario's mineral industry showed a decrease from the previous year—that, in fact, the record of production shows a steady decline from the all-time peak of $983 million established in 1960. The preliminary estimate shows production in 1963 of $876,583,824 as compared with $913,269,756 for the previous year.

It would be the height of foolishness to suggest that there is no cause for concern in the reduction of $36.5 million in the value of new wealth pouring into the economy. I certainly have no intention of making such a suggestion—but I would like to point out that the situation is not by any means all black.

The key to the problem of Ontario's mineral production appears to lie in the immensely rich Sudbury Basin, the world's most fruitful source of nickel. I might congratulate both the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Demers) for coming from such a wonderful mining country. I do not think there is any other place as valuable mineral-wise, in the world. The drop of $26.45 million in the value of nickel produced last year may be attributed largely to one factor, which is, I am glad to say, of a temporary nature. The two major producers, International Nickel Company and Falconbridge, were both required to cut back their production in an economically sound programme to reduce world stockpiles of the mineral. It is also a fact that we no longer have a monopoly on nickel production here in Ontario and International Nickel is now getting a substantial portion from the Thompson mine in Alberta.

There was a distinct note of cheer, however, in the announcement made early in February this year by International Nickel that it was calling back 1,700 of the men who, in September, 1962, were laid off from the Sudbury district operations, and that another 150 were going back to the company's plant at Port Colborne. In this step toward the resumption of full productivity, the company planned to restore about half of the nine million pounds of nickel per quarter which was the measure of the curtailment of operations.

It is a peculiarity of the Sudbury ores, and this is significant, that minerals do not occur singly but, rather, intermixed with the nickel are copper, gold, silver, cobalt, several platinum metals, iron and other minerals. Altogether there are 14 products and by-products recovered from these rich ores. It is no wonder under these circumstances that the Sudbury Basin is one of the world's richest mining areas. On the other hand, when production of the major mineral, nickel, is cut back for any reason, production of the other valuable products suffers as well.

Mr. J. M. Could (Bracondale): It is not the basin, it is the rim.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is right. My hon. friend is quite interested in mining. I have talked to him before and he has the story right there.

Thus, Ontario's production lost another $10 million in the platinum, $4 million in copper and corresponding amounts in other minerals to the degree in which they figure in the overall Sudbury picture.

I do not think that it would serve any useful purpose for me to recapitulate item by item the story of mineral production. There was a considerable overall reduction which was made up largely of losses in nickel, platinum, copper, gold, uranium, asbestos and salt. Considerable increases were shown by several other minerals, notably iron which set a new all-time record, silver, several non-metals, natural gas and oil and the structural materials.

More important than what has passed though, is the question of what the future holds in store for this province. In all honesty, I cannot predict any great upturn in 1964 as I now see it.

Unless there is some unforeseen development, by the end of this year all Ontario's uranium mines—with one exception—will have closed down. Not because of lack of ore, but for reasons which every hon. member of this House knows. Still the Elliot Lake area remains as the greatest single-known source of uranium ore anywhere in the world. Most of the mines which are being obliged to close for lack of markets will be kept in a state in which they can resume operations as quickly as possible when markets for their product develop, as they must develop, as the expanding requirements of the nuclear age brings about a renewed demand for Ontario's uranium.

Not so many days ago, Mr. Chairman, I was talking to one of the leading men in the uranium field and I asked him what he thought the prospects of uranium in the future were to see if his thinking coincided with my own. He believes, as I do, that by 1966 there will be some upturn in uranium and by 1970, if some of the indicators we see now come to pass, uranium should be double the price it is today and the demand should be sufficient to keep our Elliot Lake field going. That is my hope. It is a prediction. It may not work out but I believe it will from all indications I can discern.

The outlook for a few of our gold mines does not hold this note of optimism for the future. It is one of the economic facts of life in the world of mining that no orebody—regardless of how rich or extensive it may be—is inexhaustible, and the situation, bluntly stated, is that some of the giants of the industry which have been producing great wealth for half a century are nearing the end of their lives.

As we know, Mr. Chairman, the minute a mine goes into production, its death knell sounds right there, and some of these great mines, especially in the gold field, have been going a long time.

These mines may die this year or new pockets of ore may be discovered to prolong their lives for a while, but the end cannot be delayed indefinitely.

The solution—the only solution—if Ontario's mining industry is to continue to play the tremendously important part it has played and is playing in our economy, lies in the discovery and development of new mines and whole new mining areas.

Hon. members are entitled to ask why this is not being done at a more rapid rate. They are entitled to ask why Ontario's mineral production is falling when that of Canada as a whole is continuing to rise.

But I would like to say that Ontario still is in the pre-eminent place in mining, with some 30 per cent of this whole country's production of minerals, about 30 per cent of the total of over $2.5 billion, getting up into $3 billion.

I do not pretend to know the whole answer—but it might well be time for industry, government and the investing public to step back and take a long, hard look at the situation as far as mining in Ontario is concerned.

It could be that the government at Ottawa has done too much to discourage foreign investment in our resources and that Canadians are not yet ready or able to supply the needed risk capital themselves.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I should like to read a clipping from a Boston newspaper that I picked up the other day:

A man about 46 years of age, giving the name of Joshua Coppersmith, has been arrested in New York for attempting to extort funds from ignorant and superstitious people by exhibiting a device which he says will convey the human voice any distance over metallic wires, so that it will be heard by the listener at the other end. He calls the instrument a "telephone", which is obviously intended to imitate the word "telegraph" and win the confidence of those who know of the success of the latter instrument without understanding the principles on which it is based.

Well-informed people know that it is impossible to transmit the human voice over wires as may be done with dots and dashes and signals of the Morse Code, and that were it possible to do so, the thing would be of no practical value. The authorities who apprehended this criminal are to be congratulated, and it is to be hoped that his punishment will be prompt and fitting, that it may serve as an example to other conscienceless schemers who enrich themselves at the expense of their fellow creatures.

How many times have we heard that, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members?

It is true that that paper was published in 1873, but I am inclined to wonder if our ideas have changed so greatly in the intervening 90 years—or if we are still inclined to look with too jaundiced an eye on the idea of investing money or effort in anything short of a rock-bound certainty.

I would be the last to suggest that investment in mining stock, especially while the mine is in the development stage, does not involve an element of risk, but I would point out too, Mr. Chairman, that our province and our nation need people with the courage to invest in just such development—and precedents are certainly not lacking to show that such investment can pay tremendous dividends.

I am sure that all hon. members of this House were glad to hear in the Throne Speech that a select committee is to be appointed to examine all aspects of Ontario's mining industry. Officials of my department and I welcome this as a sign of growing interest in one of our greatest industries, and it is hoped that the combined wisdom of the members of the committee will result in new ideas to further spur the development of mining in this province.

I might add, Mr. Chairman, that all the members of mining companies, the Canadian Institute of Mining, and all the heads and those underground, and so on, are distinctly interested in this new select committee. We hope that it is going to help spur productivity and spur the finding of new mines, and that we will have a resurgence of mineral wealth coming into this province in the future.

Hon. members may accuse me of trying to apply shock therapy in an effort to cure the ills of the mining industry. Perhaps they are right, Mr. Chairman. I confess I have made no effort to play down the difficulties in which we find ourselves, but, on the other hand, I do not believe that I have overstated the case at all. However, I would like to emphasize most definitely that the present ailments of the industry are, or should be, short-term ones and if remedial action is taken promptly, the patient will recover his complete health and be stronger and more robust than ever, and I think that is a certainty.

Let us look at Ontario's mining industry as it is today. I have already pointed out that total production last year was down to $875,580,000—but that is still a great deal of money, just about double the total of ten years ago. Certainly there is cause for great regret at the loss of the uranium production, which in its peak year was worth $266 million to our economy. But with the confidence that a fruitful world market will surely be developed, there is no cause for real dismay. I had hoped two years ago that we would reach the $1 billion mark. When the market for uranium arrives I am sure we will pass that mark in Ontario.

In 1963 we had 81 mines, 794 quarries and pits, 27 diamond-drilling organizations and 24 metallurgical plants in operation throughout the province and giving direct employment to more than 46,500 people.

Let us see what else mining has done for the country. It is axiomatic that Canada's economic life depends upon a high export rate, which is currently about 15 per cent of the gross national product. About 60 per cent of the national output of minerals and mineral-based products is now being exported and the value of these exports exceeds that of any other industry. In 1962, the value of mineral exports was more than $2.5 billion—more than 40 per cent of the total value of all exported Canadian products. That is a surprising thing, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think too many of our Ontario citizens realize it.

There are in this province five "resource-based" industries. They are: agriculture, forestry, fisheries, trapping and mining. Agriculture is the most important of these in southern Ontario, but, Mr. Chairman, in the northern part of the province mining is pre-eminent. I have some rather startling figures which I would like to quote from one of our own government publications, Ontario Economic and Local Aspects 1961. This survey shows the estimated net value of the five resource industries in 1961 was $593 per person in northern Ontario and $120 per person in southern Ontario. There is now, and there always has been, far too little recognition of the role of mining as a basic and indispensable factor in the development of Ontario.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members will agree that, without question, mining has been the greatest single factor in the development and colonization of northern Ontario. The discoveries at Sudbury and Cobalt were both made during the construction of railways. And I might say in passing that the current revival of activity in the grand old Cobalt camp has brought cheer to the heart of the whole mining world. Can anybody here sing the Cobalt song?

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Yes, let us have it!

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Can you, Elmer? You should sing it right now.

An hon. member: Let us hear it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Subsequently the discovery of gold in the Porcupine, at Kirkland Lake and at Red Lake; of copper at Manitouwadge; of iron at Wawa and Atikokan; and of uranium at Elliot Lake—all these occurred in the bush, miles from railways, roads, hydro power supply, communications or any sort of urban communities. All these services and others had to be provided by the mining companies concerned or by the government, or by the combined efforts of both, before the discoveries could be transformed into producing mines—the mines that now form the main support for communities with a collective population of more than 300,000 people. That, Mr. Chairman, is a very, very enlightening picture.

I will go so far as to say that without these mines, a great deal of northern Ontario would still be the unknown, unpopulated wilderness that it was 50 years ago. Without these mines there would have been little reason to build the 16,000 miles of roads and highways now open for public use in northern Ontario. These roads not only serve the needs of the mines, but are used also by local farmers and residents of northern cities and towns. They are used by those engaged in the forest industries, by trappers, tourists, vacationers, anglers and hunters. It is a matter of interest that since the end of World War II, 1,500 miles of new railway tracks have been laid down in Canada, specifically to serve the mining industry and to derive benefit from the traffic which this industry promotes.

There is a side benefit of Ontario's mining industry that is growing steadily in importance. Only a few years ago, mineralogy, as such, was considered too erudite a subject to be considered by anyone but the qualified professional geologist or mineralogist. No doubt that is still true in most respects, but just as we have do-it-yourself doctors and carpenters and plumbers, so in North America we are developing a breed of do-it-yourself mineralogists, many of whom are surprisingly accomplished in the art. These rock hounds, as they are called, can be found by the hundred every summer searching the rocky bushland of Ontario in search of specific rocks or minerals.

They do it, not in the hope of finding a mine, but mainly for the satisfaction to be derived from success in their search for single specimens. Their usual objective is semi-precious stones—such as the amethyst of the Lake Superior region, or any of the many other minerals to be found in the Bancroft area. Not a few of these amateurs lose their amateur status when they decide to open lapidary shops for the sale of their polished gemstones and other mineral specimens.

I had some of them made up the other day into ink stands, book ends, clock bases and other things. We have in Ontario some of the most beautiful marble in the world today of which we are not taking advantage at the present time.

In total, the activities of these rock hounds have a considerable effect on Ontario's tourist industry. By way of encouragement, The Department of Mines in 1962 published a report specifically for the use of these amateur prospectors. This report, Geology and Scenery along the North Shore of Lake Superior, will be followed by a series of similar guidebooks during the next few years. Presently under consideration also, is a project to publish a pamphlet giving general information about the mineral industry, with locations of points of special interest. This work would be done co-operatively with the assistance of The Department of Tourism and Information.

Another comparatively recent development is the increase in interest in Ontario's polished marble as the basic ingredient for decorative office equipment and for other purposes. Recently I attended the architects' convention in the Royal York Hotel. From good old Lanark county—I cannot see the hon. member (Mr. Gomme) here—I saw some of the most beautiful marble there that it is possible to see—blues, whites, marble white, and the brown with the red tinge. Beautiful, beautiful marble that can be used in buildings in the future, and it is going to be a great, great item of industry for that wonderful part of the country.

As we consider the impact of mining on the whole economy, let us look for a moment at a survey made by one of the larger mines into its expenditures for machinery and equipment, supplies and fuels, and this is interesting. This study shows that, of the $6.8 million expenditure for such items in 1962, more than $6 million, or 88 per cent, of the purchases consisted of Canadian-made goods. This was one company, one of the larger ones, but the figures present an idea of what the mining industry means indirectly in the employment of Canadians and the circulation of wealth in this country. Increasing mineral production has, indeed, been a significant factor in providing Canadians with the second highest standard of living enjoyed by any people in the world!

Mr. Chairman, I hope that these introductory remarks have served to bring home to hon. members of this House the vastly important place that mining has in our way of life. I hope it will make it easy for them to see how essential it is that they approve the appropriations, which officials of my department consider the minimum cost of providing the services that are needed, if the industry for which I have the honour to speak here is to resume its march forward.

Altogether, Mr. Chairman, I am asking approval for the expenditure during the coming fiscal year of $3,484,000 for all purposes. This is $209,000 more than the estimates for the current year, and the reasons for this increase will be made clear as I proceed.

The main office is the administrative centre of the department. It handles all operations that are not otherwise allocated to specific branches, including accounting and mine assessment, the administration of personnel, the publicity programme and the control of special research projects which are being carried out on behalf of the department by the Ontario Research Foundation.

It is estimated that the cost of all these operations in the coming year will be $496,000, an increase of $42,000 which was allocated to vote 1301 for the same services in the current year.

This increase can be largely accounted for by an increase in salaries brought about through the reclassification programme. With a view to improving the public image of the department and the mining industry there has also been some increase in the amount provided for public relations purposes, including exhibitions.

The work which is being done by the research foundation consists of one very important major project and a number of smaller individual projects which together could prove to be of major importance in the development of the mining industry. The first of these, for which $50,000 has again been earmarked, consists of a programme to perfect a method of jet smelting of iron ores using natural gas as a reduction agent. I hope at a later date during this session to have an opportunity to speak at greater length on this programme. Now, I would merely point out the great potential value which it might have in developing the tremendous resources of iron ore which exist in this province, if it can be found that the natural gas flowing through the Trans-Canada Pipeline fairly close to many of these ore-bodies can be used economically to produce materials similar to the product of a blast furnace, without the necessity of importing great quantities of coking coal. These, as hon. members know, we have not got in this province.

The rest of the programme consists of a number of individual projects in ore dressing, which are designed to assist the mining industry in solving some of the problems encountered in the treatment of various ores. In cases where the problems are peculiar to one specific company, the cost of research will be shared between the company and the government. With other approved projects, which have a more general application, the department will defray the entire cost. The overall maximum for all these projects is $30,000.

As I said earlier the outstanding need, if Ontario is to regain its former eminence in mining, is for an upsurge, Mr. Chairman, in prospecting and exploration activity. The best contribution that my department can make to this work is in making available a greater knowledge of the geology of this whole province. Consequently, we propose to continue the programme of expanding the geological branch, which was started a few years ago. During the field season this year it is intended that our geologists will undertake 34 separate projects throughout the province. Of these, 15 will be in northeastern Ontario, 11 in the northwestern part of the province and eight in southern Ontario, the source of most of our industrial minerals.

Mr. Gould: You will never find a mine that way.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I will give you proof of it later.

An hon. member: He means in his riding.

Mr. Gould: How many years later?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: We are again providing $150,000 as the province's share of the federal-provincial airborne magnetometer survey of Ontario. During the last four years, a total of about 164,000 square miles of Ontario's northland have been flown in this great co-operative enterprise, and a great many promising anomalies have been indicated. This year we plan to cover a further 32,000 square miles in the area lying between Cochrane and James and Hudson Bays. We will get something for the Ontario northland up there.

Because the potentially mineral rich rock of that region is thickly overlaid with soil, a companion programme to the airborne survey is also planned for this year. It will consist of a seismic survey in several of the northern rivers. I might explain that that is where formerly there might have been earthquakes or something of that kind as a result. The outcropping of ore lies very deep down in the soil. This magnetometer indicates where ore may be beneath the soil. The seismic survey carries on from there and we find out if it is valuable to mine there or not. We hope that as a result of these surveys many valuable ore bodies that lie deep down below the earth are economically valuable, or not, to mine.

For all geological services we are setting aside $1,098,000, an increase of $156,000 over the appropriation for the current year. This is covered in vote 1302.

We now come to vote 1303 covering proposed expenditures for the mines inspection branch. The total for this branch is $329,000, a $6,000 increase which can be attributed to salary increases incurred in the reclassification programme. The work of the inspection branch is carried by highly qualified engineers who are responsible for the enforcement of safety regulations and other factors connected with the actual operation of mines. In addition to the headquarters staff in Toronto, the department maintains engineers at seven other points in the province convenient to the mining areas: in southeastern Ontario at Peterborough, and in northern Ontario at Elliot Lake, Cobalt, Matheson, Timmins, Port Arthur and Kenora.

The cable-testing laboratory in the Parliament buildings, which is operated by the inspection branch, provides a vitally important and highly specialized service to the mining industry. In the laboratory, periodic tests required by The Mining Act are carried out at regular intervals to determine the tensile strength and other factors in all cable used for hoisting in mines. Since a fee is charged for each test most of the operating cost is recovered directly from the industry.

I might say, gentlemen, to any of you who have not been down a mine, that a short time ago I was underground 8,100 feet at Wright-Hargreaves. The first drop-down is 3,900 feet on a cable. The next drop is 1,500 feet and the next drop 2,500 feet. So when you are going down that depth and at that speed, you want to know the cable is all right, and that is what this cable-testing laboratory is for. You get down in those depths 8,100 feet underground and you see the walls of the stopes curved from the tremendous pressures at that depth down in the earth. You know that the temperature there is 110 degrees. It is air-conditioned, that is quite true. You see the rock on the sides flaking off, the tie-bolts in the wall with big steel plates about three inches thick and they are curved like a bow from that tremendous pressure coming down 8,100 feet with the tremendous rock above. You want to know that every scientific safety measure is given to those men who are charged every day with the duty of going underground.

For the last few years the department and mines have had a fine safety record. The department has collaborated with the Ontario Mining Association in a research project designed to perfect a method of testing ropes while they are in actual use. The electromagnetic machine which is used for this has now been perfected to the point where it can be used for all except lock-coil rope. Research is continuing and it is expected that by the end of the coming fiscal year, the problem of applying it to lock-coil ropes will also have been solved.

Lock-coil rope is the outside wire surface, and inside is a single steel or metal lining a couple of inches across or so. I am looking at the hon. members from the north who probably sell this up there and know a lot more about it than I do. But that is the last word in safety and we have it now to the point where we think we can test it with this new system, which will add again to the greatly needed safety of these things used in mining.

The department maintains two other laboratories, the operating costs of which are covered under vote 1304. It is estimated that the costs of these two installations will be $183,000 in the coming year. This is an increase of $4,000 which was also brought about by the reclassification programme. The cost of operating the analytical and metallurgical laboratory, formerly known as the provincial assay office, will be $97,000.

I always like that new title, "analytical and metallurgical laboratory"; that is an assay office. It reminds me of the old story, Mr. Chairman, about how in government service they wanted a fellow to ride on a manure spreader; they did not think that term was quite in keeping with the position so they advertised it as a mechanical fertilizer distributor, grade 2. We are getting into the realm of where we have to get these big names for these positions; we cannot get along with the little ones any longer.

This office is located in the tower of the east block. It provides a vital service to prospectors and to exploration and mining companies, in giving an accurate analysis of the mineral content of rock and mineral specimens submitted for analysis. Fees may be charged for this work according to a fixed schedule of charges, but by far the major part of the work is done without fee on the basis of coupons issued upon the recording of claims and the performance of assessment work.

That is handled by Dr. Modele and his staff, and I think that those men are pretty eminent in the field of assaying; and when you get an assay from that place, you know that it is the correct one.

Details of this coupon system are set out in The Mining Act. In addition to the work done for the mining public, the laboratory also performs an important service for the geological branch in examining specimens gathered by the geologists in the course of their field work. The other laboratory covered in vote 1304 is the Timiskaming testing laboratory at Cobalt. The TTL provides an important sampling and assay service to the silver and cobalt mines of the historic mining camp. The cost of operation for the coming year is estimated at $86,000. A large part of this money will be returned to the Treasury by the mining companies in the form of fees for services.

The cost of operating the office of the sulphur fumes arbitrator as covered by vote 1305 will be $24,000 in the coming year.

My friend, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Morningstar), knows the importance of that, as do the men from Sudbury in the looking after sulphur fumes which have, in the past, caused so much illness and disfiguration of top soil and all the rest. Today I think we have done a wonderful job in controlling those things and I think the hon. member will vouch for that.

All of this money will be recovered from the mining companies responsible for the emanation of fumes.

The final item of ordinary expenditure is $354,000, which should be sufficient to operate the mining lands branch for the coming year. This expenditure is covered in vote 1306. The mining lands branch administers The Mining Act, insofar as it pertains to the disposition of Crown lands for mining purposes.

The remaining $1,000,000 in The Department of Mines estimates comes as capital expenditure under vote 1307 for the construction of roads to resources and mining and access roads—I think that is one vote that none of us will ever object to. This appropriation is divided in the ratio of $750,000 to be spent as Ontario's share in the construction of roads to resources and $250,000 for mining and access roads. The cost of the roads to resources is matched by the federal government, and in some cases with individual companies that might be in a position to gain very direct benefit. The mining and access roads programme is entirely a provincial matter, except that here, too, in some cases companies might be asked to share the cost.

Ontario's mining and access roads programme was instituted in 1951. In 1959 the inter-government roads-to-resources programme was introduced. Together, I suggest, these programmes provide one of the most forward-looking enterprises that this province has yet been engaged in. Already a great deal has been accomplished and the fruits of the several projects will be made increasingly available in the years ahead. Altogether, since 1951, about 1,100 miles of these roads have been built under the two programmes or they are now under construction. To date, 62 mining and access roads have been completed. Three roads to resources have been completed and four are under construction.

One new road under the roads to resources programme was started in 1963. It is to run from the end of Highway 108, a short distance north of Elliot Lake, in a northwesterly direction for 38 miles to connect with Highway 129 at Aubrey Falls. When this road is completed there will be a circular route from Highway 11 through Timmins, Chapleau and Elliot Lake to Highway 17.

Mr. Chairman, I have given in only the most general terms, an outline of what my department is doing and what we plan to do in the months and years ahead. We have scaled down our financial requirements to the bare minimum necessary if this work is to be done satisfactorily and be a credit to this province.

I feel that I would be remiss if I did not at this time say something in appreciation of the help and guidance that has always been given to me by the officials of The Department of Mines. With the highly skilled and devoted staff of this department I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that every dollar that this House votes for the department's work will be spent to the best possible advantage.

We have men in the cable-testing and safety department who are not only skilled in the technical trades, but they are men who go underground constantly to protect the safety of miners, men in all walks of life that some of you do not run into perhaps. They are dedicated civil servants, the men whom I appreciate and enjoy working with, and I assure you that our group is one group which spends money as carefully as they possibly can to see if it will not bring the greatest number of benefits. It is our hope that in the future we will be able to produce, in a greater measure, the minerals of this great wealthy province of Ontario, to bring more money into the Treasury of the province to help the people pay for the great humanitarian projects you gentlemen have been talking about in the past few days—education, health and welfare—and to also make Ontario a more wealthy and finer place for all of us to live in.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I did tonight as I always do when the estimates of this department are presented to the House, and that is to listen very attentively to the remarks of the hon. Minister. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that we know the hon. Minister—though he has a humorous side to his nature and he always tries to see the bright side of human existence when things are not always of an optimistic nature—also has another side to his nature in that he takes his duties most seriously and tries to do the job assigned to him in the Cabinet with all the ability and energy that he can.

I would remind the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) that a few weeks ago the hon. Minister of Mines one day announced to the House, before the orders of the day, that the International Nickel Company had hired on, or rehired, 1,800 men. On a subsequent day he made an announcement concerning the contract that had been acquired by a certain industry at the Lakehead. My hon. friend from York South took some objection to the hon. Minister of Mines using the time of the House, and to some extent he felt, sir, that he sought to acquire for himself certain rights as a Minister that were not his, in making these announcements as he did before the orders of the day. Then, of course, Mr. Speaker made his ruling, you will recall, and that became what is known, though it may not appear in Lewis at a subsequent time, as the good news rule.

I remind my hon. friend from York South—but before I go on with that I was reminded myself of the well-known Browning poem. The hon. Minister of Mines is something of a reciter of poetry himself. I was reminded of the very famous poem by Browning about How they brought the good news from Ghent to Aix. You will recall that, Mr. Chairman.

In the words of the poet, I could just see the hon. Minister of Mines on each of those occasions, over in his offices over in the East Block, summoning his assistants to his side and getting ready to go to the House when it met at three o'clock. In the words of the poet I could see it all happening then:

I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris, and he;
I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three;

"Good speed", cried the watch, as the gate bolts undrew;

"Speed", echoed the wall to us galloping through.

An hon. member: Real rousing stuff, is it not?

Mr. Sopha: I must say that my hon. friend from York South should not deny the hon. Minister of Mines the opportunity to bring good news, Mr. Chairman, because we get enough bad news from him. And tonight, particularly, we got the tale of distress from his lips about the plight of the mining industry in this province. In fact one could sum it up in a sentence, that after this government has been in power for 20 years, charged with the stewardship and the responsibility of fostering the mining industry in this province, he comes to us tonight and he wrings his hands, and his voice is laced with anguish, as he tells about the plight of the industry and its declining mineral production.

I regret the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) is not in his seat tonight to hear what I am going to say hereafter, as I always find a ready and sympathetic ear in him.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity): He has heard it before.

Mr. Sopha: No, he has not heard it before. I am going to deal with you a little later. But I am not going to interpolate into my remarks at this stage what I want to say to you.

The hon. Minister of Mines tells us about the state of the industry, since he has to report on the stewardship for the past year. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the mining industry in Canada is sick. Nowhere is it sicker than in the province of Ontario, where the mining industry is dying. I have corroboration of that in the statements made by my hon. friend himself tonight.

The mines in the uranium camp at Elliot Lake are closing one by one. By the end of this year, maybe by midsummer, only one of them will be operating until some time in the 1970's.

Hollinger, in the constituency of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), is closing. Kerr-Addison has announced that it has but five years production left until it closes at Virginia Town. Delnite, another and smaller producer is about to close its doors and lay off its staff.

Half the mineral production of the province, Mr. Chairman, is and has been produced in the Sudbury Basin. From a high point of $983,104,000 in production for 1960, the hon. Minister now comes and reports that in 1963 the production will be $875 million or a little better. In other words, in the space of three years we have lost $100 million of mineral production.

Then, as I trace the closing of mines, important units in our economy, I ask where are the new mines that are going to replace these? Let me put it another way. When INCO laid off 2,200 of its personnel, Falconbridge followed by laying off 500, an even more drastic cut than that of INCO because it was 25 per cent of its work force. INCO only laid off about a tenth. Where were these men to go to find jobs in the mining industry in Ontario? Where could they go and present their credentials and say:

I come from the leading mining companies, if not in Canada, in the whole world, and I am fit and qualified to work in your plant or underground? The story is that there was no place.

Some of them migrated as far as British Columbia. Others went into Manitoba. Some to the Northwest Territories. But nowhere in Ontario could they go and show their work record and seek employment. I know many of them personally, because in this province we have not had a new mineral discovery since Manitouwadge in 1953 or 1954. That was the last major one.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Why do you not find one?

Mr. Sopha: The last major one. This is not a matter of levity, my hon. friend. In Quebec, on the other hand, they have had Chibougamou, Mattagami Lake, a startling and very new find at Senneterre and just recently developments in the Dubuisson township area. But in Ontario, the last major find that we have had, as I say, was at Manitouwadge in 1954.

In that regard, of course, the prospector has become almost extinct. He is a disappearing breed. You do not see the old prospector any more who used to put his grubstake and his packsack on his back and went out into the bush to seek out minerals. He is basic to the expansion of the industry. Exploration, so far as it is done, is done by the exploration departments of large companies. In a nutshell, that is a thumbnail sketch of the state of the mining industry in Ontario.

I ask myself, rhetorically, what does this department do that spends a fantastic sum of money, less than $2.5 million to a government that always equates things in terms of the amount of money it spends? They have an equation, of course, an equation that they think baffles everybody, in that if you spend a lot of money therefore the results are good. That is the way this government always talks of its programme of education. It talks and boasts about the increases they give to it. This government has not much faith or optimism for the future of the mining industry because this is the most insignificant department in the government in terms of the money that is spent.

I ask, what does it do? Does it find new mines? Indeed it does not, and never has. The hon. Minister talks about a geological survey. Every Minister in the five years since I have been here has talked about that geological survey. I think it is going to take something upwards of thirty years to complete it. We cannot wait. Does this department advise on the mining methods? Is it an expert? Does it have on its staff personnel who are qualified to tell people how to mine the ore once it is found? The answer is in the negative, it does not. INCO and Falconbridge know how to mine the ore and I suppose if the hon. Minister wants to know something about the technique of mining, they telephone INCO and Falconbridge and ask them how it is done.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is right, the greatest source in the world.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, they are the experts. This department so far as I can see does two things. It looks after safety, but with INCO and Falconbridge it does not have to bother very much about that because there are not two industries on the continent more conscious of the need for safety of the personnel who work for them. It may be more true in regard to some of the smaller outfits. The other thing it does, is what the hon. Minister did tonight—gives a résumé of the mining industry in the province and looks at their annual reports for support for the contentions and to tell you what is produced, where and by whom. But that, generally speaking, is what the hon. Minister took up the time of the House with tonight in making his report.

I have given some evidence, that I expect to be accepted, of the closing down of mines and the lack of new discoveries. I want to support that further by referring the hon. members of the House to other evidence that is extant, about what mining companies are doing. It is natural to expect that when mining companies accumulate a reserve of capital, they will be bent with great expedition, great energy, in the finding of new sources of ore, and the development of other mining enterprises somewhere. That is not the case, Mr. Chairman. There seems to be a considerable degree of cynicism among the mining companies about locating new ore bodies.

I just listed four of them to show what leading mining companies are doing with their resources, sir. Consolidated Denison, whose contracts, of course, expired in the uranium camp of Elliot Lake, last year or the year before purchased a cement company, Lake Ontario Cement, I believe it is called, which is a very successful operation. Having done that, it purchased a bread company, a bakery. I trust it is not going to mix the bread and the cement. But these are activities and enterprises which are hardly related to mining. Rio Algom, part of the Rio Tinto group, the Rothschild group of Great Britain, used its accumulation of capital at Elliot Lake to purchase Atlas Steel a couple of years ago.

The prize example, of course, that I like to exhibit to buttress the statements I make, is Lorado Mines, that is what it is called, Lorado Uranium Mining Company Limited. It had a contract for the sale of uranium oxide which it assigned to somebody for value and now Lorado is in the Bahamas. It just recently opened up a gambling establishment on Grand Bahama Island. Yesterday we got to the fourth of them, the Little Long Lac group, well known to the hon. Minister and the Avon stockbroker firm of this city. That group apparently is bent upon acquiring the shares of Northern Ontario Natural Gas. In the parlance of the street, it is going into a takeover of the assets and the operations of that company, which apparently, according to its share structure and its distribution, is ripe for the picking at this time.

I note that one of the officials of Northern Ontario Natural Gas let it be known that the amount of money required to buy the necessary amounts of shares to win control was $6 million, which he said was exactly equal to the amount of relief given to these mining companies under The Emergency Gold Mines Assistance Act. So, in other words, these mining companies use a grant meant to foster and develop and encourage mining, to purchase the assets of a company which is not really related to mining at all. There are four companies, four companies that to some extent have gone out of the mining business entirely in this province.

To sum up this part of my remarks, I again submit to you that so far as the mining industry in Ontario is concerned, and perhaps I should exclude the great deposit of ore in the Sudbury Basin, so far as the mining industry is concerned it is dying.

The hon. Minister of Mines, or anyone else for that matter, cannot really treat of the development of the mining industry in this province unless he has in mind the duties of the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) because what the hon. Attorney General is responsible for in the securities commission, that is under his department, is inextricably wound up with the fostering and the development of the mining industry. You cannot picture one without the other. For that matter, whereas I do not underassess the importance of the prospector at all, the finding of the ore body is only the first step and it is a very short step, in the direction of the development of a producing mine. At that stage, once it is found, it is a relatively unimportant step, because having found the ore body, then comes the question of how it will be financed through to its development.

I want at this point to put some other figures on the record to support, so far as one can rely upon statistics, the argument that I now make. I have a ten-year summary of investment in the mining industry supplied by the Toronto Stock Exchange and it shows the amounts of capital raised through the medium of that exchange for the development of the mining industry. The peak year of raising capital through underwritings and share options, and so on, was 1955 when $102 million was raised in the mining field; $84 million was raised in 1956; $53 million in 1957; $14 million in 1961; $30 million in 1962, and $13.5 million in 1963—$13.5 million, remember, compared to $102 million in 1955.

The mining industry, they say, in this province is dying. One of the reasons it is dying is from lack of the transfusion of the life blood of capital into it. I sat in this House and I listened to a very intelligent man—indeed he is that, I do not know whether I ever described him to his face that way when he was here, and now that he is not around here very much, it is safe to talk about him that way—the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay). I listened to him make a speech one day in which he noted, for those who were not aware of it before, that Canadians as a breed, as a nation, as a race of people, are not willing to invest in equity securities. They prefer debt securities; they prefer bonds and debentures and so on. But they do not like to risk their savings or their capital in securities that have a high degree of danger to them. That is the type of security sold on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Look through the list at the shares that sell at 13 cents, 14 cents, and 17 cents, and so on up to $1—shares of mining companies that are in the very early stages of development if they have an ore body at all, and many of them have not. Canadians do not like that type of security. Our mining industry in this country has been financed by American capital coming in, which American capital was in many ways invited into the country by broker dealers down on Bay Street. They sent out large amounts of mailings to attract Americans to invest in stocks that often proved to be ruthless—worthless—both words suit. Shares that proved to be worthless. You could paper your wall with them, having put up good money for them.

Of course Canadians do not like risk. When time came that we were able to pipe that great store of natural gas from the west across the country and we came to the Precambrian Shield in northern Ontario we had to bring it through some of the most rocky and terrible terrain in the world. Did the insurance companies or the trust companies or the banks or the mortgage companies come forward and say "Here is the $80 million"? No, no. None of your big insurance companies or trust companies was willing to risk the money to obtain the equity.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): You have been reading our story of five years ago.

Mr. Sopha: You read mine the day after tomorrow. So they had to go to the government of Canada in a very brave and courageous manner to raise the $80 million. Perhaps the man was pilloried and driven into obscurity. Perhaps—

Mr. MacDonald: Nonsense.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, he was defeated on the hustings, but he got his come-uppance about that $80 million. The pipe line across the northern part of the province will be his memorial and eternal fame. Canadians do not like risky ventures. There it is, the activities, the growth on the Toronto Stock Exchange for the last ten years and the lack of investment in our mining industry.

So what are we going to do about it? I ask the hon. Minister. Yes, after 20 years, he comes here tonight and he says the industry is in bad shape; we do not know what to do with it so we will set up a select committee of the Legislature to look into it. That is his answer. Well, I want to say something, at least one aspect of what I advocate. Long ago, Mr. Chairman, long ago our cousins to the south of the border used up their natural resources. The great iron range, the Mesabi range in the midwest was used up, and now that they have used up their own resources for quite a period of time they have been looking covetously at ours. They are not against coming in here and seducing us—perhaps that is too strong a word for the tender-hearted.

An hon. member: Thanks for looking our way, Elmer.

Mr. Sopha: When I use that gerundive, I would be wise not to look that way.

An hon. member: You are learning quickly, Elmer.

Mr. Sopha: Better to look at the more elderly. The Americans are not averse to coming in here and winsomely taking our resources away. My friend, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), in his reply to the Budget speech referred to it when he said: "You may have a thousand men ripping the iron out of the ground at Atikokan and Steep Rock."

The hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden) made a speech on that. But when that iron ore is put on the boats at the Lakehead to go down below it creates 10,000 jobs at Cleveland and Pittsburgh; 10 jobs for every one. That is the American attitude toward our natural resources. They are into Ontario taking our iron ore and they are into Quebec and Labrador and taking theirs. The idea struck me, Mr. Chairman, that would it not be a wonderful thing at this stage in our history, 1964, for this government, for the hon. Prime Minister of this province, to go to the man who owns Steep Rock, to Cyrus Eaton, and say to him, "Look, Mr. Eaton, you are a Canadian—you were born a Canadian—how would it be if you and I—the government of Ontario and you—built this steel-fabricating complex at the Lakehead, and instead of shipping this ore away by boat to Cleveland and Pittsburgh we brought some of it 50 or 75 or 100 miles from the pits at Steep Rock into the Lakehead and erected a steel mill and fabricated it into those things that this world needs?"

The Lakehead, I say. My hon. friend's riding where they have water and rail transportation; where they have natural gas; where they have a labour force; where they built a fine new dock, did they not—a fine new dock recently—where they have everything. And if, as I perceive, they built this steel mill there, we could work for the next century. Canadians could work for the next century building steel rails alone. And in the next century, in the fabrication of steel rails we would not, I dare say, have anywhere met the needs of those emerging nations that have such pressing transportation problems—China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, many countries of Africa, South America. We could say to Mr. Eaton, "The sale of the products that we make at the Lakehead out of that iron ore which is ours, gives us an advantage over you at Cleveland and Pittsburgh. We can sell it to Red China. You cannot. We are not inhibited against dealing with Communist China in the way our American cousins are."

My idea is not far-fetched. I urge upon the hon. Prime Minister to go to Mr. Eaton or somewhere else, in the way that C. D. Howe used government for the economic expansion of this country. Go to someone and say, "Look, let us start out on a venture such as this. Let us stop this giving-away." That is what we should do: stop this giving away of our natural resources.

I do not mind this giving-away in the forest industries so much, because I know that the forests reproduce themselves. We can now plant trees and provide for a harvest in 25 or 50 or 75 years. But in the mining industry, once a ton of that ore is taken out of the ground it is irreplaceable. If we do not use it now for ourselves to create employment for our people in this province, then we are never going to have the opportunity to do it again, if we just continue the foolishness of giving away natural resources belonging to us.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is the way I see it in regard to that and that is what I advocate. I want to return for a moment before I sit down to this matter of the securities business. I want to say this: that the hon. Attorney General revamped his securities legislation and he reorganized his personnel and he too set up a committee and divided the conscience in his securities commission between the executive arm, called the director—I am going to have a word to say about that when his estimates come up—and the commission and its chairman.

I say that the mining industry and its development is inextricably bound up with what the hon. Attorney General does in the securities commission to encourage investment. And yet, when he set up the committee to look into securities legislation and the working of the securities industry, I do not feel that he had in mind what is needed in this province: to have a look from the point of view of encouraging investment, to increasing the flow of investment into the mineral industry.

On the contrary, one got the impression that he is content to have a view of existing legislation from the legislative and legal point of view, if for no other purpose than to acquaint the new chairman with how it works. I do not see in the terms of reference of that committee any concern about the decline of investment that I refer to in the Toronto Stock Exchange. I see reference to take-over bids and the advantages to corporate insiders and such things, which completely, in my respectful submission, misses the point of what is wrong with our mineral industry in this province.

The hon. Attorney General has not discovered either that the chairmanship of the securities commission ought to be a full-time job. Now the poor chairman goes back and forth from Osgoode Hall where he is a master of the Supreme Court to the part-time job of chairman of the securities commission.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Just across the street.

Mr. Sopha: Oh yes, just across the street. It does not matter if it is across the street or if it is on Eglinton Avenue, the principle remains the same. What this committee ought to be doing, instead of educating the chairman on the securities legislation, is to bring in people who have intimate knowledge of the investment business so far as it pertains to mining and ask them what is wrong with investment in the mining industry.

In other words, yesterday three million shares traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Twenty years ago three million shares traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange and yet our population has probably doubled its size in 20 years. There is no increase in the number of Canadians who come forward and are willing to put their savings into such risky ventures as Harrison Mining or—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Some moose pasture.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, some moose pasture, as it often becomes. Remember that Denison traded at 18 cents once? You could have bought it yesterday for $20. It is more sensible for that committee to determine which characteristics inhibit and discourage people from investing in our mining industry. The professional trader on the floor of the Toronto Stock Exchange—do his activities inhibit investment? Let me give you the example of Tribag Mining. There is a good one that I have looked into a little bit. I do not recommend the purchase of its shares, however. You invest in it at your own risk, but I give you the example of Tribag.

I said there was not a new mineral find. Of course, I meant of major significance. A short while ago a find was discovered in the Batchawana area to the north and west of Sault Ste. Marie, about 50 miles away. Diamond drilling and investigation of that property disclosed that by January of 1964 they had blocked off an ore body of approximately 2.5 million tons of ore of commercial grade, containing base metal. Prior to that time, the stock had gone from somewhere below $1 to a high of $3.05, I think in the fall of 1963.

When these people are looking for the senior financing—and the hon. Minister will recognize that term very readily—for development of this mine, trying to foster public confidence in its shares so they can get an underwriting at a fairly respectable amount for the development of late stages just before production, a brokerage firm on Bay Street—I am not going to give the name of it, it is well known to everybody on the street—is selling the stock short and knocking down its price. But as that stock tends to rise, because the results of the diamond drilling are found to be encouraging, so this brokerage firm is hitting the market with short sales and depressing the price. I have talked to the people of Tribag Mining and they are discouraged. Now they are trying, so they tell me, to get one of the largest Canadian mining companies to show an interest in helping them to the later stages of the development and production of that company, although they prefer to remain independent. Brokerage firms downtown do not care about jobs, really. Many of them do not care whether a mine becomes a producer or not.

Hon. Attorney General, Mr. Wookey and Mr. Anderson, I put it to you that they do not care whether a Canadian is employed or not. That scandalous affair they carried on in Shell Oil—for which unfortunately, to our eternal shame, sir, they are apparently going to escape punishment, for the shameful things they did in the rape of that company and the public.

So it is with Tribag Mining. I say to the hon. Minister, through you, sir, "Phone up the officials of Tribag, invite them down to your office, ask them how they are coming along with the development of their company toward production." That is the type of thing the hon. Attorney General's department should be looking into. I knew when he set up his committee that it could not, because one of the early members of personnel of that committee was the president of the Toronto Stock Exchange himself, and at that point I had no hope for the committee. Subsequently the president of the Toronto Stock Exchange, to his great credit, resigned from it, and he is not numbered in the personnel of it any longer.

What is wrong with the mining industry is wrong with the securities legislation of this government; the two go together. Maybe we should not have a Department of Mines at all, maybe we should not. Maybe we should put it under the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) as a branch of his department and have him go and look for markets, and have him perhaps develop it in the way I suggested for the development of the iron ore industry tonight. Perhaps then we would do away with one department. If it was under the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, and he worked closely with the hon. Attorney General, who has the responsibility to administer the securities legislation, perhaps then we could make a start in determining what is needed to attract the capital savings of our own people into investment and equity securities. That is the first thing. But, alas, the development we need we Canadians cannot finance. There are only 19 million of us, six million of us resident in Ontario. There are too few of us to put aside in the sock or under the mattress or in the banks or in the trust companies, or in the insurance companies, enough money to finance our own development. We have to go elsewhere, sir. We have to go to the United States and get that capital to do it. We have to do it in such a way that our friends abroad in foreign lands will trust us with their money.

We have always been worthy of their trust in the past, we have not let them down, but my final words are words once again of caution: that if we do something with the development of this great industry which is wasting away in this province, is in a state of sharp decline, we must do it from the viewpoint that the day is soon going to be past when we give away those resources of the great Pre-Cambrian Shield which a merciful Providence put there for our use and upon whom a merciful Providence impinged a moral duty to us to develop and to share in a responsible way with people in less fortunate lands. That is our responsibility in this century, Mr. Chairman, that Laurier said belonged to us. It has been, and up to now we have failed to carry out that responsibility, but I am an optimist for the future that we will see the light and get a sense of redirection.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Sudbury has spoken somewhat lengthily and very interestingly on the mining problems in Ontario. In the process of so doing, he has taken a number of the points that I had wished to bring up this evening also, so I will not bore you with a repetition of some of those remarks.

However, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of things in the mining end of our Ontario activities that I think should be of tremendous importance to the hon. members of this House and certainly to the people in the northwestern part and northern part of this province.

I noticed in the final words of the hon.

member for Sudbury he said something to the effect that we depended upon American people to buy stocks in our mining industry in Ontario. I suggest that many years ago this was true, and I would further suggest that through good promotion of mines in this province several years ago, many of those sharpshooting Americans and sharpshooting Canadians succeeded in taking billions of dollars from speculatively inclined American people. I suggest that we soured many of those people by that particular attitude and it is going to take us many decades to win back the confidence of the people of the United States and, by the same token, the confidence of the people of our own country.

The securities commission has undoubtedly over the years performed excellent work in trying to control such activities among certain types of brokers and I am very glad that it has. I am sorry it did not do it much earlier because I have many stock certificates that I would gladly be without.

One of the things that concerns me most particularly, Mr. Chairman, is the same as the hon. Minister mentioned with regard to access roads to mines and to other sources of wealth in the province. Certainly I would suggest that this government has been dragging its feet on provision of funds for access roads and for the construction of reasonably important highway developments that could lead to further and better development of the far northwest. Tied in with the matter of access roads, I suggest that The Department of Lands and Forests, as well as The Department of Highways, has a very keen and close interest, or should have a very keen and close interest in the activities in northwestern Ontario.

Ours is a completely different situation in the north and in the northwest. There is no particular reason, as I see it, why there should be a tie-in of The Department of Lands and Forests, The Department of Mines and The Department of Highways in this portion of the province, but definitely that need exists in the far north and far northwestern portion of the province. I believe that if some thought were given by the Cabinet to this important question, much better and faster progress could be made.

I noticed, Mr. Chairman, in reading back over some of the estimates, that just a few years ago, as many as six years ago as a matter of fact, the vote for the geological branch amounted to some $227,000. This year, 1964, the vote calls for $1,098,000, which is nearly five times the amount of six or seven years ago. I am interested in knowing, with this geological branch and the geophysical activity which the hon. Minister of Mines mentioned earlier, just how much is being added to the work of The Department of Mines in this particular branch of its work. I think the hon. Minister will remember very vividly—perhaps just as vividly or more so than I—many of the prospectors whom we have both known over the past years in northwestern Ontario. Some of them struggled through some pretty rough living over the years, through want, through heat, through cold, and in very many cases, the majority of cases, never did make a strike. But then on the other hand, we know of some, such as the two fellows, Roy Barker and his partner, who made the strike at Manitouwadge and developed the Geco and Wilroy as it is now known. They made a strike, and they made a tremendously important strike financially for themselves. They made an important strike for the company which is in there producing, and they made an important strike for the people of Ontario inasmuch as they have produced wealth which is going to add to the sum total of our wealth in this province. I think that over the years past the people of Ontario owe that old type of prospector a sincere and honest debt of gratitude for the dedicated type of work that he did. He did not, in so many cases, care whether he made a strike or not, it was the life he loved. He was out in the open, he enjoyed it, and he came in with tales that would raise the hair on your head. When he came in with a strike, he came in with a glow that must have been pretty wonderful to see, too. I know it was with Roy and his partner.

But they were only two of many. For the few who succeeded, hundreds failed. But they are the people who developed the northwest. They are the people who developed the north. Cobalt was discovered by prospectors, by the old-type prospector, Manitouwadge as I just mentioned, and our gold mines up in the Red Lake area. A certain amount of scientific acumen came into the matter after the original strikes had been made, but they were mostly in the way of development. I think we need a stronger brand of man, somehow or other in today's picture, to go and repeat that same type of performance, because I am beginning to think from what I see in The Department of Mines at the present time, that we are going to need that old-type prospector back in action again. We are not going to get the action through our department unless these departments begin working together in closer co-operation, more intensely putting their effort to the discovery of mining properties, of silver, copper, gold, iron. Then by using every effort of the government to see that these properties are developed in the proper manner; that the results achieved and the minerals that are taken from them, whether they be precious, semi-precious, or the base metal type, be developed and the proper line used after development for the good of the people of Ontario.

We see our iron ore, which I think was mentioned by the hon. member for Sudbury, taken from this country in ore boats at a very nominal price per ton. We only have to look out the window of this building, or any one of its size any day or night to see the millions of dollars worth of steel that is going by on our roadways. We know that most of that steel is coming back to us, into Canada, at 10 to 12 to 15 times the price of the ore going out of the country.

We need a steel mill at the Lakehead. We were told that private interests will not erect that mill at the present time. They probably have their own reasons, but they propose not to erect that mill. We do know we are going to have some pelletizing activity, which is going to be a good thing for us, both from Steep Rock and from Caland. We hope that the other companies will see fit to get into development, and that the government of Ontario and the federal government will do everything they can to help them, in any way they can, to get into production and so add to the economy of our country, to our gross national product and to our provincial national product.

A question was brought up by the hon. member for Sudbury with regard to towns such as Elliot Lake. We know that the worthy towns of Sudbury, and other towns in northern Ontario, have been mentioned in this connection too. These mines are dying out. Something must be done to save the business investment that has existed in those towns over the past many years; investment by government and the investment by private interests. We have everything in those towns that any town would need to be successful except industry. I believe that the thoughts of this government should be directed to such localities as have a dying out appearance at the present time. There seems little likelihood that strikes will be made in that particular area. The people who have their money invested in these towns, in their own private businesses, should have some reassurance that this government is doing something to protect their interest and help the towns survive. I believe that is not an impossibility.

I believe it can be done if the right thinking is put into effect.

But undoubtedly vastly increased action, definitely accelerated action has got to be taken by this government, and particularly by The Department of Mines in connection with northwestern Ontario, and The Department of Lands and Forests as well. I was really surprised, in looking over the estimates, to find that The Department of Mines estimates were as low as they are. I thought they would be much higher. I would have thought that a greater sum of money would be asked for, and would be provided, by this House for the development of activity in northwestern Ontario.

I think the hon. Minister of Mines is perhaps a little bit shy about asking for more money for this purpose. I do not think he should be, for I think this is where we can invest money to tremendous advantage for the future of this province.

I think the hon. Minister of Mines will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that we have so many mining properties in the northwest and the northern part of the province—I can speak more particularly about the northwestern part of the province—which is pretty well proven as far as gold content is concerned. But I have been told by people who are supposed to know this story that the people who control these properties are not too interested in getting into production at this time because they are not too interested in the price of gold. They are withholding the idea of developing the mines for that very reason. I believe it is true in some cases, and perhaps in more cases than I personally know about. That, however, is a matter that they have to attend to in their own hearts, in their own minds.

But in cases where mines are going to be developed, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that every effort should be made, every effort expended, to be sure that a sound and worthwhile development is brought about. The government should act collectively with the other departments, and with The Department of Mines, to see that roads, access roads and all this sort of thing, are placed in there so that proper development can be brought about. We have had too many cases where too much time has gone by, and nothing is done. Men are then out of work over periods of time, when they could well have been at work in many northwestern parts of the province. It is a great shame that this should happen.

I understood the hon. Minister to say that the number of geophysical surveys this year was going to be increased and that much of the country up through the James Bay area was going to be checked by scientific means. I wish his department luck in that connection this year. I hope that the results of The Department of Mines, actions in northwestern Ontario, during the years 1964 and 1965, will enable the hon. Minister of Mines to come to us next year, if we are all here, with a more reassuring and satisfying report of mining department activities for the then coming year.

To you, the hon. Minister of Mines, I wish you the best of luck. I do hope that every effort will be made to improve things in northwestern Ontario, and all over our mining country, and that you can come back to us next year with a much more glowing report than you did tonight. Thank you, sir.

Mr. R. A. H. Taylor (Timiskaming): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this vote I would first like to congratulate the hon. Minister on his recognition of some of the basic problems of our mining industry. Because the hon. Minister is a northerner himself, he is much more aware than most people of the importance of the mining industry to the development and prosperity of the north, as well as the development and prosperity of our province.

Traditionally it has been the mine seekers who have travelled our unknown rivers and searched through our bush country for new Eldorados. Their successes in the period from 1900 to the 1950's have played a most important part in the development and the prosperity of Ontario as a whole. The mines at Kirkland Lake, Timmins, Sudbury, Red Lake and even, in our sister province, Noranda, have carried the Ontario economy through the depression years of the early '30s. During those years mining developments were responsible, not only for the growth of the north, but for the start of a great number of the secondary industries throughout the rest of the province as well.

These mines have already produced fabulous wealth for our province. To a large extent this wealth has been used by mine shareholders and, in many cases, by the mines themselves in the development of these other industries. The spectacular trading of mining company shares has created the largest stock issues on the continent with respect to shares traded annually. The products from our mineral resources over the years have taken the highest place in our exports to our American neighbours. They have been our greatest provider of American funds. They have, in this way, helped to finance the purchase of capital and consumer goods from the United States required by our other industries, and by our citizens at large.

Our mining industry has, in many respects, been the backbone of our Canadian economy in converting it from a rural economy to a more industrialized one. Our mineral exports have carried the ball continually ever since World War I. In the fiercely competitive race toward industrialization today, we Canadians still have a long way to go. Our mineral production must continue to carry our economy and to carry our exports for a good number of years to come.

Unfortunately, the production of these minerals is a depletion operation. Unlike other products of the soil, our minerals do not reproduce themselves. Once they have been mined and sold they are lost to us completely. Mining is a one-time shot. To keep producing we must continue to discover new ore bodies. To keep operating, our existing mines must continue the intensive exploration of their properties. In so doing, while they have been hampered by the economic limitations of their operations, our Ontario mines have truly been most successful in lengthening their operating lives.

Many of our mines that were thought to have a maximum existence of 20 years or so, have through their internal exploration and development work continued operating successfully more than double that time. It is to be hoped that many of our present mines will also be able to extend their lives in this manner.

Unfortunately, however, in mining, at some point you reach the bottom of the barrel. In a number of our older mines, mines that have carried us over the years, no further exploration or development work is possible. They will have soon completely exhausted their ore reserves that are commercial at present-day values. The Hollinger mine at Timmins has already been referred to and has indicated that it will be closed during the current year. This mine has been in continuous operation over a period of 52 years, as is the case with many other properties; it has fathered through its production, through its exploration and through its resources, many other mines and industries throughout our Dominion.

Most recently it was responsible for the discovery and the development of the iron ore deposits in northeastern Quebec and northern Labrador. Its subsidiary, Labrador Mining and Exploration, now has in many ways outgrown its parent. Today, however, the original ore bodies in Timmins have been exhausted and the Hollinger mine, as such, will soon close down forever, leaving 1,500 miners unemployed. A number of other mines in the Porcupine and Kirkland Lake area are fast approaching this same condition. Their future life, in many cases, is now fairly well established. In the case of Elliot Lake, July 1 of this year appears to be its D-day. "D" stands for a word used by the hon. Minister earlier—"Death Knell".

The effect of these closings on our Canadian economy is going to be substantial. Our reduction in exports and our loss of this source of American funds will adversely affect all our lives. We can no longer continue to sit and hope that some new resources will turn up to take their place. Something must be done now to replace these mines and maintain our mineral exports. Something should have been done 20 years ago to prepare us to meet this situation today.

Mr. Chairman: May I ask the member what item—

Mr. Taylor: Vote 1301.

Mr. Chairman: Yes, 1301. There have been drastic statements made—

Mr. Taylor: I am preparing the background. Last year, and again this year, our hon. Minister referred to the lack of mineral exploration in Ontario. Last year and again this year the hon. Minister referred to the geological mapping of the province as absolutely essential to the mining industry and he indicated that it was still a 30-year job to complete. Even now, this government does not realize the urgency in the whole impact of the present problem. This government still thinks of the mining industry as a continuing source of revenue for the provincial Treasury. It has given no real thought to ploughing a good chunk of this money back. It has done nothing to ensure that this gold and base metal treasure house will always be there to depend on.

However, it is going to take more than the expenditure of money alone to create the growth in prospecting and mine development that we require. It is going to take a change—

Mr. Chairman: Order. At the beginning of the session today, I made a ruling that a general comment would be allowed by each of the parties and that we would confine our remarks after that to the items under that vote. Presently, the general remarks have been made and, therefore, I will have to abide by the ruling I made the first part of the—

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, if we could determine from our hon. friend if he has nearly concluded the remarks he was going to make in a general way?

Mr. Taylor: That is right.

Mr. Oliver: I think we could wind it up in a few moments and then we will move on to something else.

Mr. Chairman: You may continue.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you. It is going to take a change in climate in The Ontario Department of Mines itself. This body should not be thinking in terms of restrictions, it should be thinking in terms of encouragement. It should be acting positively to assist and stimulate exploration. It is factual that while exploration is on the wane in Ontario, it has increased in some of our other provinces. Since most mining companies and individual prospectors prefer to operate in Quebec and British Columbia, it appears likely that fewer obstacles are placed in their way by the provincial governments concerned, and more encouragement is given to them than they receive in Ontario.

There are still certain large areas in our province with no mineralization equal to those being investigated elsewhere. Those other provinces appear to be more aware of the long-run benefits that will accrue from such a policy. They seem to have a much greater appreciation of the importance of the mining industry to the rest of our economy.

The hon. Minister has indicated that certain changes are presently contemplated in connection with the required work on claims. They appear to favour earlier development of unpatented claims. This will certainly be a move in the right direction. There is still, however, the problem of patented claims. The dormancy of many of these for many years has been an important deterrent to the development of many favourably known areas. From the standpoint of the province, the retention of these claims by individuals, by companies and even by states with little or no development work being done is most unsatisfactory. Some means should be found to reactivate such prospects.

The centralization of all information concerning the work done on claims throughout the province would also be most helpful. This would replace the present haphazard system of having such information available by region through the regional geologists. This would parallel the system presently being used in Quebec, which has proved most helpful to mine developers.

Some steps should be taken to encourage more students to enroll as mining engineers or geologists in the universities of our province. Such is the limited interest in these professions at the present time that only two students will graduate from the University of Toronto this spring as mining engineers and only three geologists. It is going to be most difficult for The Department of Mines to fill its own requirements for manpower this year, let alone meet the needs of an expanding mining exploration programme for the province. Possibly action on the part of the department in setting up additional scholarships or other incentives might help correct this situation.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Taylor: In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like again to repeat to the hon. Minister and his department, the importance of readjusting their budget to meet the need for a resurgence of mining development in our province. The costs would be small in comparison to the benefits that would accrue.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, under what vote would I ask questions about mining and provincial parks?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Troy: I am glad to see the hon. Provincial Treasurer has seen the light and is letting us out early.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, we will continue with the estimates of The Department of Mines in the morning.

Hon. Mr. Allan moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1964

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today in the east gallery, students from Maryvale Public School, Scarborough, and in the west gallery, students from Bendale Vocational School, Scarborough.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. members that next Sunday, March 1, is St. David's Day. This is the day which the Welsh people and all those who are interested in their affairs, have set aside to honour their patron saint, St. David. It is usual in this House for some of the members to say a few words on that day. In the past we have heard remarks from such members as the former member for Oshawa, Mr. Thomas, who was born in Wales. He and I would always join together on St. David's Day to say a few words about the Welsh people.

I think we all know of the great contribution which the Welsh have made to our own history, as well as to other Commonwealth countries and, for that matter, the world. So I would ask you this Sunday to join with me in a toast to the Welsh people and particularly their patron saint, St. David.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table a letter that has been put on the desk of every hon. member. This is a letter addressed to me from the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada concerning pensions.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It sort of made a monkey out of the hon. Prime Minister's position.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will comment upon it in due course, Mr. Speaker. Before the orders of the day, I think quite a few of the hon. members know that Godfrey Hudson in the press gallery is going to undergo a serious operation, so I thought we might all join together and wish him well in this ordeal he will go through on Monday.

Clerk of the House: Fortieth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 1301:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I did not realize last night when I presented that question of mining in provincial parks that it would be such a stopper that the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) would have to adjourn the House. I do not know if in the meantime they have had a Cabinet meeting to decide that question, because I know it is a very important one.

But before I ask the question, I would like to call to the attention of the House that one of the fine old men in the mining industry, Mr. Harry Miller of Silver Miller Mines died. He was one of the great northerners—a prospector himself throughout his life—and even as late as in his eightieth year he was the first one to go down when the mine was reopened. I am sure I speak the minds of all who have anything to do with the mining industry and anybody in northern Ontario, probably throughout this province, that we sympathize with his family in their bereavement.

Now the question I asked was about mining in provincial parks, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Ward-robe) will recall that when the northeastern chambers of commerce met with the Cabinet last May, one of the paragraphs in their brief had to do with mining in provincial parks. At that time, the hon. Minister said to the chambers of commerce—if I can quote him correctly—“We are with you 100 per cent”. There was considerable discussion at that time and Mr. Beatty, I believe, who was on a special mining committee, was there at the time and he also made some comments. As the hon. Minister very well knows, the hunters and anglers association is very firm in its stand in regard to mining in provincial parks. I wonder if the hon. Minister would tell us now if there is anything further in this regard, because at that time he said that some report would be made, I believe, because certain negotiations were going on.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): I want to thank the hon. member for Nipissing for asking that question, Mr. Chairman, because you will remember that my own position was made very disagreeable a short time ago when I mentioned something about mining in parks in the future. The policy of this government is that there will be no mining allowed in parks and that directive has been given to me and I will abide by it in the future.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is spoken like a bad boy.

Mr. Troy: I am glad the hon. Minister is not going to kick over the traces in that regard. In regard to the work that is going on in the river valley area, can the hon. Minister give the House any information about the diamond drilling and what the prospects are up in that section?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I would reply to the hon. member that I do not know where the river valley is, and as far as I know, there is nothing going on there.

Mr. Troy: I did not get the last; we will have to have a couplet on that one. River valley, Mr. Chairman, is in the—I will not say the great riding of Nipissing—if I just say the riding of Nipissing that is enough. It is about 25 miles northwest of the town of Sturgeon Falls. I believe the vein is a continuation of the vein that cuts across from the Sudbury Basin and then continues north-eastward. I have read reports that diamond drilling has been carried on and they have high hopes. I just wondered if the department had any information.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I am told that we have no information on it whatever.

Mr. Troy: Then does the hon. Minister have any information on any prospect of the development of iron mines in the vicinity of Timagami? I believe it is the Cleveland Cutts people who have an interest there. I know the hon. Minister was quite helpful in getting the Adams mine in operation. Is there any possibility of further development in the Timagami area?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: There is a lot of activity there. There are no indications at the moment. There are so many places where activity is going on but the names the hon. member gives me are not all known to me. There is a lot of drilling and prospecting going on up in that area but we have no indications yet that there will be anything that will be of value.

Mr. Troy: What about the diamonds in James Bay?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I would like to report on that—how much money did they spend? —$50,000 roughly was spent there in the search for diamonds. They have now gone south of our country to the United States. They are looking there because, as I told you, this whole diamond-bearing geology comes from the west coast of Russia right through our country and down into Wisconsin. Now in Wisconsin they may have found diamonds. They have not found any up to now in our north but they have not given it up altogether. Some of the land they have turned back to us, some of it they have kept. So there is still interest in the area of our north.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Are you prospecting in Russia?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: No, but they found diamonds there. I can get him a report on that if the hon. member is interested.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two items that I wanted to raise. I must say I find a little difficulty in deciding which estimate they most appropriately should come under but I think the main office is as good as any. The first one is with reference to mining revenue and if I may take as my jump-off point, the comment from the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Taylor) when he said that the government's only interest was to get revenue from the mines. This observation, I submit, Mr. Chairman, is so far from the truth that it is a bit laughable. In fact, this is the point I want to make. I think the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) made a pretty good case last night in outlining the decline of the mining industry in the province of Ontario; the refusal of the companies to really carry on a vigorous programme of expansion; they are far more interested in getting out and investing their profits and their reserves in other lines of business; the limited amount of money that is being raised through the stock exchange. This government, in characteristic fashion when faced with an emergency, has set up a committee to look into the whole matter.

However, it is still, I think, rather significant to remind ourselves that for the last few years the total amount of wealth produced through the mining industry has been consistently between the $900 million and $1 billion figure. Indeed, the figure given by the hon. Provincial Treasurer this year is $902 million of wealth produced.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the money we got—we who own the resources and in effect rent them to the corporations who exploit it; this is an old theme of mine in this House—but the money we got in 1962-63 was $15.1 million. In 1963-64 it was $11.3 million. The forecast for the coming year 1964-65 is $10.2 million, so that we, the people who own the resources, have been receiving a declining amount, which is now down in the range of $10 million, for the use of resources in which wealth in excess of $900 million is being produced.

If that is an excessive burden on the mining industry then the hon. member for Timiskaming and I will have to have a chat on what is a fair figure. I submit to you, we are not getting our just share.

I concede that making a general statement like this misses some of the difficulties in the problem. The difficulty in the mining industry is that there are two categories of companies, broadly speaking. You have struggling companies that are marginal companies; they are either on the way up or on the way out. There are other companies like International Nickel that are making something like $90 million to $100 million in profit, after taxes. Yet their contribution in royalties is so small that we get from their contribution, plus all other mines, only $10 million. They in turn have $90 million to $100 million, after taxes.

If the hon. Provincial Treasurer is looking for an appropriate place, on the basis of justice, to raise a bit more revenue, I submit it is in this area.

The second point I want to raise, Mr. Chairman—and this begins to overlap, I fear, into another government department, as is often the case—concerns The Department of Economics and Development.

I was very interested, although very saddened, a few months ago in a visit to Atikokan, to get an up-to-date picture on what is happening in that town. I suppose, apart from Elliot Lake, it is one of the saddest places in Ontario. I say that because I remember going into Atikokan a few years ago when the whole place was just breathing optimism and enthusiasm. In the town hall they had maps on the drawing board for building a town of 25,000 people. It had reached 7,000 or 8,000. Now it is down to something less than 6,000, if I am correct in the latest figure. You can walk along the main street and you will find business after business closed up, vacant lot after vacant lot not being developed. When you get into the economics of the area you discover that Steep Rock, whose production in years gone by has been in the range of 2.5 million to three million tons—I think one year when there was a strike in the United States it was higher—has a capacity of producing something like four million to five million tons, but last year, for the first time in quite some years, its production dropped to less than one million tons.

The question is, why is this taking place? When one talked to the people in Steep Rock their reply was that their markets were declining. In fact, they had a very strong protest. I have looked into that since and the picture is not quite as black and white as they put it. Their argument was, why should we find difficulty in marketing our product in the province of Ontario when many of the companies like Stelco and Dofasco and even Algoma are importing iron from the United States. This is where I begin to get over the boundary into The Department of Economics and Development because we have had some hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions, spent in government funds on a trade crusade and a "Buy Canadian" and "Buy Ontario" drive—to be fair with them, it is usually "Buy Canadian."

Here you have a town declining—declining because it cannot sell a Canadian product, iron ore, to Canadian industry that is importing it from the United States. It is drifting into a ghost-town position. If I may just pursue the complications that I have discovered in this situation, because I looked into it since my visit—one is that the reason why Stelco and Dofasco are importing a considerable amount of iron ore is, as is so often the case, they have captive mines in the United States. In other words, the mines in the United States are controlled or owned by corporations in which these Canadian companies have some interest and so they are importing from their own mines, so to speak. But this only complicates the problem and I think the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) has got to take a look at it.

My information also is that the latest import figures, for example, to Canada, were something like $60 million of iron, representing approximately five million tons. I understand that by next year these Canadian companies are going to be getting more of their products from the Labrador sources of iron ore where a great amount is now being produced, much of it for export to the United States. But while this explains the situation to some extent, the basic fact still remains that a Canadian mining town with all these great resources, with a greater capacity to produce, is dwindling into a ghost town while the great steel mills of the province of Ontario are importing a considerable amount of iron ore. I think that is one part of the problem.

I think the other part of the problem—and here I do appear to be a bit ungracious to my hosts at Steep Rock when I was there—is that I am now satisfied that the view expressed by a fair number of people in Atikokan and outside is that part of the problem rests with Steep Rock and the management. For example, I understand that management is now actively considering the establishment of a pelletizing plant. When the situation was explained to me on my last visit to Atikokan as to why it was not getting into the market, I learned something that was a little bit of a shock to me. I had been led to believe that the iron ore in this deposit up in Atikokan was one of the richest iron ores in the world. I am now told that relatively speaking it is really a medium grade. Because they were not pelletizing it, it was not getting into the market in competition with other companies that maybe had a lower grade of ore but were pelletizing it and upgrading it so that they were getting into the market. So the question arises as to why Steep Rock has taken so long to face up to the necessity of establishing a pelletizing plant.

It seems to me that this question is an even more valid one to ask when one takes note of the fact that when they rented—or whatever was the financial arrangement they made with the Caland interests—and they moved in and established a pelletizing plant almost from the outset. So they apparently recognized the need, operating on essentially the same ore body. But Steep Rock is only now—according to rumour—considering the establishment of a pelletizing plant, which I trust will get it back to a greater degree into the Canadian market.

In that connection, I also draw to the attention of the House that Steep Rock's position is not financially one that would make it impossible. I am interested in noting the latest figures, for example. It has $4.5 million net earnings, it is up $1 million over the previous year, and the net profits per share were 52 cents this year as compared with 43 cents last year, so that the financial position of the company is not one that is getting worse. The intriguing thing is that while the production has been going down, while the town of Atikokan has been suffering all of these far-reaching consequences, the financial position of the company is even better than it was a year ago. So it all adds up to a situation in which one finds difficulty in coming to any other conclusion but that there has been some lack of—what shall I call it?—imagination, initiative, aggressiveness, on the part of the Steep Rock Company in keeping up with market needs. They are, to some degree, the creator of their own problems, their own difficulties at the present time.

Now, I raised this question, and perhaps having raised it we can leave it until the hon. Minister of Economics and Development presents his estimates. I have always been a bit puzzled as to exactly in what way the initiative lies with this government in its relationship to private industry when they become persuaded that private industry is not being as vigorous and active as it should be in developing the markets.

I could give you, if I had taken the time, many a quotation from the hon. Minister's predecessor in which he rather chastised management for being willing to sit on their fannies instead of getting out and being vigorous in the search for markets. Indeed, his explanation in regard to the Ontario Development Agency was that if a company came to them for a loan, what they did was to rather thoroughly examine the management of this company. And sometimes they came to the conclusion that they could give advice to the company. They sometimes could get out of their difficulties with the advice, and the loan was not necessary at all.

If you have a situation in which a town, like Atikokan, is declining and the community as a whole is suffering, the province too is suffering because a company, as it now appears, has not been active and vigorous enough in developing its markets—in marketing a product, which it should be able to get into the markets of today—then does this government play any role, either through The Department of Mines or The Department of Economics and Development, in sort of quietly sitting down with the company? No publicity. Just quietly sitting down and saying: Look, if Caland has put in a pelletizer because they feel this is necessary to get into the markets, why aren't you doing it? Why didn't you do it five years ago? Then you would not have had production dwindling from 2.5 million to less than a million. I do not know whether the hon. Minister feels that he or his hon. colleague can comment on that. I recognize it gets into a rather delicate area of relationships with established industry, but if he has any comment I look forward with some degree of anticipation to hearing it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Mr. Chairman, I have found, in my tenure as Minister of Mines, that it is strange how much you have to know before you know how little you know. This is a big field. We do co-operate with business and constantly we are in consultation with some of the mines about markets, and all the other things pertaining to them.

In mentioning Steep Rock, they have a problem there. It is hematite ore, and it is not easily upgraded. They have worked out the problem as well as Caland has and they are both planning to pelletize these ores, as you know. At Caland they are working on pelletizing installations now, and Steep Rock, I hope, will be before long. It will mean an expenditure of probably $30 million in that area.

And in speaking of Atikokan and its position, I was told by the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Noden) the other day—he knows every grain of dust that flies around the streets there, and everybody and every baby that is born, and so on. He is constantly interested in that area and he tells me that from 1945 to 1962 the salaries paid out there to employees approximated $63 million. The tons of ore mined were 21 million. The dividends paid were one-tenth of one per cent, or approximately $1 million, which shows that they are not giving all their profits to the shareholders. And with that I agree. The population of Atikokan is about 6,500. It has been fairly static. You will see from those figures that labour has received most of the money, as is always expected.

There were several things mentioned last night, if I might mention them while I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman. The first one was from the hon. member for Sudbury. He mentioned that there had not been any new mines discovered in this province for years. Recently, within the last two or three years, Nickel Mining and Smelting has gotten into production in the far western end of the province near the Manitoba boundary. Jones and Laughlin, producing a million tons of iron a year, will be in production, we hope, by November of this year. The Caland ores, about which I was telling you, are building their pelletizing plant now. And we have Glenlake Silver up in the Cobalt area, which is a new producer. We have another couple there that might be producing before the year is out. We have Cam Kotia Copper, not far from there. And we have Sifto Salt at Goderich. These are all new producers that have come in in the last couple of years.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is a rather wild statement to say that we have not had any new mines for years.

I also wanted to mention that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman) spoke about a point that is very close to my heart. That is the old-time prospector being neglected. It is true that he is having a tough time, and I think the big reason is that most of the outcroppings of rock in this province have been prospected. An awful lot of it anyway, and that is why we have to put the stress on magnetometer surveys, geophysical surveys and seismic work and the technical side of prospecting, because the favourable geology is now buried deep beneath the surface of the ground. For a man with a pick and shovel to go out and get at it is almost an impossible situation. But after these anomalies are found, then the big companies—and we try to promote this—are picking up these prospectors and giving them a break, too. We hope that that continues. I know a lot of these men personally and we know how they have worked to try to keep in business.

The hon. member for Timiskaming, sir, who spoke so well last night, will be glad to know that there is a very heavy staking rush on at the present time in the Porcupine district. There have been more than 500 claims reported in the last few days. We find that many of the other areas are being prospected, with some success, and we hope that we will have new properties to announce before too long.

In my opening remarks, I was trying to give you a factual description of what is happening. I did not want to gild the lily in any way because I do not think it does any of us any good.

It was mentioned about geological surveys not being too successful. I would just like to mention that Geco was originally discovered through geological surveys. The anomalies shown were followed up by ground prospecting. As was mentioned, Mr. Barker, Mr. Dewidowitch and Mr. Forster were the lucky boys who got that one.

Elliott Lake was also the result of geological surveys. So you can see that that is a form of prospecting that has been highly successful, to date, in this province.

I will try to answer questions as I go along. We will try to remember the things that have been asked. Somebody mentioned about our jet smelting. We have that project working very successfully, we believe, at the research institute. I think that we might have some breakthrough there before this year is over. If that is so, it will solve a lot of our problems. The hon. member for Fort William mentioned the possibility of a steel mill up in that area. Well, that is a little too far in the distant future. But I do think that if this jet smelting is successful, it may develop in time to perhaps a pig iron industry up there where the bars will be shipped overseas. It might produce the same thing in other areas in the province.

These things are all problematical. Nobody can say with certainty what is going to happen. All I do believe is that our great uranium field at Elliot Lake will come into its own, I hope, before too many years. I would say probably four to six, but that the task of a market for our uranium is a dark part of our picture. To compensate, of course, for the great Sudbury rim, somebody said, "My friend from Sudbury has brought a lot of light and satisfaction," but I hope that in other areas we will have something optimistic to report before this year is out.

Now if there are any further questions, I would be very glad to answer them if I can.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I did not say last night that which the hon. Minister attributes to me. The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) was not here last night, and I would not want him to think that I said the things the hon. Minister now this morning says that I did, paraphrasing my remarks as he does.

Sir, I do not know where the hon. Prime Minister was last night. That is his own business. He might have been at the production of Hamlet—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): That is where I was.

Mr. Sopha: —but whether he was or not, if he were here, the atmosphere would have been the same because Hamlet is a very depressing play. So was the speech of the hon. Minister about the state of the mining industry.

I did not say that new companies are not coming into production. Of course they are. I agree that those that the hon. Minister summarized this morning are coming into production.

I said that there has not been a major new mineral find in Ontario since Manitowadge in 1954 and I stand by the statement. There has not been. These companies the hon. Minister refers to are coming into production in areas that have long been established as areas which have ore bodies. Glenlake, in my old home town in Cobalt, which was a silver camp long before I was born—in fact when I was still on the drawing boards—was a producing silver camp. Cam Kotia is in another area that is an old mining producing camp.

Now if the hon. Minister can get his officials to find in their researches a new area in Ontario that has a significant ore body, then I will eat my words. I referred to the possibility of one, the Batchawana area which is some 50 miles north and west of Sault Ste. Marie. It has not yet proved to be a major new find. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Wishart) can keep us informed about developments at Batchawana. No one need fear, I am not going to repeat the things I said last night. But this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail has a very interesting item in it, which is an excerpt from a speech made by John R. Bradfield, president of Noranda Mines Limited. He was speaking to a mining group in British Columbia. Mr. Bradfield says this:

I listened recently to a Cabinet Minister from another province advocate that the federal government should have nothing to do with the development of natural resources, that this field belongs exclusively to the provinces. Yet his own province seems to do more to hinder mineral resource development than to encourage it.

Now, let me interpolate at this point. I hope he is not referring to our hon. Minister of Mines. Well, the hon. Minister nods.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, if I might answer that. Mr. Bradfield is a great personal friend of mine. Not more than a month ago, being worried about our province, I asked him if we were doing everything we possibly could do to assist in mining, and he said, "Mr. Wardrope, Ontario is ace high." Do you wish to phone him? You phone him and ask him. I would not even make a suggestion of what province he is talking about, but you can take it for granted that Ontario is pretty high in his book.

Mr. Sopha: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Singer: Would he give you a letter saying that?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I think he would if I asked him.

Mr. Sopha: I am glad to hear that. Really, truly, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that he does not mean our hon. Minister of Mines.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I am talking about Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: He continues:

Mind you, that province's financial statements show that it spends large sums in connection with mining and the complaint is made that only comparably small mining duties are collected. Two obvious items are overlooked. First, that in addition to paying mining duties, the industry pays substantial provincial corporation taxes as well as federal corporate income taxes of which the provinces receive a share. The second factor, not quite so obvious, is that much of the money reportedly spent on behalf of the mining industry is not spent at the request of, or after consultation with, the industry and a great deal of this could well be dispensed with.

Such expenditures, purportedly on behalf of the industry, provide the excuse that some provinces use for high mining duties. Instead of encouraging the development of their mineral resources, the reverse is true and many mining companies like ourselves are spending increasingly large amounts on exploration where the economic climate is favourable, often in foreign countries. Noranda has, in the last year or so, embarked on exploration programmes in the United States, Australia and Europe, and many other Canadian companies are becoming active in foreign fields. This trend will become more pronounced unless all our provincial governments take the time to analyze the facts and adopt a positive rather than a negative attitude in regard to the development of our resources in a competitive world.

Now it is that last part of Mr. Bradfield's statement that is significant. He refers to his own company being in the United States. Well, they have a copper mine in Arizona under the name of Iso. They have a large concession in Australia. They are extremely active in Quebec and, in fact, in respect to Noranda, I do not know that Noranda has anything going for it in Ontario at all except its controlling interest in Geco and Manitowadge through the Mining Corporation of Canada Limited. I have never noted that Noranda is particularly active in the province of Ontario.

International Nickel, on the other hand, has large concessions in Africa, I believe they have them in Australia and certainly they are doing a lot of exploration and development in Guatemala. Falconbridge has concessions in the Dominican Republic as well as being in a syndicate to prospect for minerals in the Northwest Territories where apparently a significant find has been made.

I said last night that the prospector is a disappearing breed and the hon. Minister has referred to that, and my hon. friend from Fort William has referred to that also, in his remarks. I am wondering why these large companies, if they are to have a monopoly of the exploration for new finds—and it is new finds in which I am particularly interested, to replace those companies like the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) faces in his constituency, where a large producer like Hollinger is closing down.

We have to replenish in Ontario our stores of mineral wealth. Why is it, Mr. Minister, that these companies do not increase their activities in our province? Why do they go so far away as Australia and the Northwest Territories to carry on mining exploration? Now, I could not stand here and say that I agree with Mr. Bradfield on two points, because he is a very fine man. He would allow me the right to disagree with him and I do want the opportunity to disagree with him on two scores in his remarks. I do not for a moment believe that the federal government should have anything to do with the development of our natural resources. They belong to the several provinces and have always historically been under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, with the significant exception of uranium, which of course is connected in some way with national defence and therefore—without going into it, sir—it came under the jurisdiction of the federal government. The other one is that I do not really agree that the mining duties of our province—and that is the only one I can speak of—are really too high. The resources, after all, belong to the people, and especially is that so in connection with a depleting resource such as a mineral ore body.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sopha: I have always believed that. I have always believed that, but I felt that—

Mr. MacDonald: Your former leader did not.

Mr. Sopha: Well I am not responsible for the former leader. I have a responsibility to this very good one we have now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald: I like that interesting emphasis.

Mr. Sopha: Well, you can look into the analysis of my remarks all you want.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): And get out of it what you—

Mr. Sopha: Yes—what you can. But I want to add that I always felt that more of the taxes ought to come back to my community, and I made some remarks about that yesterday. So before we close these estimates, Mr. Chairman, really we should hear from the hon. Minister what his department is going to do to increase exploration for new mineral ore bodies besides setting up a select committee. I may be deprived of the benefits of sitting on that committee.

Mr. Chairman, my hon. leader here has not yet decided who the personnel are to be, but I will, as winsomely as I can, try to attract his favour so that perhaps I may go on that committee, but I do not know. He may keep me in some doubt and trepidation until the very last minute. He may. And I am glad that he is here to hear these remarks this morning. But aside from that lightness, the obligation on the hon. Minister and upon this department is to give us some grounds for encouragement in the hope that we may see an increase next year or the year after rather than the very depressing decrease that we have been presented with in this stage of the mineral industry in Ontario.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I think that I have been getting a little bit uncomfortable here listening to various people speak about Elliot Lake. I think at this point it is necessary that one or two things on this main vote be written into the record, and that the hon. members here be advised of a couple of things we have not heard of in this glowing estimate.

First of all, before I mention them, I would just like to congratulate the hon. Minister of Mines. It takes a real good man to put an optimistic view on a pessimistic estimate like this. It also takes a real good man to produce the idea that the mining production is away down and therefore administrative costs must be away up, and get away with that. Beyond that I want to say a couple of things about Elliot Lake and the uranium industry. I want to mention, for instance, that there is a lack of detail as to the effect of Elliot Lake's loss of production on the residents, on the industrial and commercial property owners and installations, the farmers who have been engaged in these areas in producing foodstuffs for these people, and in a general way the deplorable situation that exists there. I do not think that this estimate is the place for me to go into this in any great detail and I will leave it at that. I just want to mention that it is possibly something that would colour the optimistic nature of the remarks that have been presented so far.

There is one important thing, though. I noted that the hon. Minister of Mines mentioned something about the year 1966 and what might or could happen to the production or the sale of uranium in something like 1966. I think he was thinking—he mentioned 1970, but he did mention 1966. This has not been mentioned—I do not know why it has not been mentioned—but I think it should be written into the record that by the first of July, 1964, I am sure the production figures that we have in these estimates will include the fact that there will be one whole year's production of all existing mines in Elliot Lake sitting away up in the air that has not been sold, and that we have no idea where we are going to sell. I wonder if this adds to the optimistic picture that we have been hearing about and I wonder if the hon. Minister would like to comment on it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: I want to thank the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin for his remarks, Mr. Chairman, because I know that his heart grieves, probably more than anybody else, being resident in that area. He knows the tremendous impact there is on a community which faces the situation of its plants going out of operation. My optimism is based on men that I have talked to recently. I hate to mention names, but they are the top men in the industry and they are optimistic.

I was speaking to the hon. member representing Hydro in this House (Mr. Boyer) and he tells me that one plant—not a large plant—would use about 125 tons of uranium a year if these hydro power plants decide to use uranium. The total production of Elliot Lake is about 6,100 tons a year, I think, or 6,150. You can realize that it would not need many industrial plants using uranium for power or industrial installations before there would be a demand for uranium.

That is what these men are basing their thinking on and they believe there will be some resurgence in the sale of uranium by 1966. They are not sure of that, but they believe that by 1970 not only will there be a tremendous market for it but they feel that the price may go as far as doubling. That is the information I get. I cannot tell you from where, but it is given in very high places. Whether it will come about or not I do not know any more than you do, but it gives great hope that Elliot Lake is not doomed to extinction by any means. We are very fortunate to have that largest body of uranium in the world right at our door.

To mention what the hon. member for Sudbury said about several items: Mr. Bradfield, who is a very close friend of mine, sits in constantly with members of our department. He sits in constantly with the Canadian Institute of Mining, which embodies the best brains we know of in mining, and they keep us advised of these markets in foreign countries. They are expanding their operations but, believe me, they are not neglecting Canada. Many of these exploration units that are out are under some name that has no connection on paper with the company that sends them out. Many of these big companies are putting up the money to send these exploration companies into the field and it always is a matter of pride and satisfaction to me to know that our Canadian companies are knowledgeable and big enough to take the lead in other parts of the world, outside of Ontario and the other provinces.

We in the mining industry—I say we, the men in the mining industry in this country—are world organizations. They are known in many countries as well as they are in Canada and we are part, in fact we are the parent, of a great world-wide organization in mining. So I am not at all concerned about Mr. Bradfield talking about the countries that they are in because I do know that they are not neglecting Canada or Ontario. Many of the things that will develop in the future will prove that.

As far as asking about our geological branch and what it is doing, in 1964 the programme for field work is this: There will be 25 geological field parties of the geological branch of our department working throughout Ontario during the summer of 1964—this represents an increase of about 25 per cent in the number of full-size field parties over 1963; seven resident geologists will be investigating new developments in their districts; ten of the field parties will be located in northwestern Ontario, 11 in northeastern Ontario and four in southern Ontario. Among the new projects undertaken in northern Ontario are a detailed study of the Steep Rock iron range at Atikokan; mapping of the Batchawana copper discoveries north of Sault Ste. Marie; examination of unmapped country adjacent to the north range of the Sudbury Basin, or the rim, and a detailed study of the south Lorraine silver area.

In southern Ontario, attention has centred mainly on industrial minerals and glacial geology. Over 80 graduates and undergraduate students, mostly from Ontario universities, have been engaged as assistants in the survey parties. Nineteen departmental staff geologists and six other fully qualified specialists are leaders of the party. I have a lot of names of party leaders here but I do not think that we have time or that hon. members would be interested in me giving all their names. But I will say that in addition to these projects, the resident geologists will investigate new development of mineral resources in their respective districts.

That would indicate to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the House, that our department is not lying down on the job. We are very concerned about the drop in production and we are doing everything humanly possible to see that it is reversed and passes our highest expectations during the coming years.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, on the vote on geology survey, I cannot say—although many of us in the riding of Dovercourt would want to find diamonds—that there is much hope. But there is much mining going on in the riding of Dovercourt—I would say—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You have the Minister of Finance there.

Mr. Thompson: —there is certainly the sub-way and we look on that almost as much as you might look on a diamond field. I have been interested in the remarks on geology and I was also interested in the remarks on Russia previously. I want to relate those two in connection with geology research because although it may surprise you that in my own small, modest office in Dovercourt, I have had people come who are surveyors and who move up into the great north country.

I had one such man who described to me that he had a method by which he could sense the minerals under the earth. This man had spent most of his life in the north. He had spent years, I think, in drawing charts and showing different approaches in studying mining, and showing different approaches by which he would—this is under research and under geology—and the thing that interests me is that he had his principle on the basis of something like a water diviner. He would put certain metals in his mouth and hold his hands out, and if he quivered or something, then he knew there was gold and such under the ground.

Now I was concerned whether he should see a psychiatrist or the hon. Minister of Mines.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Same thing.

Mr. Thompson: But let me say this, that what interests me is that a mining company was very interested in talking to him. I am quite sure that if we think back to the great inventions that have taken place at the stage where these people were working on them, probably people today would have had them see a psychiatrist.

Now, without suggesting that this eminent scientist is in any way in need of seeing a psychiatrist, I am referring to Dr. Tusó Wilson. I know of course that the hon. Minister is up to date on his research and frankly I felt when you referred to Russia and your interest in diamonds, sir, that it is because of these theories, and I am quite serious on this because I spent some time reading about Dr. Tusó Wilson. I cannot completely understand the theory; I am sure the hon. Minister can but I could elaborate a little bit on it. It seems to me that the earth, according to him, was all joined at one point. Something like a cauldron took place which it had split apart. If you get diamonds on the west coast of Africa, you may find them on the east coast of America. Would the hon. Minister comment on this?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, I am very pleased that all these questions that are thrown at me are so easily answered. You know it reminds me of the story of the fellow who was always boasting about the fact that he rode to university on a load of fertilizer; talking about being a farmer and so on. And some person in later years listening to him talk said that, as he listened to his speeches, he thought there must be a significance there.

I am very pleased to hear the hon. member mention this. We do get reports of the work going on that we spoke about, in diamonds in Russia and all the reports of the work that was done here and also down in the United States. As you say, some of these very clever geologists are men who, if you did not know them, you would think were a little—as the old lady said—"tetched". We have a gentleman in Port Arthur—a very famous gentleman, I will not mention his name—who has been responsible for some of the most outstanding discoveries in that area. If any of you know him the hon. member for Fort William would, and the hon. member for Rainy River would as well. He is a man that socially you can hardly approach at all and although he is worth a tremendous sum of money, he has a little home. If you go up to see him, he is sitting with his feet up on the dining-room table reading a book. But those are the peculiarities. He is not interested in those amenities that many of us are interested in, but he has a great brain and a great knowledge of mining.

And as you say, sir, you talked about your subway and your area—you will find that men like you are the ones who are most interested in geology and where most of our best ideas come from. So I have learned it is never good business to laugh at anybody when we think he has a foolish idea of rock or the geology of the province. Your point is well taken. That gentleman you were mentioning probably will discover something for us.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that and, frankly, I apologize. The hon. Minister has such geniality and warmth that it responds to my Irish nature. There is a Santa Claus quality about the hon. Minister's kindly features that I find infectious—but I would say that the concern I had really about this particular case was that the man had dedicated his life to these studies. They were strange to me; I am not used to them.

My point is that, in trying to refer him to someone, I could not find, frankly, anyone who would take him seriously until a very large mining company in this city did. I would hope that, and I am sure that this will be the case, that it is not your own department which turns people away—there are extraordinary men who have developed the north and I appreciate they are not conformists. Perhaps that is why they have gone up to the north and I hope that we will respect their intelligence and not stress their differences. I appreciate the point you have made.

Mr. Chairman: The present discussion should be under vote 1302, therefore, we should deal with vote 1301 first.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, in vote 1301 I was disappointed in the hon. Minister's remarks on mining—referring to mining only in the north. In my own area there also is a mine. In fact, we have the largest mine in Ontario—I should say maybe the largest mine in Canada, south of the United States, and it has been a real boon to the economy in the area. Now, my question of the hon. Minister really is in connection with the mines and Emergency Measures Organization. Has the department undertaken any type of study as to the feasibility of using mines as air-raid shelters in case of nuclear holocaust?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I thank the hon. member for that question. There have been intensive studies made by Ottawa, not by our department and we will be expecting to get the results of that study before too long, Mr. Chairman. But they have made an intensive study. The hon. member was mentioning his area—that was quite right—I was just mentioning the precious metals. But the preliminary estimate of mineral production—I am not going to read the figures, but there are bismuth, calcium, cobalt, copper, gold, iron, lead, magnesium, nickel, platinum, selenium, silver, tellurium, thorium, uranium, zinc, arsenious oxide, asbestos, gypsum, mica, naphthalene cyanite, peat moss, quartz, salt, soapstone, sulphur, natural gas, petroleum, clay products, cement, lime, sand and gravel, and stone. Now it embraces that multiplicity of different things and the hon. member has down in his area some of the things that are not in others. In eastern Ontario we have cement and salt and all those great minerals that produce large sums of money, but I was just talking about the minerals in the north. True, the eastern part of Ontario produces a great deal of our total income and the same thing applies to the hon. member's part in western Ontario.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a question? I understand that gravel pits and gravel come under The Department of Mines—I wonder if this is the right main office vote to discuss this under? I might say that I understand there are permits being given to contractors and individuals to take gravel out of the lake.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Is the hon. member talking about inspection, and so on?

Mr. Spence: No. I am talking about taking gravel out of Lake Erie.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is under item six.

Vote 1301 agreed to.

On vote 1302:

Mr. R. A. H. Taylor (Timiskaming): Sir, under vote 1302, I have several questions which I believe come under this vote. First, has the department given consideration to the possibility of making an electromagnetic survey, in the same plane and at the same time as it makes its magnetometer survey? My understanding is that the cost increase would be slight and that a comparison of these results would more quickly spotlight the districts in which land surveys should be made.

My second question is: Has the department given consideration to duplicating and centralizing, in Toronto, all information concerning work that has been performed on claims? This would enable a mine developer to check out claims without the cost of a trip to the region involved.

And thirdly, does the department propose taking any steps to reactivate work on patented claims which might otherwise be dormant for years?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: In regard to the last question of the hon. member, as you know, there are no more patents. We cannot touch patented claims that were patented before our Act was changed in 1963. There are no more patents. We changed the Act last year and now there is a maximum of a 21-year lease.

I feel, as the hon. member does, I think, that patented land is something that should never have been granted in perpetuity. But in the old days it did not make much difference.

On the first question of the hon. member, there is an aeromagnetic survey only. The work on all claims, as the hon. member suggested, is available in our Toronto headquarters if he wishes to get it.

Vote 1302 agreed to.

Vote 1303 agreed to.

Vote 1304 agreed to.

Vote 1305 agreed to.

On vote 1306:

Mr. Spence: I understand that gravel pits and gravel come under The Department of Mines. I wonder how many permits have been issued by The Department of Mines to contractors and individuals to take gravel out of Lake Erie this past year? I also would like to know how long these permits cover; for one year? two years? or three years? And what course will The Department of Mines take in regard to issuing permits to take gravel out of Lake Erie this next year?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is quite a business, sand and gravel. In 1963 there were 78,118,878 tons, at a value of $53,712,000. It just proves the multiplicity of things that The Department of Mines covers. That is one very important one.

Now, the hon. member asked about Lake Erie. There are five licences on Lake Erie and those licences are for one year only.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, what is the course The Department of Mines is going to follow? Is it going to increase permits to take out more gravel or is it going to curtail the issuing of permits?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, as I thought, there will be no additional licences issued unless more gravel is found someplace where it is not going to be destructive to the area. But the five licences are for one year and are renewable by the Minister. That is all we intend to issue at the moment.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, for want of information—in my area we have an island in the Detroit River; it is just along the international boundary line. Now, would the department of the hon. Minister of Mines have anything to do with the fill that would be taken from the river and used to build up the island? Would that come under the hon. Minister's jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I would say that it would not come under us. That would come under The Department of Public Works in Ottawa, under their navigation projects because it has something to do with navigational waters.

Mr. Newman: It would really have nothing to do with navigation. It would simply be a matter of building up the island and reclaiming that portion of the island that the municipality, or the owners of the island, would be normally allowed to reclaim.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: If it does not come under the public works in Ottawa, I would say it would come under the hon. Minister of Lands and Forest of Ontario (Mr. Roberts).

Mr. Newman: That is quite all right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Farquhar: A point of information, Mr. Chairman, please. The night before last I heard a broadcast to the effect that there was quite a substantial copper strike in the area above Blind River. Needless to say, I was on the 'phone to Blind River people within five minutes. I have not been able to find that there was any strike of such stature. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he knows anything about it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes, there is a little strike there. There have been 85 claims staked. We have not much knowledge as to its value at present, but I am hopeful that it will be good.

Mr. Farquhar: Thank you.

Vote 1306 agreed to.

Vote 1307 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Mines.

Hon. Mr. Roberts moves that the committee of supply rise, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might revert for a moment to a point before the orders of the day so that I may table some reports.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko begs leave to present to the House the following reports:

The seventh annual report of the Ontario Highway Transport Board for the year ending December 31, 1963.

The annual report of The Ontario Department of Transport for 1962-1963.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I may say I have been speaking to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) and my other colleagues of the council, and we are trying to work out a procedure whereby as soon as reports are tabled that if there are printed reports ready they will be distributed to the hon. members of the House immediately, as in this case. The Department of Transport report will be distributed so it will be available to all hon. members of the House before the estimates of this department are brought in.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-fourth order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee of ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. R. D. Rowe (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that, although I was ready somewhat earlier in this session to make a few remarks in the Legislature, time has run out on various occasions. Therefore, as I rise now at this somewhat late date to make my so-called maiden speech, I must say that I feel perhaps just a bit old maidish, rather than maidenly.

However, as many a spinster in the past has undoubtedly said, "Better late than never". I ask your kind indulgence, and remind the hon. members of this august chamber of the words of Oscar Wilde, who once said that maidens are meant to be loved, not understood.

In that regard, I wish to thank the more senior hon. members of this House for their patience and forbearance in listening, almost without interruption, to all that we neophytes have felt within our hearts to expound. I also wish at this time to compliment the new hon. members who have spoken before me. They may be new to this House but it is plainly evident that they are not new to the art of speechmaking. And I may say, that I believe there have been a few positive and worthwhile suggestions from these various hon. members.

Of course, we new members quickly realize that we are not going to solve all the problems of the universe at this first attempt. As a new member I am often asked by friends of my impressions of life in Queen's Park and in answer to that, I often think of the old story where there were three men who went out for a walk one afternoon. One was a doctor, another was an architect and the third, a politician, and they fell during their trip to discussing which of their professions was the oldest. The doctor said, "Well, I think I can win that, because if you recall when God created Eve out of Adam's rib, that was in fact a surgical operation. Therefore the medical profession is pretty old." The architect spoke up and said, "Well not so, doctor, if you recall that when God created the universe, like any architect, he created it out of chaos." The politician spoke up and said, "Yes, but who created the chaos?"

At any rate, some of the remarks and actions of the past few weeks, I think, can bear that out in more ways than one. I often wish and have felt that if some of the hon. members would speak less and keep to the subject a bit more, that there might be a bit more progress. However, we will get used to that.

And now, Mr. Speaker, since this is my first opportunity, and since you have not had too many flattering remarks said about you in the last few days, I would be very remiss indeed if I did not, before continuing further, add my words of congratulations to you upon your election to your present office. I agree with all the previous speakers that you, sir, wear the mantle of office with dignity and distinction. You have been put to the test already on numerous occasions and have always acquitted yourself, I believe, to the honest satisfaction of all concerned. I know that this spirit of fairness to all will continue.

I would also like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate publicly the hon. Prime Minister of this province (Mr. Robarts) on his clear mandate received from the electorate last September. This was given, I believe, because the people of Ontario felt that here was a man they could trust to look after their affairs of government honestly. He had proved his abilities and warranted a return to office. And undoubtedly our hon. Prime Minister was a powerful influence on many of us being here today too. He made our battles so much easier that he assured our victories.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I have the very great honour to represent that "little bit of heaven" about 75 miles east of here, known far and wide as the county of Northumberland. It is my understanding also that there are only two types of people in this country: those who live in Northumberland and those who wish they did. May I pause, Mr. Speaker, for just a moment to pay my respects to my predecessor in office from Northumberland? The hon. William A. Goodfellow served this province well and faithfully for 20 years under three different Prime Ministers. Hon. Mr. Goodfellow was a Minister of the Crown for 12 of these years. Back home in Northumberland he was a friend to everyone of normal political faith, and received the political support of practically all who knew him. He was one of the elder statesmen of Queen's Park, too, I understand. I feel certain that he was, likewise, one reason for the strength of the Conservative Party over the years.

In thinking of my riding, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Northumberland county is rather unique in that it has established the record of always having been on the government side of the House irrespective of which party has been in power, both provincially and federally throughout its history. It is a true bellwether riding. Therefore, it seems that the people of Northumberland have always felt the pulse of affairs political and have weighed the issues according to the times.

Northumberland County is one of the united counties of Northumberland and Durham, with the county town, Cobourg, being situated in Northumberland. We had a little difficulty in getting a warden elected recently, as many of you know, but by and large, conditions are usually very amicable between the two counties.

Transportation facilities, both railway and highway and to some extent seaway, paralleling the lakeshore, have undoubtedly boosted the industrial development along the south side of the county. Thus we find that industry has generally favoured towns like Cobourg where we find fairly large operations, such as General Foods Limited, Canadian General Electric Limited's plastic division, Winchester (Western Limited), which recently bought out the well-known firm of Cooley Arms Limited, General Wire and Cable Limited, Bird-Archer Limited, manufacturer of industrial chemicals and a leather tanning operation. Of course, Cobourg's largest industry in the way of payroll is the 26 Central Ordnance Depot (RCOC).

It is interesting to note that in 1963 there were about 35 manufacturing establishments in Cobourg, whose factory shipments aggregated over $30 million compared with only $4.7 million just after World War II. Campbellford is the next largest centre with a population of some 3,500 people, followed by Brighton, about 2,500 people. In Campbellford, the largest employer of labour is the Campbellford Cloth Company, while in Brighton this role is filled by Cooley Metal Products Limited, which makes metal furniture.

Colborne, with about 1,500 population, recently acquired a new industry by the name of United-Carr Fasteners (Canada) Limited. In Hastings, situated farther to the north, the largest employer is a branch of Breithaupt Leather, manufacturing leather soles and uppers. Northumberland has a predominantly rural population of close to 50,000. Approximately one-third of the county's labour force is employed in agriculture and one-quarter in manufacturing. The tourist industry, as many of you know, is also of great economic importance along the shores of Rice Lake and the Trent River.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that, by and large, conditions in Northumberland are very stable and healthy. There are a few problems to be solved by local municipalities but I am confident that with the calibre of men and women who make up the population, a solution to these problems will be found. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal with every item in our budget, because much has been said already. Suffice it to say that, although no one regrets more than I the adjustments which were deemed necessary to meet the ever-increasing demands of our modern society, yet, when one examines where this extra money is going, one cannot really quarrel with it.

I remind the House that an extra $52 million is being allotted to education, an extra $19 million for the province's highway and road systems, an extra $8 million for public welfare expenditures, an extra $9.7 million for The Departments of Agriculture, Mines, Lands and Forests, and the new Department of Energy and Resources Management. No one can say these increased expenditures are not necessary if we are to give service to the people of Ontario.

Just last week, some of us accepted the opportunity to visit the Federated Colleges at Guelph, the OAC, the OVC, and Macdonald Institute. Although it costs something like $10 million per year to operate these institutions, when one sees the work being done here, the research being carried out and the excellent leadership being given by the staff which ranks among the best on this continent, one realizes the great contribution being made to the agricultural life of this country. This expenditure is being returned many-fold to the agricultural community of this province.

Mr. Speaker, in the field of education, may I say that I personally have a particular interest in this area, not only because I was a teacher at one time myself, but also because our own family is partaking of education at all levels, from university right down to the public school level. Hence my concern is great.

The forming of the new Department of University Affairs emphasizes, I believe, the extreme concern of this government in the field of higher education. Also, in the area of post-secondary education, establishment of institutes of technology and trades schools, is recognizing the needs of industry to some extent. May I suggest that, with the recent additions of vocational wings to many secondary schools throughout the province, in four or five years' time there will be an acute need for more trades schools, and so on, to provide the opportunity to the graduates of these vocational schools to advance to still higher levels. Residents in our area trust that one such trade school will be located geographically to fill the vacuum that now exists in our part of the province. To this end, a brief has already been presented to the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis).

The establishment of a college of education in London will, I hope, alleviate a bad situation in the secondary schools of this province. Too many people, due to the shortage which exists, are teaching on permits. This is but a natural progression of a similar situation which existed in our public schools a few years ago and has now advanced along to the secondary school level.

Mr. Speaker, I would say just a few words about a subject referred to in the Budget speech, which has occupied quite a bit of time and has been given quite a close scrutiny in the last few days. In the education of our trainable retarded children, this government took the first steps just a few short years ago by giving limited assistance to this section of our population. I trust that such assistance will now be increased with the end in view of providing the opportunity to these children to better equip themselves to earn a living in a more normal way.

Along the same lines of thought, Mr. Speaker, I would also hope that the government might soon provide the funds to provide more adequate accommodation for the retarded child who is eligible for admission to such institutions as the one at Smith's Falls. Here, we find about 2,700 children being accommodated in a place built for 1,800. In addition, of course, there is a long waiting list of applications for admission, and a definite hardship is being inflicted on all concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully draw the attention of this government to one other problem which we have in Northumberland and which I presume also prevails in many other places throughout the province. I refer to the matter of law enforcement in the smaller towns and villages. There are very few places with a population of 3,000 or under that can provide adequate police protection for their citizens. Far too often, it is found necessary to hire a local person, who is usually untrained and who remains so. It is difficult under those circumstances to command the respect of the unruly element of the local populace.

One alternative, of course, is to enter a contract with the Ontario Provincial Police to police the community. This provides much more professional policing, and the results are usually much more satisfactory. Unfortunately, due to a manpower shortage which presently exists in the force, it is my understanding that such a policing contract cannot be obtained. It would be my hope, and my suggestion, that this situation be reviewed and serious consideration be given to its rectification, with the aim in mind of the province eventually making available police protection for all small communities. The cost of such service, of course, should be borne by the community concerned.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard in this Legislature over the past several days the story of Ontario. This has indicated to me that, while there are problems in each individual riding, some of which are local, and some general, the overwhelming indication has been a picture to be proud of. I would like to say in closing that I feel privileged to sit in this hallowed Chamber. May I also state that I am positive that my riding of Northumberland will continue to play its part in the economic life of this province. Thank you.

Mr. J. M. Gould (Bracondale): Mr. Speaker, may I say that few governments are all bad. My sense of political fair play prompts me to state that there are some things for which this government is to be highly commended as there are unquestionably some things for which this government is to be severely criticized.

In further comment, I intend to blend commendation and criticism with suggestions relative to several matters which have attracted my political interest. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that part of what I shall be advocating is not altogether new, it has been advocated before. But they, in my opinion, are as valid as submissions today as they were when they were first made. I make them in the hope that hon. members have by now seen the light and some of these things will really come to pass in our province of Ontario.

If some hon. members wish to regard such submissions as part of my personal blueprint for Liberal Action in Ontario, if I were privileged to lead the Liberal Party, then they are at liberty to do so. But I hasten firstly to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I tell you emphatically, that mutual respect exists between by hon. colleagues and myself, and in expressing my opinions and views I am speaking, on this occasion not on behalf of my party, but for myself as a member of the Liberal Party and as one of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House.

I hasten secondly to ask that you believe me when I say that I have genuine admiration for the person, the political wisdom and the political experience of the hon. member for Grey South, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver). And whenever I shall in my remarks make mention of leadership, I do so without meaning to detract one iota from his excellent leadership in this House. I beseech you, Mr. Speaker, let no man interpret it otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that one of the heaviest things in this world is an empty pocket. It does not make the slightest bit of difference whether it is the empty pocket of a person or of a government—whether it is the empty pocket of the Ontario taxpayer or the Conservative government in this province. I ask you, what do you do, Mr. Speaker, when both our taxpayer and our government have empty pockets? What do you do when the Ontario taxpayer laments that the purchasing power of his dollar is shrinking, and the Robarts government confesses that today, after two decades at the provincial cash register, it is in grave financial difficulty?

I witnessed the struggle and the failure of the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) to ignite the enthusiasm of hon. members of the government as government announcements were being made in this House placing, heavier financial burden on the backs of the taxpayers, and at the same time as it admitted to some six million or more Ontario people that under the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) it had failed, as did the previous Conservative government, to control expenditure.

To be sure, this government has demonstrated by its Budget that like the Frost government, it is unable to keep expenditures within safe limits. For the 1964 fiscal period, this government spent $1,211 million. It has demonstrated that it is the same old Tory spending machine, with a new driver, in a big black sleek limousine. First the Henry and the Drew clans pleaded with Ontario voters to be forgiven for overspending millions on hydro power and on highways. Viewed in another light, pleaded to be forgiven for wasting many of our millions on highways for the benefit of Hydro power barons. Then followed the one-man political machine—and they say he was the foxiest of them all—begging, with outstretched arm and turned palm, forgiveness for overspending millions on highways and in municipal grants. Viewed in another light, begging forgiveness for overspending for the benefit of highway contractors and for bribing the electorate with its own money in order to lessen, if not eliminate, surprise criticism of his Conservative government on some Frosty Friday. And now, we have Prince John Robarts, with straight face and head bent in profound penitence, imploring this Legislature's forgiveness for overspending millions for education, simply because he could not read the writing on the wall when he was Ontario's Minister of Education.

Mr. Speaker, I again say I have listened to the hon. Provincial Treasurer and his confession of overbudgeting. Imaginary surpluses and financial mismanagement, all disguised to resemble a budget statement. And I say to you, Mr. Speaker, try as this smooth and benign hon. gentleman did by fiscal sugar-coating to make his budget palatable to the Ontario taxpayer, it is still hard to swallow, not only by hon. members in opposition, but also by hon. members right in his government.

Ontario is faced with the prospect of a total expenditure of $1,304 million for the ensuing fiscal period—an increase of some $104 million over the preceding fiscal year. The highest expenditure in our history. The Budget means a $200 contribution to the Treasury in 1965 from every man, woman and child in Ontario. This is the highest contribution ever exacted from each of our men, women and children. It is alarming! When we, Mr. Speaker, in opposition, complain about and decry this government's poor planning, its lack of foresight, its imprudent handling and spending of money, our hon. Prime Minister, with intermittent bites and chews on a chocolate bar, just sits back in this House and smiles, is if to say, "Well, what are you worrying about, it's not your money?" Well, sir, I recall a story which best sums up the attitude of this government on the question of handling the taxpayers' money. It is told something like this:

Some years ago, John, a small town Scotsman, son of a banker, living in London, who had a relative in Ontario, decided to emigrate to Canada. On the second day out at sea a storm broke. Great excitement raged on board ship. The captain shouted orders through a megaphone. Lights flashed and bells rang. Sailors lowered lifeboats. Women screamed, children cried, dogs barked and some member of Parliament on ship belated. While everybody else milled about the deck in great confusion, only John went about tranquilly watching the pandemonium with some amusement. "How can you be so unconcerned when the ship is sinking?" a fellow passenger upbraided him. "What are you excited about?" asked John. "Does the ship belong to you?"

Mr. Speaker, this government says to us, those in opposition, "What are you getting excited about? Our increasing debt? So what? Our increasing taxes? So what? Our spending millions of dollars in interest on our increasing debt? So what? Our paying millions of dollars in U.S. exchange? So what? Our waste and extravagance in the cost of government? So what? And our increasing expenditures? So what? Does this money belong to you?" Yes, the ship does belong to us. It belongs to the people of Ontario—the people who voted for the hon. Prime Minister and the people who voted for us.

And let me remind the hon. Prime Minister, as others have already reminded him, there were less than a majority of Ontario people who voted for the government. In everyday parlance, more people in the last provincial election voted against than for the government. Your exhibition of conservative vote-figure-juggling, the other day, in this House, to me is meaningless. Not yet is the hon. Prime Minister "Mom Ontario's" favourite child. The Liberal Opposition at the present time may be small in number but we represent a lot of people, Mr. Chairman, some 2,340,000 of them, in fact.

Let me tell the hon. Prime Minister that the people of Ontario are concerned, some are alarmed, for his current Budget forecasts higher taxes in the coming years, if the present rate of government spending is maintained. And the working man, the wage-earner, is aroused, for the heavy tax burden was and will still be placed on his back. Placed on his back, Mr. Speaker, recently by the introduction of a three per cent sales tax, amounting to some $185 million annually, and now in the face of his protest that there is nothing or little left of his fixed income for any additional tax, this government brazenly declares he will pay more for his gasoline. He will pay more for his motor vehicle license plates. He will pay more for his liquor. He will pay more for his hospital service premiums. And this, may I say, Mr. Speaker, was the unkindest impost of all. This will cost this Tory government electoral votes, many of them. Believe me, Mr. Speaker. The man in the gallery, and even the civil servant, will not forget this unkind cut.

Mr. Speaker, I suspect the reason there were no new taxes for Ontario at this time, is simply because there were no new taxes being introduced in the United States at this time. You see, Mr. Speaker, many of the things we do in Ontario are a consequence of American influence in style, in music, in law, social and welfare services. Yes, and in the field of taxation. Much of our tax is of American origin, like the corporation tax, succession duty tax, gasoline tax, and, of course, our retail sales tax. Accordingly, if ever one wants to learn what new tax Ontario is planning for its citizens, one has merely to look for the introduction of a new tax in the United States of America. But enough of these taxes. Enough taxing the patience of the people of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, we must return to living within our income. This province must prepare to trim its outlay. There must be strict and constant observance of a policy of retrenchment in administrative spending. Some of our present programmes must be trimmed. Frills and waste must be eliminated. We must at some stage in our spending turn a deaf ear to the ever-increasing demand of special beneficiaries of government spending. And it might as well be now. Not fully satisfying the demands of our universities in regard to their building programmes is only one phase of the matter. There are 22 other departments of government where programme-cutting should also be made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may go further; the president of the United States, Lyndon Johnson, recently said, and I quote:

We must break the mould in which budgets have been shaped for many years past. Budgets do not have to show a steady increase in spending. You can have an austere budget without it being a standstill budget. Vigorous pruning of old programmes and procedures releases the funds to meet new challenges and opportunities. Economy becomes the companion of progress.

And may I add, the secret of the current boom in European countries, I am informed, is a policy of fiscal and monetary restraint.

The hon. leader of the Opposition who has seen governments come and go through good and bad times, sir, has warned both the hon. Mr. Frost and the hon. Prime Minister that during good times economy should be practised by putting something away for stormier days. In my opinion, the stormier days are here. We are caught in the throes of a crisis in the cost of education. And just before the hon. Mr. Frost sur-rendered his Provincial Treasurer's portfolio he said—and it is in his budget statement: "Our people are looking for relief—not added burdens."

In 1961, just three years ago, this same revered Tory salesman also warned: "We are living beyond our means, there is going to be a lot of belt-tightening."

In the Budget speech of three years ago—and I believe in the one previous thereto—our hon. Provincial Treasurer presented a most cheerful report of Ontario's economic health, of expanding industry, of business improving, of buoyant revenues, and of a tight budgetary control which had produced significant savings. I tell you, the present episode of Ontario's financial mess leads one to suspect that someone in government is addicted to the smoking of political marijuana. Enough of this prattling by our hon. Provincial Treasurer. There is no satisfactory budgeting control, when in face of urgent need for substantial spending for schools and education, sir, this government still proposes the continuance of substantial spending for highways. Today, Ontario has few "Tobacco Road" public highways and the proposed spending at this time of $280 million for highways could and should be cut by at least $150 million in order that it be made a little easier for Ontario to pay its education bill.

If I had the decision of caucus, with respect to this matter, Mr. Speaker. I would move that the debate be adjourned and that the estimates for the current year as submitted to the House be referred back to the executive council, with instructions to decrease the total amount of supply asked from the House by the sum of at least $250 million—$150 million from highways and another $100 million from the cost of administration of government. You tighten your belt, Mr. Premier, you tighten your belt, Mr. Treasurer, you yourselves do what you ask others to do. But oh no, making a cut in the Budget would be something foreign to this Conservative spending machine. Such a move would be a dangerous precedent for other governments. Father Frost never did such a thing and like good Tories, his political children will never do such a thing. It takes no financial genius to recommend increase of taxation and taxation beyond needs unless it be to fill that Tory pork barrel or for the early paying of election promises.

Mr. Speaker, I have more to say about that. This is only the beginning. Mr. Speaker, you know that booze and gasoline do not mix. For young people this is frequently a disastrous combination. Yet in Ontario today, we are witnessing Mr. Frost's political kids bolstering revenues by increasing the price of liquor and gasoline. They may even put a tax on water. Some 20 years ago when Conservatives took office in Ontario, liquor profits were $10.5 million. Last year liquor profits were $95 million. In 1964, the hon. Provincial Treasurer estimates liquor profits—and they should really be called taxes—liquor profits will jump $15 million to $110 million. Some twenty years ago, when Conservatives took office in Ontario, gasoline profits were some $19 million. Last year gasoline profits were $182 million. In 1964, the hon. Provincial Treasurer estimates gasoline profits will jump $36 million to $218 million.

In one year, Ontario people will be paying taxes totalling $328 million on liquor and gasoline alone. Next year, we will be paying this government $518 million, more than a half a billion dollars, for just three items—liquor, gas and retail sales. A fine state of affairs when Ontario's gas, liquor and retail sales tax cannot produce the increase in revenues required.

Mr. Speaker, since our taxes and revenues are insufficient to meet our expenditure, may I tell you that the government intends to go on mortgaging our future. The Budget reveals the government's intention of increasing its borrowing of monies in addition to the collection of additional taxes and premiums.

Our hon. Provincial Treasurer says, and I quote:

We will be required to rely on our borrowing power in order to carry out the programme we have planned for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, may I again direct your attention to the fact that during our buoyant economic years following the war Ontario's dead debt—I spell it out, D-E-A-D—dead debt kept increasing. From 1949 to 1960 Ontario's debt increased from $466,753,485 to $1,014,063,598, an increase of $547,310,113 or over half a billion dollars.

In our good times, sir, our Provincial Treasurer allowed our net debt to increase over $500 million. One would expect that in good times the net debt would be decreased by some $500 million. The net debt of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, now stands at about $1.4 billion. This makes it clear that the one common characteristic of Tories in government in Ontario during the past 20 or more years is their inability to peg the debt and their inability to check their insatiable appetite for the creation of new taxes and the imposition of additional taxes.

In defence of our increasing debt here is what this government is saying, and it is typical of how ludicrous some of the government statements are. The hon. Provincial Treasurer states in his current Budget—some call it "the saga of the vanishing Ontario dollar"—and I quote: "Our net debt is now less than it was in wartime."

Now isn't that an earth-shattering statement? And to think that members of the press were locked in for hours so as to prevent them from communicating this statement to the world before the stock exchange closed on Wednesday, February 12 in the year of our Lord, 1964.

What a nonsensical fiscal statement to be made by a supposedly experienced Provincial Treasurer and a mature Prime Minister. I would expect, and so would every man and woman in this province, that our net debt would be lower now than during wartime. During the war many millions were raised in a life-and-death struggle, and our net debt would naturally be expected to be higher than in time of peace.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the way this government handles money, I advise you, sir, to reflect upon the early prospect of either raffling, or placing in hock, or making a loan in the United States of America on your tricorne hat. For good measure you can throw in, gratis, your government's financial experts and the Lord of Lindsay, with his pay-as-you-go policy. You might also hire the hon. Prime Minister as the bearer of glad tidings to the Ontario people that their "Old Man Ontario" and "his prodigal son" are both broke—both have empty pockets. They have spent all of Mr. Ontario's money and they are now talking out of both sides of their mouth, crying for more and more by increasing the taxpayers' taxes and by increasing the government's borrowing. But who, I ask, Mr. Speaker, would want anything with two faces and a three-cornered hat?

Mr. Speaker, year after year this government reported a surplus while at the same time, as I said a few moments ago, our net debt was increasing. For 1963 we have a reported surplus of some $579,000 while at the same time a reported increase in the net debt of some $75 million. For 1962 this government reported a surplus of $502,000, and at the same time, in another column, reported an increase in our net debt of some $116 million. In 1961, a reported surplus of $391,000, and at the same time a reported increase in the net debt of some $99 million. In 1960, there was a reported surplus of some $864,000 and a net debt increase of $93 million.

In the 1964 fiscal year our net debt is increased by $113 million. In the last 10 years the net surpluses totalled $9 million, while the increases in our net debt actually totalled $679 million. While some economists approve of a deficit budget as a means of economic stimulus, they concede that there comes a time when it becomes necessary to restore the balance between revenue and expenditures. A balanced budget should be sought.

I recognize that a balanced budget may not solve all of our economic problems. But I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it will surely help solve some of them, as say these economists. Since I believe we should not increase revenues by more taxation, it is incumbent upon this government, with the help of the Opposition, to find out where and when it can slash expenditures.

Just where did our money go? To whom, and for what? How much went for cost of government? Just how extensive is the government's extravagance? Why didn't we pay more on account of our net debts? Just how much was spent on government propaganda and election costs?

In furtherance of our desire to co-operate with the government, we should like to closely examine our public accounts and see for ourselves what the causes are for our present money problems. That, I suggest, is the only way. If this government shall refuse a public accounts inquiry, then I say it is because the government does not dare reveal its true financial picture to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, Ontario Liberals demand a public inquiry into Ontario's public accounts. Our people pay the tune. They are entitled, as of right, to get an accounting, accompanied by answers, under oath if need be, to certain Opposition questions, some of which I shall enumerate. Truly, I do not believe that the hon. Prime Minister knows the financial score of the government he inherited, and which he now directs as trustee of the people of Ontario.

We in Opposition shall be delighted to enlighten him and the taxpayer. We shall move aside the cloaks of misgovernment. Close scrutiny of public accounts is one of the public safeguards of our parliamentary system. It is trite parliamentary rule, sir, not the government, and not the Cabinet, is the final authority on the procuring and spending of public funds. Control of the purse belongs to the whole of Parliament, and therefore it belong also to the Opposition.

Yes, it is our duty to guard the integrity of the public purse by diligent investigation of all—not just some—but all government expenditure. And that is precisely what we in the Opposition propose to do. I submit that if such an inquiry shall be obstructed then this government will be charged in the eyes of public opinion with contempt for the rights of Parliament in that it is denying the elected representatives of the people their right to scrutinize and approve public spending.

Please note, Mr. Speaker, that I am not now speaking about the routine, the superficial, the usual examination by our standing public accounts committee, which sits only while the Legislature is in session.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the current session, the hon. Prime Minister, when questioned in this House about more frequent meetings of the public accounts committee and closer examination of our public revenues and expenditures by such committee, exclaimed somewhat indignantly to the effect—and it is in Hansard—“Oh no! I will not permit the Opposition to use the public accounts committee for the purpose of conducting fishing expeditions into government accounts.”

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, and also the hon. Mr. Robarts, who is a graduate of a university business course, that is precisely what the Opposition is here for; to conduct fiscal fishing expeditions, to search, to examine, to ask questions, whether based on knowledge, on information, or on belief, and to smoke out, to expose waste, extravagance, inefficiency, overbudgeting, and unauthorized spending of our money.

Mr. Speaker, even though I am prepared to concede that there is something to be said for some of the government's spending in relation to its educational programme, yet as a Liberal I am not prepared to put my general stamp of approval on the government's handling of its funds until I am satisfied that they were, that they are, and that they will be handled properly as well as wisely.

We know, sir, that no one will be caught with hand in the till, but I suspect that some fingerprints may still be there.

We want to be able to assure the Ontario taxpayer that value was and will be received for his money, and such of his money which has not yet been spent by this government is still in the government till. The Ontario taxpayer wants to see where every penny, yes, every penny, of his money goes, in the very same way as you, sir, would want to see where your lovely wife spends your money.

What would your reaction be, Mr. Speaker, if she replied, “I will not tell you, it is none of your business?”

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That is what mine tells me.

Mr. Gould: Well, this is a public family. You can get away with something in a private family, but in this public family we are going to ask questions and you are going to give us the answers.

Let me go further with your kindness, Mr. Speaker, and that of hon. members of this House, by saying that in 1947 the Hoover commission report—a model report universally studied by government auditors, and our department has copies—made recommendations limiting expenditures to the lowest amount consistent with the efficient performance of essential services, activities and functions, and abolishing services, activities and functions not necessary to the efficient conduct of government. Government implementation of these recommendations exposed extravagance, waste and duplication, running into $8 billion. That is a lot of money, whichever way you may look at it and however slow or fast you may say it.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I query, why didn't the Frost government request the Gordon committee in specific terms of reference to deal with the problem of governmental control of revenue and expenditure? Why didn't it request the Gordon committee to make recommendations with respect to eliminating and abolishing services and functions which, like the Hoover report, might have resulted in exposing waste, extravagance and duplication that it is suspected could be costing Ontario taxpayers millions of dollars? This government has a copy of this report and so did the Frost government have a copy for some ten years before calling for the creation of the Gordon committee.

Mr. Speaker, for years, Mr. Harvey Cotnam, one-time provincial auditor, in report after report, warned Tories in government that there was a money problem in Ontario, but the heads of government paid no attention to him. No public inquiry into public accounts was held. Mr. Speaker, Liberals in the Opposition want one now. Let me read to hon. members excerpts from several reports made by the said provincial auditor. I now read to you, Mr. Speaker, from the provincial auditor's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950, and I quote:

The wisdom of economy cannot be over-emphasized and I would draw to the attention of the departments that there must be no relaxation of the vigilance with which they seek to control expenditures.

Here the provincial auditor, in effect, is saying that we have a problem in controlling expenditures, and the departments of this government must keep making effort to control the spending of money.

Then, Mr. Speaker, an excerpt from the provincial auditor's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, I quote:

It is recommended that a review should be made of the fees charged in all departments, for the purpose of making sure that the fees currently charged are providing a fair return for the services rendered and privileges granted at a time when the costs of government have so greatly increased. In my report last year I drew attention to the wisdom of economy in controlling expenses. I regard it as a matter of real importance and great seriousness and again urge that under no circumstances must the pursuit of economy be relaxed. It is recommended that a review be made of the statutes and various other authorities relating to fiscal accounts, those dealing with revenue, custody of funds, disbursements and public debt.

Here the provincial auditor is saying in clear unambiguous language that we must focus attention on financial administration. The provincial auditor is saying that this government should keep checking to find out what money is coming in, who has the money, what money is going out, and what we owe. These are every-day basic business questions, put in every-day basic language. Yes, Mr. Speaker, basic economics.

And now further, an excerpt from the provincial auditor's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, and I quote:

I would again emphasize the necessity of focusing attention on the control of the financial administration of the province. A review involving the machinery and methods or processes by which funds for the support of public services are raised, spent and accounted for, will reveal the expansion of financial responsibilities in all departments.

Here, in effect, the same auditor is saying, let us have a survey and focus attention on financial administration. Let us find out where Ontario is going as far as dollars and cents are concerned. Let us find out how far this government has gone with expenditure. Let us find out how far this government has committed its Treasury and its credit. Let us find out if we really know how much this province will be obliged to pay in the future.

Mr. Speaker, in view of what the provincial auditor has stated in the excerpts which I have just read, I ask as one Liberal, is this province really losing its control over public monies? How can this province best control expenditure? Is Ontario really getting a fair return for services rendered and privileges granted? The emphatic wording employed by the provincial auditor urges a detailed inquiry into this province's administration of finance—not, I again say, a routine examination by our public accounts committee.

Mr. Speaker, the Gordon committee was not expressly asked as it should have been by Mr. Frost to inquire into the government's administration of finances. Was there something wrong with our accounting? Was there something to be hidden? Why now the hesitation, the refusal by the hon. Prime Minister to the detailed examination of the public accounts by the public accounts committee? Is there something to hide? Where is the answer to the provincial auditor's question of whether existing political controls are adequate to effectively counteract the pressure that is constantly being exerted by special beneficiaries of governmental spending?

I am confident that the answers to all of these questions, and many more which I shall, in a few minutes if given an opportunity, continue to enumerate, will be furnished by an inquiry into our public accounts.

Mr. Speaker, I am also confident that if the terms of reference to the Gordon committee had been spelled out to embrace an inquiry into financial administration then the committee would surely have made recommendations as to how the Frost government, followed by the Robarts government, might today taper off large expenditure and at the same time increase public revenue so as to come closer to balancing the Budget without the necessity of searching frantically, as I believe the hon. Prime Minister is, for new or additional taxes, in addition to his retail sales tax and his new price increase in liquor and in gas and in car plates and in hospital insurance premiums.

As to the recommendations of the recent Glassco report, how much Ontario study of this report is reflected in what our government is doing or in what it proposes to do? Mr. Speaker, at the inquiry we would have an opportunity to examine closely the long-term programmes which the various departments of government and agencies have submitted to the executive council and ascertain now how much current and future government expenditure is needed for such programmes. I think sincerely, that conduct of government and the spending of its money cannot be the blind leading the blind. This government must make full disclosure to the Opposition how it will be spending public money. There must be no hesitation on the part of this government.

Mr. Speaker, there are many more, but here are a dozen questions the Liberal Opposition would ask at a public inquiry into public accounts:

Question 1. How much was spent in the past 20 years by Tory governments on account of travelling expenses? I am shocked and so will every Ontario taxpayer be when he learns that last year alone our government spent over $12 million in travelling expenses. This government must be moving on wheels, on wheels of those big, black, sleek, chauffeur-driven limousines, I previously made mention of. Limousines provided by the taxpayers of Ontario.

Most Crown Ministers maintain such a limousine; some Crown Ministers, I understand, are furnished with two such limousines, one to be driven before dinner and one to be driven after dinner. This government has the mistaken belief that movement is synonymous with progress. Not so, Mr. Speaker. I wonder how much further the policy of use of motor cars by members of the government goes? I wonder, as do many people, will members of the Cabinet be paying the additional two cents tax on gasoline? The government talks of economy. One of the best ways of economizing in administration would be for the hon. Prime Minister to clean his Cabinet by getting rid of some of those cars and by starting to reduce government travelling expenses.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Get back to Mitch Hepburn's bicycle.

Mr. Gould: Yes, ride a bicycle, as the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) does, I say.

Question 2: How many unpaid bills were carried over to reduce the total expenditure for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963? How many unpaid bills were left out for this fiscal period so that the Budget statement would show a net ordinary surplus of some $579,000? What about the estimated surplus of $522,000 for the twelve months ending March 31, 1964, being eight months actual, plus four months forecast? How many unpaid bills are going to be left out here?

Mr. Speaker, I suspect the 1963 and in 1964, surpluses, like other surpluses reported over the years by the Tory government are imaginary. Let me tell you there are no such surpluses. To build up these surpluses, which never existed, debts were left out. This is an old Tory trick employed by them as far back as some 30 or more years ago. In 1934, history reveals, the hon. Mr. Henry, to show a surplus, left out unpaid bills of some $1,948,000. This unique Tory skill of juggling just as the hon. Prime Minister juggled his vote figures the other day, was inherited by Gorgeous George and his Conservative government and then by Lovely Les and his Conservative government and now by Juggling John and his Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the member? If the member can conclude his remarks, I shall let him finish, if not I would ask him to adjourn this debate.

Mr. Gould moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Transport.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MARCH 2, 1964

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the west gallery, students from Fonthill Public School and A. K. Wigg Public School, Fonthill.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David) presents the interim report of the select committee appointed to consider the cost of consumer credit.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): I feel this is a report upon which I should make some comment.

Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, public attitudes towards the use of credit and indebtedness have been undergoing a progressive modification with the changing conditions of our society. A few decades ago, money was not so essential a consideration in obtaining the goods and services which constituted the necessities of life. However, with our remarkable advances in science and technology, and the improved living standards which followed, things have changed and credit has become an accepted and integral part of our economic structure.

This development was epitomized in the words of the British committee on the working of the monetary system and I quote from that report:

Just as a mortgage is a normal method of borrowing for the purchase of a house, so hire-purchase has become the main source of credit for equipping it. But the widespread use of credit has produced concomitantly manifold difficulties and problems. Thus the worthy injunction of caveat emptor, and "the buyer needs a hundred eyes," is of small avail against the complexities which now confront the average individual in the world of commerce and consumer credit.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am natually quite interested in what the hon. member says, but I am also interested that the proper form of debate be adhered to. Is it proper, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. member to speak when he presents a report, without a prior consultation with the other hon. members on the committee? I mean, he is just sort of throwing it at us without an opportunity to reply. I do not think that is usually done in the House.

I think it is usually agreed upon between the three parties as to when the report will be presented, then the chairman of the committee makes his remarks, and then any other hon. member who is on the committee. This is an unusual procedure, Mr. Speaker, and I am not in favour of it and I doubt if it conforms with the rules that we have had.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, what we have done on prior occasions is—and I do not think this is provided for any place in the rules—I think we have gone on consent, and that is to put the report on the order paper. I would be quite prepared to do that with this report, Mr. Speaker, and at that time the hon. member, being the chairman, perhaps could lead off the debate with his remarks. I will leave it there for a few days so that any other hon. member, who may not be on the committee but who may want to make any comments, will have an opportunity to examine the report. Then, some time later on, we will call it as a regular order of business and debate it.

Mr. Price: If that is preferable, Mr. Speaker, it is certainly agreeable to me.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to rise on a point of personal privilege. On Thursday evening last, February 27, during the course of the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, I made certain remarks, as did others, concerning the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission. In the Toronto Telegram of Saturday, February 29, and especially in the Toronto Daily Star of the same date, there appeared two news stories containing quotations from one of the members of the licensing commission, a certain Mr. William Allen, which, if correct, constitute in my opinion a slur on my own personal reputation and, at the very least, constitute a reflection on the integrity of a member of this Legislature. The clear innuendo contained in the reported remarks is that the statements were made only under the protection of Parliamentary immunity and privilege and a challenge was made to me to repeat my remarks outside this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have therefore this morning sent by registered mail to the chairman of the Metropolitan Licensing Commission, a Magistrate Thorburn, the following letter, with an extra copy sent to Mr. Allen.

Dear Sir:

I refer you to reports appearing in the Toronto Star and Toronto Telegram, Saturday, 29th of February last, relating to the comments of one of the members of your commission, Mr. William Allen, who presumably was speaking on behalf of the whole commission.

Please take notice that I consider the therein quoted comments quite damaging to my own personal reputation. So that I may accede to the request of Mr. Allen, would you please inform me by return mail of the place, time and date of your commission's next hearing and I will certainly attend, not only repeat my statement as made to the Legislature, but as well will substantiate and document my remarks in full.

With the warmest personal regards, I remain

Yours truly,
Allan F. Lawrence.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question I would like to put to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart).

Will the hon. Minister explain to the House the reasons why the tobacco auctions of the province have been closed, and what steps his department is taking to re-establish confidence in the market so that the auctions may reopen?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the decision to close the tobacco auctions was taken by the Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board, which controls the auctions, because of reactions which have developed amongst tobacco growers due to the current market-situation.

It should be pointed out that, to Friday night last 117,119,074 pounds of the 1963 tobacco crop had been sold at an average price of 51.14 cents per pound, in comparison with the average price before any deductions were made last year, of 50.93 cents per pound on the 1962 crop. However, we are most concerned that the tobacco yet unsold be disposed of at the earliest possible moment, because we appreciate fully the financial hardship that not being able to sell the remaining tobacco would have on many tobacco growers.

The Farm Products Marketing Board is standing by ready to help in any way possible. As a matter of fact, as late as last night, Mr. George McCague, chairman of the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board, was in telephone conversation with Mr. Demeyere. I have been advised further—and this matter has been carried in today's press—that representatives of the Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board are in Ottawa today for consultations with The Canada Department of Agriculture. I have not been advised of the purpose of this visit but, as you know, flue-cured tobacco has been listed as a product under The Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act of Canada and is eligible under the deficiency payment policy. I understand that this deficiency payment was set at 47 cents per pound for the crop currently being marketed.

Mr. Speaker, because of the meetings between the Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board and the federal government, I feel it would be most inopportune to make any further statements on this matter. I think it is sufficient to say that Mr. George Demeyere and his Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board appear to be doing everything possible to correct the present situation and that the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board will be available to assist them in any way that is necessary.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. friend what portion of the present crop remains unsold?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Our estimate of the 1963 crop was set at about 182 million pounds. Until Friday night, 117 million, a bit over that, had been sold, so there are about 55 million pounds left to sell.

Mr. Nixon: Supplementary to that, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister if we are to assume that, while negotiations are taking place with the federal department, no action would be taken by the provincial department?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is abundantly clear this problem only arose on Friday afternoon last, when it was decided to close the auction. The flue-cured board, if I understand correctly, met on Saturday and decided, according to this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail, if I am not mistaken, to send a delegation to Ottawa. They went to Ottawa, as I understand, last night, according to the discussions I have had with Mr. McCague, and it would be impossible for us to do anything when they are down there meeting now.

Mr. Demeyere, the chairman of the flue-cured board, and six of his board members, are in Ottawa, as I understand, this very afternoon; they are discussing these matters with the federal officials.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the following:

1. The report of the Minister of Public Works, province of Ontario, for the year ending March 31, 1963.

2. The 43rd annual report of the Public Service Superannuation Board for the year ending March 31, 1963.

3. The report of the provincial auditor on the Public Service Superannuation Fund for the year ended March 31, 1963.

4. The report of the provincial auditor on the Public Service Retirement Fund for the year ended March 31, 1963.

5. The seventh annual report of the Ontario Parks Integration Board for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

6. The annual report of the commissioner of agricultural loans for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

7. The annual report of the Ontario Mental Health Foundation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the hon. Prime Minister, a copy of which he has had since Friday, I believe.

Is the hon. Prime Minister contemplating making any representations to the federal government or the CNR with a view to postponing the announced plans for the closing of the CNR car shops in London?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National Railways, in order to give you some background in this matter, operates car shops in London and has done so for some considerable number of years. It proposes to close them in 1966, unless they can be closed prior to that time by negotiation. It is prepared under its present arrangements and agreements to keep the car shops there open until 1966, but because of other moves within the railway, it might be more advantageous to the people involved if they were to be closed earlier, because there would be more jobs available at an earlier time to which the workers to be displaced could go.

There has been a series of meetings held, the most recent of which were in January of this year, with employees of the car shops, with the city council in London, and with union representatives. These meetings have outlined in much more detail than I, the proposals I am mentioning now.

There is no legal authority in the government of the province of Ontario to require any industry to carry on operations in any particular area or in any specific location. This matter has been debated here on prior occasions. However, as a representative of the area personally, I have been very interested in this over a period of some years. As a matter of fact, this matter has been dealt with by not only myself, but my colleagues from the whole London area, both federal and provincial, over a period of the last four years, from the point of view of retaining the shops if possible, and in the event that they could not be retained, to work out the matter with the least possible disruption of the workers concerned. But the ultimate decision here, Mr. Speaker, must rest with the management of the Canadian National Railways. I can only assure the hon. member that every possible representation that can be made, has been made to both the railway and to the federal government in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The fortieth order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

On vote 2201:

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, it is my privilege today to bring before the Legislature for consideration, the estimates of The Department of Transport for 1964-65 and to review briefly the activities of the department for the fiscal year now drawing to a close.

I propose to do this in an informal manner. For details of our continuing programmes and services, hon. members can refer to several extensive reports that have been made to this Legislature in years past. I see no point in repeating them. I prefer rather to deal briefly with the highlights of our continuing programmes, with new developments and with our plans for the coming year.

It was in August of 1963 that I succeeded my desk-mate and colleague, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Auld) as Minister of Transport. Without wanting to embarrass him in any way, I would not allow this occasion to pass, sir, without paying my tribute to the zeal and the vigour and the judgment with which he directed the affairs of the department.

I would pay my tribute also to the very splendid staff of the department and in particular to the senior officials who direct its operations with such efficiency and responsibility.

The past year has been one of continuing growth and continuing problems, and in the year ahead the department looks forward to further advances in meeting the complex challenges of this mobile age.

Year by year we have seen an increase in the number of licensed drivers and registered vehicles, nor has the past year been any different. In 1963, for the first time, the number of registered drivers exceeded 2.5 million. This was up about 3.5 per cent from the previous year. The registration of motor vehicles climbed by four per cent to some 2,425,000. The increase in passenger vehicles alone was in the order of 72,000. This would be the total number of vehicles in a city the size of Hamilton.

An innovation this last year was the provision for quarterly licensing of commercial vehicles and trailers. Of the 500,000 vehicles of this kind in the province, it is interesting to note that the owners or operators of more than ten per cent of them took advantage of this option. Hon. members will perhaps recall that a week or so ago some further regulations were made concerning this quarterly licensing extending further this convenience and fairness to those using these vehicles. It was in the summer months, when one would expect the greatest use of vehicles of this kind, especially by farmers and cottagers and vacationists with their small trailers, that the largest registration of these vehicles did occur. It ran beyond 60,000 vehicles registered for the summer quarter.

A major accomplishment of the past year was the introduction of our mechanical issuing of drivers' licences. Applications for renewals of these licences were made out in the names of each of 2,500,000 drivers. These went out by mail. Licences were renewed for periods of from one to three years as indicated on each individual licence. The rate of fee remained the same at $2 a year. Of the licences that will be expiring in 1965, some will be renewed for two years, some for three. From 1966 on all licences will be renewed for three years.

The transformation into our mechanical system was a monumental task. It began more than a year ago. Through the intervening months in the preparation of the data processing punch cards, literally tens of millions of mechanical operations were called for. To help the public understand what was happening and to appreciate the reasons behind it we had a public information campaign and I am happy to say that the general public reaction has been favourable and most cooperative.

In the final act—the actual mailing of these renewal licences—we used high-speed machinery running 24 hours a day, non-stop, for almost eight full weeks. I think we can say now with certainty that this new licensing will meet its purposes, which were: To permit the more efficient handling of the issuance of licences than could be done manually as the number of drivers increases year by year in the days ahead; to provide an easy, rapid and more extensive use of our data, in many ways, as for instance police information, for the control of suspended drivers and for research; and finally, to afford drivers of this province the convenience of a licence for three years.

In all the activities of the department, a prime consideration is the complex and disturbing problem of traffic accidents. This problem is critical and far from being solved, not only in Ontario but in all jurisdictions where the motor car is in wide or extensive use.

Let me give you the motor vehicle accident picture in Ontario for 1963. The total number of accidents was 104,919. The property damage amounted to $49,500,376. The number of people injured, permanently or temporarily disabled, was 47,801; and the number of people who lost their lives was 1,421.

All of these figures, I regret to say, were records. Of course one of the factors in the growing total of accidents is the great increase in the amount of driving that is being done. Last year motorists in this province drove an estimated total mileage in excess of 20 billion. This was up 9.2 per cent from the year before.

Figures of that order are rather incomprehensible. I regard them as astronomical. The amount of driving, then, that was done on the roads and the highways of Ontario last year, 20 billion miles, would equate with travelling the distance from here to the moon and back every 13 minutes, day and night, for an entire year.

So with more vehicles and more drivers and greater distances, it is not surprising that accidents have increased; but neither is it acceptable. I am sure that all hon. members share with the department and me a very deep concern for this problem.

The accident rate—that is the risk of accident according to the distance driven—has remained fairly stable in recent years. Last year the rate of accidents per million miles was 5.2. This was up one tenth of a point from the previous year; but the rate of fatal accidents, 6.0 per hundred million miles was down one tenth of a point from the year before.

While these statistics may give us some reason for satisfaction, they are far from being acceptable to our department with its great concern for this problem. We might very well ask why the government cannot, by some sweeping order, end this carnage on the highways. All hon. members know very well why we cannot; because the only action that would be successful would be quite unacceptable; namely, to prohibit the use of motor vehicles.

Accidents are in the main the result of an attitude or an action on the part of the driver. We realize that driving is essentially a matter of personal responsibility. If we are going to correct the situation we have to get at the cause of it. We have to arrive at some way of influencing the actions or the attitude of drivers, and this the department is seeking to do, to bring about a correction in attitude on the part of drivers and pedestrians alike.

Our highway safety branch operates the most extensive programme of traffic safety on the continent. It has programmes for children and young people beginning before kindergarten age and running through secondary school.

We are particularly happy about the success of our driver training courses in the secondary schools. This is an extracurricular activity with the approval of both The Department of Transport and The Department of Education. Last year it was in operation in some 60 secondary schools; now some 75; and we expect when the school term opens in September that the course will be available in about 125 of our secondary schools.

It had excellent reception and I think none can gainsay that the teaching of good driving at the secondary school level brings about better driving habits on the highways and an increase in highway safety.

There is also a film available for use by high school students and community groups entitled: "Right from the Start".

For adults, the department has both advertising and publicity campaigns; gives assistance to local community groups in their work on behalf of highway safety and conducts the road safety workshops that have been so successful around the country. The last three were in Ottawa, in Windsor and about six weeks ago, in Sault Ste. Marie.

Other factors contributing to highway safety are the very realistic programme of driver examination conducted by the department; the work of our traffic engineering branch with municipalities in drafting by-laws looking to either better traffic flow or enhanced road safety, and our demerit point system.

The demerit point system has made a very real impact on public consciousness. Last year there were 39,495 drivers in this province who came up to the six-point level and received the warning or advisory letter. At the nine-point level some 12,562 drivers were called in for interviews.

This, I would think, was perhaps the most important factor in the operation of the demerit point system. Here the drivers at the nine-point level, to the number of 12,562, called in for interviews had laid before them those faults or wrong attitudes that were spoiling their driving. They had to face up to the situation that unless they mended their ways they would suffer the loss of driving privileges. So successful has this programme been that only 2.5 per cent of those who received the warning letter, or had the interview, went on to the 15-point level and were deprived of their driving privileges.

Additional to the operation of the demerit point system were the courts where some 24,200 drivers in this province lost their driving licences by compulsory suspension on convictions under the Criminal Code or for offences under The Highway Traffic Act with magistral discretion.

So we see the operation of the courts and the demerit point system effectively restraining dangerous driving in this province so that those who are extreme or habitual bad drivers can expect to be identified and have their driving privileges suspended.

While most of the accidents—or collisions, to use a more exact term—are caused by some action of the driver, the mechanical condition or the deficiency of the vehicle is a cause or part of a cause of some accidents. About one million vehicles were tested last year by police inspection or voluntary safety checks on the traffic lanes provided by our department. I understand that the provincial police checked more than 500,000 vehicles last year, and this was supplemented by the action and vigilance of municipal police forces across the province. In Toronto some 75,000 safety checks of one kind or another were made by the Metropolitan Toronto Police. So you see the part this vigilance and action by the police plays in traffic safety. Hon. members are aware that we now have before the House amendments to The Highway Traffic Act, one of which aims to clarify and strengthen the position of the police in this function.

Then we have our voluntary 38-point safety check lanes—a permanent one at Downsview and our mobile lanes moving around the province. These mobile check lanes are an imaginative assembly of machinery. In 1963 they made safety checks on some 114,000 vehicles. The checks on the mobile safety lanes alone rose last year to 80,000, up some 17 per cent from the previous year. They visited 73 different locations, which was 12 more than the previous year.

We find that there is increasing regard by the people for this kind of free, widely available, safety checks. This whole matter of vehicle safety is one that has given us some concern and has been receiving very careful study. As other phases of the traffic problem and the safety problem, the matter of vehicle safety is not all black or all white. There are those people who will tell you that the importance of the mechanical condition of the car is a factor in so few accidents that it can be dismissed as inconsequential. On the other hand, we have people who regard the safety of the vehicle as of such paramount importance that they figure if we had compulsory safety checks or something of this sort that the whole problem would be solved.

As a result of our studies, sir, we have come to these conclusions: first, that while most accidents are caused by some action or fault of the driver, there are occasions when the mechanical condition of the vehicle was partly responsible at least; secondly, that we should take all practical steps to ensure that vehicles are kept in top safety condition for operating on the highways; thirdly, for the present, the most practical course is to support the police safety checks that are now being made and to extend our own facilities for voluntary checks on these safety lanes.

To this end we are assembling three more mobile units, bringing our complement to eight. These will be available to communities across the province where they are proving to be so greatly in demand that they are now signed up well ahead. We will be bringing in a more intensive campaign of public information, urging upon people the desirability of keeping their cars in top mechanical condition, urging them to visit their own garages or to utilize the facility of one of our check lanes.

Before coming to this conclusion, the pros and cons of compulsory vehicle examination have been very carefully weighed. We have looked at the experience in other jurisdictions, we have used our own statistics, we have thought the matter out as best we can with all the data available to us and we have concluded that this would not make any very substantial difference. First of all, I would say to the hon. members that we agree that a compulsory safety check programme in the province would be feasible. It would cost in the neighbourhood of $12 million to establish. We could operate it at an annual cost of approximately $5 million.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): How much?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Five million dollars a year. If our department felt a compulsory check system would produce any substantial reduction in traffic accidents over and above the system we are following and expanding, it would not hesitate to recommend such a programme. But for the present, we are not satisfied that it would produce any such results.

Another problem, and a difficult one to deal with, in the past, has been that of the motorist who does not carry insurance. In many cases of accidents involving an uninsured vehicle, it was difficult and not infrequently impossible for the individual motorist, the injured party, by personal action, to obtain payment covering damages he suffered. It was in this situation that this government acted in a very forward looking way back in 1947 when it introduced the Unsatisfied Judgment Fund. This was pioneer legislation and brought to motorists of Ontario a very substantial measure of protection against the uninsured motorist and the hit-and-run driver.

In the summer of 1962, out of the experience of the operation of this fund and a survey of what was done in other jurisdictions, we brought in a successor, the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Fund. Outstanding among its provisions were the increase in the amounts payable from a single accident to a total of $35,000, and procedures for settling claims without the need of a court judgment. In the operation of this fund the hopes of the Minister expressed when it was brought in have been abundantly realized. These were that it would provide the people of Ontario with the best coverage available any place on the continent against the uninsured driver and the hit-and-run. Since this fund came into effect in mid-summer of 1962, until the end of 1963—a period of 18 months—no fewer than 6,013 claims were settled, paying out a total of $5,700,000. Just to realize the magnitude of the settlements, may I say that the total of claims settled, 6,013 in that 18-month period, was more than half the total of claims paid in the 15-year operation of the previous fund.

It is interesting to note that the majority of the new claims coming before that fund are being settled without a judgment. Through operation of this fund aided by the imposition of the $20 penalty for those applying for registrations without insurance, we now have, through the full period of 1963 only 2.3 per cent uninsured drivers.

If hon. members will refer now to the estimates before them they will find that for our department I am asking for a total of $7,571,000. This is the gross amount for running the department for the coming fiscal year, but hon. members will see, too, in item five, some $630,000 of this is allocated for the operation of the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Fund this year.

The fund is self-sustaining, so that sum is in the nature of an advance; and at the end of the year that sum will be repaid to the department in full. Therefore, our net expenditure for the year is the gross amount I mentioned, less $630,000, for a net of $6,941,000. This total is some $564,000 above a year ago, an increase of about 9 per cent. It is made up of two items and to these I shall make brief reference in conclusion: (a) Expanded operations of the department in consequence of growth; and (b) the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Transportation Study. Because of the increase in vehicle registrations, driver licences, and increased driver examination and because of the projected expanded programme of vehicle testing, and so on, this normal growth of the department calls for an increased expenditure of $239,000. This covers the expansion of the department and the increased services to the public.

In addition, the department is working on the mechanization of drivers' records, even as we mechanized the issuing of drivers' licences, and is continuing its research into the utilization of mechanical means for the issuing of vehicle licensing and plates.

For the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Transportation Study we are asking $400,000 this year. This represents an increase of $325,000 over a year ago. For the benefit of new hon. members perhaps I could sketch in some background.

This study is a new and imaginative approach by the government to the complex problem of urban transportation. It is taking a close look at the present and potential means of transportation in an area bounded roughly by Hamilton, Barrie, Oshawa and Lake Ontario. Its findings will be of great value in assessing the transportation problems of highly populated urban areas in all parts of the province, as well as giving guidance in formulating policies for development of transportation in the immediate area under examination. Serving with me on the executive committee are my colleagues the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) who acts as its chairman, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) and the chairman of Metropolitan Toronto.

On our technical committee are representatives also from the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. This study is concerned with the road, rail and transit services in this area of approximately 3,000 square miles, in which some two million people work, or have their residence, some 70 municipalities. It has made great progress in the past year. It is very much concerned with the future as well as with the present.

Following its inception the committee moved, first, to assemble plans throughout the area which were in progress or projected. It heard briefs from all the transportation agencies in the area. It then appointed a study director. Following that was a detailed investigation which showed, as feasible, the utilization of certain of the existing railway rights of way for commuter service. Then it followed on with assembling data on many related facts, e.g.:

The existing demand for commuter service, the potential demand, the engineering problems, the need for parking at the stations, the use of feeder bus lines and so on. Conditional upon these reports will be the consideration of whether we set up a pilot or demonstration commuter service project as the best means of resolving some of the unknown factors. This study is looking also at the potential for subway, freeway and bus line as well as commuter services. It is concerned very much with the integration of them all into an overall complex or pattern.

In the coming year, to complete the assembling of all this data, it will be necessary to draw extensively on outside agencies and consulting firms because of the impossibility of drawing together such a sizable group of highly trained technicians for a short-term project. These outside agencies and consulting firms will operate under the aegis and direction of our compact study group.

The past year has seen the ground work laid for the pursuit of the detailed investigations in an orderly and fruitful manner. In the year ahead, a vast amount of work will be done as this significant and unprecedented study moves towards the accomplishment of its aims.

Mr. Singer: I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. Minister. He is in a new department, at least for himself, and as carefully as I have listened I fail to understand still the need for the continuance of this department as a separate department of government.

We have talked about this before in this House and it is obvious from the remarks of the hon. Minister today that he is merely giving a mechanical recital of a service department, which for so many years was successfully handled under The Department of Highways. Its work overlaps, in almost every respect, those duties of The Department of Highways; and the breaking down of this ministry into two departments seems to stray a long way from the recommendation given by the auditor in his report to this Legislature, that the government should be constantly on the alert for methods of saving money and controlling expenditures.

Of course, I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) has a serious problem. He has got a lot of hon. members over there and he has to create a lot of Cabinet posts, whether they are needed or not. I suppose this is the reason for the continuance of this particular department.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines):
Sour grapes!

Mr. Singer: Well, sour grapes perhaps, but I should think that the hon. Minister of Mines should be just as interested as anyone else in this House about running this government more efficiently. I do not think it comes under the head of efficiency to fragment, and to further fragment, the various responsibilities merely to create new titles, merely to have more Ministers in more private offices, merely to have more titles on the door and more Bigelow on the floor—I think that is the way the phrase goes—and merely to have more drivers driving the Ministers around to make more speeches. I do not think this is efficiency in government.

Now I was listening anxiously, Mr. Chairman, for some new ideas that would emerge from this hon. Minister. Some ideas that would perhaps add to the efficiency within the duties that have been granted to him. I was wondering, perhaps, if he would be prepared to say after these many years that there would be compulsory inspection of drivers. This has been advocated on this side of the House for a long time and the hon. Minister hardly touched on this in his remarks.

It has come to my attention within the last few days that since the big machines have taken over the issuance of drivers' licences that apparently the big machines are reissuing the drivers' licences and very little attention is paid to the answers to the questions that are on the backs of these licences.

One gentleman advised me just a few days ago that when he sent in his application for renewal of licence he carefully marked that section of the form which indicated that he had suffered some physical defect since his last application for licence. In fact, he indicated that he had had a serious stroke since he last received a licence. This apparently sounded no caution in the minds of the licence issuers and by return mail, or whenever it came back, the licence automatically went on its way through and there was no change at all.

It would have seemed reasonable to me, Mr. Chairman, that when this advice came back to the government as a result of an honest answer to a sensible inquiry, that there would be some machinery available in government to do something about this. When an individual indicates that he has had a stroke, and that perhaps there is some doubt in his mind about his continued ability to drive, the government should be alert to this sort of thing. Certainly the individual was sufficiently alert to have so advised the government. But it is my instruction that no action was taken and in the ordinary course of events the licence came back in the mail.

Now Mr. Chairman, this is no way to run a business, I would think. Certainly the hon. Minister should look at the wonders of these machines that he has installed and see if perhaps there should not be some much more careful check.

This is part of the theme that we have put forward over the years, about compulsory examination of drivers, and I would think that this is something about which the government should be very seriously concerned. People's physical conditions change over the years. Their eyesight is not always what it was at the time they originally got their licences. Their general physical being is not always in the same condition that it was in the years that they took their original tests. Certainly it would seem logical to me that we could and should work out a system of compulsory re-examination.

The hon. Minister was concerned, as we all are, about the increasing incidence of fatal accidents, of personal injury accidents, of property damage and that sort of thing. It would seem to me that one very serious step that could be taken to cut these figures down, to cut these percentages down, would be a very careful system of re-examination of drivers over the years. I do not think it would be logical, nor does anyone expect the government, to re-examine every driver every year. Certainly over a period of five years, every driver could and should expect to be re-examined. I would have hoped that we would have heard something along this line from the hon. Minister.

I would have hoped, insofar as accident prevention was concerned, we would have heard some remarks about the relationship between this department and The Department of the Attorney General, because there seems to be a new approach to provincial police and the role of the provincial police in the enforcement of traffic laws and in safety precautions generally. But I have not heard at all of any meetings, or series of meetings, or the establishment of any liaison between The Department of the Attorney General and The Department of Transport. It may be that behind the scenes these things are going on; but if they are going on behind the scenes, then I would have thought that this hon. Minister would have said, and been proud to say, that there is a new system of co-operation between these two departments which is working to produce better safety for the drivers and for the people of Ontario.

The hon. Minister refers somewhat to the question of compulsory inspection of vehicles and suggests that this would cost $5 million. He goes on to say that the studies done in his department do not indicate that this would produce any substantial reduction in vehicle accidents. Well, these figures are not the same as the figures that I have had occasion to read and refer to in this House before. A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, I remarked upon the system and the success of compulsory vehicle inspection in the city of Vancouver. The figures are there in the previous Hansard if the hon. Minister wants to refer to them, and I am not going to quote them again.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that in the city of Vancouver where there has been compulsory vehicle inspection, the incidence of accidents has fallen substantially and I would think that as a pilot scheme the hon. Minister should be prepared to try this in certain areas; perhaps not all of the province at once, perhaps not all of the province could be properly done, but pick out one or two of the urban centres and try it. I think the hon. Minister would be very pleasantly surprised, as would all the people of Ontario, at the fantastic success compulsory inspection of vehicles would have in lessening the ratio of accidents.

I was interested too, Mr. Chairman, in the hon. Minister's concern about the ability of people who drive on the roads, and in this connection I thought the hon. Minister and the House would be anxious to hear a clipping that appeared in the Toronto Telegram on Friday, December 20. I think it is important enough insofar as the estimates of this department are concerned to read it in its entirety into the record.

It is headed:

STARTS FIFTH YEAR IN JAIL
THREE MAGISTRATES WANT LIFE BAN ON DRIVER

A motorist whom Magistrate C. A. Thoburn recommended should have his licence taken away for life started a six months jail term yesterday for driving while under suspension. The magistrate had refused—

The man's name is here in the clipping. I am not going to read it. I will call him X.

The magistrate had refused X time to pay a $500 fine. X, the father of a baby, has a driving record that includes five convictions for driving under suspension and four for leaving the scenes of accidents. X said he had spent a total of about four years in jail for driving offences. Two magistrates had earlier recommended the lifetime suspension of his licence. X was stopped in 1962 for driving while under suspension but ran away from the police. He went to Vancouver and was arrested there last week. During the past year his licence was reinstated by the Minister of Highways.

Well, I am sure the clipping was wrong in this regard. It would be the hon. Minister of Transport who must have reinstated the licence.

Commented Magistrate Thorburn:

I don't know what good it will do to recommend his licence be suspended for life when two other magistrates have also recommended it. I am amazed that the Minister would reinstate his licence after such a short time against the recommendation of Magistrate William Rogers and Magistrate S. T. Bigelow.

X has shown over the years a total disregard for the law and the highways. With the civil war that is taking place on the highways, he is not the type who should be allowed to drive.

And then the magistrate concludes:

But let the Minister take the responsibility, not me.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how typical this is. Perhaps it is just one incident and one incident does not necessarily colour the whole approach of the department. But here is something that His Worship Magistrate Thorburn has seen fit to comment on at substantial length. The two other magistrates recommended, and the hon. Minister, in his wisdom, saw fit to reinstate X's licence for some reason that certainly escapes the three magistrates concerned, and escapes me as well. I would think that the hon. Minister should very carefully turn his attention to incidents of this type.

I was interested to hear the hon. Minister's comments on the progress that has been made insofar as the unsatisfied judgment fund is concerned—it is now called the motor vehicle accident claims fund. I was interested to hear the hon. Minister taking credit for all of the forward steps that had been taken, and somebody has to take credit, the government did act on certain recommendations that were made. Those recommendations, Mr. Chairman, were made, as you will recall, by the select committee which inquired into the workings of these matters and were among a series of recommendations made.

When the estimates of The Department of Insurance were before us, Mr. Chairman, I made some comments in connection with that report and read certain portions of it again into the record. And I am interested to note that while the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) did not bother to answer those inquiries, the hon. Minister of Transport apparently feels these questions come under his jurisdiction. Well, so be it, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. Minister of Transport feels that these inquiries and these suggestions come under his jurisdiction, I would be very happy to hear this afternoon the answer from the hon. Minister of Transport as to why the most important and remaining recommendations of this committee have not been implemented. We have heard no comment at all in regard to those recommendations.

Those recommendations, you will recall, Mr. Chairman, suggested a system of compensation without fault be established in the province of Ontario which would, in my opinion and the opinion of many of those people who have studied this report, give to Ontario, without a doubt, the best system of automobile insurance in the whole of North America, probably in the whole of the western world. The hon. Minister's somewhat idle boast that we have now the best system in Canada, I do not think is in fact at all correct; there are other systems which are equally as good. New Jersey's is at least as good, Saskatchewan's presently is much better, and there are others which are at least just as good.

I do not know why the hon. Minister pats himself on the back quite so obviously, when he is not prepared to even comment upon the most important recommendations in that report, the report of the committee which, incidentally, was headed by his colleague, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan). We in this House know the abilities of the hon. Provincial Treasurer; he chaired that committee and led it to these conclusions and we think very highly of the report. I think it is somewhat of an insult to this House that the hon. Minister did not even comment in regard to these very important recommendations.

Somewhere along the line we did extract an admission from the hon. Attorney General that a special committee, an inside committee if I can call it that, has been appointed to examine these additional recommendations. Just what this inside committee consists of we have not as yet been told.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): We have a bill in that does not cover it.

Mr. Singer: We have a bill in that does not cover it as well. The hon. Attorney General admitted that he had been asked to make two recommendations for appointments to the committee. I asked the hon. Attorney General what the committee was supposed to do, what its terms of reference were, and he would not answer. I asked the hon. Attorney General who the members of the committee were, and he would not answer. And I ask the same question of the hon. Minister of Transport because he, apparently, is the Minister who is concerned with this. And I think the hon. Minister owes an explanation to this House as to what committee has been set up to further examine the report of the select committee.

The select committee's report makes sense in all regards, that it has and is sufficiently good to allow the hon. Minister to pat himself on the back. I agree that it is good, and maybe the hon. Minister should pat himself on the back, but why does he not take the next step, the next step that really would be significant, and would give Ontario something that it could really boast about? If he is conducting further inquiries, let us be frank about it, let us tell the hon. members of this House what are the inquiries that he is conducting, and who are the people who are examining the various ramifications of it?

This select committee did a great deal of examination; it sought opinions from all possible people that the select committee could imagine were concerned with it. It sought opinions from the legal profession; a renowned group of lawyers came before the committee and gave their opinions. It sought opinions from the insurance industry, and the All-Canada insurance group came before the committee and gave its opinion. The members of the committee are not without some knowledge in these things, and they agreed unanimously that these were good recommendations. The hon. Minister has insulted this House by not even choosing to comment upon these matters this afternoon. And I ask why, Mr. Chairman; I think he should, I think he must.

A few days ago the hon. Minister saw fit to bring in certain recommendations dealing with uniform legislation for crosswalks. I commend him for this. Not too long ago several of the members suggested, including myself, that it made good common sense to have uniform legislation for crosswalks applying to the whole of the province of Ontario. But the hon. Minister has neglected to include in that legislation—and I suppose this is more in order under the provisions of his amending bill, but I will just mention it casually here—I would have wished, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister would have seen fit to bring in, with these proposals, the additional recommendations, or the additional safeguards, which the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto has included in its crosswalk legislation, those things relating to prohibition for passing within 100 feet of the crosswalk, the matter of not allowing a car to enter a crosswalk while a pedestrian is in that crosswalk, and that sort of thing. Those things have been found, in Metropolitan Toronto, to be very substantial additional safety measures.

I would urge upon the hon. Minister to carefully reconsider the bill he has before the House, insofar as crosswalks are concerned, and perhaps to amend that crosswalk portion of his legislation to include those additional safety measures. They have been proven to be very excellent safety measures in Metro; and since they were, and since the original crosswalk idea emanated substantially from the thinking and the studies done by a Mr. Sam Cass, the Metropolitan Toronto traffic engineer who brought in these additional refinements, I would think the hon. Minister should look very carefully at that portion of his legislation before it comes to the House for second reading.

I was interested too, Mr. Chairman, in the hon. Minister's comments in connection with the traffic studies which are going on in the whole Metropolitan Toronto area. The members of the committee, doing this study apparently now, are the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, the hon. Minister of Highways and the hon. Minister of Transport and I gather, somewhere along the line, the personnel on this committee has been changed. At least the Cabinet Ministers have been changed, because it is my recollection that when, on December 18, 1962, the committee was set up, the hon. gentleman who now occupies the portfolio of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) was a member of that committee. He was a member of that committee I would have thought—if my memory serves me right—because of his position as Attorney General. The hon. Minister of Travel and whatever his department is called (Mr. Auld) shakes his head. He was on the committee in any event. I suppose he vacated his position on that committee when he left The Department of Transport and was replaced by the present hon. Minister of Transport.

But I did comment, and I think the comment was appropriate whether the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests was on or not, that it seems more than passing strange that, in a committee appointed by this government to investigate traffic problems in and around Metropolitan Toronto, a member for Huron, a member for Leeds, a member for northern Ontario should be the only people who are members of this House appointed to inquire. We have replaced the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Auld) with a member for Ottawa South (Mr. Haskett). Mr. Chairman, it would still seem to me that, with all of the hon. members available to the government from Metropolitan Toronto, at least one of the members of that committee could and should be a member from Metropolitan Toronto.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity): Mr. Allen is chairman.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Allen, the chairman of Metro, is on that committee, yes; but he holds a substantially different position to the Cabinet Ministers on that. He is not a representative in the strict sense, nor really in any sense of this government.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: They are pretty hog-ish in Toronto. They want two or more for every one appointed outside Toronto.

Mr. Bryden: It happens this deals with Toronto proper.

Mr. Singer: I would think there would be no one howl louder or longer than the hon. Minister of Mines if four people, or four members from Toronto, were appointed to investigate something going on in Port Arthur.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Right!

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): You have made your point—

Mr. Singer: No need to gild the lily.

Mr. Bryden: To what lily are you referring?

Mr. Singer: In any event, since December 18, 1962, when this committee was appointed, some preliminary studies have been done and there have been reports of those preliminary studies. It has been a long time since the committee has been reported. Some of the personnel has changed. The hon. Minister says some $400,000-odd is going to be expended this year.

We are most anxious in Metropolitan Toronto to have the best possible government advice, and an indication of government policy, in regard to Toronto's transportation problems. I would certainly hope that the hon. Minister would have been able to give us a date when we could reasonably expect the final recommendations of this committee to come forward. We have not heard this; all we have heard is that the committee is going to continue to sit and the problems are very serious.

We knew the problems were very serious much longer than the two years ago that the committee was appointed. And we knew that the committee would continue to sit—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): That is why we have an unbiased committee.

Mr. Singer: And we knew, too, that the government probably would spend a few dollars in allowing the committee to sit, but we would like some answers in connection with this problem. We would like them quickly, and we would urge that the government do something about this at the earliest possible opportunity.

An hon. member: Pretty gloomy picture.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, very briefly those are the comments I have to make in connection with the general administration of this department. As these estimates are discussed, I am certain my hon. colleagues will have additional questions and criticism to levy at the hon. Minister. In very brief summary, we believe that this is a department that really has no excuse for continuing as a separate entity. Even within the limited fields that it has to look after, many of the things that should have been done have not been done. It is very disappointing to hear the hon. Minister make his introductory remarks in connection with these estimates without real indication that substantial progress is going to be made. We have heard none of that this afternoon, and it is unfortunate that this continues to take place under this government.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, this department was set up a few years ago. At that time it was inaptly named The Department of Transport. It should properly, in my opinion, have been called The Department of Highway Licensing and Safety, and as far as I can see from anything in the annual report or from anything the hon. Minister has said today, it should still have that name, because that is essentially its function. I do not, however, agree entirely with the hon. member for Downsview, Mr. Chairman, that the department could properly or satisfactorily revert to its previous status of being one or more branches of The Department of Highways. What I would like to see instead, would be the development of the department into a proper Department of Transport.

Transportation is unquestionably one of the most important conditions of economic development. I should think that the two services that could be regarded as basic services are transportation and power, and any economy will not develop beyond the limits that are imposed by its facilities of transportation and power. We should be developing a transportation policy in this province, an integrated co-ordinated policy. I would assume that The Department of Transport would be the department that ought to develop such a policy, or at any rate should provide the information from which the government can develop a policy. This is surely part of the total planning of the government. Unfortunately, this government does not seem to believe in planning, so everything is on a hit-and-miss basis. But if we are going to have co-ordinated development of the province, and if we are going to create potential for economic growth in the future, then we need an integrated and co-ordinated transportation policy.

The department, apparently, did not have that function in mind when it was created, and it would appear that it still has not developed it, except to a very limited degree. One need only look at the latest annual report of the department which was placed on our desks on Friday. If one turns to the introductory section and gets past this scintillating picture of the hon. Minister and on to the introductory portions of the report, one finds that the deputy Minister outlines what he describes as the highlights of the report. He outlines those highlights under nine headings, and I will read the headings to the House for the benefit of any hon. members who may not have had time as yet to look through the report.

First is registration growth, in which the report indicates the increase in motor vehicle registrations; next is motor vehicle accident claims fund; third is new programme for quarterly licensing of commercial vehicles; fourth is new programme for driver licensing; fifth is movie "Right from the Start"—which is a safety movie and no doubt a very useful safety movie; sixth is road safety workshops; seventh is portable safety check lanes; eighth relates to revenues, and the ninth relates to legislative changes made during the preceding year. Those are the highlights of the report as outlined in the report itself.

There is not any suggestion at all that there is anything that the department did that would merit the description of a "highlight" relating to what I should think would be its basic function, and that is the development of transportation policies for the province. I am not suggesting that the licensing and safety functions which the department apparently regards as its prime functions are unimportant—I believe they are very important and I would agree with some of the criticism the hon. member for Downsview made of the progress the department has made to date in those fields. I would also agree that the department has made significant progress in those fields.

But in relation to the need for a transportation policy in this province I would suggest that those are secondary functions. Yet they are the only functions which catch the eye as far as the "highlights" of the departmental report are concerned.

One has to get to page 40 before one comes to a heading of traffic engineering branch. Under that heading we find that traffic engineering branch has given technical assistance to a number of local municipalities, which, I have no doubt, was very useful assistance but still has nothing to do really with the development of a transportation policy.

Then there is a reference, and the first reference, to the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study, on which I will comment again in a moment, but I will merely mention it at this stage.

One goes to page 41 and one sees the heading, rather hopefully, planning and procedures branch. When I first saw that heading I thought, well, here at last we are coming to some awareness on the part of the department that transportation planning is necessary, but my hopes were dashed. I discovered that this had to do with the use of computers and other machinery in the processing of applications for licences. Finally, on page 42, we come to research branch. I do not think it has a very large appropriation but we do have a research branch, which has conducted a number of unrelated studies, all of them worthy in themselves but none of them relating to the basic problem that I have been talking about.

Of course, we have had in the last year or two a significant development—the first recognition by the government that planning is necessary if we are to develop adequate transportation policies. I refer to the establishment of the so-called Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study. It is the rather curious name that this body has been assigned, but I will take it as it has been given. I would wish the hon. Minister might think of a briefer name and one that one can get one's tongue around more readily. It can be said, I think, that the committee or the study or the study group or whatever it is, has made a good start about ten years late, on a very difficult problem. That is the problem of integration of transportation facilities and the development of a transportation policy for the region described by the hon. Minister as the semi-circle more or less bounded by Hamilton, Lake Simcoe and Oshawa—the semi-circle surrounding Toronto.

To the best of my knowledge the committee so far has issued two publications reporting on its work. The first is a prospectus. This was issued in October, 1963. I was rather surprised that it took that long for the committee to find out what it was going to do, but it did issue a prospectus at that time which was very useful. I think it indicates that the committee has grasped the problem and has plans afoot to tackle it. Then it issued its first technical study which was described by the hon. Minister. I will not go into it in detail but it relates essentially to the integration of railway lines into the present transportation system in the area. This becomes important in view of the fact that many more railway lines will soon be available for local transportation within the area covered by the study. But this is as far as we have got so far on a consideration of a problem that had become critical ten years ago. There is no suggestion that I can see, either in the department's annual report or in the estimates or in the hon. Minister's introductory remarks that the government has learned anything from this problem in the Toronto area and that it has any plans with regard to any other area at all. The prospectus that the study committee issued does mention this fact and I am quoting:

To some degree these conditions—that is the conditions in the area under study:—can be duplicated in all of the metropolitan communities in Ontario. Since World War II this region and similar areas have undergone unprecedented growth featured by the spreading use of land for urban purposes.

And so on. The only suggestion of possibility of government consideration of the problems to which the prospectus itself calls attention, that is problems in areas other than the Metropolitan Toronto area, is on page six of the prospectus and it says:

This prospectus is presented as a recommendation for a transportation study of this region which it is expected will assist in considering similar problems throughout Ontario.

Now I do not know if we have to wait for the completion of the studies on Metropolitan Toronto before we can expect consideration of similar problems throughout Ontario. I hope not, but if that is so, Mr. Chairman, it will be entirely in line with long-standing government policy of never dealing with a problem until it reaches crisis proportions.

That is what happened with regard to the Metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study. We were finally faced with a crisis in transportation in this area so the government finally got around to doing something about it, at least to the extent of studying it so that proper plans could be worked out to solve it. Now are we going to wait for crises to develop in one metropolitan area after another across the province before we get any action from this department or the government to study their problems? I would submit to the hon. Minister and to the government that his department should right now be conducting studies of other major metropolitan areas, studies in co-operation with the areas concerned, to anticipate the problems that they are certainly going to meet and to have plans ready to meet those problems before they become critical.

I would also suggest to the hon. Minister that it is a function of his department to consider the overall problem of transportation within the province, particularly within the densely populated southern portion of the province. We not only have problems of transportation, of moving goods and people, within metropolitan areas and their immediate neighbourhoods; we also have the problem of moving goods and people between metropolitan areas, between centres of population. We should be developing integrated transportation policies to deal with that phase of the problem as well as the localized phases and the two should be integrated.

We should have one overall transportation policy which takes account of both types of problem, both the interurban and intraurban transportation problems. And, of course, when we develop that far, we naturally get into areas of federal jurisdiction. I think there should be close co-operation between this government and the federal government to develop a transportation policy for Ontario, and more particularly for southern and southwestern Ontario, that will make the most efficient use of all phases of transportation.

I think we should look for an end to the day when we have senseless and wasteful competition between different types of transportation. We should integrate transportation so that we do not have the highway transports and the railways cutting each other's throats. Let us have a rationalized policy which will result in the most efficient use of each type of service. That is the type of thing that we should be working toward, that is the type of thing that will make for the greatest efficiency in terms of the economy as a whole and will therefore create the greatest potential for growth of the economy. But as long as we drift along using no foresight at all and dealing with problems only when they become crises we will never develop such a transportation policy.

The federal government, of course, has to look at the problem in terms of the nation as a whole. Its position in many ways is analogous to ours. We have to look at the province-wide problem and at the same time the individual problems of individual population centres; and the federal government has to look at the nation-wide problem, but it has to integrate into its consideration of that problem the consideration of the transportation problems of each of the major regions of the country.

This is the sort of thing that in my opinion The Department of Transport ought to be undertaking as part of a larger government policy of planning for the development of the province. But whether or not it believes in overall planning, it certainly should be making information available to develop integrated transportation policies. We cannot afford any longer to carry on on the inefficient, wasteful, hit-and-run basis on which we have been carrying on in the past.

The Department of Highways, I may say, has been showing some signs of giving study to the economic consequences and economic factors involved in the development of highways, but highways are only one phase of transportation. That is only one form of transportation facility and nobody, as far as I can see, is looking at this problem in terms of its totality, with the exception of this one area surrounding Metropolitan Toronto where the government belatedly is giving consideration to the problem.

I would also suggest to The Department of Transport that in its consideration of overall transportation policies, if it ever gets around to giving any consideration to such policies, as I think it should, it should be giving consideration to technology. Maybe, sir, some of our transportation problems will be solved by new methods of transportation that are at most in the planning stage, or even perhaps in the fantasy stage.

I have read, as no doubt other hon. members and the hon. Minister have, various suggestions for new methods of transportation, sir. Some of them sound quite fantastic. One of them I read about just the other day involved people being shot in capsules through space for either long or short distances. It sounded quite fantastic to me, but let us bear in mind that in this world of technological revolution the fantasy of today is the reality of tomorrow.

I am not saying that all fantasies become realities, but some of them do. There are certainly some developments in this field that are advancing beyond the fantasy stage. I would suggest for example the use of hovercraft and hydro-foils are matters that we should be considering here.

I am not suggesting that The Department of Transport can do the engineering research on those developments. I do not think it can, not as it is presently constituted, and I do not think it is necessary. There are other people with the facilities available doing that sort of research. But I think the department should be on top of that type of research, it should be fully familiar with technological developments and their potential.

In terms of planning transportation for the future, it may be that in the not-too-distant future the most efficient form of transportation of people for intermediate distances, let us say, between London and Toronto, may be by a hovercraft that might be able to travel—as I understand it—on a single rail with speeds up to 200 miles an hour. That would probably be a more efficient method for that distance of transport than an airplane. As I understand it, in the field of air transportation, the intermediate distances are not too efficient, especially as the planes become more powerful and faster. In the distance between London and Toronto they hardly get up in the air, these planes, before they have to come down again. So maybe there are better ways of transporting people, and even goods, for intermediate distances of that kind.

The hydro-foil also may have a role to play in the development of transportation facilities in an area such as Toronto. It is possible that we could use the waterways, which provide us with a free right of way to transport people and goods, for quite significant distances within this Metropolitan area and its immediate region. These are some of the newer developments. I am not suggesting they are practical at the moment, but they are becoming practical, and it seems to me that a Department of Transport which gives no consideration to these developments at all, and is not considering their potential for the development of future transportation policy, is simply sound asleep.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister, and I do it as charitably as I can, that his department, which has had several Ministers, sir, has always had this fact in common, that it has been sound asleep as far as the basic job is concerned. It has been so preoccupied with the functions it took over with The Department of Highways, which though they may be important are still secondary, that it has hardly had any time to deal with what ought to be its real function, and one can see it from the estimates.

There is $400,000 out of $7.5 million for the Metro Toronto and region transportation study. Buried in there somewhere, no doubt, is a vote for the research branch, but it is probably a negligible amount. There is also $74,000 for the traffic engineering branch, which has a limited role in the field I have been talking about. Outside of that there is nothing in these estimates of $7.5 million. There is perhaps $.5 million, at the outside, for what is undoubtedly the most important function of the department and, what is more to the point, one of the most important functions in the future development of this province—because as I said at the outset of this portion of my remarks, the growth of an economy will always be limited by its transportation. I think that is a basic elementary economic fact with which everybody is familiar, and in this day and age we cannot expect to have efficient transportation without adequate planning of that transportation in relation to an overall policy.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of these estimates I would like to comment on at this time. This relates to the safety function of the department, but it is a phase of the safety function to which I think the department has given quite inadequate attention. Indeed it has not given much attention to it at all, other than a few propaganda blurbs at Christmas time.

I am referring to what I consider the most serious problem in the field of highway safety and that is the problem of drinking and driving. I would like to say, to begin with, that I am not passing any judgment on drinking by itself. If a fellow wants to have a drink—I have been known to have the odd one myself, I may say—it is his business as far as I am concerned. I could not care less. But, if a fellow wants to have three or four drinks and then get behind the wheel of a car, it ceases to be his private business. It becomes a matter of public concern, because such an individual creates a hazard both for himself and others. I do not think we have faced up to this problem in this province and, from anything I have been able to see up until now, I do not think there is much indication that we are planning to face up to it.

Yet it is one of the most, if not the most, important problems in the field of highway safety. I have noticed the accident statistics contained in the most recent annual report. They indicate, according to my mathematics, that the percentage of total accidents in which alcohol was a factor was about ten. In other words, alcohol was a factor, according to these statistics, in about ten per cent of all accidents in the province in the year 1962, which is the year for which the figures are given. But in fatal accidents, alcohol was a factor in 25.5 per cent; and in personal injury accidents it was a factor in just under 12 per cent. That is a greater-than-average factor in the more serious types of accidents.

Furthermore, I think that we should recognize the plain fact that alcohol is a much bigger factor in accidents than these statistics indicate. As authority for that statement, I would like to quote from an issue of the Criminal Law Quarterly of May 1960. This publication, I may say, has been before the government for a long time, but apparently it has had no influence on it.

I would like to quote a couple of passages from that magazine. One is on page 22. It is a quotation from a committee of the British Medical Association which says:

The committee is satisfied that the official returns for accidents caused by drivers who have taken alcohol underestimate very considerably the number of accidents due to this cause.

I would like also to quote from Mr. Edson Haines in the same magazine. Mr. Edson Haines, as he then was, Mr. Justice Haines as he now is, said:

As a lawyer engaged in the trial of motor vehicle cases for over 25 years I can say that alcohol is a contributing factor to far more accidents than the police can ever establish. It is commonplace for a lawyer to learn from his client that he has consumed four or five drinks before the accident while admitting to the officer that he had had only one or two or sometimes denying that he had any.

I do not think there is anybody who would deny the assertions of the authority I have just quoted, that alcohol is a substantially bigger factor in accidents than the statistics indicate; and yet, as I have already shown, the statistics indicate that it is a serious factor, particularly in the more serious types of accidents and, most serious of all, in fatal accidents.

Another thing I think we should bear in mind is that the driver who creates the greatest hazard on the highway is not the fellow who is seriously drunk. Such a driver, if he can manage to get behind the wheel of a car at all, is usually extremely cautious, not likely to drive his car along at 70 miles an hour. He is more likely to drive it at ten miles an hour. He does not create anything like the hazard of a fellow who has had just a few drinks and has no noticeable signs of impairment at all.

But the fellow who really creates a hazard on the highway is the fellow who has had just enough drinks that his judgment has been interfered with slightly so that he will take risks that he would not normally take. His reactions also have been slowed down slightly so that he will be unable to react as quickly to the difficult situation into which his impaired judgment may get him. He is the kind of fellow who may go driving along the highway at 75 miles an hour absolutely convinced that he is stone sober, completely in possession of his faculties and a completely safe driver. This is the kind of driver that should be watched, but he is the kind of driver that our laws do nothing about at all, or practically nothing.

In fact, I would like to make another quotation from Mr. Edson Haines, now Mr. Justice Haines, and I am quoting from him now since his appointment to the bench, from an article that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star on January 2, 1964:

Present laws favour the drinking driver, Mr. Justice Edson Haines of the Ontario Supreme Court said Tuesday night.

"The drinking driver knows the police cannot compel a breathalyzer test," he said, "and of course he is aware of the delightfully sporting section of the Criminal Code which prevents police making mention of his refusal to take the test in any subsequent trial."

One of our difficulties, Mr. Chairman, is that this problem of drinking and driving is still regarded as something of a joke. It is a game. If the drinking driver is led to believe that he can put one over on the police and if the police cannot pin it down, he has scored a point. I do not know what sort of a point he has scored, but some day the point he scores may be somebody's death, possibly his own, or somebody else's death. And too often people take the attitude that it is sort of funny if a fellow with a few drinks gets into a car and drives it. Usually the fellow himself, if he has not schooled himself in advance, is absolutely confident of his own capacity to drive and will brush aside the suggestion that he is not able to drive. He gets into the car and drives away with wheels spinning and squealing and everybody thinks it very funny, except that he has a lethal instrument that may kill someone, and unfortunately all too often does kill someone.

It is that kind of driver that we should direct our laws against, and yet the laws are quite inadequate to deal with him. In a good many cases, he probably could not be convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol or even driving while one's ability is impaired. With all the sporting chances that are given, even if one could prove a certain degree of concentration of alcohol in the man's blood, it may not be enough to prove impairment. Therefore there is no penalty at all, nothing to discourage him from carrying on in the same way as he has before.

Most authorities in this field have proposed—and I am proposing it here—that there should be a new offence created in addition to, and less serious than either of, the present offences of driving while impaired or driving while intoxicated. The law should be stated in strictly quantitative terms so that it can be more readily enforced. Our laws should provide that it is an offence for anyone to drive a motor vehicle when he has a concentration of alcohol in his blood exceeding .05 per cent. I may say this is not my idea; this comes from authorities all over the world on this problem, who agree that this is the best way to handle the problem. In fact, this device is used in many European countries.

I point out to the hon. Minister and to the House that this is analogous to our present way of dealing with speeding. We provide that on certain highways there will be a speed limit of 50 miles an hour, and on certain others it will be 60 miles an hour, but it is just an arbitrary figure. It is quite true that some people may be able to drive safely at 55 miles an hour on a certain highway whereas somebody else might not be able to exceed 45 miles an hour safely. But the law is definite, it takes the average, it does not try to adjust itself to every individual variation. It provides simply that if you go more than 50 miles an hour you have broken the law and that is it; and the driver knows it and there is no argument about it. He may argue but he knows perfectly well that if it can be established that he was driving in excess of 50 miles an hour, he is for it, he will be fined, as he should be.

That does not mean that we do not also have offences such as reckless driving or dangerous driving, but we do have a readily enforceable offence established in the law with regard to the speed at which one may drive. I am suggesting that we should also have in the law of the province a quantitative limit on the concentration of alcohol that a person may have in his blood when he drives a car, exactly analogous to the speed limit, and that if he has more than .05 per cent, and if it can be established that that is, in fact, true, he has broken the law and there is not any argument about whether or not his body was one that could tolerate a somewhat higher degree of concentration of alcohol. It is true there are variations. Some human beings' bodies will tolerate a higher degree than others, and all human beings will tolerate a higher degree at one time than at another. But as Dr. Ward Smith pointed out in this same journal that I was talking about, people should not experiment with their tolerance to alcohol on the highways. Let them do it somewhere else.

It has been found by intensive scientific research that most people are usually unfit to drive a car safely if they have a greater concentration than .05 per cent. Yet in our courts it is usually considered that a person is not impaired unless he has at least .1 per cent. So there is a big margin there of people who can be extremely dangerous drivers, but who can probably not be convicted of impaired driving even if satisfactory evidence can be brought in in their trial, which is not always the case. There is a big area where there can be quite dangerous driving which is not covered in the law at all. I am suggesting to the hon. Minister that it ought to be covered, that we should have some such provision in the laws of Ontario.

I would like to read one or two extracts from the lengthy and learned article of Dr. Ward Smith in this issue of the Criminal Law Quarterly that I referred to. He says right at the beginning of his article:

Why is it that in this country in 1960—and one can say the same about 1964:

—we are still toying by way of legislation with minute advances in this field? Why, on the other hand, did Norway, as early as 1926, make it an offence for anyone to drive with .05 per cent or more alcohol in his bloodstream?

I would say "Why, indeed?" Why can we not, in the year of our Lord 1964, catch up to where Norway was in 1926, and where all scientific opinion that I have seen indicates we should be?

That is the sort of provision we should make in the law, but I think in order to make the law enforceable and make it meaningful, it should be backed up with a meaningful education programme. I am not now referring to such slogans as, "If you drive, don't drink," or "If you drink, don't drive," or what-have-you. I also recall "Good time Charlie," which was a series sponsored by the department a few years ago, and which I am happy to see has been abandoned, or I think it has been abandoned. I think it contributed nothing to education in this field. This sort of exhortation in my opinion has very little effect on people.

I think that you are going to get some sense into people's heads on this matter only if you put facts before them. I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister that the kind of facts he should get across are the kind of facts that the Alcoholism Research Foundation, or I guess it is called the Addiction Research Foundation nowadays, has been putting before the government and the public for years.

I am going to suggest to the hon. Minister that if we have a law limiting the amount of alcohol a person may have in his bloodstream while driving in the manner I have described, we should at the same time conduct an educational programme which will indicate to an individual how much drinking it takes to produce that amount of alcohol in his bloodstream on the average. There are always individual variations, but they are not that great.

In 1960, the Alcoholism Research Foundation, as it then was, published a chart showing the effect of drinking on the alcohol content of the blood. It published its charts in terms of a person weighing 140 pounds, then put in a footnote saying you can deduct an hour from what it shows for a person weighing 25 or 30 pounds more, and add an hour for a person weighing 25 or 30 pounds less. It defined a drink as being either a 12-ounce bottle of beer, three ounces of port or sherry, or 1.5 ounces of whisky. It showed that if the person had only one such drink, the effect on him would be negligible and therefore he could safely drive immediately. If he had two drinks—that is a person weighing 140 pounds—it was indicated he should wait two hours before he drove a car, because it would take two hours for the alcohol content of his blood to come down to .05 per cent. If he had three such drinks, he should wait four hours. This would apply to a person weighing 140 pounds. If the person weighed 165 or 170, he could take an hour off. In other words, after three drinks he should wait three hours. Now this is scientific information. This is information that, I think, should be put before the people. It should be part of an educational campaign to back up the law along lines I have suggested; but even, apart from the law, I think the information should be placed before the public.

I think the department should take time on television. I think it would be useful to the public of the province to have this sort of chart put before them on television with adequate commentary. That would be at least as useful as these ditties such as, "It's blended", or "It's the natural thing to do", and so on. I think maybe we should ask the breweries to put these charts on every time they put on one about it being blended, tasted and so on. "Take roast beef—for example—and then finally get around to beer."

This is the sort of information the department should place before the public. I would suggest that they do it in television spots. I think this sort of chart could be put across by repetition to get it into people's heads. I suspect there are very few men weighing 170 pounds who realize that, if they have had three drinks, they should wait three hours before driving a car. I can tell you a great many of my acquaintances, I will not name any names, who do not wait three hours to drive a car after having three drinks.

It has been suggested by an hon. member that I was talking about my hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald). I will point out that he weighs considerably more than 170 pounds, so I could not possibly have been talking about him.

However, Mr. Chairman, I am suggesting to the hon. Minister that he should have both a change in the law and an educational programme to do something effective about this problem of driving and drinking, and thereby reduce the hazards created by the drinking driver, which means most of the people, on the highway.

One further point should be mentioned in this connection; that is, that if we are to have a law limiting the concentration of alcohol which one may have in his blood when driving a car, then we have to have some way of determining what the concentration of alcohol is. There is no doubt that the person has to be prepared to submit to a test to determine what the concentration is. That brings up the old controversial issue of the breathalyzer test and I am suggesting to the government that breathalyzer tests should be made compulsory in this province, particularly to provide evidence for enforcing a law along the lines I am suggesting. Indeed, they would necessarily have to be compulsory for that purpose, and also to provide prima facie evidence in cases where it is considered appropriate to lay more serious charges than merely the one I was talking about.

I think the time has come when we should get over this ancient nonsense that there is an interference with the rights of the subject to provide, in the law, that a person who has the privilege, and it is a privilege, of driving a car in the province, should not have to take a breathalyzer test if there is reason to believe that he has recently imbibed alcoholic beverages and therefore will have at least some degree of concentration of alcohol in his blood. The breathalyzer test is a scientific, accurate way of determining the degree of concentration of alcohol in a person's blood.

I think that drivers, as a condition of getting a licence to drive a motor vehicle, should be required to agree that, if requested to do so by appropriate authority under appropriate circumstances, they will submit themselves to breathalyzer tests. And if they do not care to accept that condition, they should not have the right to drive motor vehicles on the highways of the province.

It has been suggested hysterically, time after time, that this is analogous to self-incrimination, that we will thereby require people to incriminate themselves. There is nothing whatsoever, I would like to suggest, in such a contention; and in support of what I say, I would like to quote from much greater authorities than I am or than any of those who have talked so freely on this subject. I would like to quote first from Mr. Justice Edson Haines as he now is, in the article I have already referred to in the Criminal Law Quarterly, where he said, and this is something that he was proposing:

It is proposed that we should no longer withhold the use of the breathalyzer from our law enforcement officers. The time has arrived when we must balance the right of a drinking driver to refuse a simple test against the right of the public to be free from the harm caused by those who drink too much and drive.

And then to take what I would think should surely be regarded as the ultimate authority in this field, the Supreme Court of Canada, which has held that it is not an interference with the rights of the individual at all and it is in no way analogous to compulsory self-incrimination to require a person to take a breathalyzer test, I would like to quote from Mr. Justice Fauteux who said:

The confession rule requiring a warning exclusively concerns self-incriminating statements of the accused and aims at the exclusion of those which are untrue. As its subject matter or purpose, the confession rule does not embrace the incriminating conditions of the body, features, fingerprints, clothing or behaviour of the accused, that persons other than himself observe or detect and ultimately report as witnesses in judicial proceedings.

In other words, according to this eminent jurist of the Supreme Court of Canada, the degree of concentration of alcohol in one's blood is a physical condition. Methods of observing, whereby another person observes and measures that physical condition, have nothing to do with self-incrimination. It has nothing to do with self-incrimination to require a person to submit to a breathalyzer test any more than it does to ask him to walk across the room, which the police can do right now.

The only difference between the two tests is that the breathalyzer test is accurate and the walking-across-the-room test is not accurate. A man may stagger or stumble half-way across the room for a dozen reasons, but he will not show a certain degree of concentration of alcohol in his blood on the breathalyzer test except for one reason. So therefore it has nothing to do with self-incrimination. This is a red herring which has been dragged across the trail repeatedly, and has prevented proper public policies from being adopted to deal with this very serious problem.

In concluding my remarks on this matter, Mr. Chairman, I want to quote again from the Supreme Court of Canada in the same judgment that I referred to when I quoted from Mr. Justice Fauteux. I would like to quote some comments of Mr. Justice Rand on this same matter. I may say the case, as most of the hon. members will be familiar with, related to a Saskatchewan law which requires a breathalyzer test or indirectly requires it. It provides that you cannot have a licence if you refuse a breathalyzer test; you lose your licence. I think that is a satisfactory brief summary.

I would like to read what Mr. Justice Rand had to say—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Upheld by the highest court of the land, too.

Mr. Singer: I read that into the record a few years ago.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, by the Supreme Court of Canada. As the hon. member for Downsview said, he has brought this judgment to the attention of the government; and so have I. Certainly the government knows all about it. They have had adequate opportunity to consider what is the best scientific and best legal opinion on the matter, and yet they flatly refuse to look at it, and continue to talk about old wives' tales about self-incrimination.

I would like to, in conclusion, read this comment of Mr. Justice Rand, and I would like to leave it with the government for their consideration. Mr. Justice Rand said:

The answer to this [he had posed a question—I will not bother going into the question because it is not the point I want to make here] must take into account a consideration of the impact of a constantly intensifying traffic of persons and vehicles on the highways, of their use by automobiles, and the ghastly results of mere carelessness in operation alone.

When to the lethal dangers inherent, and multiplying under the best of ordinary circumstances, we add the most potent and destructive factor, the intoxicated driver, a stage has been reached where the public interest rises to paramount importance.

I am submitting to the hon. Minister that the stage has been reached where the public interest has risen to paramount importance. If he is serious, as I believe he is, about the problem of highway safety and of reducing accidents on the highways, he will do something useful about the problem of drinking and driving. And, as I have suggested to him, that involves a combination of revised laws and improved educational practices.

I submit to the hon. Minister that we can no longer carry on with ancient child-like notions that there is really nothing very wrong about a fellow having even three drinks and then going out and driving his car. We have to get it into the heads of the public that three drinks are too many for driving a car; indeed, two drinks are too many unless the fellow is willing to wait at least an hour before he gets behind the wheel of a car.

Regardless of how he may feel, once he has had a couple of drinks he is in no position to judge his capacity to drive, and the intelligent man—if the point can be got across to him—will realize that and therefore will refrain from driving. Until action is taken along the lines I have suggested, we will continue to have a mounting toll of death and disability due to the fact that people—good, law-abiding citizens in most cases—have foolishly driven a car when they really were not capable of driving it because their ability to drive had been sufficiently impaired, even though it had not been seriously impaired, by the use of alcohol.

There are some others matters I would like to deal with. I would have liked to have made some comments on the automobile accident claims fund, Mr. Chairman, but I have taken up quite a lot of time already in these introductory remarks so I will give an opportunity to some other hon. members. It may be possible that I will have a chance to make a few supplementary comments under individual votes as they come up.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question—before we get off the main office—of the the hon. Minister. Under what vote would we take up amateur radio call licence plates? I would like to speak on that question for a little while. Would it be under the main office or would you find another vote under which you would like to discuss it?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Under 2204.

Mr. Bukator: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Vote 2204, I would say.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if we are on the main office, I have two or three unrelated and relatively brief points that I would like to raise.

On the first one I beg the pardon of the House for coming back to an old, old theme. We have a new hon. Minister; perhaps we can be more successful with him than we have been with previous Ministers, sir. Some years ago, I was a member of a select committee of this Legislature which investigated toll roads but, in fact, was more. Its terms of reference were more that of investigating highway revenue. It included such distinguished persons as the hon. Prime Minister of today as its chairman, the former hon. Minister of Transport, and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree), if I recall correctly. In fact, I have forgotten who all my colleagues were, but I do not think there was any committee which had such a significant body of alumni in the Cabinet today as this one. It therefore puzzles me as to why the efforts of this committee should have been put on the shelf to gather dust in two or three rather major portions of its recommendations.

I raise this again this year, because in the Budget for this year the government has once again increased the gasoline tax. I was something of a maverick on that committee. I agreed with most of its recommendations, but when we got to the point of signing it, I envisaged a little bit of political manoeuvring, and rarely have I been proven to be correct in so short a time.

One of the things we had discussed at great length was the objective of getting an equitable balance in highways' revenues. We found out, for example, that unless the diesel tax was much higher than it was, trucks which operated on diesel oil were going to be paying a smaller share to highway revenues than those which operated on gasoline. The government moved to increase the diesel tax back in 1958, or 1959 if I recall correctly. Indeed, to begin with, they moved it perhaps beyond an equitable point and they reduced it. I think they put it to about 20 cents, and then they reduced it to about 18 cents or 18.5 cents.

Another significant point—and my good friend, sir, the hon. Provincial Treasurer and I have never been able to achieve agreement on this, I am not even persuaded that he agrees yet—but one of the points on which we got testimony was that until you got this equity between truck revenues and car revenues if you raised the gasoline tax, 90 per cent of the burden would fall on the cars and only ten per cent of it would fall on the trucks. And I remind the House in this connection, of some figures that I think are roughly valid, though I suspect they are getting out of date, which were submitted to the toll roads committee and which I subsequently used on a number of occasions. On one occasion I got into considerable difficulty with that most energetic of lobbyists, Mr. J. O. Goodman—he once challenged me as to where I got these figures; said they simply did not exist—so I wrote to New York, California. I ultimately got them and sent them to him; on this point at least he has remained silent since, in his communications to me.

An hon. member: That settled that.

Mr. MacDonald: That settled that, because he had been given the evidence. However, I notice he really was not persuaded by it because he has put out a little press release, following the government's increase in gasoline tax this year, in which the substance of the evidence I gave him had been forgotten.

Once again the government has increased the gasoline tax, and they have done so after years of absolutely inexcusable procrastination on the issue of some form or other of weight distance tax.

I do not know why the hon. Minister over there shakes his head.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy Resources): You looked at me when you said that.

Mr. MacDonald: I looked at you and you were shaking your head. I was looking at you because you were shaking your head, and for no other reason at the moment than that.

I used to raise this issue for the new members of the House. This is at least annual on the estimates, this little speech of mine. I raised it throughout the years 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961—about the year 1960 or 1961 I was suddenly startled to have the then Minister of Transport, now the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree)—in fact he startled not only me, but I noticed most of his colleagues in the Cabinet benches, when he said, "I will admit to the member for York South that he is correct in his contentions with regard to a weight distance tax."

That, I thought, was some glimpse of the fact that the slow-moving research branch of The Department of Transport was getting near the point of producing something. However, two or three years have gone by. Last year, just before the estimates came up, there was a leak to one of the Toronto papers. Somebody had got hold of one or two pages from a research document that had been produced in this rather inactive research division and it was published, I think, in the Toronto Telegram. There was a bit of a flurry because the then Minister said that he wanted to study it further. Now we have the hon. Minister coming in, as you look in the annual report that was just provided to us, and there is not a whisper in it of any further research being done on this topic.

Seven or eight years have gone by and the good work of the Prime Minister of the day and three or four of his colleagues is still gathering dust.

I do not know whether I can persuade this hon. Minister to get at this topic, but just in the hope that I might, let me quote one paragraph from the report of the toll roads committee, chairman, Mr. J. P. Roberts, QC, secretary, Mr. D. J. Collins, and signed by everybody except myself. I think I forgot to put in the little footnote there, that ten days after I refused to sign it the government raised the gasoline tax and proved that my suspicions were well grounded. Now, they have duplicated it again this year. However, the paragraph I want to draw reference to is on page 31 of the final report. It is entitled:

FUEL TAX AS A SOURCE OF REVENUE

The findings of these various studies are not in complete agreement. However, there is broad acceptance of certain important findings and perhaps the most important is that the gasoline gallonage tax breaks down as far as equity is concerned when vehicles approach the gross weight of 18,000 pounds. There is room for argument in the equity of any particular set conditions but it is obvious to the committee—and this, as I may interject, is an obviousness that was unanimous to Tories, Liberals and myself.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: You did not sign the committee report.

Mr. MacDonald: It was always obvious—I agreed and I said afterwards that I agreed with most of the analyses and the recommendations. I did not sign it because I knew the government was going to pick and choose from the implementation in the way that it picked and chose from the report of the committee that was chaired last year by the hon. Minister who interjected—the hon. Minister of Energy Resources.

But the increase in the gasoline tax falls most heavily on the light motor vehicles. A simple increase in the rate per gallon of gasoline tax would mean that 90 per cent of the burden would be paid by the passenger cars and light trucks in relation to use and number of registration.

A fuel tax per gallon would be the ideal system of taxation if all vehicles weighed the same amount and travelled the same distance per gallon. It is obvious, however, that it is not the case. The heavier vehicles use more fuel per vehicle mile of travel than do lighter vehicles but use less fuel per unit of weight hauled. This is easily understood when one considers that a passenger car weighing approximately two tons travels approximately 18 miles per gallon and therefore obtains 36 ton miles of operation for an 11 cent tax.

Subsequently raised to 13 cents and now 15 cents.

A truck weighing 46,000 pounds, or 23 tons, obtains five miles per gallon of gasoline or 115 ton miles of operation for 11 cents. This becomes even more important when it is realized that a truck combination weighing 68,000 pounds or 34 tons travels four miles per gallon and therefore obtains 136 ton miles of operation for 11 cents.

The passenger car obtains one quarter of the ton miles of use compared to the 34-ton vehicle for the same amount of gallonage tax.

I would like to take, in relation to that, the calculation I made reference to for a moment and then sidetracked myself in my comments on Mr. Goodman. It is the study that was made in the United States, and I think has general application to Canada though it may be getting somewhat out of date. In the state of California something like 52 per cent of the cost of building a modern highway derives from what must be put in that highway to meet the needs of four per cent of the traffic at that time, namely, your great big trucks, those box cars on wheels, as they are referred to.

It may well be that something less than 52 per cent of the cost goes into our highways for something more than four per cent. I think our trucks are now in the range of 15 per cent or 20 per cent, perhaps even more of the overall traffic. But certainly on the basis of those calculations, even with revisions that bring them up to date, the big trucks are not paying an equitable share of the cost of our highway revenues and the government is dragging its feet. Indeed, let me be fair to the government. It is not dragging its feet. It is not doing anything because the report indicates that in the research division it is doing no more investigation on this.

I leave that point with the hon. Minister in the urgent hope that perhaps he has something more enlightening to say to the House about it than his predecessors had.

I have two other very brief points that would come under the first item, Mr. Chairman. When the hon. Minister is talking about the efficiency of his new department, I am a bit curious to know how there could have taken place that incident which was reported in January 18 this year—of a TTC driver who was fined when he was brought before a court on two charges, one for stopping his bus so that he had blocked the highway and somebody rammed him from behind, and the second charge was that he had not notified the department of a change of address on his driver's licence.

The first charge was dismissed, but the irony of it is that he was convicted on the second charge. I say irony, because he had notified the department in August and he received word back from the department acknowledging the notification four days after he had been convicted, and it was in early January.

I presume the hon. Minister has looked into this because it got some publicity. I wonder if he has an explanation as to how five months could be taken for an acknowledgment of a change of address, which is presumably a routine matter. If it is lost altogether how was it acknowledged five months afterwards?

My final point is more or less facetious, but not completely facetious, Mr. Chairman, for the hon. Minister. From the Toronto Daily Star, of February 21, Gerry Barker in one of his columns, has this little note:

The monthly bulletin, Ontario Traffic Safety, issued by The Ontario Department of Transport, seems to be doing a fine job of plugging the Minister, the hon. Irwin Haskett. There are five photographs of the boss in the current issue.

Maybe the hon. Minister should—after he has stopped blushing—put a brake on the enthusiasts in his department because it is going to be embarrassing for him as well as the rest of us if this keeps up.

Nothing to say on the highway?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I feel I must answer that one but I am lost for words.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I am sorry, I have not seen the issue but I shall look at it and if I find it as horrible as the hon. member for York South represents I shall see if something cannot be done to improve future issues.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good!

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Let me begin with the hon. member's terminal remarks, and move forward: the other comment with regard to the bus driver who got into some difficulty in consequence of a change of address. First, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the newspaper clipping is somewhat misleading in that changes of address are not normally acknowledged. The primary purpose is to update our own records. The confirmation mentioned in the clipping was actually Mr. Ellis's new driver's licence. But I am at a loss to understand why Mr. Ellis pleaded guilty for failing to notify the department of change of address when in fact he had notified us and our records so showed. You may be interested to learn that when this matter was first brought to our attention, we immediately recommended a refund of the fine. The fine has been remitted.

Mr. MacDonald: But the conviction still stands?

An hon. member: It shows the need for legal aid.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: There was no delay on our part.

Mr. MacDonald: But the conviction still stands. The fine was returned but the conviction still stands.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I do not know what we could do in the case of the conviction. The man pleaded guilty to not having notified us of change of address when in fact he had notified us.

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. Minister will forgive me, the reason why I am adding this further query is that the newspaper says:

Ellis, father of two children, is faced with additional court charges of $200 if he wants to appeal and clear his record. He said he was advised by the TTC counsel: "Forget it."

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think that is fact, but I say the fault occurred in the man pleading guilty to the charge of failing to notify us when in fact he had notified us. Yet when we learned of it, we recognized immediately he had notified us and all we could do by way of restitution was to refund the fine, and that we did.

The hon. member for York South has made mention of the cost factors in transportation. I think he realizes that the whole matter is at the moment in a state of flux, what with the adjusted licensing fees that have been brought in, the different rates for passenger cars and the rearranging of licensing fees, and the further upgrading of tax on fuels. Passenger vehicles using gasoline are now paying 15 cents a gallon and the big trucks using diesel fuel are paying 20.5 cents a gallon for their heavy consumption, which does bear relation to weight and distance, he must admit.

But I find that in connection with the AASHO report to the Minister that was referred to, I think in last year's estimates debate, the detailed reports are still under study in the department. The AASHO report referred to is that of the American Association of State Highway Officials and until the internal study of these reports is completed, I am not in a position to say when a departmental report may be ready.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say very much more but this is the feeblest and the lamest kind of excuse. There are many states in the United States that studied the AASHO report and subsequent studies of it within a year or so. The department has been on this for six or seven years.

If I may lapse into the vernacular, Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. Minister it is about time some Minister in this government "levelled" with the Legislature, because I am convinced what has happened is that the hon. Minister is going to have no weight distance tax. He has been lobbied into submission by J. O. Goodman and the Automotive Transport Association and he is refusing to come and say so—by giving a whole succession of excuses down through the six or seven years.

The proposition is that the hon. Minister is studying it because the whole thing is in a state of flux. It is not in a state of flux, it has come to a dead halt. I will assert this flatly, until this government gives some evidence to prove that I am wrong. I have been waiting for seven years for that evidence.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member for Woodbine raised some questions. I must say I was a bit at sea as to what he was thinking that the department needed in the way of an overall transportation policy, that could not be confused with matters falling within the federal jurisdiction. I found it rather incomprehensible. I think I have to pass by that because I do not yet understand how we can integrate the transportation facilities that fall naturally within the jurisdiction of the province with those that obviously are under federal jurisdiction.

For my own part I rather enjoyed his dissertation on future and rather fantastic modes of transportation, such as being propelled into the air as a ballistic missile or capsule, the use of these hydroplanes or hydro-foils and particularly the hovercraft running on single rails. I have to confess that we have made no very deep studies along these lines.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister has not made any deep studies.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I deny that. With regard to his rather thoughtful presentation of the difficult and important problem of drinking and driving, I must say that this is a problem that comes perhaps more under the aegis of the hon. Attorney General than our department, but it is one in which we have a very real interest, in that it has an important bearing on highway safety and is one of the most perplexing of the problems confronting motorists and pedestrians in this province.

In Ontario .1 per cent concentration of alcohol in the blood—as distinct from the suggested .05 per cent that was being mentioned as a basis for a new law or regulation by the hon. member—is generally accepted as evidence of impairment. Since different individuals become intoxicated at different levels of alcohol concentration, there is no generally accepted level in this regard.

Mr. Singer: Of course there is. How can the hon. Minister say—

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I said it was generally accepted.

Mr. Singer: It is not; surely, on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the only way it has been generally accepted is as a suggested guide. It is not part of the law. This is the point made by the hon. member for Woodbine and it is the point I made a few years ago.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It is not written into the law but I say—

Mr. Singer: That is the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I can give you these statistics over the last four years with regard to intoxicated and impaired convictions: in 1960, intoxicated 906; impaired 9,349; in 1961, intoxicated 864, impaired 9,437; in 1962, intoxicated 7,070, impaired 10,997; in 1963, intoxicated 702, impaired 10,240. You will note there has been a decline in the number of convictions for intoxicated driving and an increase in the number of impaired convictions.

Mr. Singer: Does that mean there are fewer drinking drivers?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member may use the statistics as he wishes. The drivers in reported accidents occurred in these percentages: In 1961, ability impaired, 2.3 per cent of drivers involved; had been drinking, 5.9 per cent. In 1962, ability impaired, 2.1; had been drinking, 5.9. In 1963, ability impaired, 1.9; had been drinking, 5.6. In the overall statistics, we find that out of the total number involved in accidents, those for “ability impaired” and “had been drinking” both dropped, in the first case, from 2.3 in 1961 to 1.9 in 1963; and “had been drinking”, from 5.9 in 1961 to 5.6 in 1963.

Chemical tests to measure the amount of alcohol in the blood and reveal whether or not drivers are under the influence, are in wide use in Ontario by both municipal and provincial police forces. The tests are normally used to support police officers' assessment of the suspected individual's condition following various tests of co-ordination, speech, etc. These supplementary tests will perhaps always be necessary, since a man's judgment is affected not by the amount or type of alcohol imbibed but the amount accumulated in the brain. The amount that is present in the brain is affected by a variety of factors, such as state of health, weight, amount and type of food in the stomach, rate of absorption of alcohol from the stomach and intestines into the bloodstream, the rate at which alcohol is oxidized, and so on. It is for these reasons that chemical tests alone are not always able to reveal the effect on the driver's judgment or the extent to which he is under the influence.

Tests of co-ordination are reported—and I take these from reports provided by Sergeant Michael Coulis of No. 6 traffic division, in charge of the breathalyzer tests for Metropolitan Toronto police department—where a driver could hardly stand up but the chemical test showed small—that is less than .1 per cent—concentration of alcohol. In other cases it is reported that co-ordination tests suggested slight impairment but the chemical test showed a high .3 per cent concentration of alcohol.

Since the most significant factor in the offence is whether the driver is under the influence, experience up to the present suggests the need for both the chemical test and supporting tests as at present used.

Mr. Singer: Would the hon. Minister answer a question on that particular phase?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Well, I might try.

Mr. Singer: Does the hon. Minister really believe that the incidence of alcohol in accidents has fallen off in the last few years or has it increased?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I rely on the statistics I was using, and from them it would seem that the incidence of alcohol was less than it was two or three years ago. I would not want to support that with my own opinion, because I am a layman, but I must say that I share with hon. members a very real concern for the problem, as all serious people must.

Mr. Singer: Has the hon. Minister got any statistics from insurance companies? They have pretty complete statistics.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No, I do not have them.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that just about everything I said on that subject apparently went over the head of the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No, it did not.

Mr. Bryden: We are still getting the same old arguments that have been completely exploded long ago. I would refer him for reading some evening when he has nothing better to do, perhaps over a nightcap, if he wishes—as long as he does not go out and drive afterwards—an article by Dr. Ward Smith, the head of the Attorney General's laboratory in this government, which appeared in the issue of the Criminal Law Quarterly, which I cited a moment ago. I gave my copy to the Hansard reporter, so I do not have it in front of me.

In about a 50-page article, he made a detailed and scholarly review of all the evidence available. The conclusions he came to, I think, were quite in line with what I was saying. I will put it the other way around. What I was saying was quite in line with his conclusions. I may say that his conclusions were an important factor in the representations I was making to the hon. Minister.

On this question of the degree of concentration of alcohol in the blood, the .1 per cent factor comes in, as I understand it, in relation to charges of driving while impaired. The courts, as I understand the literature I have read, have tended to the conclusion that if a person has a degree of concentration of alcohol in his blood of .1 per cent or more, he is probably impaired. But the point I was trying to get across is that the offences now provided for in law, of driving while intoxicated or driving while impaired, simply do not cover the subject. There can be sufficient impairment in a driver's judgment and capacity with a concentration of less than .1 per cent, to make him unsafe on the highway.

It has been found by exhaustive tests that almost all drivers are sufficiently impaired if they have a concentration of .05 per cent; that it is not safe for them to drive cars. This has been well established by authorities all over the world, and it is that gap in the law that I am suggesting the hon. Minister should close up. The law should provide simply that it is an offence to drive a car with a greater concentration than that in the blood, just as it is an offence to drive a car on the Queen Elizabeth Way at faster than 60 miles an hour.

Of course, to determine if the person has indeed committed the offence it is necessary to have a test to determine the degree of concentration in his blood and the breathalyzer test is reported, by all authorities that I know of in the field, to be an accurate test of the degree of concentration of alcohol in a person's blood.

This is the whole point at issue. As to the more serious charges of impaired driving, or driving while intoxicated, I think they should be retained in the law. We have nothing to do with them anyway, they are in the Criminal Code. I am suggesting that, to get really at this problem, we have to create a smaller, at least a less serious offence—but one where the law is more readily enforceable.

We can retain the other offences for flagrant violations, but let us do something about the problem of the driver who is not sufficiently impaired that he can be convicted of a charge of impaired driving but still is sufficiently impaired that he creates a hazard on the road. That is the real problem. That is where the .05 per cent comes in and, as far as I know, there is no significant difference of opinion among scientific authorities on that point. They are almost all agreed that that is a reasonable arbitrary point at which to establish the question as to whether or not the person is guilty of an offence.

There may be some who should not be driving, who have an even lower concentration, but there are few if any who would have a higher concentration than .05 per cent who should be entrusted to drive a vehicle.

This is the point I am trying to get across; and if I may say so, Mr. Chairman, I cannot take the hon. Minister's assurance of his concern about this problem as well justified, unless he is ready to look at this particular proposition which I will emphasize to him again. But in order that he will not become prejudiced against it, I will assure him it is not my proposition; it is the proposition of all leading authorities in the field, including authorities right in this province—such as the director of the Attorney General's laboratory and the addiction research foundation. Both of them have been putting forward this proposition, not recently, but for several years.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think the hon. member has spoken very strongly in favour of establishing a new law that would set .05 per cent content of alcohol in the blood as a basis. He appreciates that this is chiefly a matter of enforcement and the administration of justice; and he has clearly stated himself that insofar as the amount of alcohol in the blood is related to charges is concerned, it comes under the Criminal Code and consequently within the federal domain.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I have tried the idea on various Attorneys General; I thought I might have more success with the hon. Minister of Transport. I think, without professing to be an expert in the field of law, it would be possible for the province by statute to create an offence of the type I have mentioned, just as it has decreed that it is an offence to drive a car at faster than a certain speed. I think—

Mr. Singer: So that they can order a compulsory breathalyzer.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, well it has been established in the highest court of the land that it can require breathalyzer tests and I think it can also create these other offences which have to do with the regulation of traffic and so on.

I do not want to go through the whole subject matter again. Perhaps I can raise the matter at least briefly with the hon. Attorney General when his estimates are before us.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 2201 carried?

Mr. Singer: Well, is the hon. Minister not going to reply to the other criticism?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Downsview raised a number of points. He spoke first of all of compulsory drivers examinations and I thought he might be interested to know the extent to which the examination of drivers is increasing. After requiring that all new applicants for drivers' licences must take examinations, these categories of drivers are being re-examined.

All drivers over 80 years of age; drivers over 70 once they have been involved in an accident; drivers involved in fatal accidents; accident repeaters defined as "those involved in three or more accidents in a two-year period"; drivers referred to the department by the courts and by enforcement officials; and all suspended drivers. Compulsory re-examination of drivers is under consideration, but to be effective it will be necessary to await the cycling of the renewal over our 36-month period.

By April 1961, three years ago, all examinations for new drivers' licences were being conducted by departmental examiners. The department is at present operating some 47 driver-examination centres in 107 travel points. A programme was also expanded by the introduction, three years ago in June, of preliminary visual and written examinations before the issuance of temporary instruction permits. And a special examination for a school bus driver's licence has been required since September, 1961.

Some idea of the volume of business conducted by our examiners may be seen from the fact that, in 1963, 190,513 persons were examined. Of these, 38 per cent failed on their first attempt but most of these unsuccessful individuals passed after a second or third attempt, bringing the total number of road tests to 270,478. In addition, 258,150 tests were conducted for temporary instruction permits. These include the 13.2 per cent who failed on their first attempt. I think it is significant that the failure rate for both drivers' licences and instruction permits is steadily decreasing, which is an indication that, through our programme, persons are putting much more effort into the preparation for their tests.

Mr. Singer: On that point, Mr. Chairman, as I understand the figures just given to us by the hon. Minister, about one-third, more than a third, of the people are failing. Of all of the retesting—

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Forty-one per cent!

Mr. Singer: What per cent of those who have licences have been retested?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I would not have that figure available but I could perhaps obtain it for the hon. member. The percentage of those being retested and who failed? Is that the question?

Mr. Singer: No, no; just of those who have licences. How many of those are being retested under all the categories the hon. Minister gave?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, the total number being retested.

Mr. Singer: Yes, the over 80s and over 70s and those involved in accidents and so on.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: This is one of the—

Mr. Singer: A fraction of one per cent probably, would it not be, of all the drivers on the road?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, it is a small percentage. We will get that figure. The orderly retesting of others will follow when we get this new driver licensing into operation. That is one of the advantages that will flow from this mechanically maintained record of drivers.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if a third of the people fail their original tests and a fraction of one per cent, or a very small percentage, to use the hon. Minister's words, are being retested, is it not reasonable to conclude that there must be an awful lot of people on the road who would not be able to pass a new test?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The 38 per cent that fail are those who are trying their tests for the first time, seeking a driver's licence. These are very different from people who have been driving like you and me for a number of years.

Mr. Singer: Probably we should be retested too.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member for Downsview raised the question of the report of the select committee on insurance—

Mr. Singer: Before you get to that, have you an answer about the man who admitted having a stroke and had his licence renewed? Or the other man whom three magistrates recommended should never be allowed to drive again?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No, I will hold those for the moment. I will get a report for the hon. member. I am not aware of the situation.

I would like to make a brief comment with regard to the select committee on automobile insurance that reported a couple of years ago, and in the final report of which there was a recommendation with regard to compensation without fault. I may say that almost immediately on assuming the ministry of The Department of Transport I had a review made of matters standing before the department, including the final report of the select committee. We checked the report very carefully and isolated from it the residual recommendations that had not been implemented. Outstanding among them was that dealing with compensation without cause. Action was instituted on that subject, I would say, early in the fall, probably by mid-September, and I would like to give the hon. members some information with respect to what has transpired.

In order to secure factual data to assist further in the government's consideration of the perplexing problem, I appointed a special interdepartmental technical committee of civil servants to conduct some further studies affecting the costs of implementing the recommendations. The terms of reference of that committee were:

To examine, investigate, inquire into, study and report on:

(a) the effect of liability automobile insurance premiums if it were made mandatory that such policies contain accident insurance coverage to all injured parties regardless of fault to the extent as recommended by the insurance committee; and the costs to the fund of the payment of accident insurance benefits to a like extent and other matters relating to such scheme which might affect the operation of the present fund;

(b) the costs to the fund of the payment of property damage claims regardless of the existence of insurance coverage, and the effect such payments might have on existing insurance premiums;

(c) the effect on insurance premiums if The Insurance Act were amended to eliminate the defence of inevitable accident as recommended by the insurance committee, and the costs to the fund if claims were paid in similar circumstances;

(d) the necessity or otherwise for legislation giving the superintendent of insurance authority to control automobile insurance premium rates and the costs associated therewith;

(e) the necessity or otherwise of implementing by legislation the committee's recommendation pertaining to the automobile assigned risk plan, and if necessary the changes required in the present statutes;

(f) any other matter relating to the above which the committee consider relevant.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, that is very interesting. At long last we have the terms of reference. But I would like the hon. Minister to advise us, since he read those terms of reference, why he did not see fit to consult with his colleague the hon. Provincial Treasurer, because he would have told him that before the select committee came, the most able body in the province of Ontario, and probably in the Dominion of Canada—who were in a position to advise the government about all of these questions that he has asked—is the All-Canada insurance group. The group have access to actuaries, to all sorts of authorities on all of the questions that the hon. Minister has asked, and if he was not prepared to take the hon. Minister's word he could have talked to the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling), for instance, who was on the committee. The hon. member for High Park knows full well that when these representations were brought before the select committee, these are the questions that the hon. member for High Park, the hon. Provincial Treasurer, and other members of the committee, were asking. These are all detailed in the evidence which came out before the committee; they are all detailed in the transcript of evidence that was read.

I ask again, Mr. Chairman, and I think we are entitled to know: Why, after all of this work was done by what I think was one of the ablest select committees this government has ever set up, one of the committees that had the best advice that was available from all of the persons in authority, did the government set up a new committee, an interdepartmental committee, to cover exactly the same ground? What sort of new information can they get? What do they hope to gain? Surely they do not hope to gain anything more than to sweep the whole recommendation under the rug, and for what reason?

Every known authority in the field came before the committee and said these suggestions were reasonable. Estimates of costs were given. All of the fields possible were explored. The insurance people were in favour of it. The lawyers were in favour of it. The members of the committee, including the hon. Provincial Treasurer, were in favour of it; and suddenly the hon. Minister, last September, embarked on a brand-new inquiry covering exactly the same ground, and for what reason?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member realizes that this matter is moving forward in a very thoughtful and serious way, and that this Minister is having a review made of it for his inspection before he recommends to his Cabinet colleagues any particular course of action.

Mr. Singer: Can the hon. Minister tell us, Mr. Chairman, when he expects a report?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No, I would not put a time limit on it; but, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the House that the matter is moving forward very acceptably.

Mr. Singer: Acceptable to everybody except the people of Ontario.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in vote 2201, item 6, I notice that the expenditure this year is $400,000 as opposed to, roughly, $75,000 last year. Is the department undertaking any special studies—that is, transportation studies—in areas other than Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The item of $400,000 is for the continuance of the work of the special transportation study for Metropolitan Toronto and region.

Mr. Newman: Well, is the hon. Minister aware that there will be a train—train number 369 and train number 370—cut off on the Windsor-Toronto and Toronto-Windsor run? This may make a transportation problem into which his department could look, and possibly make some suggestion to the powers-that-be that these trains be not withdrawn; because the withdrawal of the trains will only add to the burden upon the highway. The highway between the Chatham and the London area, as the hon. Minister is well aware, is probably the most dangerous section of highway in Ontario, being the single-lane portion of Highway 401.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the amount indicated is fees for expenses for special studies and research. I intimated that out of the findings of the special study committee on transportation would come data that would be of great value in assessing the transportation needs of other densely populated urban areas, but I would think, in answer to the hon. member's specific question with regard to the dropping of rail service, that to drop it must be an indication that the rail service is not being used to such a great extent, that it has become unprofitable.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, surely the department is not only going to study problems in the Metropolitan Toronto area? There are other areas in the province which likewise have problems which should be studied. Under research, what does this entail? Does it entail the study of the safety of seat belts, brake fluids and so forth?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: This is a provision for studies of any items of this kind which may be referred to our research branch.

Mr. Newman: Has the department then prevented the sale or forbidden the sale of certain automobile accessories? What I am trying to say is that certain manufacturers of seat belts may not meet certain specifications your department may set down; and has this department then prevented the sale of any of these seat belts to the public?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Seat belts sold in Ontario have to comply to the requirements of SAE and CSAE requirements.

Mr. Newman: If they do not meet the standards, does The Department of Transport assume the responsibility for them not being on sale?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Well, it could be checked in our inspections of vehicles, but enforcement is the responsibility of the provincial and municipal police forces.

Vote 2201 agreed to.

Vote 2202 agreed to.

It being 6.05 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

On vote 2203:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): I want to ask the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) a question with regard to safety on the highways regarding the ploughs of The Department of Highways moving along the highways during storms. That revolving light, which is used to indicate that there is a plough on the roads, I have heard reports, and I know myself, that in storms it is somewhat difficult to see that light. Has the hon. Minister had any complaints about that?

Some hon. members: No, no!

Mr. Troy: Well, of course, down here in the banana belt maybe you do not know anything about blizzards and storms. Has the hon. Minister had any requests or any suggestions that the light colour be changed?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, the snowploughs use the blue flashing light for a very good purpose and, under The Highway Traffic Act, I think it is subsection 31 or section 33, it is defined that no person shall operate on a highway a motor vehicle or road-building machine while being used for the removal of snow from a highway unless the motor vehicle or road-building machine is equipped with a lamp producing intermittent flashes of blue light visible for a distance of 500 feet. I say to the hon. member it is a very thoughtful question—we have not had complaints about it, but I would go further and say that the reason that this is a blue flashing light is because that is the light that is most visible under those circumstances; and we restrict the use of that light to this particular kind of implement or vehicle for that very purpose.

Mr. Troy: Has research shown that this is the most visible light under the circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Oh yes, this is known.

Mr. Troy: Well, then, possibly it may not be blue enough. I think the blue is a little conservative; make it a little more liberal and increase the intensity of the light.

Do I discuss under this section, too, the safety instruction in schools?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: That is right.

Mr. Troy: It seems to me, and I know I have support of a great number of teachers, that we overemphasize this driving instruction, trying to teach youngsters to drive. It seems to me that it would be much better if we forget about the course and try to make them walk. Then I find, too, that statistics indicate that a car to a high school student is almost a permit to failure in a great number of cases. What did it cost The Department of Education and The Department of Transport to operate this programme last year?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, in specific answer to the question of the hon. member for Nipissing as to the amount spent on this driver-instruction in secondary schools, I have here the total, school by school, and it comes to a gross of $11,315.02 for high school driver training courses.

Mr. Troy: Does the automobile industry participate in that programme? Does it make grants—the automobile industry?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The vehicles are usually contributed by the motor companies.

Mr. Troy: But no actual—

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No outlay.

Mr. Troy: No. I think they are the ones who should be sponsoring the programme completely.

In regard to safety on our streams and rivers and lakes, I know the hon. Minister will say it is a federal matter, but it is becoming quite a vital problem. The increase in water traffic on our lakes and rivers and streams has increased immensely in the last few years. And the department of the hon. Minister has no jurisdiction over that—not even a fatherly eye on it?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We do not have jurisdiction on the waters. Because of the growing use of water craft we do put out some safety bulletins every year; we publish a bulletin on water safety. That is all we do.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, in relation to slow-moving vehicles on the highways, are there any requisites, like requirements for slow-moving vehicles on the highways? Is there any requirement as to the size of the reflectors, the intensity of the light, the colour of the light?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The question is a very pertinent one. Farm tractors, which might be considered slow-moving vehicles, carry the same lights as other vehicles. But there is a further problem, and that is in the case of these oversized farm implements that are called implements of husbandry. They are getting bigger and wider, and becoming more of a problem on the road. But to move one of those vehicles on the highways requires a special permit, and we would not allow one of those vehicles to travel at night so the question of lights is not applicable.

The situation still arises in taking one of these very wide implements along a highway even in daytime. If it should be over the brow of a hill, and a fast-moving vehicle were coming toward it or overtaking it, it might suddenly find the road completely occupied by the over-width implement; so we have been working on a new scheme of requiring such over-width vehicles to carry a certain signal or flag or warning device on the top of a flag-pole—say, ten feet from the ground on the extreme left of the vehicle. This is a new development and is part of the concern we have for the occasions when we issue special permits to move over-sized vehicles.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I then suggest to the hon. Minister that he use an alternating on-and-off type of light on the back of slow-moving vehicles so you would have the right light on one time, then it would blink off, then the left light would come on and it would blink off, and then the right, and so on. This light should be bright enough so that even in the early hours of the dusk it would be readily visible; because, today a vehicle travelling at 30 miles an hour is a slow-moving vehicle. With modern speeds one does not realize how quickly he is upon a vehicle of that sort, and just does not have the time to veer off or to stop.

I notice that such a lighting system has been used successfully in some jurisdictions, especially where road construction was taking place. This type of light is readily seen by the motorist.

The next is: Does the department require moving vans, trains, boxcars, or any vehicle generally over 30 feet in size, to have reflector tapes or some type of reflected light along its sides so that it could be readily seen? My principal concern is on level crossings, where you have these dark boxcars, dark freight trains, and you do not notice the train until you are probably a little too close to it?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Well, with respect to the slow-moving vehicle, such as a tractor; it is covered in The Traffic Act that every farm tractor and self-propelled unit of farm equipment, or implement of husbandry, equipped with an electric lighting system when on the highway during dark hours, shall be required to carry lamps required for motor vehicles under section one.

The hon. member asks why we could not utilize the flasher type of light on the slow-moving vehicle. That is a problem we are considering. We have thus far restricted the use of flasher lamps to these stationary situations where we have been warning of construction and that kind of thing. If we were to make it applicable to slow-moving traffic, tractors and such, we would lose the particular value that applies to the restriction, or the keeping, of that kind of signal specifically for construction or stationary situations.

As I say, it is a serious problem and we are trying to find some better way. If we can we will be ready to consider it.

With regard to the boxcar, or flat black side of a great big truck that may not be visible, there is a provision here for what we call side-marker lamps, that when on a highway outside a city, town or village at any time during the dark hours, every motor vehicle, or combination of vehicles having a length in excess of 20 feet shall carry not less than four side-marker lamps, one of which shall be located on each side of the vehicle or combination of vehicles near the front and shall display a green or amber light, one of which shall be located on each side of the vehicle or combination of vehicles near the rear and shall display a red light, and each of these lights shall be visible for a distance of 500 feet from the side of the vehicle or combination of vehicles on which it is located. So the equipment requirements are spelled out there. I think that is what the hon. member was reaching for.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one of the other problems, which is probably the one that causes a great concern, especially to municipalities, is the one-eyed driver. I know it is nothing unusual to have one of the lights go out in the motor vehicle, but it certainly is most disconcerting to the driver coming from the opposite direction to see only the one light approaching, sir, and not know whether it is a motor cycle or not. Is there any regulation that governs the period of time, after an individual is stopped by a policeman, to having the problem corrected?

I know I was driving through Indiana, one year, and was stopped with the one light out. The policeman gave me a ticket and told me that I had to have this fixed up at the first gas station and then deposit this ticket at the first police station after, to show to him that I had the problem corrected. Is there anything like that at all with this department?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Well, the Act makes it an offence to operate a vehicle without the benefit of the full proper headlights and if a policeman stops you and gives you the opportunity to have it fixed, I think it is a very sensible way to operate.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there is still one other question, and that is concerning the road safety workshops. Apparently local safety lanes have been set up in various areas. Accident prevention organizers have arranged for this equipment to be made available for three or four weeks in some communities. When they do set this up, they have no difficulty at all in obtaining co-operation from local safety councils, police departments, garage operators, service clubs and even interested municipal groups. The local radio, television and newspapers will advertise this and they will get the public to come down. They visit a lot of the communities; in fact I think their book mentions that they visited 61 communities in the last year.

In all of that they only checked 68,000 vehicles. That is less than three per cent of the vehicles. If they can only check three per cent of the vehicles, then the programme is absolutely worthless. It is expenditure of funds that is serving no purpose whatsoever. Ninety-seven per cent of the cars that are on the road do not get these 38 checks. Sure, you will say that one million vehicles have been checked by the department, but you consider it a check when an attendant comes along and cleans the headlight at a gas station. That is no check at all.

When you are going to talk about checks, I think you should refer to the 38-point checks that your road safety workshops give the vehicles. When you have that, one out of 37 cars checked, you set up the equipment in a community and who goes down to have his car checked—the man who has a new car, or a fellow who is buying a car and wants it checked free by The Department of Transport. But the fellow who has a car that has something wrong with it, and the fellow who has problems to be corrected on the car, Mr. Chairman, stays away from this safety check lane as much as he possibly can.

So I would conclude that the safety check lane is definitely not serving its purpose when you can only get three per cent of the vehicles in. In other words, you will have to make this compulsory or drop the programme. Three per cent is definitely not good enough at all.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the safety check lanes operated by the department last year, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, had checked 114,000 vehicles last year on these voluntary check lanes—more than 80,000 of these on the mobiles, and the mobiles are being increased by several new units coming on for use this spring. They are doing a really worthwhile job. This is only a part of the vehicle checking, because as I mentioned, too, in my remarks this afternoon, the provincial police checks more than 500,000 vehicles and we estimate that the provincials and—

Mr. Newman: Could the hon. Minister tell me what type of checking the provincial police does on a vehicle?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: They check the obvious requirements—lights, horn, windshield wiper, brakes—and they can require any of the operators of vehicles to take their cars in, if they feel they are not in road safe condition, to the first garage and have them inspected. We figured that more than one million vehicle checks were made in the province last year, as I mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. Newman: The only account that we have to go by is the annual report 1962-1963, page 36, which says a total of 61 communities was visited, some on more than one occasion, and 68,195 vehicles were given the standard 38-point check. This other check that the provincial police departments give you is very, very minor. This 38-point check is the important check. This tells whether the vehicle is fit to be put on the road or not and this is the type of check we would like to see general throughout the province. If you are only going to check 68,000 vehicles out of 2,230,000, you are just pouring money down the drain. You would be better off to spend it on educating the 60-and-over age group in pedestrian safety because apparently they are the ones who suffer mainly from pedestrian accidents.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member is using the 1962 report. For the benefit of the House this afternoon I made a point of reciting the new figures for the last year and gave the figure of 114,000 checked on our 38-point safety checks and The Department of Transport check lanes.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I stand corrected. Four per cent of the vehicles. There are still 96 per cent that were not checked at all.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Many are checked by police but not checked on our departmental check lanes.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, with the statistics accumulating more and more evidence of the value of seat belts and the hon. Minister last year requiring all government cars to be equipped with them, does he foresee an amendment to the regulations requiring them on all cars driven in the province?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The introduction of regulations that might have called for that would have seemed more necessary a year ago than now when all new cars are being equipped with seat belts. Manufacturers are supplying them and I think that is a great step forward. We have not taken any move to require older cars that were not equipped to put in the equipment.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister also mentioned that the flashing light is reserved for vehicles stopped along the road. Many of us, I know, have had the experience where we had to stop to fix a flat or something like that. The turn signals on the car are equipped to signal a left- or right-hand turn but none of them, or very few of them, are equipped to give the flashing signal that would indicate a stopped vehicle. Is there any possible change in the regulations requiring this additional equipment?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators has been considering the use of a signal of that kind. I may say I carry one in my own car; a railway battery-operated-type flashlight that has a flashing red light as an alternative, and I think these are very good.

Mr. Nixon: But you are not anticipating any change in the regulations.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: They are being considered by this administrators' conference.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly education along the lines of highway safety is extremely important and this would be one area where education perhaps would take the place of regulation. But I see by the public accounts that highway safety publicity—which would be the educational enterprise of the branch—amounts to $325,000 in the estimates and was $323,000 two years ago. I see there that there were several film enterprises hired to make some sort of presentation that I suppose would be used in schools. I also see that an organization, McKim Advertising, was paid $112,484.84 for its part in this. I wonder to what extent these responsibilities are let by tender.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It is not a case of the accounts being let by tender. We paid a certain amount to McKim, and McKim or any advertising agency gets the percentage from the publisher. I think every hon. member of the House understands that, and whether we use McKim, or B or C or D, the account for the amount of linage we use in the specific papers would be identical without regard to what advertising agency we used for processing distribution of our advertising business.

Mr. Nixon: There is nothing then, really, to choose among the contending advertising agencies? I was going to ask further about these films that are produced for the educational programme for highway safety. Who are these companies and are they selected by the advertising organization or by the department?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: That would be by the department, of course. I mentioned one of the films this afternoon as being very well used and doing a good piece of work in encouraging driver training and that was the film, "Right from the Start."

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to choose between the advertising agencies, but both the Liberals and the Conservatives have their favourites.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Granted.

Mr. MacDonald: Some years ago, Mr. Chairman, the Ontario Fire Fighters Association passed a resolution and it was forwarded to the department, I believe, with regard to the proposal of changing the flashing lights for volunteer firefighters' cars to red from amber because of the growing prevalence of amber on new cars and trucks. I am wondering if this proposal of the firefighters association is still under active consideration and whether there is any likelihood of it being acted upon.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: A volunteer firefighter under the department Act "may carry on his motor vehicle a lamp not exceeding four inches in diameter, displaying an amber light showing the letters, VFF, meaning volunteer fire fighter, which lamp shall be illuminated only when such motor vehicle is proceeding to a fire or other emergency and no other motor vehicle shall carry any such lamp." That is a distinctive marking, I think.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister has missed my question and the resolution passed by the Ontario Firefighters Association. Its argument was that amber lights were becoming very prevalent on new cars and trucks and therefore the recommendation was that it should be changed from an amber to a red light whether it had initials on it or not and there has been no action taken on this. This was drawn to my attention, strangely enough, by firefighters in two different areas without any collusion or prompting on their part, so apparently it is something that they are in a continuing way concerned about. I take it from what the hon. Minister says that you still have the old regulations. My question is, are you considering acting on their recommendation of switching to a red rather than an amber light?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: These vehicles that are being used by the volunteer firefighters are private vehicles and the request was for identification so that the police would permit them to proceed to a fire. We have not seen that it was desirable to extend the use of the flashing red to this group of operators.

Mr. MacDonald: I shall send a copy of the hon. Minister's reply to them and look forward to their comments.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: They know it.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, I noticed the buses that run these days shine their lights in the daytime. This is supposed to improve safety. I am wondering if the hon. Minister has any plans for making compulsory the use of running lights; it is a light that is on the grill on the front of the car that shines whenever the car is going during the daytime.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Etobicoke raises a question that has been put to us by various groups and agencies, wondering if we would not want to sponsor or bring in regulations that would make it necessary for vehicles to carry running lights in the daytime. I think one of the preferred types being used today is a single light in the middle of the radiator or grill. These certainly attract attention when you first see them on the streets in the daytime. However, people in the highway transportation business feel that for a week or two, or for a while until they came in general use, they would attract notice. Then they would be taken as just a casual and everyday occurrence and would receive no more attention than the vehicle does today, and so would lose value very quickly.

Mr. Braithwaite: Just one more question, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister, through you. Has it not been proved by the bus companies and the transportation people that the use of lights during the daytime has cut down on accidents?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We have no evidence to that effect at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, has the 50-mile speed limit for trucks been removed on the Queen Elizabeth highway from Hamilton to Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Where the speed limit on a piece of road has been upped from 50 to 60, the trucks would have the same right exactly to move up to the maximum limit that the private automobile has. There is no difference.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I have to beg difference with the hon. Minister. For at least two years there were two limits on the Queen Elizabeth from Hamilton to Toronto—50 miles for trucks and 60 miles for passenger vehicles. To my knowledge, at intervals there were signs saying, "Speed limit for trucks maximum 50 miles per hour."

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member is quite right, except that "tempus fugit" faster than he thinks it does, because it is four or five years since that regulation was washed out.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there are trucks travelling the highways that do not have tailgates, do not have side ramps, and carry all kinds of miscellaneous material. Quite often you will find this material flying off the vehicle on to the roadway. Are there any regulations that require the covering of materials transported by trucks that have neither the tailgate nor the side ramps?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The covering of loads is not set out in our regulations, but littering the highway, as such, is an offence.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest to the hon. Minister that he give some serious consideration to the covering of loads, especially on loads that do not have side or tail gates. It gets to be quite a serious thing, especially when you have trucks carrying broken-up automobile parts, automobile bodies and so forth. The bouncing around does create a real hazard on the road. For the interest of highway safety you should certainly see to it such loads have some type of tarpaulin or some cover.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I do not know the relevance of the side and tail gates, but certainly the question of covering a load to prevent the littering of the highway is under consideration, because it is a nuisance, if not a danger, in some places.

Mr. R. W. Gibson (Kenora): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am naive but I would like to have perhaps a little more detailed explanation of the services that McKim Advertising Limited perform for this one department. I note that this department has paid McKim $165,000, more or less. What specifically does this advertising agency do?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We did not pay KcKim that for work McKim did; we paid McKim one cheque to pay all the advertising accounts in all the papers, newspapers and magazines in which they had placed advertising for the department in our safety campaign, made up as follows: highway safety branch—$112,000; motor vehicles administration branch—$21,000; motor vehicles accident claims fund—$30,000.

We get down to the breakdown and we find that for newspapers: Daily newspapers—$16,000; weekly newspapers—$23,000—for a total of $39,000; miscellaneous publications—$2,442.80; outdoor billboards—$15,583.50; radio and television—$52,367.95; production and preparation of material—$54,101.59.

Mr. Gibson: Am I correct in assuming, Mr. Minister, as I think you said that the basic reason that this one agency gets this business is that it is because it is a favourite of this Conservative government? That is what the hon. Minister himself said.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It is a good agency.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I am puzzled about this expenditure for highway safety publicity. In the year for which the public accounts are represented here, there were some $328,000 spent, and this year there are some $325,000 to be spent. In the year which these public accounts represent, there are some three or four film companies; and the hon. Minister did mention in his remarks certain films. Is it the plan of the department to go on turning out films? How many films do you plan for this year? What are they going to depict? What are you going to do with the $325,000 for highway safety publicity?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The film last year, I think, was on the demerit point system—that is the one projected. A film is in the course of preparation on the use of seat belts, the safety factor in seat belt use. The one I spoke of in my talk had to do with the value of driver training in the high schools.

Mr. Singer: How many films do you have for the ensuing year, the one you are asking for in the vote tonight?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The one on the demerit point system.

Mr. Singer: Is that going to cost the substantial part of $325,000? Or is that an estimated cost?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It might cost $20,000 to $25,000.

Mr. Singer: What is the rest of the $325,000 for?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Here is a breakdown of our estimated expenditures by programmes for advertising publicity for the year. The $375,000 is made up this way:

Nursery school and kindergarten programme—$2,000; bicycle safety programme—$11,500; elementary schools programme—$30,500; senior citizens programme—$1,000; continuing public education programme—$35,000; high school driver training programme—$2,500; vehicle safety check programme—$24,000; seat belt programme—$2,500; poster competition—$2,000; road safety work shops—$16,500; exhibits and displays—$34,000; monthly safety bulletin—$13,000; standard publications—$94,000; film production—$23,000; film library—$6,000; photographic supplies—$4,000; writing production services—$16,000; licence expiry date advertising, including drivers' licences announcements—$36,000; equipment—$19,500; sundry and miscellaneous—$2,000; for a total of $375,000.

Mr. Singer: Is it necessary to retain an advertising agency to put these ads in? Why cannot the department do it itself? The various political parties seem to be able to do it themselves.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I would say that it was good business to utilize the services of a responsible advertising agency in selecting the media, and in apportioning the spending between the different kind of media, newspapers, dailies and weeklies, television and radio and such. I used to be in business myself in a small way and I confess to the House that I employed an advertising agency to do my little bit of advertising because I thought it was the best chance of getting the most for the advertising dollar.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the total request for money in this department is $481,000 this year, and for the year ending March 31, 1963, it was some $549,000, a decrease of some $60,000-odd. What have you cut out? According to these public accounts your highway safety branch is $549,000 for the year ending March 31, 1963, and this year it is $481,000; what have you cut out?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think that the shift in the amount for the highway safety branch, the drop in the estimate for this work, is in the main part made up of the transfer of the statistics branch to driver control—the accident statistics work was moved into the driver control branch, out of the highway safety branch, and the cost of it was transferred over. There were 23 staff members, for instance.

Mr. Singer: All right. Mr. Chairman, I asked this question in my remarks earlier this afternoon. Certainly the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass), through the provincial police, is concerned with highway safety. I wonder what liaison or what co-ordination exists between this department and the OPP, insofar as planning a programme of highway safety is concerned? Are there regular meetings, for instance, between the responsible civil servant in this department and Mr. Silk, the commissioner of the OPP? Is there joint agreement as to what sort of a highway safety plan should be embarked upon? Does this department concern itself with the number of police who are controlling the highways, and that sort of thing?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We have no jurisdiction over the number of policemen patrolling our highways. We do not have regular meetings, weekly or monthly, but there is a very close liaison maintained between the senior officers of this department, the officers of the Attorney General, and the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police, in all these matters.

Mr. Newman: Am I right that only $1,000 is being allocated to the senior citizens educational programme?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: That is so. This year the amount allocated to the senior citizens programme is up because we found we had substantial material on hand carried over from last year's programme.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I read to the hon. Minister from his own report, then, the seriousness of this? Page 36, senior citizens safety:

It is an unfortunate fact that people aged 65 years and over, who make up less than nine per cent of our population, are involved in 30 per cent of the pedestrian fatalities.

If for this reason alone there should be a real concerted effort to cut down this pedestrian fatality ratio where 30 per cent of all pedestrian fatalities involve people 65 years of age or over. I do not think that $1,000, plus what material the hon. Minister may have left over from other years—apparently he over-budgeted in other years; if he does have materials left over—is sufficient at all.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the amount of $1,000 ill represents the character and the quantity of the work that we are doing with the senior citizens. Much of the work with the senior citizens groups, if you can isolate them per se, is done by way of speaking and making direct contact with groups of older people. The item there, separating the older people's programme, the senior citizens, had to do with some publicity we had for them, and a book entitled "The Lost Art of Walking," and such.

Mr. Newman: Apparently the programme has been very ineffective if, in operation in the past, it could not reduce the fatality record below 30 per cent. How many people does the hon. Minister have in the senior citizens safety? How many people are there involved in—

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We do not have any members of the staff allocated specifically for senior citizen work.

Mr. Newman: Does anyone from the department go to senior citizens' homes and emphasize upon them the necessities of pedestrian safety?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Oh yes. I think it is one of the active operations of our field staff. They make a point of speaking and dealing with these people just as our work with the children involves a great deal of meeting with groups in schools and talking to them.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister: Is material sent out to the senior citizens and schools all across the province? Do you also have material in the French language?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, we do not have any publications of this kind in the French language.

Mr. Troy: Does the hon. Minister not think—since some other departments of government do use that language because there are so many in certain areas, certainly in northern Ontario and the northeastern part of the province—it would be most advisable, in order to get this message of safety across, that it should also be printed in the French language?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We have not heretofore put out any of this material in the French language, but I understand there is a booklet that will be available in French, I think, perhaps within this month.

Mr. Troy: I am glad his research has at least led the hon. Minister that far.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister made mention of the advertisements in connection with the licence expiry date. I wonder if the hon. Minister is aware of the confusion in the minds of the public just over Saturday here in Metropolitan Toronto in connection with the expiry date of licences?

Mr. Gisborn: That is not on this vote.

Mr. Braithwaite: Not on this vote. Well, here is one on this vote. With reference to the Pro Drivers Club in Toronto, through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister: How big is the grant that is given to the Pro Drivers Club with reference to safety?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We do not make any direct grant to that group. We do make grants to the Ontario Safety League, the Ontario Traffic Conference, and the Canadian Highway Safety Council.

Mr. Braithwaite: Has the hon. Minister been approached by the Pro Drivers Club with reference to a grant to help in their safety work—the training of teenagers?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: To the best of my knowledge, no. I think that is a private group which finances its own operation by charging for the services it renders.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, I have noticed a number of the other departments seem to have spent considerable money through their advertising agents to explaining their programmes in foreign languages. In fact, I can think of one hon. Minister in the last session who displayed this and showed that this was an important media, using different languages. Could I ask the hon. Minister in what languages he puts out his programmes?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the booklet I speak of, we expect it to be available by the end of this month, will be in a number of foreign languages.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister cannot class French as a foreign language. The hon. Minister referred, a moment ago, that he was going to put out a booklet and he said it would be in French; now he says it will be in foreign languages. Does he include French as a foreign language?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I answered the hon. member for Nipissing that we would be producing a booklet in French. I answered the hon. member for Dovercourt by saying that we would be producing the same booklet in a number of foreign languages.

Mr. Troy: I will have to wait until I see the transcript of Hansard to find out what he said.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I wish to pursue just a bit the question on speed limits. Someone might say it is in the next vote but I want to apply it to safety so I will take this opportunity.

I was told that the speed limit for trucks was changed from 50 to the regular 60 for passenger cars. I was almost sure that this had taken place just a short time ago and maybe, as the hon. Minister informs me, time goes faster than one might realize. But, nevertheless, at one time there was merit in having a differential in speed limits for trucks and for passenger cars on the Queen Elizabeth from Hamilton to Toronto. Now, obviously, the reasons are not there and the same limits are now allowed for trucks as for passenger cars.

I would submit that they should not have been changed, that the fact that now trucks are travelling between 60 and 70 miles an hour on that short stretch creates a very definite hazard for all the people using that stretch. You have to realize—and I would like the hon. Minister to give me the reasons for the change after I sit down, for changing the speed for trucks to the 60-mile limit—it is a short stretch, there are weigh scales in between the two places, and there are large stretches where it is only a two-lane highway. I came across this morning and, immediately ahead of me, there were four trucks in the right-hand lane and three in the left-hand lane, and they must have stayed in that position for about five miles.

Part of the time they were onto the gravel, which was throwing back on the cars behind them, and it was obvious to me that two of them were definitely racing for the weigh scales. I cannot find any reason for this increased speed of truck traffic on a stretch of highway of that nature. I think that a lot of consideration should be given to putting the limit back to 50 miles for trucks of the size that use that stretch. It certainly creates a lot of serious apprehension to the passenger car driver and sets up a tension that has most of them scared on that piece of road. I would ask for some reasonable excuse as to why the 50-mile limit was taken off for the trucks on that piece of highway.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The matter of trucks travelling at 70 miles an hour, or racing, is of course a matter of enforcement. We can have no sympathy whatever for that kind of performance.

There is, in The Highway Traffic Act, the provision that a driver or operator of a commercial vehicle, when driving on a highway outside of a city, town or village, shall not follow within 200 feet of another commercial motor vehicle. This shall not be construed to prevent one commercial motor vehicle overtaking and passing another commercial motor vehicle. That is the section of the Act. That is the basis on which enforcement arises from the situation the hon. member mentioned.

But as for having a differential in speed limits between trucks or commercial vehicles and passenger vehicles, especially on a crowded highway such as the "Queen E"—which has two lanes in each direction—the hon. member himself would recognize the difficulty in trying to improve safety by maintaining the differential, because it would increase the amount of passing, and there is danger inherent in passing itself. To have all this traffic travelling at the same rate, provided they observe the speed limit, I think is the safer course.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, this is going to be a matter of difference and attention to actually what happens. First, I would say that we cannot be naive enough to relate to the laws. I think the hon. Minister and almost every hon. member in the House knows that when the limit, or so-called limit, was 50 for trucks, they used to drive as high as 60, and when the limit for passenger cars was 60, they would drive at 70. I have raised this question before and I was told by the previous Minister that this has become the trend. It has to be watched. Then some day when everybody gets moving at 70 rather than 60, they will up the speed limit, depending on surveys and that sort of thing. You can drive from Hamilton to Toronto in a passenger car and if you hold the speed limit at 60 you are being pushed and almost insulted by the traffic behind you. So I would ask for a survey on this strip of highway to see exactly what is going on.

I am one who used that strip a great deal in the past. When we had that 50-mile limit for trucks, they could stay on the right-hand side and the passenger cars with the ten-mile-higher limit could drive with much more ease and without tension, by knowing they had the right to pass the trucks and that they would stay there. I would ask for a lot of consideration in this situation, on this particular piece of highway.

If you take Highway 400 going north, where the traffic is not as heavy when you get a certain distance away from the Metro area, an unlimited speed or the same type of speed for both trucks and passenger cars might carry more justification. In my opinion, and I have had it raised by others using this strip, there quite often is a hazard with the trucks at the accepted speed. Maybe it is enforcement we need, and if we feel we want to enforce the 60-mile speed limit, then it should be enforced. But in my opinion it is being ignored right at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: If speed limits are being ignored, it is a matter of enforcement. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Wentworth East, Mr. Chairman, that it would be conducive to traffic safety to have a speed differential between the commercial vehicles and the passenger vehicles. As for his statement that on a 60-mile-an-hour road, people travel at 70, my officials tell me that with the hidden radar they find that the average speed on 60-mile roads is about 58 miles an hour. I have seen times when it was not so.

Mr. Gisborn: Will the hon. Minister explain then why they did establish the differential at one time?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The road was not then so crowded and we had not realized then the amount of danger that was inherent in the passing.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I am particularly worried about the various exits from Highway 401 and the Gardiner Expressway in the Metropolitan area on to the cloverleaves. It has always appeared to me that as you come off the highway you have to make a fast circular turn; it appears that the notice of the decrease in speed is insufficient. I speak in particular about the Gardiner Expressway if you are going to take the Bay Street exit to come north on Bay Street or on York Street. I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us whether, in the planning of these expressways and highways, is there not sufficient room or space, or just what is the problem? No matter where in Metro you turn off the main highway, you slow down and all of a sudden you see a sign that says 15 miles an hour. You have been going 50 or 60 miles an hour, and the first thing you know, you are almost into a skid in the wintertime.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member must realize that highway design is outside our jurisdiction.

Mr. Troy: Research and highway safety is not.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, two things I have noticed happened in my own riding. The first is, sir, that on one side-street, there have been three accidents involving children running out from behind ice cream trucks.

I understand this is not isolated to my riding nor to areas in Toronto. I realize that with respect to the laws to protect children getting off school buses, this is a provincial matter. My first question is because of the number of accidents that I understand have happened with young children running out after they have bought ice cream, could not there be several things done? I can appreciate that there are local bylaws, but could not we, for example, have either distinctive blinkers or some kind of thing that would have to be placed on ice cream trucks, as some safeguard for young children, because certainly in Metro Toronto there were a whole rash of accidents because of this?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a matter of local concern. I think it is a matter of controlling the movement of vending machines that attract passengers into the dangerous area of roadway purchasing. I think the problem is a local one of licensing these travelling stores.

Mr. Thompson: I would have been inclined to agree with you except for the number of accidents that appear to have happened not in just one locality, but around our province. I think it could include the kind of vehicle vendor that attracts very young children, and because of this, and because I know your desire, particularly with school buses and proper safeguards—for example by law you have to stop when a school bus stops—I just ask that you might give consideration to the checking of vending trucks or cars which sell to young people.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I think we might very well give consideration to it. I cannot say that I have any sympathy for the kind of operation that goes on—vending machines travelling on highways and attracting customers across highways.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, practically every community has its own patrols that control students going to and from school. The type of uniform that these patrols wear is a conglomeration of everything that you could possibly imagine. I think there should be some uniformity, so that in the city of Windsor you know that the uniform represents a safety patrol officer, and when you travel to London, that same type of uniform would represent a safety patrol officer. You would not be confused by the type of uniform. The uniform would identify the individual. I think the department should give serious consideration to coming through with some type of uniform that would be standard for all school safety patrol officers. Also, I think the department should insist on some kind of training course which these officers could pass so that the application of the safety procedures would be the same in all communities.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think the uniforms used are provided by the Ontario Safety League, and the work is supervised by the local school boards. The training would be provided by local safety councils and the police in most instances.

Mr. Newman: Well, it may be in most instances, Mr. Chairman, but I can speak for my own area and it is not so at all. These school safety patrol officers purchase used uniforms from the members of the police department and, as a result, you have every type of uniform and every fit that you could possibly imagine. I think the department should come through with a standard uniform. The individual who is a safety patrol officer could wear one type of tunic with flashings designating this and that, with some type of safety patch on them so that they could be readily seen at an intersection, especially in one of these heavy-traffic roads that you do find close to some schools.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we are talking about two different things. I was speaking about the school children's safety patrols using the children members of the school, and I think the hon. member is referring to adults who are used as part-time officers by the local police force.

Mr. Newman: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: That would be a police responsibility.

Mr. Newman: I am referring to the adult safety patrol officers. The variety of uniform found even in one community is too great. Regulations should be set down by the department stating the type of uniform the individual should use. Likewise, the department, for the sake of safety, should make grants toward uniform purchases for these senior safety patrolmen.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister about the serious hazard, in my way of thinking, of three transport trucks travelling close together on the highway. Are there regulations prohibiting this?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I just read the specific section from the Act.

Mr. Sargent: If the hon. Minister has read the section of the Act, why is it not in force then?

Vote 2203 agreed to.

On vote 2204:

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Under this heading, I would like to ask the hon. Minister with regard to the new method of issuing operators' licences this year. A third of the operators will have paid three years in advance. Of course those who are 80 years of age and over will have to take a driving test each year; maybe next year they will fail their tests. Is it possible for these groups, or different ones, to apply for a refund if they are denied a driver's licence?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, in the case of one passing 80 having to take a test, and not having his licence continued, he can apply for a refund for the unexpired portion of the licence and he will be made a refund for each full year.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on the same question, how about the individual who dies; does his estate then apply for the refund?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: This one I would review. I say to my hon. friends who ask me this, if the deceased will write and give me his forwarding address I will see that he gets the refund.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, he does not want to be with the hon. Minister later, though.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I was asking about the advertising in connection with the licence expiry date. I wanted to ask the hon. Minister if he is aware of the confusion that existed, particularly in Metropolitan Toronto, with reference to the expiry date of licences. Has the hon. Minister any statement to make on that subject?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The Minister has made statements and he will make another one tonight. The length of time, sir, when motorists could have obtained permits and plates this year for passenger vehicles was a full three-month period. On October 31, 1963, a press release announced December 2 as the first day of sale and stated that February 28 would be the expiry date, with no extensions. On January 28, 1964, an advertisement in all daily newspapers in Ontario had ten spot advertisements. On January 28, 1964, all radio stations in Toronto, ten spots. On January 29, all radio stations in the rest of Ontario, ten spots. From February 3 to 8, all weekly newspapers in Ontario. The Minister announced in the House on February 17, 1964, in Hansard, page 659:

Eleven days left and 600,000 still have not obtained their '64 plates. The final day for purchasing the plates is Friday, February 28, and it is not intended that there should be any extension of the deadline.

We purposely avoid having a Saturday as the expiry date because, if for some unforeseen reason a motorist has not been able to obtain plates during the issuing period, he will not be denied the use of his vehicle over the weekend.

Mr. Braithwaite: The only thing I would like to know is, in view of all the advertising, it is obvious that the message did not get across. What I am wondering is: Is the government going to make any demand on McKim and the other advertising agencies for a refund of the money spent?

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Minister, through you, if he would explain to the House the part the department plays in the application of the assigned risk insurance premium.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The department plays no part in the assigned risk plan. It is the insurance companies who have united to operate that plan.

Mr. Gisborn: I thought I would get a different kind of answer to that. I understand that when the insurance companies decide a client has to take out an assigned risk insurance the government, through this department, assigns the insurance company.

Some hon. members: Oh, no, no!

Mr. Gisborn: Well, what happens in this case? That is what I want to know.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, I could answer the hon. member if the hon. Minister does not mind. It is just a simple question. I could answer it very simply for him: The risks are assigned by the insurance companies, the government has no part in that at all.

Mr. MacDonald: They share the gravy.

Mr. Cowling: Well, whatever you want to say, but it is not done by The Department of Transport. Insurance risks, they assign them to certain companies. They will assign any risk that is licensed by the department. I think that is perhaps what the hon. member is getting at.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, I do not quite understand it. I understood that the government assigned the company which would do the insuring.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We will give a driver a licence; the assigned risk plan will give him insurance.

Mr. Gisborn: Well, I want to continue with my argument. Maybe, regarding the problem that I find in this area, or the problem I feel exists in this area, the government should have more to do with it, because of the cases which have been brought to my attention. It seems to me that the assigned risk insurance feature is nothing more than a legal racket as far as insurance goes in the car field in this province.

Mr. Cowling: That is just silly talk; that is just silly.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Except it is true.

Mr. Gisborn: I will give you some cases and I would like some—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Gisborn: It is my opinion, and unless someone explains to me why certain people have to pay exorbitant fees for insurance coverage—

Mr. Cowling: Does the hon. member want an answer to that?

Mr. Gisborn: Wait until I give the cases and then the hon. member can reply to the cases if the hon. Minister cannot; he can let the hon. member answer if he wishes.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It is not within the compass of this vote. If it has anything to do with insurance, it might have come up under the estimates of The Department of Insurance but I do not think it is germane to this vote.

Mr. Gisborn: I beg the pardon of the hon. Minister but there is a department of his which has records in relation to the driving habits of licence holders.

An hon. member: You are right.

Mr. Cowling: It has nothing to do with the assigned risk.

Mr. Gisborn: Then where would I properly complain? To which government department would I properly complain and ask to take some responsibility in this field, as to what I term is being a legal racket?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The hon. member is dissatisfied with the rates which are charged to bad risk. Well, I think that is purely a matter of insurance.

Mr. Gisbourn: I am dissatisfied with the exorbitant rates charged in a discriminatory manner—

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It is still insurance.

Mr. Gisbourn: —in cases which I do not think are bad risks, in cases which I do not think are any more risky than many of the hon. members who have licences in this House, and thousands of other people who are driving with a licence and paying the regular rate of insurance for coverage.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: There must be a reason for it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have brought to the House the case of a man who had his licence cancelled for what the insurance company claimed was moral reasons; or something like this.

Mr. Cowling: That is a pretty good reason.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it?

Mr. Cowling: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: A man's ability to drive a car has absolutely no relationship to the moral reasons they happened to be using in this particular instance; and they themselves recognized it was wrong and reversed their stand. So let us not paint all this white.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, this is just another case of the NDP having all the answers on insurance. They know all about hospitals, they will tell us all about speed limits, but they do not pay any attention to the advice they get from this side anyway, so what is the use of giving it?

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, on the driver examination branch, I have had a number of requests to ask the department. I had already written the hon. Minister but I am not quite satisfied with his answer in regard to the hours these driver examination branches are open. They close generally at 5 o'clock. A number of people have told me, because of their working conditions, that they cannot get there in the day time, sir, but they can get there on Saturdays when they are off duty. Would there be any possibility—I have asked this before and I repeat it again—of staggering the days of leave of your employees so that they would be available on Saturdays? That is the first question.

The second one is: Some years ago when the present hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) was the Minister of Transport, I had asked that there be in my own riding, in which a large number of people speak the French language, an employee in the driver examination branch who was bilingual. He did so. I wonder: Is this policy carried out in other areas of the province, where it is most important that there should be an officer who is bilingual so that he can, in his examination and instructions to those who are taking the test, understand them?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, first of all with regard to the hours the driver examination posts are opened. This is a problem. You see it is like night shopping. A lot of people want night shopping for their own convenience who would not want to work at night themselves.

We have been trying to accommodate people with staggered hours. Last year, sir, the driver examination offices remained open on Thursday evenings. Since March of last year we have opened our examination centres on Thursday evenings for the purpose of conducting inside tests, that is to say the parts of the driving test, including knowledge of rules and signs and visual screening tests and such, which take place inside the examining centres. By shifting our Thursday working hours, to noon until 8.30 p.m., we conducted some 29,000 inside tests last year but, in the process, we lost out on 36,000 road tests which normally would have been conducted in the mornings.

You will appreciate, I am sure, that doing road tests after 5 p.m. is neither practical nor desirable due to the congested evening traffic conditions and, of course, darkness through a great part of the year. This loss of 46,000 road tests actually means that we are operating at less than peak efficiency. Any extension of this programme would only result in further loss which, in the final analysis, means greater delays for applicants and additional costs for the people of Ontario.

The opening of driver centres on Saturdays is not practical. Experience in other jurisdictions has shown that Saturday testing has produced more complaints and created more problems than exist with the Monday to Friday standard which is used across Canada today.

Saturday testings, in jurisdictions where it has been tried and abandoned, was instituted for the benefit of persons who found it inconvenient to appear on weekdays. The programme was defeated, however, by housewives, students, and others who could have attended during the week but instead chose Saturday and clogged this day for weeks in advance. An extremely high degree of complaints resulted.

With regard to the bilingual driver examiners, I want to say this: The department has always been aware of the need for examiners fluent in both English and French in areas of the province where French is commonly spoken. To this end the department has selected and trained examiners with this qualification, and has ensured that there is a bilingual member of the staff stationed at all driver examination centres in these areas.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister said that now there is an examiner who is fluent in both languages.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: In all examining stations in areas where French is extensively used.

Mr. Troy: Right-o.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, in a number of jurisdictions, statistics are compiled from the information available in applications for driver's licence—information with regard to the age of the car. Does the hon. Minister, with all his new machinery, compile those statistics in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We do not issue plates according to the year of manufacture of the car, but that information is given on the licence, Mr. Chairman. When we get into the mechanical issuing of vehicle licences and plates, that kind of information will pop up and be extensively used for the very purpose I think the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have considerable sympathy for the hon. Minister's rather indignant reply to the proposition that the deadline for issuing a licence should not be postponed and postponed.

I think, sir, that when you have given three months for a deadline at the end of February, that this is fair enough. However, I have been rather surprised at the number of representations that have been made to me, not so much on the postponement but for fixing a deadline at that particular time of the year. Some of them have been, I think, of secondary importance—such as winter being a tough time to get all those screws out when they have been salted in, and things of that nature.

I am not too impressed by this but I have been impressed by the number of people who have written or spoken to me in terms of the financial hardship involved in having to buy their plates in February. It is the immediate post-Christmas season and, more particularly, it is the period of highest unemployment. Those who, in this age of automation, are having increasing difficulty in retaining jobs, may find themselves unemployed or with less employment at that particular period. Has the hon. Minister given any consideration to another time of the year being the deadline?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: This is the time that is common for renewal in jurisdictions across the continent. I think it has to do here, particularly, with our own fiscal year. I can appreciate the hon. member's point that money may be tighter in January and February from overspending in December. It may be a period when there is, as the hon. member says, more seasonal unemployment. It may be a period of the year when people of very limited means find their budget extended and I think I have sympathy for the view, sir. There are difficulties in shifting it but I think there is a reason to look at it; and if it were a possibility, or it could be done conveniently, I can appreciate that there might be ground for it.

Mr. C. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I asked a question earlier in the afternoon pertaining to licensing, or licence plates, for ham operators in the province. They call themselves the Radio Society of Ontario Incorporated. Did the hon. Minister get a brief from that organization?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, about two weeks ago, after receiving many petitions and warnings from these groups and the hon. members to whom the local organizations of amateur radio operators had been writing, we saw this group. The appointment was arranged by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. R. G. Hodgson). We set up the interview and they came with a well prepared brief. They were accompanied also by my colleague and predecessor, the hon. Minister of Travel and Publicity (Mr. Auld).

They made a very plausible case for the special privilege of having their radio call numbers for their automobile licence plates. They all begin with VE, then they have one or two figures or digits, with another two or three letters. They are very interested in getting their own radio station call numbers or code for their licence plates.

From our standpoint, Mr. Chairman, there are difficulties and, even considering the representations they made, I think hon. members will realize it is a rather difficult thing to try to interrelate a series of completely unrelated lettering with our sequence of numbers. But I appreciate the point.

Mr. Bryden: The problem has been solved.

Mr. MacDonald: All nine provinces and 48 states. Why do we have to be the last one?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Some of the states are recalling them and cancelling them for that reason.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, if I may I would like to read just portions of this brief. May I? I am not going to take much time with it, but I would like it on the record.

Mr. Chairman: Is that the circular which was sent to all the department heads?

Mr. Bukator: Yes, all the hon. members got the circular, but I feel that some portions of their argument should be recorded, if permissible. I assure you that I will not take too long.

Amateur radio operators are always ready and willing to aid the civilian authorities during any emergency. This has been proven time and again throughout the province, such as hurricane Audrey and hurricane Hazel, and the southwestern Ontario windstorms. Many of the amateurs came from distant points and brought their own equipment with them. They have helped considerably in many cases where other types of communication have been done away with simply because of storms. They do this for nothing. They buy their own equipment.

And they have asked in one paragraph here; yes, paragraph two:

There would be no cost to the province for call letter plates. The other nine provinces issue plates to their amateurs, charge them an additional $3 to cover the cost of making the plates and the administration of same.

Now they claim that nine other provinces have done this for them. They claim that 48 of the 50 states have also done this for them. It would appear to me that in this case the province of Ontario should not be last.

I understand, according to their brief, there are 3,500 in number who are ready for instant action any time you want them, and I do not think they are asking for too much of a concession. They have a cardboard plate now. They are asking for a metal plate for which they are willing to pay their $3, or whatever this government sees fit to charge them. They are asking for a concession, and in the meantime they are rendering a very good service to the province of Ontario. I think in all fairness to the organization, a group of people who want to help themselves and help you, the hon. Minister of Transport, should consider their request and see to it that they get their plates.

I might put it by way of question, but I do not want this to be considered a loaded question: Will The Department of Transport implement the request from the Radio Society of Ontario Incorporated? This is by way of a question, and I would like an answer from you.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I answered the hon. member before he asked the question.

Mr. Bukator: I do not think that is quite in order. I do not think I have been too difficult this evening yet, but I can get nasty if he does. I asked a fair question. Will you not consider giving these people the concession they are after?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman it is exactly what I said, that we are considering the application in question:

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Minister, I think I have to get back into my usual form and my usual manner.

Mr. Chairman, the white-haired gentleman, the hon. Minister of Transport, reminds me of another white-haired gentleman that we had here for quite some time. He said "in due course". These people are entitled to the privilege they are asking for and you can rest assured, as far as I am concerned and the hon. member for Victoria—he was mentioned in this brief, but I do not think I should speak for him—but I do believe I would like to hear a few comments from him because he is pushing this particular project. I sat here all afternoon listening to a lot of conversation that I did not think was too interesting.

An hon. member: All your hon. members like to talk.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Let me find out where that hon. gentleman is from.

Well, all right, I am not finished yet.

Where is that hon. gentleman from that just made the first speech that he has made in the House?

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): You probably missed the last one.

Mr. Bukator: Well I hope it was more constructive than the one tonight anyhow.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that this is very important, to these people especially. I do not think they are asking for too much of a concession. Every other province in the Dominion of Canada has given them the plates for which they have asked. I would like to hear the comments of the hon. member for Victoria if he would see fit to speak.

Mr. R. C. Hodgson (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that while this brief was circulated to every hon. member in this House, only 29 of the 108 hon. members saw fit to support it, either by letter or personal visitation or personal contact with this member or the hon. Minister. I feel it is a very worthwhile project.

Mr. MacDonald: Let us have a vote.

Mr. Hodgson: We have supported it with some additional information that was not in that brief.

I would like to point out that we also had a very fair hearing by the hon. Minister and his department heads. When the hon. Minister said it was under study, we realized the confusion of issuing licenses and the sort of thing that the department is dealing with at the present moment, therefore our society felt that we should leave this decision for some time to be considered. I feel that this department will give this very good consideration.

I would ask the other hon. members, who did not support this petition, if they might feel free to do so now. We will send it on to the hon. Minister; the hon. Minister has not heard the last of our petition and support. I can assure you that if he turns it down this time, it will be repeated until he finally sees the light. Thank you.

Mr. Bukator: This is by way of finishing up—

Mr. Chairman: The Minister has already given you the answer.

An hon. member: Are you a ham?

Mr. Bukator: I have been a ham ever since I came into the Legislature.

Mr. Eagleson: There are a lot more in here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, I believe the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) is right. You have to be a ham to get here. We have got a lot of new people in the Legislature—

Just by way of clarifying a point with the last speaker, Mr. Chairman—because we did not write to the hon. member for Victoria—I think in all fairness this is the place to debate the matter. I did not want anyone to get the impression that I am not supporting this. I think if the hon. member for Victoria would be good enough to move a resolution, I think he would get the support of the whole House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments concerning the motor vehicle licence branch. What are the fees given to the sellers of motor vehicle licences?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Fifteen cents for each driver licence and 35 cents for each pair of plates. Ten cents for a transfer.

Mr. Newman: When was the last time the amounts were revised upward?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think it was three years ago.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest to the hon. Minister then that he consider an upward revision at this time, because when the department first sent out the driver's licence renewal forms to the driver, included was a return addressed envelope leaving the licence purchaser with the idea that he had to mail his money order and licence to Toronto. As a result of that, the local issuer found himself selling practically one-half of the number of drivers' licences that he would have normally. As a result he finds himself receiving less in fees this year than he would have in a normal year. I think the time is ripe now for an upward revision.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the driver licence applications that went out by mail pointed out specifically that they could be taken to their local issuer or mailed to Toronto, which is the procedure which has been in effect and available to the people for years and years. When we found that there were more coming in to Toronto than we wanted, we put in an extra stuffer suggesting that they take them if convenient to their local issuer.

Mr. Newman: That is all well and good, but that was already too late. A lot of them had already sent their licences to Toronto. The advertisement came in the newspapers at too late a time.

At this time I would like to request that the department consider having an historic vehicle licence plate. There are not too many historic vehicles in the province, and this would be a very nice way of recognizing the vehicles that are 25 or 30 years of age and are still in fairly good condition and likewise are something that has an historic value. Is the department considering a special licence plate for these owners?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The department is aware of the desire of some of those with antique vehicles to have special plates.

Mr. Newman: One other thing, and that is a request for the department to come down with some type of slogan on their licence plates; likewise, a more colourful plate. The licence plates in the province of Ontario are the dullest, the drabdest, you could possibly find. Apparently there is no imagination at all, and McKim Advertising apparently is letting the department down once again. What I would suggest, too, is that they do not use the slogan: "province of opportunity" because the use of that slogan suggests and infers—

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): How about: "Your government deserves your support"?

Mr. Newman: I thought the Beatles left for England a week ago.

The slogan: "The province of opportunity" infers that in all other nine provinces in Canada there is no opportunity. It definitely does. I would suggest that the department at this time come through with some appropriate slogan and come through with a very colourful licence plate. They have talked about this for the five years I have been in this House and they have done nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I can be very prosaic about this matter. We may have the dullest and drabdest licence plate but the purpose of the licence plate is primarily for identification purposes. A standard size licence plate has been established across the continent; namely, six inches by 12 inches. By engineering testing we find that the digits should be at least three inches high. We have, across the top of our plates, "Ontario" and the crown, and the year. If we were to apply even a three-quarter inch line of type across the bottom by way of a slogan, it would so reduce the size of the letters that, by accurate test, the number of the licence plate would become legible from just 50 per cent of the distance they now are.

I must say that the guiding criterion with me is the use of the licence plate for its intended purpose, namely, to identify the vehicle. Consideration has been given indeed to a fancy plate with a slogan—indeed we have mock-ups of them—but these are the things we have to weigh. Do you want to reduce the value of the licence plate's primary function to carry a piece of advertising, or do you want to maintain the licence plate at its best possible value? When thinking in terms of stolen vehicles, hit and runs and such, I am inclined to think—I am a little prosaic—but I think a licence plate should do the job for which it is designed.

Mr. Newman: I do not know what is wrong with the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman. Surely he knows there are other provinces and states which come along and do this and are not concerned at all? Their whole idea is to sell the province. If you wish to see the number a little plainer, increase the size of the licence plate; what is wrong with that? After all, they are made in one of the government institutions here; what are you fellows afraid of? I still cannot see why this province, which tries to sell itself as a province of opportunity, will not take advantage of the advertising potential of a licence plate which travels throughout the 50 states in the United States, and the other nine provinces in Canada; why is this department so backward as to refuse to put a slogan on the licence plates?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It may be, Mr. Chairman, that we are just too advanced, because the engineering testing labs at the University of Illinois are recommending to the states of the Union that they take slogans off the plates and make the plates as extensively useful as possible.

Mr. P. J. Yakubuski (Renfrew South): Mr. Chairman, the question I have to ask the hon. Minister of Transport today might seem in the lighter vein. I have heard so much quibbling since four o'clock, and a lot of it nonsense, from the hon. gentlemen on my right who often veer far to the left, that I think what I have to suggest or ask of the hon. Minister may have some merit.

I was wondering if the department were giving any consideration to retiring certain government plates. We know that, in sport, when there is someone who excels or stars in a certain field, whether it be in the New York Yankees, men like Ruth and Gehrig, or famous men in hockey or any other field, their number is retired if they should pass away or retire from that competition.

What I have in mind is that many Prime Ministers in the past, many of the Ministers of the Crown, have excelled themselves in this House, have been stars in the field of politics and stars in this Legislature. Perhaps, when someone does excel themselves in this House or in the field of politics, that private licence plate which they are accustomed to getting year after year should be retired—I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, the plate number 3033, which was held by the late hon. James A. Maloney of Renfrew South from the year 1956 to 1961, inclusive. What ails me, or what disturbs me, is this: We all know that Mr. Maloney has gone to his reward and we all know that Mr. Maloney is now living in beautiful and happy surroundings. I am not one who has ever sat in on a seance; I have no contact with the other world; but I do know that I feel that the late member for Renfrew South is not resting very happily when he knows that licence plate number 3033 is being used by an hon. member of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, if I could rise for a moment. I think that Mr. Maloney should be very greatly honoured to realize that the tradition of progressive thinking, which Mr. Maloney I know was noted for in this House, is being carried on in a new party and in a new way. I have no intention of retiring at this moment and, having been issued the licence, I am delighted to know that I have such a good licence and am carrying on a great tradition from Renfrew South.

I am going to improve on that tradition, Mr. Chairman. The licence is going to be carried with dignity in this province and, I am sure, with a great deal of improvement as far as outlook and message to the people of this province is concerned. I like the number; I intend to hold it.

Mr. Braithwaite: We have heard how the advertising in the department is taken care of. I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister could tell us just what system is used in the choosing of people who issue licence plates. I would like to know if he could take a particular case, any one of them, and table the correspondence connected with the appointment of an issuer of licence plates. This is something most people worry about. It has been brought up before. I would like to know for myself if the hon. Minister could table some correspondence on the matter.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister will not table the correspondence I had with him.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Ask the Postmaster General.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the appointment of the issuer of licences is at the discretion of the Minister. It is his to appoint and that is what he does.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Braithwaite: I just wondered if the hon. Minister would care to, perhaps tomorrow, table the correspondence connected with the appointment of only one of his representative issuers. I think the public is entitled to know just how this discretion is used. There are other people, besides good people working for the good Conservative Party, and I am wondering why anybody else does not get a chance on this type of job.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the Minister appoints the issuer and he chooses a person he thinks is suitable and able to give the required service.

Mr. Bryden: Why do they always have to be Tories?

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, on this same question, we have run into quite a problem in the Hamilton area. We have quite a few insurance people kicking to us now on the basis that a lot of the cars are sold at weekends. People go to get a transfer of their licence and they discover, up on the mountain in Hamilton, for religious reasons, the licence office is closed on Saturday and they have to try to go downtown to remedy this.

Is it possible that the licence office in Hamilton on the mountain be kept open on Saturdays even if, for religious reasons, they have to have somebody else in there who can look after that business?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy Resources): It would be open on Sundays.

Mr. Newman: It is not open on Saturdays; this is our problem.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Normally, Mr. Chairman, the issuer's office is not open on Saturdays. The department office here, which does the issuing over in the east block, is not open on Saturdays. I think it is customary in some of the smaller communities, where the issuer may happen to have the general store and there is a congregation in town on a Saturday, that he finds it convenient to be open for the service of the people. But we do not require the issuer's office to be open on Saturday, any more than we do the government service offices.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, if I could follow up this, the hon. Minister says that across this province the choosing of the people who will sell the licences is at his discretion. There are a great number of these people; first, I would like to know how many. Then I would like to know, sir, who advises you in order that you use your discretion in this.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: Because of the large number of people who get permission from you to issue licences, you yourself surely cannot know them individually; therefore how are you advised? From whom are you advised in order to have the discretion to appoint them?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, there are about 270 issuers across the province I am told. The only one I know personally is the one in my own area, who has been there for many years. As far as I know, the applications are made to the office; and the selection which comes to me, comes to me as a recommendation from the registrar of motor vehicles. I have great confidence in the man and I can rely on his judgment.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I would be interested in knowing whether we could have tabled in this Legislature the correspondence with respect to the registrar of motor vehicles in whom you have such confidence. Behind my question it is very obvious that I would suggest to you, sir, that, in the number of those letters that come to him, the letterhead says, "The Progressive-Conservative Party of such and such a constituency."

I ask you, since you shake your head, sir, whether you will deny that such letterhead is not among the applications which come to the registrar?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I recall one such letterhead coming to me and the only one such; and it was a blast to the Minister for not being amenable.

Mr. Thompson: Could I, sir, ask whether it is possible to see the correspondence which there had to be; to have this tabled?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: No, sir.

Mr. Thompson: Why is it not, can I ask?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: This is within the department.

Mr. Thompson: I would just like to say, on a basis of principle, before I sit down, that we can smile at this and say, "Well, this is all part of a system where the government in power can hand out small privileges." But I would say this: When you see cracks like this, and you know that a Minister will condone them, you cannot help that the public will suspect the morality of a government; if it permits it in small ways, it also permits it in larger ways.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): The people did not feel that way on September 23.

Mr. Troy: To the hon. member for Welland, some were feeling very good on September 21, but not so good on the 25th.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: But, continuing this matter of issuers of licences, sir. Some years ago I had written to the former Minister of this department, now the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko), in regard to the issuer of licences at North Bay. My answer was that it was considered that he was doing well and there was no reason for changing it; but I notice, after the 25th, even though this former issuer is a very strong Conservative, the issuer was changed. And I am sure the request came through, certainly as the hon. member for Dovercourt has said, not just on plain paper.

Continuing on this issuing of licences, I find in the town of Sturgeon Falls that the licence bureau is on a winding road. There is a sign written in ink. It is away out of town. When this person was granted the position as issuer of licenses, at that time she was a widow and certainly nobody at that time objected to her appointment; but now this woman has been married again.

Her husband, sir, is an employee of the leading industry in the town, and while people were sympathetic in the beginning it seems to me that since it is in such an out-of-the-way section of the area, it should be re-located in the downtown section. It offers services, not only to the town of Sturgeon Falls, but to all that area west, right through to Noelville. I am curious, too, as to how these things are changed because, as I said, at one time the issuers in North Bay had been found satisfactory, and then there is a change for the purpose of improving the service.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the provision of section 6, subsection 4 says:

The Minister may give authority to any person to issue permits for motor vehicles, trailers or conversion units, and may define the duties and powers of such person and, where the salary is not otherwise provided, may authorize and fix the fee obtained by the person so authorized for each permit issued.

We discussed the amounts of the permit before. Our concern is to appoint somebody who can give the public good service, and I can say that is the criterion I follow. I am not aware of the situation in Sturgeon Falls. I have not heard of it. The hon. member for North Bay mentions the one up there and in North Bay—

Mr. Troy: Sir, the rest of the riding would reject that if I were only the member for North Bay. I am the member for Nipissing.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I apologize to the hon. member for Nipissing for misnaming him. I am dealing with the situation of an issuer at North Bay and there was some controversy about it. The reason that the man up there was replaced was simply to ensure that the motoring public of North Bay and district, and I suppose that includes parts of the riding of Nipissing, were given adequate, efficient and courteous service.

Mr. Chairman, the file in my department on the former issuer is by actual measurement over an inch thick. But rather than read the entire file, I can quote from a letter to the editor of the North Bay Nugget which was printed in that newspaper and which I am sure you will agree sums up the matter succinctly. It is under the heading: "Verbal Abuse" and reads as follows.

Perhaps I could be excused if I omit the name of the issuer. I do not want to besmirch any man's name. I continue:

Dear Sir:

It is with a great deal of interest I read a letter to you in the November 26 issue of the Nugget undersigned by Mr. Blank, former issuer of motor vehicle licences.

The interest stems from the amazement shown by Mr. Blank upon having his position terminated. He appears to be completely in the dark as to the reasons other than secret Conservative strategy. Enlightenment may be very interesting.

Perhaps the former issuer can remember on numerous occasions in the past the verbal abuse directed at those motorists who inadvertently fail to make out their renewal applications in the proper manner. Trivial things were often omitted such as colour of hair, eyes, etc. Nevertheless, this was sufficient reason for a tirade from the issuer or the typist. What a way to cultivate good public relations.

I know personally a number of motorists who travel to Bonfield each year to buy their licences simply because they happened to be the recipient of a reprimand that at times dealt with their mental ability. They are all intelligent, responsible people. There is little doubt that some of them complained to the registrar of motor vehicles.

The motoring public does not and will not put up with discourtesy on the part of a person to whom they are having to pay a fee.

Yours truly,

(Signed) D. N.

Mr. Troy: If the file of the hon. Minister is more than an inch thick it certainly took the department a long time to make a change.

Mr. G. E. Gomme (Lanark): Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said tonight about issuers for motor vehicle permits and I am not a bit afraid of any correspondence that the member for Lanark has sent to the hon. Minister in this regard, for I have just had one issuer appointed since I became a member of this House and there was a young chap down there who—

Mr. Bryden: Did you have him appointed?

Mr. Gomme: Yes, certainly. I was instrumental and I am proud of it.

The young chap was a recruit in the RCMP and while he was on his holidays met with a serious automobile accident which left him paralyzed from the waist down. He had no visible means of support and his doctor came to see if there was an opening, if this man would be considered for the position.

His training of three years with the police force was excellent, he is a good public relations man and he is able to do his work from a wheelchair and I am very pleased with the action that the department took in appointing this man. If you want to talk about politics, I would be very surprised after what this great party has done for him that he would not support them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with another subject. Earlier this afternoon—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps it is appropriate at this time to make some comment on the little Chicago gang that holds forth here, particularly in evening sessions, and would suggest, sir, that perhaps we could get along much more quickly with the estimates if we did not have quite so much foolish noise coming out of that back row up on the top.

Mr. Chairman, there are 77 government members here and it may be that the guffawing and the loud, stupid noises that emanate from them are going to deter, for a while, the remarks of some of the Opposition members. We have just as much strength as they do and we are going to stay here and make our criticisms whether there is foolish noise from them or not. We deserve the courtesy of a hearing and we are going to get it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on this particular vote earlier this afternoon I was suggesting to the hon. Minister that it seemed from the statistics that he was giving that approximately one-third of those people who are tested for drivers' licences fail their test. The hon. Minister suggested I had the figures a little mixed up and that the figures he gave involved a third of all of those tested.

I have now had occasion to refer to his report, and on page 28, in the table number 20, under the heading of "Special Tests," I draw this particularly to the hon. Minister's attention—I will wait until he gets his report if he wants. Under the heading "Special Tests" it shows that the number tested were 12,744 and of that number some 35 per cent failed. Beside the words "Special Tests" there is an asterisk and the asterisk refers to a footnote that says:

These tests are conducted for the following reasons: drivers over 80 years; drivers 70 years and older involved in accident; accident repeaters; drivers involved in fatal accidents and drivers sent for retest by the driver control branch.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, from these five headings that the 35 per cent of the 12,700-odd people who failed in the test were people who did have their licence. I repeat these figures from the report, Mr. Chairman, to indicate merely this. It would seem that where the department has bothered to retest licensed drivers that by their own statistics in this annual report over a third of those retested drivers have failed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, can there be any better argument for a continuous system of retesting all of the drivers on the road? It would seem that we have in Ontario a record whereby a third of the licensed drivers whom the department has chosen to retest have failed. It may well be that these are the worst group, but there is no indication that these statistics necessarily do not follow through on all of the drivers. If the hon. Minister is really serious about doing something about driver safety, one would have thought that long before now either he or one of his predecessors would have inaugurated some sort of regular system of driver retesting.

The figures speak for themselves. They are in the hon. Minister's report and I do not see how he can deny it.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I want to continue with the question I raised in regard to assigned risk insurance. The hon. Minister has informed me that this subject has nothing to do with his department. I want to suggest that maybe it should have something to do with his department. I understand that when a conviction takes place through an offence under The Highway Traffic Act the court notifies the driver control department of The Department of Transport and there a record is made.

There is one question I would ask before I continue, sir, and that is what does the department do with this record other than file it? Do they in turn give this record to the insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The insurance companies have a statutory right to get information on convictions and suspensions.

Mr. Gisborn: They have to write to the department? It is not automatically sent to the insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: There is a fee for the information.

Mr. Gisborn: Then I would think this would make the department part of this system of assigned risk insurance. In any set of estimates that are dealt with in this House I am sure that hon. members can suggest that there should be estimates for something to take place and I want to suggest that this department should have something to do with the assigned risk insurance. It is a function in this province that in my opinion is a detriment to a group of people. I cannot find any other place to raise it and I think this department should have something to do with it.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Gisborn: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cowling: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

I submit to you, sir, that the question of assigned risks as it is being raised in these estimates do not apply to these estimates. They apply, in The Department of the Attorney General, to the superintendent of insurance of the province of Ontario, and no other place. They have absolutely nothing to do with this department.

I would like to have your ruling, sir, that this continued discussion of the assigned risk is out of order.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I would suggest that if you rule me out of order in dealing with this question in this department on these estimates, I should be advised as to where I can properly raise it before the House by yourself, sir, or through the hon. leader of the House of the day.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that the department was not concerned with the assigned risk plan, I just said that the hon. member's remarks were not germane to my estimates; and they certainly did not apply to the estimate under consideration at this time. I think he understands the matter comes under the work of The Department of Insurance which is reported for by the hon. Attorney General.

Mr. Chairman: This has been passed, it is under The Department of Insurance. The Minister has stated where this item comes under and it does not apply to his department.

Carry on.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, then we cannot discuss insurance at all under this vote?

Mr. Chairman: No.

Mr. Gisborn: I take it then the ruling is, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot deal with this subject on these estimates even though the insurance companies receive information from this department that then lets them use their own judgment on whether or not a person should be put on to an assigned insurance risk?

Mr. Chairman: I have made the statement that the Minister has answered your question and it cannot come under this department.

Mr. Gisborn: Certainly in previous estimates I have heard hon. members debate what they think should be in the estimates, what the department should do in relation to matters. Now this is all I wanted to do. In my opinion this department should have something to do with this problem.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I would like through you, to suggest to the hon. Minister that prior to this issue on which the hon. member is making a point, we were discussing the issuers of licences across the province.

The issue here is not all-important. It happens at all levels of government—politics come into it. But regardless of where we sit in this House, Mr. Chairman, there is a principle at stake here when the hon. Minister says—I think I understood him correctly—that the files could not be made public.

Now correct me if I am wrong. I would like to suggest that any citizen of the province of Ontario can walk into any government office and request any information he wants. This is public business and public money we are spending, and this has been my concept of democracy in government.

I guess I am very wrong if this does not happen in this province. I would like the hon. Minister to answer that, please, or the hon. Prime Minister, if he can.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Can I walk into the province of Ontario bank downtown and go into their vault and ask them for the money?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. Minister of Mines—

Mr. Chairman: The Minister has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I outlined how appointments were made, the basis on which they were made to my knowledge; and I also said that this is what we consider privileged correspondence and I do not think there would be any right for an individual to have access to all of it.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know the answer; is this public business or is it not public business?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I say this correspondence would be privileged, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sargent: For whom?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister, regarding the traffic engineering branch, what its function is, and what it does?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The traffic engineering branch is responsible for the supervision of traffic regulations and by-laws, municipal by-laws relating to traffic. That is municipal by-laws, Mr. Chairman, concerning the flow of traffic, the safety factors and such, are all reviewed by our traffic engineering branch before approval is given.

Mr. Young: Well then, does this branch offer any assistance to fair-sized municipalities which may be having some problems with traffic and yet may not be in a position to hire traffic engineers to solve their problems for them? Will the hon. Minister's department send a man out to help them survey and help them solve some of their traffic problems?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, that falls very well within the work of this traffic engineering section. Its purpose is to assist municipalities upon request in all matters relating to traffic control, to undertake studies, to prepare reports and recommendations for presentation to municipal councils, to discuss findings and reports with the municipal councils, to research and develop new techniques for traffic control and operation. I think that would encompass the limits of what the hon. member was asking.

Mr. Young: Could the hon. Minister give us some idea of how many municipalities might have been assisted directly over the past year?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, it is a lengthy list. If the hon. member would like a particular list or account I would be happy to let him have it.

Mr. Young: I would appreciate the list.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: It includes municipalities, large and small scattered across the face of the province.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct to the hon. Minister of Transport an objection that I have already directed to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner).

My objection does not apply quite as strongly to his estimates as to those estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, but I objected to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs because the whole of his department, with the exception of the municipal board, was combined in one vote. Now in this particular case, the same is not true here, but there is one vote, the one we are now dealing with, 2204—which covers five branches as well as some other services. It involves a sum of money, $5,410,000 out of a total appropriation for the department of $7,571,000, which I think would be in the neighbourhood of 75 per cent.

Seventy-five per cent of the total appropriation is in one vote. I would suggest to the hon. Minister that in future years it would make for more orderly discussion if these individual branches under the general category of motor vehicle administration had their own individual votes and we could deal with them one at a time. As it is, we jump from one to the other. There are several different branches here, as well as other different services.

The particular branch under the general administration that I would like to refer to for a moment is the vehicle inspection branch. The hon. Minister made some comments about vehicle inspection in his introductory remarks this afternoon. He took the position that compulsory inspection of vehicles is not a good approach to the problem. I am not going to argue with him about that. I have no doubt he has received some well qualified advice in arriving at that conclusion. I think he agrees, and all hon. members of the House agree, that the mechanical condition of motor vehicles is a powerful factor in accidents and therefore everything possible should be done to reduce it.

One step that I would suggest is not appropriate, notwithstanding the seriousness of the problem, is a procedure where a police officer may take the licence plates off a vehicle on the highway. I do not think we should put police officers in the category of judges and give them lawful authority to pass judgment upon a driver and his vehicle on the highway. However, that is a matter of legislation which I will not comment on any further at this time.

I would, however, like to suggest to the hon. Minister an area where the problem of mechanical defects may be tackled, and perhaps tackled in a way that would tend to reduce the problem on the highways, and that is on the used car lots.

It is criminal some of the heaps that used car dealers put on the roads of this province by selling them to unsuspecting buyers. Vehicles that are not roadworthy should not be on the highway and certainly should not be sold. Yet I once talked to a used car dealer in regard to a car that he took off my hands and I pointed out certain problems with relation to it. His answer was; I may say this was a new car dealer, who had a used car lot. His answer was, "As long as the car will get off the lot I do not care what happens to it after that."

I think they should have to care about it. They should have to take responsibility for the vehicles they permit to get on the highway by selling them to other parties.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised a number of disjointed problems. The first was the arrangement of the estimates.

I appreciate his point. Item 2204 seems a large vote and yet, for sake of convenience, it is broken down into different branches in the hope that it will facilitate the discussion on the various sections of the work. I think it is collected as it is, in one vote, because that is the way it is financially administered.

He made a couple of comments with regard to vehicle condition. First, the compulsory inspection issue. I said this was still open to study. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Downsview this afternoon represented that the situation in Vancouver, where they have compulsory investigation, was vastly better than ours. I have received statistics which state that in Vancouver, the rate is 7.4 compared with ours of 6. I was not too convinced but I am convinced, by the overall or the loose statement, that that was made by that hon. member without any buttressing statistics.

With regard to the used car dealers, I think my hon. friend knows that our requirement is that a used car dealer shall indicate on a vehicle being sold if it is or is not safe for operation. The responsibility then rests with the purchaser to make sure that the vehicle is in safe condition before he operates it on the highway. The certificate of mechanical fitness is required under section 49 of the Act. It requires that when a used motor vehicle is sold by a dealer he must furnish a separate certificate stating that the motor vehicle is or is not in safe condition for the highway.

There was one other matter he dealt with and that was disjointed, too. It had to do with the rights of the police to remove licence plates. That, as the hon. member knows, is one of the items which will be discussed in the present bill, on The Highway Traffic Act amendments, that is before the House.

It was back in 1935 that the police were given all the powers they now have with regard to requiring examination of a vehicle. The only change proposed in the bill is the confirmation of a practice that has been current as a means of immobilizing an unsafe vehicle. It is not enough to say to a fellow, "You must not drive out of your lane when I turn my back," so the officer removes the plates. That practice has been used extensively through the years. The present bill before the House, which is going to committee and which can be discussed at length there, provides that that function of the police will be clarified and reinforced by saying that a police officer has the right, when an impounded vehicle or one unsafe for the highway has been so judged, to remove the plates until the vehicle is put in safe condition to go back on the roads.

Mr. Bryden: Well, is the hon. Minister implying that the police for some years have been exercising this power without lawful authority?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The police have the power to impound or prohibit the operation of a vehicle. The actual act of removing the plates was a device that was used to make sure it would not be used when the policeman's back was turned, if I may put it that way. That was, I understand, a fairly extensively used practice.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I think we will have to contend that some of the problems which are arising from licence issuing are not the fault of the department. I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question about driver examinations.

I would like to ask him if the cost of driver examinations has to be related to the number of drivers examined or if it is a service to the public? Does it have to pay for itself or is it a service? That is what I want to know.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: They pay for the service they receive; I would think it would be a very fair apportionment of the cost.

Mr. Farquhar: You did not answer the question, sir. The question is: Are the driver examination appointments made so that enough people are examined to pay the cost, or is it a service? Primarily a service?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the driver examiners are civil servants now, all members of our department. They are paid salaries and we place them where we think they best serve the convenience of the most people. The estimated cost of the programme of driver examination for the current year is estimated at $1,256,000. We expect that the fees paid will total barely over $1 million, so that we will have an out-of-pocket amount of about $200,000 in operating this service.

Mr. Farquhar: Fine. Thank you, very much. I want to direct the hon. Minister further, Mr. Chairman, to a situation in a rural area that I know, where a licensing examination officer comes into the area every other Wednesday. I want to suggest that, in the case of school children or people 16 years old who want to take a licence examination test, they can drive 60 miles to this place on a specific Wednesday afternoon, lose a day's school, and get there to find the place crowded to the point where they do not get it that week—so they go back two weeks after.

If this is a service, I would suggest, as I suggested to you, sir, in a letter, that another examination officer should be placed in the area. I suggested an area with a radius of less miles than that. I suggested, to make sure that it might happen, a good Conservative, but it still did not happen. This is the reason for my original question: Does it have to pay or is it a service?

I am thinking that in some areas, if it is going to function, if it is going to have any value, it cannot be related to the number of examinations that are taken. The answer I got from the hon. Minister was something to the effect that there were "X" number of examinations the year before, and therefore it did not seem feasible to put another officer in. I am wondering if this is a constructive way to look at this, or if there is a mistake being made.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, in some areas of the country, obviously, applicants for drivers' examinations will have to travel further than others, but we have tried to make it possible so that none will have to travel more than 25 miles. The hon. member mentioned a distance of 60 miles. An appointment should be made for the test in these areas that are sparsely populated, where the driver examiner has to spend much of his time travelling. Of course, he will not cover as many tests as he would where the volume of business kept him busy at the one stand all the time; and those places operate, obviously, Mr. Chairman, on less than average revenue.

There must be a limit, of course, to the number we can have; we just have to do our best to suit the convenience of the most people and put no one to too great an inconvenience.

Mr. Farquhar: I am wondering, Mr. Chairman, when we are talking about revenue, whose money we are talking about. We think of one driver travelling 25 miles to spend a few hours to take care of 25 people. Is it cheaper, do you think, for 25 people to travel 50 miles and back? I think we are supposed to be talking about revenue saving but we may have got a little out of context here.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We have to be practical about this, Mr. Chairman. If we are going to have a driver examiner in every small community across the province it would just be impractical from the financial point of view. We just have to do the best we can as we expand this service to meet the need.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the evening I asked the hon. Minister if he would care to table the correspondence with reference to even one of the issuers of licence plates. Just now the hon. member for Grey North has asked—oh, the hon. Minister declined, by the way—if the public could see any correspondence in connection with the department, and the hon. Minister replied that this was not possible. I would like to know, first of all, whether or not a private member of this House could examine any one of the files with reference to this or any other matter in any department; and if the answer of the hon. Minister is no, I would like to know whether or not the answer is based on the hon. Minister's interpretation, or whether or not it is based on custom, or whether or not the answer is based on a point that has been proved in a court of law here in Ontario.

An hon. member: Very well done.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I am in no position to give the hon. members a complete dissertation at this time upon the rights of the public generally as mentioned by the hon. member for Grey North. The hon. member for Etobicoke is talking about hon. members of this House. There is no right for any member of the public, of course, to walk into any government department and ask to examine anything. Indeed, there is no right on the part of any hon. member of this Legislature to walk into any department of government and ask to have any particular document revealed or files shown to him.

There is a right on the part of a member here to ask—and I will find out what the proper numbers of the rules are and so on—but under the rules the procedure is outlined by which a member may ask for return of documents to be tabled and it then becomes a question for the government to decide whether the tabling of these documents would in any way be prejudicial to the public interest. If the government decides it would be prejudicial, the discretion lies with the government to table these documents.

However, if the government decides it is not prejudicial to the public interest then the return of these documents is tabled as a sessional paper. In very brief outline, this is the way it works in much the same way as the questions on the order paper.

Mr. Bryden: Such questions get much the same treatment.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, the hon. member for Woodbine says that. I think if you check back in the last few years your questions have been answered. They are all answered, and they are answered in a form in which they can be examined, sir. This is not irrelevant to the estimates of this department; but for the benefit of new hon. members of the House that is the procedure which the rules of the House provide for.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that from where we sit, putting a motion—a notice of a motion for a return on an order paper is a complete waste of time because the motion will never be called, or will be called so late as to be useless. I think the practice has fallen into desuetude, if that is the right word, because it turned out to be useless; and I think that is unfortunate. It is commonplace in Ottawa for documents in possession of the government to be placed on the table. Certainly the government has to reserve the right to refuse the production of certain documents.

This all arose from a question by one of the hon. members as to whether or not the hon. Minister would be prepared to table the correspondence relating to one application. Now the proper procedure for him to follow, I suppose, would be to give notice of a motion for a return; but if past experience is any guide that really would not produce very much for him. I think it was a fair question to ask. In effect, if he did give notice of such a motion, would it be complied with?

I judge, from what the hon. Prime Minister said, it would not be; either the motion would not be called or, if it was called, it would be voted down. I do not see why the hon. Prime Minister considers that the matter of the correspondence relating to the appointment to an office of administration of the affairs of the province is a privileged document. I must say I am not an expert on the rules in such matters but I do not see why that is a privileged document at all; and I do not see why the hon. Prime Minister should not be prepared to table such correspondence if a motion were put forward calling for an order of the House for him to do so. But, also, I do not see that there is much point in the hon. member going to the trouble of giving notice of such a motion if he has already got a negative answer. I suggest to the hon. Prime Minister that he reconsider the answer he gave and discuss it with some of his colleagues. I think that in this House we should—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The Minister has given his answer and the Prime Minister has also answered the question. I think that should be sufficient.

Mr. Bryden: It is really no answer at all.

Mr. Chairman: Order! He has given a direction which the private member can take and I think that should be sufficient.

Mr. Bryden: Can he give us an assurance that if the hon. member follows the proper procedure the matter will be placed before the House for consideration within a reasonable length of time, not on the last day of the session?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I can only say that of all the ridiculous requests to be made—out of 250 appointments, to ask the hon. Minister if he will please table the correspondence concerning one, when no one is mentioned! For instance, we have the Ontario

Motor League which issues licences all over the province. We could very easily take the correspondence concerning the appointment of a branch of the Ontario Motor League as an issuer of motor licences; what consequence or significance is that? If we want to debate how you go about this, I have told hon. members how to do it but the whole question has arisen, in my opinion, in a very trivial and light manner.

If there is something an hon. member wants to know, let him ask it; let him ask what he wants to know and there is a procedure that he can follow. I have pointed out what the procedure is, but to stand up and say, "Just table the correspondence concerning any one appointment of all the appointments, the department might make," really does not, in my opinion, and I doubt to any sensible person, make very much sense.

If the hon. member has a question he wants to ask; if he has a particular case he wants to know something about, let him follow the procedure.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend does not need to get so upset—

Mr. Roberts: Most assuredly, I am not upset.

Mr. Oliver: Well, from over here you looked as if you were a little excited. And we do not want you to get in that frame of mind at this time of night because—

But my hon. friend knows, of course, quite well that there is a line that is pretty hard to define as to what properly belongs to the members of the Legislature by way of information and what properly is privileged and should not be divulged.

I do not agree at all with my hon. friend when he says, "If you want correspondence about something, if you have something to say about a particular matter, then say it, and we will give it to you." We should be able to ask, and I think any hon. member is entitled—they certainly do it in the federal House all the time—to ask for correspondence to be laid on the table relating to a certain matter, a certain appointment.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: This is not a certain appointment; he said any appointment. Maybe the hon. leader of the Opposition was not here when this took place?

Mr. Oliver: I know I was not here. We can surely particularize the appointment; there is no question about that.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, I mean any particular one; but he did not say that.

Mr. Bryden: If there is a particular one, can you produce it?

Mr. Oliver: That is the point. I am old enough in this game to know that you cannot ask carte blanche for everything across the board.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, he did not even ask for that.

Mr. Oliver: What the hon. member has asked for, and what he has a right to expect an answer to, is correspondence relating to a particular appointment. That is proper public business. And if we want that information, you should furnish it.

The hon. Prime Minister talks about having the right to say whether he is going to table the matters or not. The only right that I know of in the federal Parliament is that it is against the security of the state. For heaven's sake, surely an appointment as an issuer is not going to be related to the security of the state. I think we are getting just a wee bit ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, if I might just interject.

In the first place, I am suffering from the same affliction the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) had, I have a little bit of laryngitis, so my voice perhaps does not sound usual. However, I would just point out to the hon. leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member asked that the correspondence from an appointment be tabled. He did not specify any appointment. He did not say the appointment here, there or anywhere else. He said: "Will you table the correspondence for an appointment that has been made?"

Well, as I say, we have 250 issuers. How many of them were appointed last year, how many the year before, how many have held an appointment for 15 years? We do not know, it is a pretty vague question. I do not think really it is the kind of question one could take too seriously. If he has a specific appointment that he wants some information about, I would suggest that he follow the procedure and ask for it. This is the point I make.

Mr. Oliver: On that very question, I was not here, I grant you, when this discussion was initiated. But I understand that the hon. Minister said, in relation to one or all appointments, that it was privileged. Now, the hon. Prime Minister says in relation to an appointment it is not privileged and the hon. member has the right to get that information. If that is what the hon. Prime Minister said—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is not.

Mr. Oliver: Well, what did he say?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I said, sir, there is a procedure that can be followed and then it is a question for the government to decide whether the production of these documents is in the public interest.

Mr. Oliver: Well, now, why would it not be in the public interest?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am not arguing whether it would or it would not. But I have not received the order for production yet. I do not even know what he wants to know.

Mr. Oliver: Can the hon. Minister conjure up a case where it would not be in the public interest?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Chairman, how could I decide whether it would or would not be in the public interest when I do not yet know what he wants?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister has started out by—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I think I should be able, as Chairman, to give my opinion on this. Now I think the Minister has given an answer, the Prime Minister has tried to explain this, the leader of the Opposition has given his views and I think it is very clearly set out here how the private member should proceed in asking his question. I think there should be no further question about it.

Mr. Sargent: Inasmuch as I asked the question, Mr. Chairman, would I not at this time be allowed to ask the hon. Minister if he would table the correspondence with reference to the appointment that was made in North Bay after the election?

Mr. Chairman: As has been stated here before, all the member has to do is put a notice of motion on the order paper.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Are there any further questions on vote 2204?

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the hon. Prime Minister. Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister answered my question and I want to reply to him. We could not care less about the licence issuers or the tabling of the documents. In principle—

Mr. Chairman: Order! If the member has a further question to ask on vote 2204, all right.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, we are speaking on this budget.

Mr. Oliver: Knowing my hon. colleague, I feel he is leading up to something tangible.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: I want to know from the hon. Minister of Transport if he says that these files cannot be made public, because of privilege—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I think I have the right to reply to a question I asked.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Troy: May a question be asked of the hon. Minister of this department about bilingual traffic signs or does this come under The Department of Highways? Does it come within the purview of the hon. Minister's department or The Department of Highways?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, our department.

Mr. Troy: Well, sir, some time ago during the reign of the former Prime Minister, I had correspondence with him about bilingual signs in communities where the population was largely French. At that time, or at a certain date, there was to be put in the Act a clause which said that traffic sign would be "Stop" only. Then hon. Mr. Frost told me that to solve the problem the word "only" would be taken out, therefore it would be permissible, in areas in which the population was largely French, that they could use the word "Stop" and also the French word for stop, arrêtez or arrêt.

Now, there has been a certain amount of discussion in Le Droit in regard to bilingual signs in the city of Ottawa. What is necessary then for a municipality if it wants to put up bilingual signs in its own community, what steps have to be taken? Must there be a municipal by-law or does the Act cover it, or does it override the municipal by-law?

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Want some Italian signs, too?

Mr. Troy: Some of you cannot even read English.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, the signs that are laid down in our regulations are, stop, yield and speed limit. I am in no position to say what the courts may decide on the point the hon. member raises, but I would say to him this, that we have a Canadian committee on uniform signs studying the symbolizing of signs which would provide the most desirable answer.

Mr. Troy: Yes, but sir, as I say, the correspondence—I cannot table it and maybe I cannot get it from the former Prime Minister of this province—but he said that the word only would be taken out and, therefore, it would be possible to have French, in areas where the population is largely French, such as in the town of Sturgeon Falls. They have the signs up there already. Now, is that legal? The former Prime Minister told me that the difficulty would be resolved if they cut out the word only.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I understand the word only is not in the regulations.

Mr. Troy: No, that is right, and these municipalities may put up the stop signs, and also under it in the French language, too?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Well, the regulation does not go beyond that. It is silent on that.

Mr. Troy: Well, that is what the former Prime Minister said, since it is silent, silence gives consent.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I think the symbolizing would be a—

Mr. Troy: Pardon, sir?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The adoption of symbol signs would be the answer to the whole situation.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in the driver examination branch, school bus drivers apparently have to go through a whole series of tests that cover vision, knowledge of rules of the road, skill in sign recognition, and in addition to that they must file a certificate of physical fitness.

Now, I see no mention at all of other bus drivers. Surely municipal bus drivers, drivers of intercity buses, should be required to file certificates of physical fitness, probably it is even more important for them than school bus drivers, Mr. Chairman. They are on the road for eight or ten hours a day, whereas the school bus driver may be on the road only four hours. Is there any reason why there is the difference between the school bus driver's requisite for filing a certificate of physical fitness and a regular bus driver?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: In the school buses it was found desirable to specify the qualification of a driver as possessing physical fitness. In the case of the large bus lines, they are pretty big corporations and would be concerned, very definitely concerned, in the selection of their drivers, that they possess the requirements for good driving.

Mr. Newman: One other question, Mr. Chairman. Has the department ever given consideration to the use of the log book with automobiles? In other words, just like an aircraft. An aircraft is required to have a log book showing the performance and any repairs to the aircraft. Is there thought of any similar thing for a motor vehicle?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I have heard it proposed, Mr. Chairman, that motor vehicles should carry logs that would give the whole story of the car, but as far as I know it has never been considered or studied by the department.

Mr. Troy: May I ask a question of the hon. Minister? Is it legal, Mr. Chairman, for, say, Sturgeon Falls and the city of Eastview, the city of Ottawa and other areas through this province, where already we have bilingual signs on municipal streets, is this legal?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am in a position to answer the legal question the hon. member asks. I simply told him what there is in the Act.

Mr. Troy: Would you then carry the question forward to somebody on the government side that can answer?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I would think it would be a case that would go to the courts if anyone was interested. Interpreting the law—

Mr. Troy: It is not that—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, surely when this has been a topic of controversy in one of the large cities in this province, and the hon. member comes here and in good faith asks the hon. Minister whether this type of sign is within the purview of the Act or is not, he is entitled to an answer. That is what the hon. Minister is there for and the hon. Minister must give us an answer. Surely.

Mr. Troy: The former Prime Minister gave me every indication that it was legal and he said it would be solved by leaving out the word only, so that municipalities in which there are large numbers of French-Canadian citizens would be okay. Now I find out—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister is hedging.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): No, no, no!

Mr. Singer: Even the hon. Minister of Labour gives more positive answers than that.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: I gave the hon. member my understanding of the regulation that is laid down and I am not interpreting the law. It has not been adjudicated as far as I know. I also explained to him a solution I thought was a happy one that might solve the problem.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister says he explained the solution. The solution is that there is a study going on to replace words with pictures. This is a continuing study that may not be resolved for many years. Now this is a topic of important concern to many citizens of our French communities and surely we are entitled to know, tonight, at this time, when this hon. Minister's estimates are before this House, what the hon. Minister intends by his regulations.

Either this is permissible or it is not. Surely this is a logical inquiry from Opposition members and surely we are entitled to a logical answer from the hon. Minister.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Troy: Just to continue the same question. Would it be too late then, if I put in on the order paper that such correspondence between myself and the former leader of this government be tabled. Would that correspondence still be available?

Mr. Chairman: Given as a motion, yes.

Mr. Troy: No, I thought it was all finished. Sometimes you get rid of files. I thought since the Great White Father—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to digress from the subject.

During the previous session of this Legislature The Highway Traffic Act was amended to allow the length of trucks to increase from 50 to 60 feet. Since that time the traffic officials of the city of Hamilton have had a problem because of this and I understand they are trying to find ways to ban trucks of this size from city streets.

They ran into some problems. They are now soliciting help from other cities and I assume they have solicited help from the government in this respect. Is there any intention of the department to amend this particular section of the Act to assist the municipalities in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I caught the last of the hon. member's question, but when dealing with these over-length trucks, the municipalities have the power to draw up and pass regulating by-laws respecting the use of trucks on certain streets and thoroughfares subject to the approval of the department. Is that the question answered?

Mr. Gisborn: Yes. Is the department giving consideration to giving approval so that the problem can be rectified in the municipalities?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, we have had no request on it. If we had, we would go into it and give a decision.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister, and I say this from an experience of which I know in which someone had taken a driving test outside of the city of Toronto where they were residing for a period and they found it was a much easier examination than it was in the city of Toronto.

Now I can understand some of the factors involved may be the congestion of city streets and so on, but I am wondering—is there a conformity in both the standards that the examiners apply to people taking the tests?

I ask as well, sir, with respect to this, regarding the method by which people are chosen to be driver examiners, do they have a common test for this?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The driver-examiners are given courses and they all follow exactly the same routine in the tests. The tests are identical, insofar as it is possible to have them. Of course, you could not duplicate in Cobocok the traffic conditions at the corner of King and Yonge, it is just impossible. But insofar as it is possible, the same series of tests are applied in each case. That is my understanding.

Mr. Thompson: Do they come in to a central spot to take training?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, all our testers are educated and trained in the one centre.

Mr. Thompson: My other point is—and I am interested in this with respect to the whole government departments. I have been interested in two things that have come up tonight.

One is the discretionary power of the hon. Minister, and I hope that this could be discussed more fully on a broader basis, because I think this is one of the most serious situations with respect to parliamentary control, that is, the wide discretionary powers that the Ministers have. And second, the regulatory powers that go down through deputy Ministers and so on. I question frankly, as I have sat listening to estimates, whether we govern in Parliament or whether we have abdicated the power and it is now given over to assistants and so on down the line.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member is more familiar with federal affairs.

Mr. Singer: He has a good knowledge of provincial affairs too.

Mr. Thompson: Looking across at the hon. Minister of Labour, and thinking of some of his boards, I ask you, sir, with respect to your boards, or this driver examination branch, supposing such a situation could arise where an individual citizen perhaps did not get along with the examiner for other than driving ability—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is this a hypothetical question?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, but it is a real question, and I ask this because we have to guard the rights of the individual citizen in this province. Supposing that such a situation did arise and he was turned down on two occasions—I do not know when you have to give up, after about two or three—but assuming that this was the situation, can one appeal to a higher body in order to get another test?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member's zeal for the common man, and I share it with him as a champion of the people.

With regard to driver examination, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the Minister's discretion has ever been involved at all. But if a driver trying his test was turned down, he can have a second test or a third test or as many tests as he wants, and he can go and be tested before another examiner if he so desires. In fact, it is not infrequently that very kind of thing happens where the second test is taken before another examiner.

Mr. Thompson: In other words, the method of appeal is that you just move to another city or somewhere.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Another examiner at the same station.

Mr. Thompson: I see.

Well then, sir, could I ask this: It would seem to me odd that one examiner—and surely you would look at this situation—one examiner is failing a number of people and another examiner is being more lenient with the people and passing more. Are you having a look at this type of situation? I myself might be inclined—of course, I am a good-natured fellow as the hon. Minister is—to pass a great number of people, but someone else such as—and I say, with respect, that the hon. Minister of Labour might also be with our grouping, but he may be a tougher man and fail a number.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, we keep complete records of every examiner and we know how many the examiners are passing and how many they are not passing. We make it a practice, my deputy tells me, that when a pupil goes back for a second test he is not supposed to be tested again by the same examiner.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question about the driver examiner—it takes a little while to get my wits about me this late at night, but I will come around to it, sir. The former Minister of Transport, now the hon. Minister of Labour, and I were privileged to have our pictures taken together when the driver examiner station opened in Niagara Falls. Since that time we find that the examiners in that area also examine the people up in Fort Erie when it comes to drivers' licences. One day last summer I wrote to the hon. Minister—I think I could do much better if my own colleague here would be a little quiet. I think, Mr. Chairman, I am being sabotaged.

But getting back to this problem that exists in Niagara Falls riding, concerning the two examiners who are there now, I believe there are still two. There have been times when people have had to wait for two and three weeks before they had an opportunity to try their tests because of the lack of help. I wrote to the hon. Minister at that time and he did say that, because of the many months of the year where they do not have too much to do, people—I cannot quote it exactly—would have to put up with inconvenience for a few weeks' time because they should not have to hire extra people to sit around and do nothing.

But would it be possible for the hon. Minister's department to hire people who could be roaming examiners, to pick up the slack and assist in the areas where they are busy, rather than have the citizens of this province, especially in my riding, wait for two or three weeks for an examination? This does not seem quite right. It would not be done in a private business; I do not know why the government should carry on that way. I would like to know if any steps have been taken by the department to assist these people to get their examination much quicker than they do.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, in view of the wide fluctuation in the volume flow of applicants for driver testing, it is just not possible to keep a perfectly even flow going through, and at peak times the work does fall behind. There is just no other way of handling it.

We have made a practice of training more examiners than we need continuously through the year and taking some of them into the department for other work when the peak has gone down. But you just cannot build up a corps of examiners sufficient to cope with peak times and leave them standing idle through the slack periods.

We try to even out driver tests, Mr. Chairman, as best we can but there must be periods—just like Christmas shopping when the stores are jammed—there will be times come spring, and periods like that, when the driver examinations sought are beyond the number that can be coped with readily by the examining stations.

Mr. Bukator: When you get conscientious workers such as we have in that particular office in Niagara Falls—I respect the work they are doing and quite often they work overtime. They respect the people they are working for and with, and they often take them at five o'clock or later. Does this government, or does the department, pay them overtime for the extra hours they put in? I think at least, if they have to do the extra work, they should get more money for it, for overtime work. Or are they on straight salary?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, they must be very loyal and splendid people in Niagara Falls I am sure. According to civil service regulations, we give these people working overtime, compensating time.

Mr. Bukator: That does happen? You pay them extra money if they put in extra hours?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We do not pay them extra money; we give them extra time off to compensate, to even up.

Vote 2204 agreed to.

On vote 2205:

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, under this heading, in the province in order to get a driver's licence you have to give proof of insurance or pay a fee. Now there are thousands and thousands of non-residents travelling our highways, for which we are very pleased; is there any check on these non-residents entering this province that they are covered by insurance, the same as the residents are, or what reciprocal agreement is there between the United States and the province?

I have a letter here, with regard to a citizen who had a car accident with a non-resident, and of course the non-resident said that he was covered by an insurance company in the United States and gave his insurance company's name. After he went back to the United States, the resident found out there is no such insurance company in the United States. I wonder what protection is given to the residents of the province, to see that the non-residents are covered with insurance, or is—

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, in the case of a non-resident who is covered by insurance being involved in an accident and is responsible for it, the injured party would sue him or his insurance company; but in the case of one who is not covered, the Ontario motorist has the protection afforded by the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Fund. That is where we have excellent protection for our motorists.

Mr. Spence: In this case, Mr. Chairman, this fellow could apply to The Department of Transport and get the damages arising out of the accident that was caused by this non-resident?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: If the guilty party was not insured, the injured party can apply to our Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Fund. If the guilty party, the cause of the accident, was insured, then the action would be against him and his insurer.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand the hon. Minister. If the blame was on the non-resident entering this province, then he could apply to the hon. Minister's department under the insurance claims department? Or is it the motor vehicles claims department?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: If the non-resident who caused the accident was insured, then the action would be against him and his insurer. If he were not insured, then the motor vehicle accident claims fund would become involved and it would meet the claim.

Mr. Spence: I will have this gentleman contact the hon. Minister's department at once.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: He is lucky to be in Ontario.

Mr. H. Worton (Wellington South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask an explanation from the hon. Minister on this fund. As I understand it, there has been $400,000 in fees. Is that the $20 fee that these people have paid into the fund?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: May I have the question again?

Mr. Worton: Sir, what I have here is in item 2205, the motor vehicle accident claims fund, and it gives fees at $400,000. Now what I am trying to get at: is this the $20 fee that individuals who have no insurance pay into the fund?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Oh no, these are fees, these are monies being paid out in fees to solicitors, adjustors and others in settling the claims. This is part of the cost of operating the fund. This is not revenue for the fund. These are disbursements out of the fund and it is estimated that solicitors, adjusting fees and so on in settling the claims that may number 1,000, 2,000, 3,000 claims this year—that solicitors' and adjustors' fees will amount to about $400,000.

Mr. Worton: Well, Mr. Chairman, where do we get the figure of these people who are not insured?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: The amounts of money paid in by the non-insured automobile drivers made of their $20 payments in consequence of not being insured, amounted to $1,460,000 last year. That was the contribution of the uninsured drivers paying $20 each in lieu of presenting a certificate of insurance.

Mr. Worton: In other words, there are roughly 50,000 people who are not insured, is that it?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, approximately that number.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, if this is going to take any time, I would move the committee rise.

Mr. Bryden: But, Mr. Chairman, I was really going to inquire as to whether or not this is the proper place to raise a matter I have in mind. Perhaps I could clear that point up.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: All right!

Mr. Bryden: It relates to some correspondence between the city of Toronto and the hon. Attorney General, sir, with regard to a suggestion from the city of Toronto, sponsored originally by Alderman Davidson, for the establishment of a board to deal with claims for compensation in automobile accidents. I do not want to be placed in the position when I come to some other estimates that I will be told that I should have dealt with it here. I merely ask for your direction, Mr. Chairman, as to whether this is the appropriate place or whether it should be dealt with under the estimates of the hon. Attorney General. If this is the place, I want to take advantage of the opportunity.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Is this in the nature, Mr. Chairman, of the recommendation that was made by the select committee on insurance?

Mr. Bryden: It is another phase, I would say, of the same problem. The select committee dealt with the question of compensation without fault. This is another phase of the same problem, namely the kind of tribunal, that should deal with claims for damages in automobile accidents. The city of Toronto, as the hon. Minister probably knows, has made the proposal that an organization with some such name as automobile compensation board should be established to deal with claims for damages in automobile accidents and this is another phase of the whole problem of automobile accident claims.

The correspondence, as it happens, was dealt with by the hon. Attorney General on behalf of the government. That is why I am in some doubt as to the proper estimates where it should be dealt with. I would have thought it would come under this vote.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Chairman, I would doubt, if it does not come within the operation of the motor vehicle accident claims fund that it would hardly qualify as a proper topic for discussion under item 2205. It might better have come, if it were to have come, when we were discussing the policy of the department. Perhaps it is a matter to be taken up with government policy generally, because it is clearly outside the operation of the fund.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, it seems that the hon. member wants to discuss it somewhere. We might as well make an arbitrary decision. Frankly, in listening to this discussion I do not know which department it would come under, but I am going to suggest that perhaps we deal with it under this estimate, if this is satisfactory. If you want to leave it and ask the hon. Attorney General whether he has any plans for establishing such a thing or not—it might fit better there, but it seems to me that we will have to arbitrarily say one way or another, then the hon. member will know where we are going to talk about it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will complete these estimates and proceed with the estimates of The Department of Agriculture; on Wednesday we will go to the order paper and the Budget debate and on Thursday we will return to the estimates and I believe—yes—we will be on those of the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) and the civil service.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.10 o'clock, p.m.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE ALCOHOLISM AND DRUG ADDICTION RESEARCH FOUNDATION ACT, 1949

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Alcoholism and Drug Addiction Research Foundation Act, 1949.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to permit the foundation to pay remuneration to members of the medical advisory board whom the commission employs to do certain types of research work.

THE MATERNITY BOARDING HOUSES ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Maternity Boarding Houses Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these two amendments: The first is to permit the boarding by recognized child welfare agencies of children over the age of three in homes operating under this Act.

The second amendment is to make it mandatory that these homes shall report any death occurring in the home to the coroner as well as to the medical officer of health.

THE NURSES ACT, 1961-62

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Nurses Act, 1961-62.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to make certain in the Act that action with respect to schools of nursing, to be established or to be abandoned, can only be taken with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

THE ONTARIO MENTAL HEALTH FOUNDATION ACT, 1960-61

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Mental Health Foundation Act, 1960-61.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these amendments: The first is to enact that the real and personal property, business and income, of the foundation is not subject to taxation for municipal or provincial purposes.

The second, and the more important, amendment, is to establish a board which will operate the Dr. C. K. Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, or better known to most of us as the new psychiatric hospital here in Toronto.

THE RADIOLOGICAL TECHNICIANS ACT, 1962-63

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Radiological Technicians Act, 1962-63.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to authorize the board of the radiological technicians to examine candidates who came in under the grandfather clause of the Act as passed last year, to ascertain that they have complete knowledge of the dangers inherent in the instruments they are using.

THE ASSESSMENT ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Assessment Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these amendments is to provide for the appointment of courts of revision where a district assessor is appointed in the territorial districts and for the remuneration of members.

Another amendment requires that the clerk of each municipality is to send to the county clerk a statement of the valuations of real property in respect of which grants in lieu of taxes have been made.

Another provision is respecting the appointment of county assessors and for purposes of clarification of these sections already in the Act, the Minister is also empowered under another amendment to make grants to defray part of the cost of the district assessor where a county has appointed an assessment commissioner. This amendment will provide for equalization proceedings for a limited period to give the assessment commissioner sufficient time to assess real property in all the municipalities on the same basis. The reassessment, if we may call it that, may take more than one year.

Then there are a large number of sections dealing with the appointment of assessment commissioners in the territorial districts to make assessments in the local municipalities and also in the localities in the district that are without municipal organization.

Another amendment dealing with section 182 of the Act will now require that after a tax sale has been held by the county treasurer, he is required to send to any owner or encumbrancer a notice that the land has been sold for taxes, the date of the sale and that the owner or encumbrancer can redeem it in one year from the date of sale by paying the amount required and costs.

At present the treasurer is to send such notice to the address of such encumbrancer or owner, if known to the treasurer, and if not known, to any address appearing in the records of the registry office or the sheriff's office. The amendments will require the county treasurer to ascertain the address of each owner and encumbrancer that may appear in the records of the local municipality in which the lands are situate. These records are more likely to be correct, since there is an annual assessment.

References to fees to registrars in The Assessment Act are being deleted because these are provided for under The Registry Act.

THE ONTARIO MUNICIPAL EMPLOYEES RETIREMENT SYSTEM ACT, 1961-62

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System Act, 1961-62.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is required so that the employees of the Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement Board may participate in the pension scheme established under the Act.

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Department of Municipal Affairs Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, a number of the amendments in this bill deal with the matter of inquiries which may be taken into any or all of the affairs of a municipality.

A further section provides through this revision to give the department the same powers with respect to any inquiry or investigation made under any general or special Act as it now has as a result of a provincial-municipal audit made under Section 17 of The Department of Municipal Affairs Act.

Another section deletes the reference to registration fees because these fees to which registrars are entitled are provided for under The Registry Act.

Another amendment requires a tax arrears certificate to be signed by the treasurer; also a redemption certificate be signed by the treasurer; and also another document which is known as a vacating certificate which must be signed by the treasurer.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Minister would advise us if these bills will go to committee?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: These bills will in the usual way find their way into the committee on municipal law.

THE ONTARIO-ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity): Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill is to change the name of the commission to the St. Lawrence Parks Commission.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day, I wish to table the answers to questions Nos. 1, 6, 7, 9, and 12 on the order paper.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

1. Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Inquiry of the Ministry: (1) Has the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario acquired title to the lands described as "the remaining lands" in the agreement between Dimensional Investments Limited and the commission dated March 11, 1959? (2) If so, (a) what amount or amounts were paid for the said lands; (b) when; and (c) to whom? (3) If not, what steps are being or have been taken to acquire title to these lands?

Answer by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario:

(1) Not yet.

(2) Answered by (1).

(3) The action in the Supreme Court of Ontario by Ontario Hydro against Dimensional Investments is not yet concluded.

6. Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Inquiry of the Ministry—(a) On what date did the regulation requiring principals of schools with over 300 pupils to have university degrees come into force? (b) How many schools in this category have principals without such degrees at the present time? (c) On what basis does the department award letters of permission under these circumstances?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis):

(a) The regulation requiring principals of schools with more than 300 pupils to have university degrees went into force on September 1, 1961. The above is in accordance with subsections (2) and (3) of section 7 of regulation 81—General Regulations for Elementary Schools—which read as follows:

(2) Subject to subsection 3, on and after the 1st day of September, 1961, no person shall be the principal of a school having an enrolment of 300 or more pupils unless he holds,

(a) a permanent first class certificate or a permanent elementary school teacher's certificate; and

(b) the degree of Bachelor of Arts from an Ontario university or a degree the Minister deems equivalent thereto.

(3) Where a teacher who is otherwise qualified but does not hold the university degree required under clause (b) of subsection (2) is employed by a board prior to the 1st day of September, 1961, as principal of a school having an enrolment of 300 or more pupils, he shall be deemed to be qualified under the said clause (b) as principal of any such school operated by that board.

(b) At the present time the qualifications of the principals of 134 elementary schools with enrolments of 300 or more pupils do not meet the requirements stated above.

(c) The department issues letters of permission to school boards for the employment of principals not holding the required qualifications when the boards have advertised the positions in newspapers with province-wide circulation and have not been able to secure qualified principals. The renewing of such letters of permission depends on the continued satisfactory progress by the persons concerned toward the securing of the required university degrees.

7. Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Inquiry of the Ministry—(1) Have lands been acquired for the development of the Queen Elizabeth Highway to a limited access road from Hamilton to the Lincoln county line? (2) (a) If so, what lands have been acquired? (b) From whom were they purchased? (c) And at what cost? (3) (a) Is any land being expropriated for this purpose at the present time? (b) If so, who is the owner of the land presently being expropriated?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton):

(1) Yes.

(2) (a) Lands Acquired

Township	Lot and Concession

Saltfleet	Pt. 21 B.F.
Saltfleet	81

(c) Cost

(3). (a) Yes.

(b) M. & Z. Kasprzak.

9. Mr. F. Young (Yorkview)—Inquiry of the Ministry—(1) Has the farm machinery board, recommended by the Ontario farm machinery investigating committee, been set up? (2) If it has, would the hon. Minister inform the House (a) of the names of its members; (b) its terms of reference? (3) If the committee has not yet been set up, can the hon. Minister state when it will be?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart):

(1) Yes.

(2) (a) Names of members of the farm machinery advisory board: chairman, C. G. E. Downing; members: R. Sinclair, C. G. Whittaker, W. J. Allinson, Wm. G. Tilden, M. L. Tebbutt, Arthur S. Bolton, Fred Cohoe, Robert J. Rice, R. S. Sparrow; secretary, Hal. E. Wright.

(b) Terms of reference—to act in an advisory capacity in respect of all aspects of the farm machinery industry in Ontario and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing:

1. To obtain information and test reports on farm machinery being offered for sale in Ontario;

2. To evaluate, review and report on developments in testing and quality control in the manufacture of farm machinery;

3. To review and report on the availability of spare parts for farm machinery;

4. To receive and review complaints from farmers, farm machinery dealers and others and assist in reaching solutions acceptable to the parties concerned;

5. The board may hold hearings at such times and places as may be necessary, and for such purpose the chairman or acting chairman shall have all the powers of a commissioner under The Public Inquiries Act.

6. The board shall report at least annually to the Minister of Agriculture and at such other times as the board deems necessary.

12. Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale)—Inquiry of the Ministry—(1) How much money did The Department of Lands and Forests lose as a result of the introduction of the three-day non-resident fishing licence in 1963?

2. (a) How much money was collected for the said licences in 1963? (b) How much did the collection costs of the licences increase?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts):

(1) None.

(2) (a) $202,050.50 for 67,228 three-day non-resident angling licences. Incomplete figures for 1963 show approximately seven per cent increase in the number of non-resident licences sold.

(b) Nil.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to make a very brief statement concerning the plans for the Centennial in 1967. This matter was raised by the hon. member for Downsview during the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, and as there has been some comment in the papers, I thought I might set out the position so that the proper planning could be done.

We have already sent from Municipal Affairs a memorandum in which is set out information concerning the participation of the federal and provincial governments in projects which will be proposed by the municipalities and submitted to The Department of Municipal Affairs. Then the decision will be made as to whether they fit into the regulations as set out by the federal government and ourselves. The contribution of the provincial and federal governments will be a maximum of $1 per head from each level of government, to match a minimum of $1 per head from the municipality. Municipalities may, if they wish, co-operate in a joint project, in which case our contribution and the contribution of the federal government would be $1 per capita of the combined population of the municipalities.

Then, in addition to this, the federal government has offered to the province $2.5 million, or 50 per cent of the cost, whichever is the lesser, for the construction of a single capital project.

This government is presently considering the Ontario project which would be suitable for construction under this offer of the government of Canada. I would point out, as I have done before to the press, that this project would be a purely provincial project; and would not be in conjunction with anyone else. It will be designed to commemorate Confederation, the anniversary of Confederation, by the province and on behalf of all the people of the province.

In the press there have been reports that the city of Toronto is considering the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts as a possible centennial project and I have no doubt that, upon application, this project would be eligible for the federal and the provincial grants as I have mentioned them here this afternoon. It is not contemplated that the purely provincial project, which I mentioned secondly, would be done in conjunction with the city or with anyone else. Therefore the federal and provincial support available to this St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts project is the $1 per capita from the federal and the provincial governments which I have already mentioned.

In order—and I think this is where some confusion has arisen—that the city may feel free to proceed with its planning, I would say that we are not, as a province, planning any project which would be the same type as the art centre, as I understand the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts to be. I think perhaps this is where the confusion has arisen. But if the city wishes to proceed with its planning for this centre, I can assure them, their council, that what we do provincially will not conflict with what they have in mind in this particular project so that they may go ahead with their planning.

We are conducting a good deal of research into the type of project which would be suitable for a province-wide commemoration of our centennial. We are not yet in a position to announce the general form, or the detail of what is being considered. Immediately we are, it will of course be announced here in the House. But what I really wanted to do was to reassure the city of Toronto that what we are planning will not in any way conflict with what they have in mind. I hope in this way to remove any confusion there may be.

Mr. Speaker, just before we reach the orders of the day, I would like to introduce to the hon. members of the House a guest who is sitting under the balcony, Mr. James A. Mathieu. Mr. Mathieu will pardon me—and he knows I am going to say this—he is 95 years of age; I believe he is the oldest living ex-member of this House. He occupied a seat in this Chamber from 1911 to 1914. I believe, sir, that was your freshman term here. And he was here, according to vagaries of political life, from 1919 until 1929 representing, of course, the Rainy River district where he has lived for many, many years.

He is a man of somewhat enormous experience. I think you might be interested to know that, at the age of 17, he was a chief raftsman on the Mississippi River floating rafts of lumber down that great river. He has built in the Rainy River district, in the course of his lifetime, eight sawmills. He is busy every day; he is active day by day and he has been a great humanitarian and a great benefactor to that area.

He was awarded the Lamp of Learning award some years ago—I might say the first man outside the field of education to be given this recognition—and he sponsors the revolving educational fund which is used to assist the young people of the Rainy River district to acquire the higher education that our young people are searching for so actively today. I would say, too, that he has a very beautiful home, which I have been privileged to visit, just outside Fort Frances on the highway just about where the fur traders from the west used to come down and meet the voyageurs when they came up from Montreal to exchange furs in those days—because the travelling season was so short that the voyageurs from the Quebec area could not get all the way out.

So, Mr. Mathieu, we welcome you here and are delighted with this opportunity of recognizing you and introducing you to your successors in this Legislature; and we wish for you many, many more active years.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The forty-first order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT
(concluded)

On vote 2205:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should give the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) a moment to sit down.

I indicated last night that I had a matter that I wished to raise with the hon. Minister and the government relating to a request made to the government on several occasions by the city of Toronto. It appears to me that the request is directly related to the operation of The Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act and fund. The request that has been made by the city could perhaps be as well summarized, at least as well described, for the House if I simply read the motion that was adopted by the city on September 30, 1963.

This, as I say, was the third occasion, I believe, when the city council adopted a motion of this type and forwarded it to the government. The person who has been sponsoring the proposal contained in the motion is Alderman Davidson, whom Toronto members will know is a senior alderman in city hall and is known for his conservative views. I think one could properly apply the word conservative to Alderman Davidson both with a small C and a large C.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Dennison too!

Mr. Bryden: Well I am talking about Alderman Davidson. The reason Alderman Dennison's name got into it is that he happened to second this motion. I will read the motion as I have it from the city council minutes:

Alderman Davidson, seconded by Controller Dennison moves that—whereas it has been repeatedly stated that there is a severe shortage of accommodation for the Magistrates' Courts, creating congested and unhealthy conditions for those attending same; and whereas it appears that more than half of the cases coming before the Supreme and County Courts are those arising from motor vehicle accidents, which has interfered with the administration of justice on ordinary matters; and whereas it is desirable and necessary that additional space be provided for the Magistrates'

Courts to relieve this problem; and whereas a considerable saving could be made if a method could be found to provide this accommodation without undertaking any new construction of buildings; therefore be it resolved that this council ask the province of Ontario to give consideration to the appointment of a board to issue licenses for motor vehicles, fix insurance liability with respect to motor vehicle cases and administer all claims arising out of motor vehicle accidents, and further that this council request the Metropolitan Council to make a similar request to the province of Ontario.

This motion was adopted by the city council and forwarded to the government. It will be noted, Mr. Chairman, that this has to do with the administration of motor vehicle accident claims. The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) has mentioned on more than one occasion a cognate subject, that is the question of establishing in the law the principle of compensation without fault, which has been unanimously recommended by the select committee of this House, but has so far not been acted upon by the government.

Alderman Davidson has proposed that there should be a separate board or similar agency to administer claims relating to automobile accidents. Personally, I would carry the whole procedure one step further to its logical conclusion and say that automobile accidents should be handled in much the same way as industrial accidents. In other words, we should not only establish the principle of compensation without fault, we should not only provide for administration by an independent board, but there should be a fund set up administered by the board to which motorists would contribute and out of which claims for compensation would be paid without regard to fault.

This, however, is a matter I will not take time to go into now. I merely want to make it clear that although I support the proposal that Alderman Davidson put forward, I think it should be carried to its logical conclusion. However, I would certainly agree with him that one should go at least that far and I would agree with the hon. member for Downsview that the principle of compensation without fault should be established as well.

What I am mainly interested in bringing to the attention of the House, Mr. Chairman, is the reply which the city clerk received from the government, and in this instance the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) was asked to act for the government, and I will read the relevant extracts from his reply. It is a letter dated February 7, 1964.

As you are aware a court may only be constituted and a judge only appointed by the government of Canada and it is not within the jurisdiction of the province to infringe on that authority.

A serious problem also arises since the establishment of such a board might remove the determination of a person's civil rights from the courts where such rights have always been determined. This is a very serious proposition and it is certainly one which could not be undertaken without very great consideration.

In most cases the establishment of a board such as you have mentioned carries with it the proposition that any person injured in an accident might apply to that board regardless of fault. This, of course, would remove one of the deterrents from our system since there would not be a judgment against the wrongdoer, and he, in fact, would be able to obtain compensation despite his own misconduct.

The cost of such a scheme would be substantial and a great deal of detailed analysis would have to be made to ascertain the reliability and advisability of this type of board.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The hon. Attorney General did not send a bill with that opinion, I trust, because it is not worth very much in law.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, in common with my hon. friend, the member for Sudbury, I have great respect for the intelligence, knowledge and ability of the hon. Attorney General and I think it is regrettable that his superior ability should be used to devise specious arguments of the type set forth in that letter.

Mr. Sopha: And inaccurate, you might add.

Mr. Bryden: Well, specious at any rate.

I would say that they are ingenious probably, although not as ingenious as perhaps one might expect from a person of the hon. Attorney General's ability. It shows that he is really reaching for straws in the kind of reply that he made to the city council on behalf of the government in regard to a serious request.

There are essentially three points he raises. The third one is the question of compensation without fault. He raises the old chestnut, which has surely been demonstrated to be wrong time after that, that if the principle of compensation without fault becomes established a deterrent is removed. As if people get themselves involved in automobile accidents in order to collect insurance.

It reminds me of Mr. Richard Crossman many years ago, when he talked about deterrent charges that had been introduced at that time under the British health plan. He said that the purpose of these deterrent charges was to discourage people from the sheer self-indulgence of having their teeth drilled. This is the same sort of argument.

However, I do not really think it is necessary to belabour that point. There has been a committee of this House, representing all parties of the House, that unanimously recommended that the principle of compensation without fault should be incorporated into our law. It would be useful if the hon. Attorney General, before engaging in mental gymnastics of this kind in the future, would read that report. I believe it was available before February 7, when he dictated this letter.

As to his other two objections, the first of which is that courts may be established and judges appointed only by the government of Canada, I really cannot understand it. I am not a lawyer, but I cannot understand what relevance this point has at all. If the hon. Attorney General were here, I would ask him how it was that the province managed to establish the workmen's compensation board. The point, even to a layman, is obviously a specious argument.

His other point is that if we established a board of this kind a person's civil rights would be removed, or the determination of a person's civil rights would be removed from the courts and this he says is a very serious proposition. Well, I would like to read to him what the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario had to say some substantial time ago—two years ago to be exact—on the same subject. Unfortunately, even people so eminent as Chief Justice McRuer can set forth cogent comments on matters of this kind and they appear to have little effect on the government. I have already read some extracts from the press accounts of Chief Justice McRuer's speech before the opening of the Toronto Assizes in January of 1962 to the House. I will read one or two again, because it takes a long time for some of these sensible ideas to seep into the thinking of the government.

Chief Justice McRuer, I may say, in that famous speech in January of 1962, came out in favour of some scheme of compensating motor accident victims along the lines of The Workmen's Compensation Act. Some of his comments are interesting, in view of the concern the hon. Minister has expressed for the protection of individual civil rights. Chief Justice McRuer said this, for example, as quoted from the Toronto Daily Star of January 10, 1962:

When I see a judgment for $1200 or $1500 that carries with it costs amounting to nearly as much or more than the injured party receives I cannot feel that we have devised the best method of dealing with these cases.

The same issue of the same paper quotes him a little later on as saying:

We are doing little more in the civil assizes than operating a great adjustment bureau involving motor car cases. I am convinced our present method of settling claims for injuries sustained in automobile accidents is more of a guessing game than administration of justice.

And then the Toronto Globe and Mail, January 12, published a partial text of the Chief Justice's comments and among other things he said there:

I can say with some conviction that I never preside over an automobile accident case that I have any real feeling of administering justice according to law.

And the hon. Attorney General is concerned about the civil rights of the individual! The Chief Justice of Ontario, who has presided over many of these cases, says he has never had the conviction that he was administering justice according to law. Why? Because of the impossibility of determining justice in such matters. The Chief Justice also went into that point.

The present scheme of settling claims for injuries and assessing damages is more of a guessing game than the administration of justice, he said, referring to motor accident cases. This is from the Toronto Daily Star of January 9.

Witnesses are asked to recall details of cases which happened two to five years before they came to trial.

Then the Toronto Daily Star quotes him along the lines that I have just quoted from the Toronto Globe and Mail.

So that in the face of such comments from so eminent an authority as the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, it is simply incredible that two years later the hon. Attorney General could write a letter of the type that I have just described. It is obvious that there is no case whatever for clinging to the ancient system we once had—brought partly up to date by amendments of two or three years ago—for dealing with automobile accident cases. I am suggesting to the government, Mr. Chairman, that the case has been established beyond any reasonable doubt for the only proper way and the only just way.

I am now concerned primarily about the individual civil rights. The only way to deal with these cases, while giving full protection to the individual's civil rights, is by establishing a board similar to the workmen's compensation board to administer a fund out of which compensation can be paid. This is what the city council of Toronto asked for on the initiative of Alderman Davidson. I think the city council of Toronto was entitled to a more intelligent reply than they got from the hon. Attorney General acting on behalf of the government.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I want to pursue a question I was ruled out of order on yesterday, on this vote, I think it is the proper place to deal with this.

This vote covers a fund established by this department to pay compensation to people who are hurt, or who have property damaged under certain circumstances. The hon. member for Woodbine has spoken about another type of justice that should prevail in regard to accidents and I want to suggest that the department should also look into the problem of assigned risk insurance and—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Last night you ruled that a discussion of assigned risk on this department was out of order. Right? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that your ruling last night was proper and I submit that the same ruling should apply now.

I am not saying that this hon. member has not the right to discuss anything that he wants to talk about and I have not any brief for the assigned risk, but I simply say that it does not apply in this estimate, Mr. Chairman, and I would again ask for your ruling on the matter.

Mr. Gisborn: Before you make the ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, if the hon. member in raising the point of order has a personal interest in this issue and he is connected with—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Gisborn: —then we might look into the problem of a conflict of interest of an hon.

member of this House. I was ruled out of order yesterday on another vote, and I ask your indulgence and I expect to have the right to make my point in this regard under this vote. I am not doing any more than the hon. member for Woodbine did just previous to me in taking the floor. I think that the assigned risk insurance certainly is an area where one can—

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, if I could just advise the hon. member. The hon. member for Woodbine was discussing a proposed board. It is a non-existent board at this moment. The hon. member for Wentworth East is talking about a board that is in existence and has no connection whatsoever with The Department of Transport.

Mr. Gisborn: I do not know what board the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Cowling: Well then you had better smarten up.

Mr. Sopha: What has the assigned risk plan got to hide?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

I made a ruling yesterday and we should abide by it.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I have two questions I would like to ask of the hon. Minister through you. I would like to know how many claims are still unsettled under the unsatisfied judgment fund and also how much of a backlog is there now in the motor vehicles accident claims fund?

Hon. Mr. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, I find that as of January 31, 1964, the number of outstanding cases, old and new totalled 2,347.

This included cases unsettled as of July 1, 1962, 1,232 outstanding; and of these 1,134 have been settled so that the old cases outstanding number only 98.

Last night when I was speaking on this subject, sir, I gave from the tables from which I had prepared my remarks that the total number of claims settled in the course of 18 months of the operation of the new motor vehicle accident claims fund was 6,890. I understand the corrected figure is 6,013, and I want to correct that misstatement to the House last night.

Mr. Davison: I take it then there are 1,100 claims under the new fund not settled yet, is that right?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Yes, there are approximately that number of new claims currently before the board.

Vote 2205 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Transport.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Chairman: On vote 101:

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, before making some general comments on the agricultural picture in Ontario today, I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge the co-operation and assistance which I have received during the past year from a very outstanding and a very hard-working group of civil servants in The Ontario Department of Agriculture.

The deputy Minister, the assistant deputy Ministers, and all of the department heads, have been of great help to me in carrying out the agricultural policies of this government and in dealing with the many problems we are encountering today in food production and in food distribution.

I am also grateful for the co-operation and help of all those working in the various departments at head office in Toronto, at the colleges in Guelph, at our agricultural schools, our research and experimental stations, and in the field, where the ultimate results in agriculture are achieved.

The annual report of the department for the year ending March 31, 1963, has been tabled in the House giving a detailed account of activities for the fiscal year.

As we deal with the estimates for the coming year, there will be an opportunity to discuss these activities in detail as well as those new activities which were started during the current fiscal year.

I thought, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that I would devote my remarks today to several overall policy matters and the approach this department is taking towards them and towards some of the specific problems in agriculture which have arisen.

Change is the greatest challenge which government faces today. In no department of government is this more so than in agriculture. All of those in this phase of government service are constantly confronted with rapidly changing needs of the food industry, in which farmers play the primary role.

In agriculture we have come to accept change not only as inevitable but as an important indicator of progress, and the extent to which we can make quick adjustments and readjustments is the extent to which our agricultural policies will be successful, and the extent to which we will see the development of a healthy agricultural industry in this province.

It is my hope that this department of government will continue to encourage new ideas in agriculture and welcome new suggestions and proposals.

Recent advances and trends in agriculture are bringing many benefits but they are also bringing many problems for which satisfactory solutions have not yet been found, either in this country or in any other country where agriculture has become highly developed and mass merchandising of food has become an established practice.

These problems must be faced within the scope of our prevailing agricultural policy which recognizes the freedom of the individual, his right to self-determination, his right to ownership of land, the products he produces, and his right to organize with others for collective action.

Within this policy there is a basic and a necessary recognition of government responsibility for the development of a healthy agricultural industry and for the welfare of those making their living from the land.

This policy is based on three major concepts—better production, better marketing, and better living—and all of our activities in The Department of Agriculture stem from this triangle which gives meaning and purpose to our agricultural programme.

The base of this triangle is better production, and the two sides, better marketing and better living, come together to make up a symbol which represents what we are achieving in Ontario agriculture.

This triangle can be superimposed upon a much wider background which represents our ultimate goal—an adequate supply of good food for an expanding domestic and world population at satisfactory prices to the producer.

This goal cannot be achieved unless agriculture is founded on these three basic concepts—better production, better marketing, and better living for the farm families of this province.

Ontario is the most important producer of agricultural products in Canada, leading all other provinces in total output of every farm commodity with the exception of cereal grain.

Agriculture has made possible the industrialization of this province because, as history has shown, no country in the world has moved to an industrial footing without first having achieved a sound agricultural economy.

Agriculture continues to sustain the well-being of Ontario and a healthy agricultural and food economy will continue to lead this province into new accomplishments and new eras of development.

The history of the world has been the history of agriculture, and the future of the world will be the future of agriculture and food as countless millions yet unborn will not be satisfied with the subsistence living evident in some countries today.

We, in this vast province, endowed with rich agricultural resources, must be constantly aware of the needs of farming and of farmers in our overall economy, if we are to see these resources fully and properly developed in the future.

The total food needs in Canada are expected to rise by some 70 per cent in the next 20 years.

World needs are expected to increase by 80 per cent.

Ontario farmers will be expected to play their part in meeting this demand for food, not in the unforeseeable future but within the lifetime of many of our young farmers today.

This brings me to the first of our three basic agricultural concepts—better production.

Ways and means are under continuous study to develop, through research, production methods which will keep our agricultural food products on a competitive basis.

Some 40 food products, valued at more than $200 million, continue to be imported into Canada each year. Nearly all of these products are normally grown in this province and most are selling in competition to our own farmers in their own traditional market.

This situation is causing increasing concern and points up the need to find ways and means to promote Ontario products on the home market on a larger scale than ever before.

A study is presently underway of the production and marketing difficulties involved in getting a larger share of this market on the doorstep of Ontario farmers.

In the area of research, a field in agriculture where Ontario ranks as a world leader, many problems at the farm level are being solved, as well as other problems in secondary agriculture such as food processing, handling, storing, packaging and distribution.

In this regard, a great step forward was taken by this government two years ago with the establishment of the Agricultural Research Institute of Ontario when the best research talent in agriculture and veterinary science were brought together.

Many research projects are presently being carried out by the institute with an annual budget of $5 million, as the hon. members will note from the first annual report of this institute which I had the honour to table in the House a few days ago, and which they will find on their desks today because it had not been printed in duplication until this last day or so.

We are moving ahead in our beef and dairy herd improvement programmes with better animal husbandry, better feeding methods, better animal health control and attaining higher standards of quality in both beef and dairy products.

To develop a greater appreciation of the potential market for feeder cattle in this province we are bringing a group of livestock farmers from northern Ontario to see the beef herds in southern Ontario, to see the feed-lots in operation to get an idea of what is demanded in the feed-lots by our feed-lot operators and the requirements of those operators.

We hope that through these efforts this year we will be able to encourage the development of feeder cattle and cow-calf herds in the northern parts of the province.

The Ontario Department of Agriculture has been instrumental in the organization of the Ontario Beef Improvement Association which has just concluded its first annual meeting.

This association, which now includes some 38 newly formed county organizations, is an important step forward in furthering the development of the beef-producing industry which is of vital importance to this province.

New advances are also being made in hog production in Ontario, but we still must make a greater effort to raise quality if we are to increase the appeal of pork products to the consumer, who has the final say about what food she will buy and what she will not buy.

Revolutionary changes are also taking place in poultry production and in the processing of fruits and vegetables, and as a result we are increasing our share of the home market and finding new markets for these products in the United Kingdom and Europe.

For instance, an experimental shipment of 120,000 fresh frozen turkeys to West Germany last November has proven a success and I am advised that Ontario turkey and chicken should do well in this market in the future.

As I informed the House earlier, we are following up our success in promoting Ontario food products in the United Kingdom by sending another 100 tons of a variety of Ontario foods to Great Britain's Ideal Home Show which opens in London this very month.

A great number of producers and food processing firms in Ontario are co-operating in this promotion to put Ontario products on the map.

This United Kingdom promotion of our food products has been a continuing effort over the past three years and our exports to the United Kingdom have now reached an all-time high since we managed to regain entry to this market in 1960.

We are finding that increased emphasis on better production to attain our full agricultural potential is showing very concrete and definite results and these results will be even more startling in the future if there is no relaxation of effort.

Another area where better production emphasis has resulted in an important step forward is in corn production for livestock feed. As a result of new cultural practices, new varieties and improved mechanization, some five million more bushels of corn were produced in Ontario last year than in 1962.

The importance of farm machinery in production and the problems created by mechanization have now reached the stage where special consideration must be given.

Last year the government established the farm machinery board which was one of the recommendations made by the Ontario farm machinery investigation committee.

This new board will make an important contribution to agriculture by continuous evaluation, by review and study of developments in testing, in quality control of machinery, as well as keeping on top of problems in distribution and availability of spare parts.

The board will advise the government on any legislation that may be necessary having to do with the manufacturing, testing, distribution or sale of farm machinery in the province.

Better farm production, Mr. Chairman, is basic to all other developments in agriculture and the food industry and I am happy to report to this House, through you, sir, that among the farmers of Ontario there is a great thirst for knowledge which will assist them to improve their production methods and their efficiency in farm operations.

However, Mr. Chairman, the recent drought in southwestern Ontario, the loss of an estimated six million dollars to our oat crop due to stem rust disease and the loss of some $10 million in milk production last year due to mastitis are only some of the constant reminders that agriculture remains, due to the whims of nature, a great challenge to man and to those who make their living from the land.

In regard to stem rust disease, The Ontario Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with the federal government, will launch a campaign this year to rid Ontario of the barberry shrub which is the host plant for the disease.

As I announced in the House a few weeks ago the government will initiate a mastitis control programme this summer as a result of the new knowledge we have of this disease which seriously affects many dairy herds in this province.

Better marketing, the second of our two basic concepts in agriculture, falls into two main categories: our own domestic market and our potential market in other countries.

In our home market, changes in agricultural technology, marketing systems, consumer demands and changes in almost every phase of the food industry and every level of production and distribution have created new problems and many are growing more complicated every day.

No longer is it clear in the agricultural and food industry today to determine, in a broad sense, where the interest of one group ends and another begins.

In many cases there has been a telescoping of traditionally separate functions, such as production at the farm level, processing, distribution and retailing of food.

Farmers, through their own organization, have integrated forward in the food production and marketing system to make closer ties with the consumer and in some cases food merchandisers have integrated backward toward the land, and in between many separate operations are now joined together under a single management or by contractual arrangement.

Farm suppliers, mostly machinery companies and those supplying feed and seed, are also integrating in many cases and their traditional role in agriculture has been expanded to include financing and management functions on behalf of some farmers.

These are but some of the changes, most of them quite recent, which have occurred in the fusion of agriculture and the food industry.

Government responsibilities in agriculture are also becoming more difficult to define in some areas as the industry becomes more complex and interdependent.

Government is being asked more and more to go into the game as a referee with little or no power to stop the play or to interfere with the players.

Although we have a great deal of legislation to cover agricultural and food practices which this Legislature feels ought to be controlled, our system, as is the case in most of the western world, remains basically one of free enterprise in farming and in food production and distribution to the consumer carrying with it the benefits of competition and a free and open market.

We do not say in this country who may own the land and who may not, who may farm and who may not and we do not impose production controls and quotas on food production.

Such extreme measures, which add up to state control over food production, decrease the initiative of the individual.

However, many serious problems are emerging as the farmer faces an ever increasing concentration of buying power due to mass merchandising and retailing of food products.

The extent of this power can be seen in the fact that 60 per cent of all food sales in Ontario is now controlled by large food chains, and another 20 per cent is in the hands of stores engaging in group buying.

Mass merchandising of food has brought with it many advantages, it has also brought many problems.

Trends in integration and concentration of buying power are not only creating serious concern for farmers—particularly those who lack the collective bargaining strength to negotiate reasonable prices—but also for the government which must be alert to any trend which might lead to a cornering of the food market.

While we have not reached this stage yet, there are disturbing signs in both Canada and the United States which point to this possibility and there is some fear that present trends in the food industry may lead to monopoly control, not only of the retailing and processing of food but of production at the farm level as well.

Expressing a rising concern in the United States, President Johnson noted in a recent speech that there are 200,000 retail grocery stores in the United States but one out of every two dollars spent for groceries goes to fewer than 100 chains, and the President wants to know how this concentration of power affects the public interest.

As I have pointed out, a similar trend toward concentration of buying power in a few hands is taking place here and this government also wants to know what the effect of this trend may be in agriculture and in the food industry generally.

An investigation of this situation by The Department of Agriculture has already begun through the Ontario Food Council which was established by this government a year ago.

Apart from the adverse effects this trend may have on the open and competitive marketing of farm products, on the effectiveness of producer marketing boards and on the security of farmers generally in this province, it also may have some serious long-term implications for the consumer who, up until now, has enjoyed the benefits of free and open competition in the sale of food products.

The problem goes by several different names—corporate farming, contract farming, vertical integration—and the problem also exists in several different forms; some of which are not considered to be harmful, but some are creating very serious concern.

We as a government are concerned with maintaining an agricultural industry which will provide the fullest opportunity for farmers, for processors, and for others involved in food production, to market their products competitively, openly and without fear of reprisals by powerful corporations if they do not knuckle down to certain terms and conditions.

We do not want to see a situation where the farmer is told that he either accepts the conditions of sale dictated by the big companies or he does not have a market for his product; or where the processor of farm products operates under the same fear.

Widespread take-over by large companies of the production, processing, distribution, and retailing of food products, would have a disastrous effect on the agricultural and food industry of this province, or in any other jurisdiction where this occurred.

Integration is not new, and is quite far advanced in many phases of agriculture, including poultry—which is perhaps a classic example—fruit and vegetable canning, some crops such as soyabeans and sugar beets, and in some phases of the dairy industry.

It is also advanced in some other aspects such as contractual arrangements between farmers and farm supply companies, and in many other ways we have examples of integration which has already taken place, or is presently underway.

How far we as a government would be justified in going, or how far in fact we can go under our constitutional powers to intervene in this situation, will depend on the investigations we are presently carrying on to determine the extent and ramifications of integration.

The problem appears to be also interprovincial and international in scope and it is becoming more and more apparent that a national approach may be required in view of the interlocking nature of management and company operations in Canada and across the border.

One important step we have taken was the establishment of the Ontario Food Council, to which I referred earlier, composed of representatives of producers, processors, distributors, and consumers, with powers under The Public Inquiries Act to investigate this problem and others which may arise from time to time in food production and distribution.

The food council has brought together representatives of the various interested groups in an effort to find solutions to the problems of integration.

For the first time in our history we have a group of agricultural and food industry leaders, along with representatives of consumers, meeting together with the common purpose of dealing with any problems which might tend to weaken the effectiveness and the general economy of the agricultural and food industry.

Some steps have already been taken to strengthen the provisions of The Farm Products Marketing Act to prohibit a processor from cancelling a farmer's contract to supply fruits and vegetables without just cause, and to require that processors who grow their own fruits and vegetables pay licensing fees under the Act for commodities regulated under a marketing plan.

In regard to the food council, may I add that it has launched a consumer programme on marketing and merchandising practices to fill a very great need for this kind of information.

The council also has a responsibility for promoting Ontario food products, and a commodity merchandising programme has been set up with large retailers to deal with temporary surplus problems.

A case in point is the current merchandising programme for onions, which has been organized by the council with the result, I am advised, that more onions are moving in the domestic market at this moment than is usual for this time of the year.

Many of the situations we are encountering in agriculture would be far more severe than they are, were it not for the fact that this province is very far advanced in marketing legislation.

There is more marketing legislation designed to create an orderly and stable market for farm products on the statute books of Ontario than in any other jurisdiction in North America.

This does not mean to say that improvements in our marketing plans cannot be made. Changing conditions in agriculture and the food industry require that marketing legislation remain constantly under review so that changes can be made to meet new situations.

In regard to our export markets, some of the traditional thinking in this province may have to be revised in the light of the opportunities which exist for many Ontario farm products.

Farmers can no longer afford to regard these markets as dumping grounds for surplus production, but rather as continuing and stable outlets, provided continuity of supply and quality are maintained.

Farmers, producer organizations and processors should be prepared to develop these markets with the long-term benefits in mind in order that we may be able to attain our full agricultural potential.

I come now to the last of the three basic agricultural concepts, and perhaps the most important—better living for those who live and work on the farms of Ontario.

This has to do with our human resources in agriculture, with the farm families who have the responsibility for producing the food which is required. For them, change has the greatest impact. New developments in agricultural technology, and the changing needs of the food industry, are requiring the farmer to make changes in his operations about every five years, the result being that he faces major adjustment and readjustment about seven times during his active life on the land.

This kind of disruption not only interferes with production but poses frequent and periodic threats to the farmer's capital investment and his long-term security.

Other industry, being founded on mechanical rather than living things, need not contend with uncertainties of climate, the threat of disease, and the many other problems inherent in the growing plant or the growing animal. To these families farming is a way of life, a business, a career, a job, a heritage, and a future.

The farm families are the backbone of the rural life of this province. Their aims and objectives are closely tied to the land and water resources, to land use, to rural planning and development, and to rural community services.

In 1962, the farm families of this province paid more than $50 million in real estate taxes to their local municipalities, and all together paid out more than $650 million for their operating goods and services and other expenses, thus making them one of the largest consumer groups in Ontario.

To meet rising concern in some rural areas, particularly in land use and planning for future needs, many projects have started under The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, with the ultimate goal of making better use of physical and human resources in rural communities.

Capital and credit requirements of farmers are of great concern as the cost of land, construction, machinery, equipment, and other needs follow the same upward trend seen in other segments of the economy.

The cost of establishing their own farms today is of special concern to the young people who want to remain on the land, and this House has before it now a government bill which will raise junior farmer loan maximums from $20,000 to $40,000.

Farm management assistance, including estate planning essential in these days to preserve the farm family structure, is one of the most important extension services of The Department of Agriculture.

The department is also providing extensive assistance to the farm families through the home economics branch and co-operating and participating in the many programmes of the Women's Institute of Ontario.

The young people on the farm, among whom are the agricultural leaders of tomorrow, are actively engaged with the department in many activities.

All hon. members of the House will be interested to note that this is the 50th anniversary of the junior farmer association of this province, and junior farmers and 4-H Club members in all parts of Ontario will be celebrating this occasion throughout the year. We extend our congratulations and our best wishes to them in this, their anniversary year.

I have tried to outline the three basic concepts of this government's agricultural policy—better production, better marketing, and better living, and some of the philosophy which lies behind the estimates which are now before the House.

In concluding my remarks at this time, I should just like to add that man's age-old struggle and conquest of the elements, and his ability to adapt to his environment, have brought us to this place in the agricultural history of this province and this nation.

Although hon. members of this House may, and likely will, differ on the best ways to be of service to the farmers of Ontario, I think we would all be agreed on the extent to which we depend upon them for the development of our country and for the essentials which make it possible for our country to enjoy a very high standard of living.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I listened to my hon. friend today with a great deal of interest. I listened to him very closely for some 25 minutes and I certainly detected in his remarks some of the optimism that was expressed by his hon. colleague, the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope).

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend, the hon. Minister of Agriculture has been very frank with us today. He says that the agricultural industry is not in as good a shape as he would like to see it. He realizes the problems. He knows that they are many, but he says that the future he hopes will be brighter. I hope that I have interpreted my hon. friend correctly in saying that.

Indeed, I was very happy to hear the hon. Minister come into the House today, and even though he did pinpoint a few of the more pressing problems in the agricultural industry and the agricultural community as a whole, he went on to say and to spell out the importance of that industry in our economy.

I was delighted to hear the hon. Minister do that because I think that in the past we have failed to do this. We have failed to sell our organization, or at least our industry, and its importance in the economy. I was happy to hear the hon. Minister come into this House and tell the people of Ontario that here we have an industry that is important to the province, is important to the country and is, indeed, important to every person no matter where he might live.

Certainly our public relations has suffered badly in the last, well I would say, 20 years. We read in the paper where the gross income of farmers has gone up and I was once again happy that the hon. Minister did not mention about gross income today as he did last year. He mentioned it last year. Certainly I think this is one thing that has contributed to the bad public relations that has resulted from this kind of publicity.

We have read in the papers on a number of occasions where the farmers' gross income has gone up by so many million dollars and then these people turn around and use this as an argument to say that farmers should not receive subsidies. They say, well look, the gross income of the farmers has gone up by so many million dollars and yet you people are crying for subsidies. We have to pay for it in one way or another. So this has resulted in the end effect to give the farming community bad public relations as an industry, taking it as a whole.

Certainly this is not the case. If the people who expounded on this particular subject, had taken the trouble to acquaint themselves with all the facts, they would have found out that the situation was considerably different than they had thought.

My hon. friend, I am sure, realizes, and he has said today, that agriculture and farming is not enjoying adequate income. He said that in so many words. This is absolutely true. Certainly the farmers of this country today are enjoying no Roman holiday.

The agriculture community represents about ten per cent of the population and they are getting about five per cent of the income. Certainly this is something that should be pointed out on all occasions to the people who seem to take delight in telling our urban friends that the farmers are walking around with pockets full of money and driving Cadillacs. I think we should take every opportunity to tell the people of this province, and I think The Department of Agriculture has a certain amount of responsibility in this regard to say to the people of the province, that where one farmer produced enough for ten people in 1942, he is now producing enough for 32 people.

I think that we should tell the urban people and tell our urban friends that this is an industry indeed that they cannot do without.

Now I just wanted to refer briefly to a comment in the paper which dealt with this very subject, the public relations of the farming community and the job that we have done, and I want to relate this to the department of the hon. Minister, because I think that his department must assume a certain amount of responsibility for it.

This article was in the Rural Co-operator, dated Tuesday, January 14. It is an article written by Mr. A. H. Musgrave, the Ontario federation president. I will not read it all, but I will read parts of it. It said:

The area in which we have failed, and failed miserably, is in the field of public relations. Had we been doing a job for our industry and our people there would not have been the tirades and disparaging articles that have appeared in the press nor would there be a distorted image of the farmer in the minds of so many people. Had we been doing our job, it would not have been left to the president of a large wholesale to point out that consumers are paying less money for many of their basic foods than they paid in 1952.

We have left it to someone else to explain that today's higher living costs are due largely to the fact that the consumer considers yesterday's luxuries as today's necessities. Why have we left it to someone else to point out that, by any measure, food is still the biggest bargain on today's merchandising scene?

What have we done to publicize the fact that the sales of wheat to foreign lands have brought prosperity to the whole economy? Not just the farmer, but it has resulted in more jobs in the transportation industry, more jobs in industry in general, because the farm population has the money to buy the goods and services they would otherwise be unable to buy. This means jobs, not unemployment.

The article concludes by saying:

These are some of the pertinent facts which should be brought to the attention of every Canadian, but we have failed to get the message across to those who live off the farm.

And that sums it up very neatly.

I did mention that the farming community is not enjoying adequate income and my hon. friend has talked about the triangle: the better production, better marketing and better living triangle. Certainly I would agree with him that this is indeed a very commendable endeavour and a very commendable thing. The only more or less fly in the ointment, is the fact that we have to make sure that we have the ultimate in our production and the ultimate in our marketing to ensure that we have better living.

I noted an article in the London Free Press. It is dated February 24, and it deals with the income of farmers, the net income, that is. It says:

Canada's total farm net income including changes in farm inventories of grains and livestock, rose 2.2 per cent in 1963 to an estimated $1,716,300 from $1,678,800 in 1962. The increase resulted entirely from advances in Saskatchewan and Alberta. All other provinces reported decreases.

And then the article goes on to say: "Net income of farm operators from farming operations in 1963 by provinces," with 1962 figures in brackets.

Ontario had $377,866,000 net income in 1962; and, in 1963, they had $200,278,000, a decrease of roughly—I am sorry I quoted the wrong figure there; the Ontario net income this year was $377,866,000 and last year it was $379,531,000, or in other words a decrease of roughly $22 million, a sizable decrease I must say. So certainly we have not enjoyed the income levels of other groups. Indeed this very fact alone should present to the hon. Minister a picture which would not fill him, by any stretch of the imagination, with enthusiasm.

About these bad public relations I want to make just one final comment, because I do think it is sufficiently important that The Department of Agriculture have a responsibility to help and work with other groups to improve the farmers' and indeed the industry's public relations and public image in general. Certainly all this business we have read in the press, and that we have heard and seen—that governments print figures and reveal figures which are more or less designed for political advantage—this operates to the detriment of the farming community and to farmers in general. And this has resulted in the bad public relations which now exist.

This is evidenced by the fact that if the price of milk goes up one cent, or the price of bread goes up one cent, we hear a tremendous outcry. Everybody is saying, "Well, there the farmers go again, up goes the price of our food, they are putting more money in their pockets." And this is not the case, as I have already pointed out in this article by Mr. Musgrave. Certainly our public relations have dropped to a very low level when this kind of thing can happen.

This is the level of the public relations of the agricultural community, and the hon. Minister should not miss the opportunity to tell the farmers, and to tell the people of this province in general, some of the pertinent facts about agriculture—which he did today, and I was glad to hear that he did.

Now, just one final comment in this regard, and I just make this comment to indicate how important I feel—and, I am sure, a great many other people feel—public relations is, on the part of the farmer and the farming community. Certainly our large companies all have a public relations department. I think the importance of it is pointed up by the fact that most of these public relations people are paid fantastic salaries to do a job.

Certainly it would seem to me that there is a certain amount of correlation between the successful PR people involved in a particular company and the success of that company as a company. I think the more successful the PR, in most cases, the more successful the company. Certainly we can break it down even finer than that and say that public relations is a very important part of our interaction as individuals. So it is high time that we started to move in co-operation with the farming organizations in a direction to try to halt this trend, and to try to swing the pendulum the other way.

I want to say at this time that I feel the one area in which this government has been sadly lacking is the area of long-term planning and long-range planning in the agricultural field. It would seem to me that the government rushes to plug the holes in the dam but does nothing about preventing the flood. I would suggest that we embark immediately on a long-range and long-term plan for agriculture. I think it has been lacking in the past and I think agriculture could well do with some of the long-range and long-term planning which goes into some of the other phases of the economy.

The reason that the farmers—and the hon. Minister mentioned this—have witnessed, or are more or less held back by, the inability to effectively cope with marketing is because they do not have the bargaining power as individuals. I am sure the hon. Minister—as a matter of fact he mentioned that very point today—recognizes this. But certainly, in recognizing it, we as the government must give all encouragement to farm groups and associations, to set up their bargaining agencies so that they can effectively bargain in the market place.

We are past the point when we expect individuals to go into the market place and bargain effectively. Farmers cannot do it against the big business interests. It is impossible, and this is a result of the income levels which farmers today enjoy. They realize that they cannot bargain effectively in the market place, so they have moved—and I must say along with some help from the government—into the field of collective bargaining to raise their bargaining position in the market.

I think, as a government, we should give every encouragement to this kind of thing. I think every encouragement should be given to groups to set up this kind of bargaining agency. Certainly the Ontario broiler growers have attempted to move in this direction, but at the present time they seem to be stalled in their endeavours to reach a point where they can bargain effectively with the trade. I have discussed this with my hon. friend and I know the broiler growers have also, but the point is that The Farm Products Marketing Act was amended last year to require sales of all regulated products to be marketed through the appropriate producer board but this does not apply to a negotiating board. It just applies to an agency-type board. Certainly, as far as the Ontario broiler growers are concerned, they feel—and rightly so, I would think—that they cannot move from nothing to an agency-type marketing board. They must have an intermediate step. They must have an intermediate stopping place, so they feel that the negotiating-type board would be the answer until they get into a position where they could bring in or develop an agency-type marketing plan.

The fact of the matter is that they cannot negotiate, or set up a negotiating board, because The Farm Products Marketing Act does not cover, or at least does not protect these people for this reason—now this is different to the agency type. The producers and the board are protected under the agency type. But under the negotiating board they cannot be protected because if the integrators, the feed companies and the processors try to go into the field—and I suggest they would if they realized that the broiler growers were attempting to set up a negotiating board or some type of bargaining agency—they would move into the field very rapidly. Then we would have the situation where the bona-fide farmers, or the bona-fide broiler growers, would have to market their birds through the negotiating board. But the integrators, the processors and the feed companies, and what have you, who went into the growing of chicken broilers, would not—they could circumvent the marketing board, they could go around it. Therefore this would spell disaster for the entire industry.

This could happen very quickly because you realize the peculiar traits of the chicken broiler industry. It takes only ten weeks, sometimes less, from the day-old chick until the bird has matured and is ready to market, and weighs anywhere from 3½ to 4 pounds. The time limitation and the time involved is rather peculiar to the chicken broiler industry in that regard because the integrators could move in within a matter of weeks if they knew this was going on and throw the whole industry into chaos.

Indeed it has been suggested that they could control the market to the extent of 60 per cent, 70 per cent and even 80 per cent within a matter of weeks. If this happens, my hon. friend can see what a state the bona-fide broiler producer—who has thousands of dollars tied up in buildings and equipment—what a position he would be in if this happened.

This is a very real problem and a very serious problem because these people are endeavouring to move toward the position where they can develop their strength, and to cope effectively with the money interests and the trade. Yet, they cannot do it because they are afraid of this very thing.

I suggest that the hon. Minister should take a long look with a view to bringing in amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act, which would also apply to negotiating boards as well as the agency type. Surely if the government is genuinely interested in seeing that the farmers do increase their bargaining power this move can be, and should be made, with the appropriate amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act.

Another aspect of marketing legislation is the short period of time that can, not in all cases, but can hamper the operation of a marketing board as such. That is to say the marketing board can come into operation and within a matter of, well, months in some cases, the forces that are opposed to that marketing board, if they are successful in marshalling enough support, can overthrow the board before it actually has a chance to get into operation, and to iron out the case; to really show the producers what it can do for them.

The onion board is a very good case in point. My hon. friend said today that the food council was endeavouring to promote onions on the domestic market and I am happy to hear this. The onion board was a very successful board and yet it was turned down. I will read you an article in this connection from the Rural Co-operator of January 14. It says:

ONION MEN FACE SURPLUS PROBLEM
ONTARIO'S ONION GROWERS ARE FACING TROUBLE

At the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association annual meeting in Toronto this week, John Brown, secretary, said growers had assembled 12,500 tons of onions for export markets. However, there are no buyers. The British market, a major export outlet in recent years is not interested in buying Ontario's onions at present prices.

"U.K. buyers are willing to pay only 50 cents a bag because they can get onions at low prices in Europe," Dr. Brown said.

Dr. Brown said growers need 70 cents per 50 pound bag to meet production costs. Last winter following a short crop in Europe, Ontario growers were receiving between 75 cents and $3 a bag.

And then the article concludes by saying:

Seventeen months ago growers and the producers both decided to close down the operations of Ontario's Onion Growers Marketing Board. Almost two-thirds of the voters favoured retaining the board but the plebiscite required a clear two-thirds majority.

The onion plan had been operating for little more than a year. In its short life the agency-type plan restored order to onion marketing in Ontario. The board opened up overseas markets for onions surplus to domestic requirements. Many farm leaders viewed the onion plan as the almost perfect example of what a marketing board could achieve for producers. Before its introduction the law of the jungle prevailed in the onion-growing industry.

I suggest to the hon. Minister that he consider amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act which would require that the marketing plan, after it has been implemented and brought into operation, be given at least two years of operation before it is passed to the growers and the producers in order that they should vote on it, to either give their approval or rejection of the plan. I think that if this period were given, then we would have a situation where the growers would know really what they were voting on and what they were voting for. They would know if the plan was efficient, if it was manageable in terms of costs and so on, and they would have an idea exactly where they were going.

As it stands now certainly they do not. The forces that are opposed to the plan, mainly because of a conflict of interests, get together and successfully convince enough farmers that they should vote against the plan, then in some cases, just like this onion board, we have a situation where a good plan is thrown out merely because it has not been given a chance.

I suggest that should be done. Also in the Rural Co-operator, and this was quite a good issue because this is from the January 14 copy once again, it suggests this very thing—that a two-year trial period be given to market boards. I will not read too much of it but I would just point out to my hon. friend that the article says in effect and this is in relation to this proposal:

The purposes of this proposal are obvious. One, a trial plan must be given every opportunity to prove itself and two, an inexperienced board requires time to become acquainted with the difficulties of marketing board operations.

At the conclusion of the trial period of not more than two years, the plan in the form of a working machine with some, if not all, of the bugs taken out would be put to the test of a producer vote.

In theory, at least, a successful plan measured against appropriate economic and social standards of value would be accorded producers' support. If the machine had proved ineffective, costly and too erosive of farm managerial freedom, it would be junked.

So once again, I would simply concur with the article and urge the hon. Minister to act accordingly.

Now I would like to turn to the inquiry committee, dealing with the tobacco industry. Of late we have heard a great deal about this. The news reports on the radio and television have certainly kept us up to date on this situation. I would only say that I think the hon. Minister has at least a responsibility here, because he brought down a report of the tobacco committee when a third of the tobacco still had to be sold. In other words, there was a third of the tobacco yet to sell.

Certainly in this situation there were other contributing factors, but I suggest to him that this was certainly a factor in the depressed prices that caused discontent, threats of violence and eventually closure of the three markets at Delhi, Tillsonburg and Aylmer. As a matter of fact, just yesterday the chairman of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board, George Demeyere, was in Ottawa with his delegation, to discuss with the Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa, the drastic situation and certainly the discontent and threats of violence that have been forthcoming from this situation.

It is very grave and I suggest that the hon. Minister take a long look at it. The situation is of sufficient gravity to demand his immediate attention. The article in the London Free Press this past Friday, February 29, says:

Shouting tobacco farmers forced closing of auction exchanges at Delhi and Tillson-burg with threats of violence yesterday while a second bomb threat of the week, shut down the Aylmer exchange.

There have been no further bomb threats today at the three exchanges which are normally closed Saturdays and Sundays. A meeting of district tobacco farmers will be held at 8 p.m. in the Hungarian Club in Delhi.

As a matter of fact, I just heard on the radio coming down today that they had held a meeting last night and they had decided unanimously that they should keep the exchanges closed until such time as there is mutual understanding and agreement between the buyers and the growers.

George Demeyere, chairman of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board ordered the Delhi exchange closed at 1.30 p.m. and the Tillsonburg exchange at 3 p.m. after demonstrations at both places.

The farmers called for an investigation of the buying practices of the tobacco companies. They said they would keep the exchange closed until something is done. The Tillsonburg protest was similar.

Tobacco normally selling for about 55 cents a pound drew bids of 47 cents yesterday. Buyers were not bidding on all of the flats offered for sale.

So that I do say this to my hon. friend, that certainly the situation in the tobacco industry is that the buyers have been influenced by this report, I feel, to some extent because the report has recommended what I might term sweeping changes in the industry. I think perhaps I will not read all the changes that the report has suggested, but the one most startling change I would suggest to my hon. friend is the first one, the orderly withdrawal of production controls.

Certainly no doubt the buyers felt, if not by direct comment, certainly by inference, that if orderly production controls were withdrawn, everybody could produce tobacco, everybody could produce as much as they liked and therefore undoubtedly a surplus would result. This is really what would happen, I would suggest.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, may I make just one comment on this, because I do not want the inference to get out—I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, I think he is making an excellent speech.

I do not want the inference to get out that the Stinson report which has been awaited for many, many months and that I had been asked to bring into this House—as soon as it was presented to me, I tabled it immediately. I am being criticized for having done this too soon—it is wrong to suggest that it was the Stinson report that had anything to do with the closing of the auctions last Friday. There may be some side effect, I do not think there has been, I have heard no mention of it. But I do know that the matter that my hon. friend refers to in the pricing of tobacco not reaching the average price that had been reached in previous sales, this is something that has gradually been growing and was in effect long before the Stinson report was tabled in the House last Wednesday.

Now this is quite true and I feel that when we recognize the fact that we have sold, in comparison with last year, 73 million pounds last year to this same date and this year 117 million pounds at a higher price than we sold last year, there has been a lot of tobacco moved at a very, very good price.

I do not think my hon. friend intends that to be the inference that is here, because I believe my hon. friends in the Opposition, as all hon. members of the House and indeed all people interested in this very vital industry to Ontario agriculture, would want to see the report as soon as it had been presented to me. I would think I would have been open to criticism had I sat on it.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate the hon. Minister's comments. I did not mean to leave the impression that the report was entirely responsible for the situation, but I just say once again that I do feel it had some effect.

Now certainly the report of the Surgeon General in the United States had a very great effect, there is no question about that, because some very detrimental and very bad results certainly were bound to accrue from that particular report. There was apparently a very definite connection between lung cancer and smoking, and certainly this could not help but have an effect on the price of tobacco.

But I simply say this, that the tabling of the report at this time certainly did have an influence on the tobacco people. I certainly cannot leave the situation there and leave my remarks without saying that a certain amount of responsibility rests on the doorstep of the hon. Minister in this regard.

As a matter of fact, I would go a little bit further and say that my hon. friend's doorstep indeed is becoming somewhat cluttered. We have the dairying situation, notwithstanding the inquiry committee that has been studying all aspects of the dairy industry. Certainly they have been very thorough in their examination of various phases of the industry; I have no doubt in the world about that, I have heard that from different sources. But nevertheless, I think the final onus rests with the government in providing leadership to bring these four groups together, the four dairy groups, and set up a marketing plan, one milk marketing board to handle all milk produced in the province of Ontario.

I feel that this committee has made certain recommendations, or at least they are forthcoming. I am sure the hon. Minister has read the report very carefully, but I think the responsibility that rests with the government in this regard is one in which they should implement a milk marketing plan as quickly as possible, taking into account the interests of the four dairy groups.

I think it is rather obvious at this point that we cannot satisfy all four groups. Undoubtedly there is compromise needed on all sides to implement and draft a successful milk marketing plan, and I think the sooner we get at it the better for the entire industry. As a matter of fact, the committee, I understand, mentioned the reclassification of multi-milk in its report. It said that the reclassification was necessary, and with that I would agree wholeheartedly.

I feel that the northern Ontario dairy producer is placed in jeopardy. I think the situation is serious and I would urge the hon. Minister to consider this. I would urge him to make this reclassification in the form of legislation. I think it is an oversimplification of the problem to say that the entire dairy industry in northern Ontario depends upon the reclassification of multi-milk, but indeed the situation is serious enough to demand immediate attention by the hon. Minister.

Now let me turn for just a moment to the ARDA programme. I want to say a few words about this, because I feel it is a very important aspect of the agriculture department. I feel that their aims and objectives are indeed noteworthy, but I do want to make a few comments and I start off by relating to you some of the words of Mr. Herb Crown, the Ontario ARDA director. Mr. Crown said:

The great challenge that faces rural people, farm organizations and governments, is to direct the changes that grow out of progress to meet the needs and aspirations of all the people.

Certainly I am sure we would all agree with that.

I want to continue by quoting Mr. Crown in an address to the Ontario Federation of Agriculture at its annual convention. Mr. Crown said:

The basic requirement here under the rural development section of ARDA is that rural people themselves are involved in both the planning and the execution of a programme for which they see a need and about which they want to do something. Without local improvement, there can be no ARDA programme.

It is in this area that the federation of agriculture has important influence to assure that Ontario farmers understand the concept of rural development and do not see the ARDA programme as merely a government programme to assist one particular segment of the rural community to solve the problem. The concept of ARDA is for rural people with technical, professional and financial assistance, to examine the total resource assets of a rural community so that programmes can be developed that serve the needs of all the rural people. ARDA will only be successful and meaningful in this province to the extent that rural people see this as a means of helping them to help themselves.

As I have said previously, I think that the ARDA programme is a very deserving programme, its aims and objectives are certainly high and indeed necessary at this time. But I have a feeling that the rural people up until this point have not been involved in the planning and execution of the plan as Mr. Crown has suggested they should be.

All too often I hear reports, at least, that rural people in—and I am thinking of one particular project at the present time where the people involved did not really know anything about it. The machinery, apparently, of the ARDA programme, was to contact the agricultural office and ask for their advice concerning the matter. This was quite a sizable project. It was in connection with a chunk of land in my home township, as a matter of fact, and indeed it affected the lives and the livelihood of quite a number of people. It seemed to me that the liaison between the administrative branch of ARDA and the people involved in the implementation of the programme at the grass roots level was very poor.

After all, I think we must realize that, in programmes of this nature, people who have lived on the land and lived on a particular chunk of land, farm land, perhaps have lived there for centuries; at least it has been in the family name for centuries. And even though in some cases this is marginal and sub-marginal land—indeed in a lot of cases under such circumstances the people are just squeaking out a living—yet they do not want to give it up because they have a certain heritage there, they have certain ties and certain roots, and they consider farming in that instance as a way of life rather than as a way to make a good living and perhaps accumulate a certain amount of money.

These people feel that if they are shunted into some other branch of society, into some other phase of industry, if retraining has been unsuccessful, then they will be a liability to society rather than an asset to it because, in a good many cases, these people are older people. They are people who cannot very easily be retrained for other jobs at this stage, and certainly there is a very substantial room for argument here. I just simply suggest that the liaison and the working relationship, the communication if you like, between the administrative branch of the ARDA programme and the people involved and the people whom it will eventually affect, sir, should become closer and should be improved to the extent that local people are brought in—and local people do know what is going on.

If that happens, then I am sure that, in a good many cases, they would be more than happy to at least do what the programme suggests and what the ARDA administration has in mind, considering the definite need for retraining and re-education of a lot of these people so that they might effectively be adopted into other phases of the work force.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit me to just speak for a moment? He is on a very vital point and I am interested in this.

I think he would be interested to know, as would all hon. members of the House, that we are in complete agreement with what he is saying. We have asked the wardens and chairmen of all the agricultural committees in the province of Ontario in the organized counties, along with the agricultural representatives, to come to a meeting here in Toronto on March 11 in order that we might explain to them that we would like them to go back to their particular counties and organize the very type of committee to which the hon. member refers here. I think this is what he has in mind—involving the local people.

We felt the county council agricultural committee and the warden was a good place to start as a nucleus of that type of committee which would involve all of the respective organizations. I am thinking about the Soil and Crop Improvement Association, the Federation of Agriculture, the Farmers' Union, the Women's Institute, the local chambers of commerce, the conservation authorities in the respective counties, so that they might all be represented. Not a great massive committee, but that the thinking of all these people might be brought together to better co-ordinate the local projects in ARDA. Now this we intend to do.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): What about the territories?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: They already, through their committees in northern Ontario, which I will explain later on in the estimates, will be taken into consideration in ARDA—the very same thing, only a different application.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to hear that the hon. Minister agreed with me on this point because I think it is of sufficient importance, to the people of Ontario who are affected in this thing, to warrant consideration by him and by his department and indeed by the administration of ARDA.

In other words, all I was saying is that we have a selling job to do—and I realize that the hon. Minister is moving in this direction, setting up committees and so on where local people will be involved in the programme—then this problem will be partially solved at least.

I do want to mention another aspect of the ARDA programme and that is community pasture programmes. I realize that there are at least two or three, perhaps more, community pastures set up in the province under this programme, and I think it is indeed worthy of expansion. The hon. Minister has mentioned on a number of occasions that he would like to see the beef cattle, the beef industry in Ontario, reach a point of, not self-sufficiency but at least, producing more stocker and feeder cattle for our own use down here in eastern Canada. Certainly this is worthy of consideration, but I suggest to him that, in order to do this, one of the things which would aid this would be the extending of the community pastures programme under ARDA; because I think we all realize that the western farmer, in these cow-calf operations, has a big advantage in efficiency over our eastern cow-calf operator.

Certainly the people out west have large expanses of land, large acreages. They do not have to invest large sums of money in buildings to house their cattle; they can let them run around a strawstack or a haystack all winter, and certainly we could never hope to reach that kind of efficiency. But we could, I am sure, if we had the large acreages of land which would be forthcoming if community pasture programmes were expanded under the ARDA programme, expand to the extent that a great many farmers across this province could build up their cow-calf herds and take advantage of community pastures, and thereby increase the number of replacements we would raise down here in eastern Canada.

I think we should move in this direction very quickly, because certainly this past fall was an indication of how high prices out in western Canada can place our beef cattle producers in jeopardy. After all, if our stocker and feeder cattle are well bought they are half sold; and if we have to pay exceptionally high prices for feeder and stocker cattle, and then transport them down to eastern Canada, it certainly places our beef cattle people in a very awkward and unrealistic competitive position.

I would say to my hon. friend that this is one phase of the ARDA programme which we feel should definitely be moved ahead with all speed.

I will make one final comment about that and simply say that we feel that, as far as the community pasture programme in the province is concerned, it could play a significant role in the expanding and consolidating of the beef cattle industry in eastern Canada.

Finally, I want to turn to meat inspection. I feel that this deserves more than a passing comment. The whole reason for the setting up of the meat inspection bill, as we saw it here just recently, was because of the meat scandal in 1961. Certainly that was a very bad thing, and it resulted in bad relationships between the meat wholesalers and the trade. Obviously we do not want that to happen again and, through various pressures from consumer groups and so on, the hon. Minister saw fit to bring in the meat inspection bill.

This bill, certainly, will cause him trouble—I think I am justified in saying that—certainly if he had thought of troubles with the dairy industry, with the vertigal integration problem or marketing legislation, I am sure the hon. Minister's problems and troubles will be compounded in the meat bill which he currently has for our perusal.

This bill as you know went to the committee on meat inspection—at least went to the committee on agriculture—and the interest that was shown at that time was certainly indicative of the way that the trade, the slaughter house people and all phases of the trade really, how important they feel that this meat inspection bill really is.

I think there are a few things that we must consider in any meat inspection bill. One of the things is the protection of the consumer, I think we obviously must offer protection there. We must offer help to the operators who are unable to sell their meat in cities where local bylaws prevent people from selling meat, where bylaws are in existence that prevent operators from selling meat that is not inspected under The Canada Meat Inspection Act, so that these people would be able to eventually sell meat in cities like Kitchener and Hamilton where these bylaws exist.

Third, I think we must ensure that the small operator is able to stay in business if he produces a high quality product. I think those are three things. I just mention three, I think there are more but certainly those are three things that are paramount in any meat inspection bill.

I did note, however, that when the bill was in the agricultural committee there seemed to be what I might term a certain lack of understanding of the terms of reference between The Department of Agriculture in Ontario and the Ottawa people.

Certainly I have no doubt in the world about the integrity and sincerity of my hon. friend in bringing this bill before the committee and certainly before the House in order to offer this kind of protection to consumers, but I would suggest to him that he is perhaps a little bit confused on this issue; and the terms of reference as to where the responsibility lies with regard to this bill are not clearly defined. I think that he is groping for a candle to throw a bit of light on his rocky way in this regard.

Section 4 of the bill, I note, reads that:

All inspections of livestock before slaughter and of meat and the labelling thereof to be exactly the same as presently done under the regulations respecting establishments.

That is respecting establishments by Ottawa made under The Meat Inspection Act of Canada. What is going to happen is that the bill will come within the confines of the regulations as set out under The Meat Inspection Act of Canada. I know that my hon. friend realizes this federal inspection certainly is very stringent, it is very strict, it requires that a minimum of 12 employees be—is that not so?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is not the case.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, at least—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is a rumour. It is a rumour only, but it is not the fact.

Mr. Gaunt: I would say this to the hon. Minister, that the regulations dealing and pertaining to The Canada Meat Inspection Act are very stringent, very strict and in some cases, really impractical for processing of sanitary and clean meat.

What I am saying is that all the regulations set out under The Canada Meat Inspection Act are not necessary for the clean, healthy and sanitary production of meat. I say this because it seems to me that we have based a lot of our thinking on the presumption that the higher the investment in our facilities to butcher and to process meat, the better the quality, and this is just not necessarily so.

I suggest to him that a number of these small people perform a very vital function with regard to slaughtering of meat and they have built up a relationship with the consuming public. The consuming public has gained confidence in them to the point where they continually buy their meat from them.

I am told from reliable sources that we have something in the neighbourhood of 498 plants registered in Ontario at the present time. I am also told from reliable authorities that under federal inspection, federal people feel that from 60 to 70 per cent of these people will eventually be forced out of business under this Act, The Meat Inspection Act.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I do not think so.

Mr. Gaunt: I suggest to the hon. Minister that this means approximately 350 operators would be forced out of the business. If this is so, we not only affect the people who are in the meat business, who are selling meat, but we also affect the farmers. Because if these people are taken out of the market then they affect the farmer in this way, that they are not then competing for his products.

Really, while these people may not buy a large volume of cattle or hogs and farm produce in the course of a year, they still do add an element of competition in the market place. I think we must realize this. I think we must appreciate it, because this thing could mean and would mean dollars out of the farmers' pockets if we implemented a bill of this nature and it was detrimental to the industry to the extent that 350 or so operators would be forced out of business. Certainly this is a very serious thing and it affects a great many people.

I think the hon. Minister realizes that most operators cannot afford the $40,000 to $50,000 to $60,000 involved in requiring that they bring their plants up to federal standards as the Act, as I read it at least, the Act says that these people must come up to federal standards if they are going to be inspected, and this would require in a lot of cases large expenditures of money these people, or many of them, cannot afford.

Furthermore, they are in the awkward position where they have reached the latter stages of life. Here once again, if this Act says that they cannot sell meat and they are forced out of business, what will they do at this stage in life?

My hon. friend from Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) indicated in his speech on automation that this was a problem. The work force of people over 50—45 to 50 to 55—are not readily accepted into the employment force. I do not want to get into that, but I say to my hon. friend that this is a real problem and I suggest that he sit down with the Ottawa people and define precisely what is going to happen here and ensure that these people, if they produce a high quality product, are allowed to remain in the field of selling and merchandising meat.

If they are not, if these people are forced out of business, they have two alternatives, really. First of all, they can take their produce and their cattle and their hogs and their poultry to a plant, to an inspected plant, to have that plant process them on behalf of that operator. The thing here, the catch is, that the operator would have to hire a truck to take his live produce to that plant and then he would also have to hire another truck to bring back the processed or butchered meat. In other words, he would need two trucks in order to complete the operation. Certainly this adds to his cost of production which eventually, I would suggest, would have to be passed on to the consumer.

So this places him in a very awkward competitive position.

Or he has another avenue, and I want to be very careful on this one, because I want to make it abundantly clear at the outset that I am not calling into question the integrity of these people, not for a moment. But I suggest that these people have another avenue open to them.

As you know the federally inspected meat is stamped in three places. It is stamped on the hip, the middle and the shoulder and so what could happen? The operators—the small operators—could go out and get an inspected plant to process a cow, let us say for example, and in that the meat would be stamped on the hindquarter, the middle and the shoulder. But then the small operator, where he was not able or successful in living up to the standards of a federal inspection, could slaughter an animal in his own slaughter house and replace the inspected cuts of meat with uninspected cuts of meat.

Perhaps the quality would be exactly the same and the meat be just as good but this could happen and I suggest that we surely do not want to create a situation where these people are able to peddle meat.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Are you suggesting total inspection of all meat killed, then?

Mr. Gaunt: No, I am not suggesting total inspection, I am just simply suggesting that these people who produce a good quality product should not be forced out of business, and that if they are forced to go to custom killing by an inspected plant, and take the produce to an inspected plant and bring it back, that they could conceivably do this kind of thing I have suggested. Therefore we would need more watchdogs than we have operators to patrol and to supervise this kind of a bill. We do not want to get into that.

The fact is that the small operator, the small butcher in the small town, does in most cases, produce a good quality product. In most cases—there are exceptions; I am sure we can cite them across the province. In most cases these people do produce a good quality product but will be unable to spend the amount of money required to bring their plants up to standards set out in this Act. Certainly I think that we should seriously consider some revision to protect these small people and I hope my hon. friend will give this consideration and sit down with his colleagues from Ottawa and discuss some way that they can bring this about.

Another thing that I want to mention—there is nothing mentioned in the Act that I can see about prosecution under the Act. What about someone who violates the Act? How are we going to treat him? I fail to see anything in reference to that under the Act and I just suggest once again, as urgently as I can, that the hon. Minister should consider these things I have mentioned.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying briefly that I hope the government will give my recommendations serious consideration because I do feel that the areas I have dealt with do require special attention, and I do hope the hon. Minister and his officials react accordingly.

In closing I want to say that my colleagues will be discussing subjects that I have not touched on such as vertical integration, and farm machinery report, and annexation, and so on, but no doubt they will deal at greater length with some of the subjects that I have touched on as we proceed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, while the hon. Minister was presenting his estimates I could not help but note that the number of his hon. colleagues in their seats, whose interest was sustained, dwindled from 20 to four and one of those four went to sleep. Now, I do not know whether I can really blame them because with all the respect I would like to have for the hon. Minister, and all the kind things I would like to say for him, I think it was a frothy, after-supper speech that he gave. It is a very good thing for the hustings but it very, very carefully skated around every one of the issues of crisis in agriculture today.

If you can imagine the hon. Minister of Agriculture getting up at the present time—now if the hounds to the left here, Mr. Chairman, can just stop their baying perhaps we can deal with the issue. If you can imagine the hon. Minister of Agriculture at this time getting up with the situation in the tobacco industry—and not even mentioning the word tobacco, as though it was just like poison, that it was going to cause cancer or something—he had nothing to say about it. The only comment he had was some antiquated and contradictory philosophic statements that obviously were with reference to the tobacco situation and then he skated away, having drifted as close to it as he dared.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with one issue alone in my remarks in my introduction to these estimates. That is on the whole question of farm marketing because this obviously is the issue that is claiming the attention of all serious-minded people in the agricultural industry.

Agriculture is being faced with a continuing crisis in marketing. A few years ago it was hogs; today it is milk and tobacco; tomorrow, who knows what it is going to be? And the interesting question is what are the reasons for this? Why do we have this relentless succession of crises in one aspect or another of the agricultural industry at the marketing level?

I want to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that there are two things that basically are wrong. The first one is that the processors have simply refused to accept, in good faith, the right of collective bargaining on the part of the growers. They may argue otherwise; they may make statements that are in the category of John Kenneth Galbraith's comment in his book The Affluent Society where he refers to the "bland leading the bland," they will make these comments but they have no more respect for the right of the people to bargain collectively than, for example, did the hospital board at Trenton for the workers there, or had this government for the workers in municipalities—as long as they maintained section 89—on the periodic crises that develop in industrial relations across this province.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I want to document this case of the basic worry in the agriculture industry with regard to the attitude of the processors to the right of collective bargaining, by giving a few cases. What I am going to do here, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of some of my chiders around the House who like to refer to me as the farmer from York South, I am going to keep as close to the grass roots as I can, by quoting the grass roots, or those who are working intimately day to day with the grass roots. For example, I have here from the Globe and Mail in January, 1964, a quotation with reference to the milk situation. Just let me read two or three paragraphs:

The Ontario whole-milk league representing 10,000 farmers who ship milk to dairies for bottling, claimed yesterday that dairies have shown unusual reluctance in recent months to live up to the marketing agreement with farmers.

Emerson Farnsworth of Huntsville, league president, said at the annual meeting in Toronto that relations between producers and dairies deteriorated alarmingly during the past year.

"Some dairies have begun deducting from producers' cheques, handling, trucking and other charges on surplus milk that dairies cannot use for bottling or other manufacturing in their own plants," he said later in an interview. "Such charges were not made before last year," he added.

And indeed, if I might add one final paragraph in this news story, as it is not without its significance:

Some farmers said dairies were making deductions to recover income lost through a change in federal dairy policy May 1, 1963, when Ottawa cancelled a subsidy of 14.5 cents per pound to dairies paid on surplus milk shipped to creameries making butter.

In other words, what you have here, Mr. Chairman, is the government at Ottawa cutting out the 14.5 cent subsidy which was there to try to cope with one of the problems in the dairy industry. And now, in the view of at least some farmers, what is happening is that the dairies, are taking it out of the farmers by these extra charges in violation of agreements—certainly not the kind of thing that was happening a year ago.

Let me take another example. The Rural Co-operator for December 17 carries a story in which it is quoting Mr. Williams, I just cannot spot his first name, who was the head of the Ontario Food Council—Douglas Williams:

Speaking at the 68th annual convention of the Niagara Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association at Vineland, Mr. Williams said one existing practice is compulsory contributions by growers and distributors to pay for retail gimmicks in the stores. Suppliers who do not contribute are cut off from the markets involved. Worse are the payola contributions made on a personal basis to boost sales. These practices appear to be more widespread than we first believed.

In other words, here is another example of the kind of relationship you have between the grower and, indeed in this instance, the distributor, with the retailer, the big stores about which the hon. Minister was talking.

However, in the latter part of this same news account I just quoted from, there are a couple of quotations from Mr. J. W. Baxter, president of the processors association. Apparently Mr. Douglas Williams had spoken to them also and he had apparently taken a somewhat tough line with regard to some of the practices of the processors, and this produced a couple of comments reported by the Rural Co-operator. Let me read them:

J. W. Baxter, president of the processors association, told the meeting that processors cannot be expected to co-operate with the Ontario government if they are not permitted to see legislation restricting their activities before it is put into effect.

The same kind of arrogant statement, in advance, that they simply are not going to co-operate with the government if the government is not going to sit down with them behind the scenes and seek the compromise that they are willing to tolerate.

However, another statement from Mr. Baxter:

We cannot be expected to co-operate with growers who are continually trying to devise new means of imposing controls on our operation. The processors association speaks for 51 processing companies.

I was interested when the hon. Minister was speaking, because, in those somewhat antiquated and contradictory statements on basic philosophy, at one moment he was saying, "We are in favour of the free and open market," and in the next moment he was lamenting the fact that some of the farmers lack collective bargaining strength in negotiating prices.

Let us face it, Mr. Chairman, the free and open market does not permit of collective bargaining strength on the part of the producer. They just have to take what is given, and here is Mr. Baxter, in effect, saying that he is objecting to the producer getting collective bargaining strength which is going to result, as he puts it, in devising new means of imposing controls upon his operations. His operation is free and untrammelled in the free enterprise system, for he does as he pleases.

If I may begin to relate this to the main issue of the hour, the real crisis in the farm front at the marketing level, namely, the tobacco industry, just let me recall to the House a chapter of a year or so ago. In fact it is now maybe three or four years ago. There had been a marketing scheme for tobacco in this province which the farmers, in their wisdom, decided they wanted to get rid of. They voted, by the requisite majority of something over two-thirds, to establish the present type of marketing plan.

The first fall that they met with the processors, to enter into the usual buying in the exchanges, you will recall what happened, Mr. Chairman. The buyers simply decided that they were going to boycott the whole set-up. The whole industry was seized with a crisis. It went on for week after week in the month of November, and on into December, until the pressures grew to the point where this government called both sides in; and they sat around the green table over in the agricultural offices there, for something like a solid week, in complete deadlock.

In effect, the tobacco companies were saying, "We are just not going to buy your product. We do not like your scheme." They thumbed their nose at the government, the law, everything else, because this scheme had been established in conformity with the law. And only at the end of the week did the pressures build up until, as I am reliably informed, even leading people in the churches down in the tobacco communities began to put their pressure on the Prime Minister of the day.

Only at the end of the week, when these pressures mounted to the point where the Prime Minister had to act did he move in and crack the whip. And the tobacco companies were forced to face up to the fact that here was a scheme established in conformity with the law of Ontario, and they had to live up to the law and respect it just as much as any other citizen.

You had a clear indication of what the attitude of the tobacco companies was at that time. They did not accept the marketing scheme in good faith. They had no intention of dealing with the growers in good faith—and I want to submit to the hon. Minister, and I shall attempt to document it during the course of my remarks, that they have never changed that basic attitude. You had the current manifestation of it, in their defiance of the last few days, where they will come in and toy with the whole operations of the now open market by bidding six cents for tobacco at one point and then when it is taken off the floor and it comes back, they will bid 46 cents for it—just trying to make a mockery of the whole system. Well, this is the kind of thing, this is the kind of attitude and background generally in the marketing industry; and now, narrowing down to the question of tobacco itself.

I dealt with one of the reasons why I think we have got this crisis, namely, the unwillingness and the refusal of the processors to deal in good faith, to acknowledge the right to growers to have collective bargaining strength and the machinery to implement it.

The second reason for the crisis—for the persistent, recurring crisis in agricultural marketing—Mr. Chairman, comes right down to this government. It is that this government itself is unwilling to grant producers effective bargaining rights and then to stand back of them as they go out to exercise those rights. I will never forget a comment made one time by Mr. Harris who is the solicitor for the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. His comment was that building a marketing scheme was like painting a magnificent oil painting. "You can spend weeks, you can spend months, you can spend a year completing this painting and any fool can come along in five minutes and punch a hole in it. This is the kind of thing which is happening in farm marketing.

This government, when the chips are down, is not willing to stand shoulder to shoulder with the farmers in the exercise of the collective bargaining rights which have been given to them. Indeed, three or four years ago, when a group of farmers who were the first to really exercise the powers, which theoretically were granted to them under

The Farm Products Marketing Act—I am referring to the hog producers—did start to exercise those powers, then this government acted in essentially the same way that Joey Smallwood did with the IWA in Newfoundland. I will concede that the only difference between this government and Joey Smallwood was that he smashed the union and then brought in the law to legalize it. This government brought in the restrictions in the farm marketing legislation, the so-called amendments of Bill No. 86.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is the best hog marketing plan in the world.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, that is fine but just wait. We will take a look at the consequences of exercising the restrictive powers of Bill No. 86 in the tobacco industry. And if that is best, the hon. Minister is like the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope); he is spreading great optimism on the things which please him, but the things that do not please him he refuses to do anything about. He comes into the House here and is silent, as silent as a tomb, never even mentioning tobacco.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Let us hear what the hon. member has to say about it.

Mr. MacDonald: Hon. members are going to hear it. I have the floor right at the moment and I intend to hold it until I am finished.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the essential point that I want to make before I proceed to indicate the implications in the tobacco marketing situation is this, that I think this government with the passage of Bill No. 86, and subsequent experience is proving it, simply got off the rails in marketing.

My concept, certainly the concept of the New Democratic Party, and I think it is the concept of anybody who is interested in building genuine collective bargaining strength for the primary producers or the industrial workers of this country, is that you say to a group of people who are seeking to exercise collective bargaining strength: "Here are the powers which we grant you." This does not mean that at some time later we in the Legislature may come to the conclusion that they have too great powers, or that they have too few powers, and we may revise the powers that we were willing to delegate to them through The Farm Products Marketing Act by revisions in that Act.

But once you have granted them the powers, you treat them not as children, but you treat them as adults, as grown-up men and women, and you say: "You go out and exercise these powers". You do not operate on the medieval paternalistic approach, the Big Daddy philosophy, that for everything they do they have to come back and get permission. They have to get permission from Queen's Park how much money, of their own money, they are going to raise. They have to get permission from Queen's Park how much of their own money they are going to spend so that the local marketing board becomes a mockery, the local marketing board has no powers that are expressive of producer control and the wish of the producer to build the machinery for collective bargaining. The local marketing board is reduced to a rubber stamp of this government, a rubber stamp that is manipulated by this government agency, the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is absolutely false and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. MacDonald: That is not false and I will show the hon. Minister how true it is by getting right back to the tobacco marketing situation. Let us go back to the local area, so that we can quote from the local people. Just let me draw to the attention of the House, for example to the Simcoe Reformer's headline on May 1 of last year: "Flue board told to back down on rights or be abolished".

Now what is the background, Mr. Chairman? The background is that the tobacco industry was facing up to a basic problem. They had a surplus and the surplus was wrecking the market, the surplus was destroying their capacity to get a price which would meet their costs of production and give them a fair return. So the tobacco marketing board, representative of the farmers, elected by the farmers, exercising the powers which this government had given them under The Farm Products Marketing Act, decided that they would do something about this surplus. They decided, Mr. Chairman, that they would remove the six acre exemption from acreage reduction and that they would cancel the right to transfer quotas from one farm to another. Just let me quote the first paragraph of this particular story:

Trustees will be appointed by the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board to run the affairs of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board if it refuses to reverse its stand on acreage transfers, growers attending a District 12 meeting were told last night. Director John Sprau revealed that the tobacco board directors were sent home after a meeting in Toronto Friday with "an ultimatum" either to change its standard or face dissolution."

There is Big Daddy cracking the whip in Toronto saying: "Do as we say or we will dissolve you."

This is democracy?

No wonder you have something approaching a mood of civil war out on the tobacco front at the present time. This is the kind of thing that has happened during the year.

And let the hon. Minister squirm in his seat because this has gone on month after month after month for the last 12 months, as I shall now document.

Director Sprau added, "This is a fight for the control of the industry."

I was interested in the comment of the hon. Minister when he was giving these antiquated philosophic comments on state control over food production, or if we can broaden that, to farm marketing. He was objecting to state control.

What have we got in the province of Ontario on tobacco? If it is not state control, what is it? Just let me prove it, if hon. members of the House do not believe me.

That was a May 1 headline. Now let me give you the headline from the Simcoe paper on May 2: "Flue board gets ultimatum." This is democracy in Tory fashion.

FLUE BOARD GETS ULTIMATUM

A compromise is reported being sought today in the power struggle between the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board and the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board.

Let us go on. On May 3: "Flue Board bows to OFPMB" — the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board.

Big Daddy in Toronto has said: "You do as I say." As Mr. George Demeyere, the head of the board said, the province had won. Let me quote this story and it speaks for itself. It was datelined Tillsonburg:

The province has won a test of authority over a local marketing board, citing its obligations to observe the law, the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board bowed yesterday to the orders to change its stand on restrictions for 1963 flue crop.

The point I am getting to, and I will continue to document it—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Read the whole story.

Mr. MacDonald: What does the hon. Minister mean, read the whole story?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The story behind what the hon. member is saying. I will tell—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister in his introductory remarks was so panty-waist about the issue that he did not dare to touch it when he had a chance to give us the whole story. Now if the hon. Minister wants to be so brave and bold, why did he not, when he got up and introduced his estimates, deal with this issue? Where was his intestinal fortitude at that point, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I dealt with enough, I am sure.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay, let us just follow this through.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): It is all half truths!

Mr. MacDonald: Of course, everything in the Simcoe paper is half truth if it is not what you people want to hear. The hon. Minister of Public Welfare was asleep while the hon. Minister of Agriculture was talking and should go to sleep again.

Let me give you another example of Big Daddy's operation with regard to farmers. December 3, 1963, once again in the Simcoe Reformer, entitled "Black day. Take powers from the board."

Now here is a board, Mr. Chairman, may I remind you, which had been given the powers to negotiate and to arbitrate on prices; exercising collective bargaining strength. What was the hon. Minister's comment? He lamented the fact that the farmers had not collective bargaining strength. These farmers had been given collective bargaining strength and what did this government do last December? Let me read the story to you:

Negotiating and arbitration powers of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board have been removed from The Ontario Farm Products Act.

The tobacco board was served notice of this by a letter from the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board at a regular meeting yesterday. The move was made by the Ontario government at the request of the Toronto board without the knowledge of the tobacco board, the meeting learned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I just ask the hon. members of this House to pause and consider this. If this is not accurate, the hon. Minister will have a chance later to spell out the details wherever it is in error. Here is a group of farmers given power under the Act and this government in its omniscience and wisdom, dictates to the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board and they in turn then say to the local tobacco board, "The powers you have had up to now have simply gone!" If this is not order-in-council and dictatorial operations, I do not know what it is.

An hon. member: Neither do I!

Mr. MacDonald: If this is democracy, then we certainly have to go back and redefine the definitions in the dictionary.

On the agenda was an item to discuss the possibility of removing the arbitration and negotiation sections of the Act. Earlier the Toronto board had asked the board [that is the local board] to consider such a move.

You see how it operates? The Toronto board says to the local board, would you consider this move? And while they were considering it the guillotine came down, and their powers are gone! Director Robert Causyns described the Toronto board's action the same as the black day in Tillsonburg when the tobacco board was ordered to reverse its stand on the transfer of acreage and to allow a six-acre exemption.

I want to give you one final bit of evidence. I was very interested in reading the news accounts of a case that has come before the courts. I do not think a judgment has been rendered on it yet. I shall not comment on the case as a whole, but I want to read into the record here for consideration of the hon. members a bit of evidence as to exactly how this government operated vis-à-vis the tobacco marketing board.

One of the men who testified told the court that the system of grading had been changed from the previous year, and that last year a grade tag was affixed to each bale.

Director Rene Strobbe of district 5 was called as a witness for the prosecution. He told the court that the method of grading had been changed from the previous year Mr. Strobbe said: I was at the auction the day that flat 46 was sold and was talking to Mr. Smith—

If I might interject here, Mr. Chairman, flat 46 was a flat of tobacco which Mr. Smith who is testing the power of the marketing board, had picked out and had followed all through the process of its sale and ultimate disposal to one of the processors.

He told the court that a resolution was passed by the tobacco board on November 5, which stated that the method of grading tobacco for the 1963 crop "was to be the same as the previous year".

He was asked by Mr. Harris [that is the lawyer] who had changed the grading policy, as the resolution was unanimously approved by the tobacco board.

Mr. Strobbe replied: "The Department of Agriculture called the chairman and told him the methods he was to use to grade his crop."

"In other words, your board had no alternative," said Mr. Harris.

Lawyer Stafford asked: "Was there ever any written notice of this order placed before a meeting of the tobacco board?"

Mr. Strobbe replied: "Not to my knowledge, and I have not seen a written order."

Mr. Harris then produced a letter which he claimed was sent by the department to the tobacco board but Mr. Stafford refused to allow it to be placed in evidence.

Magistrate Barnum commented: "It looks to me that the book says one thing, and the man on the other end of the telephone comes along and says you do it another way."

In other words, Mr. Chairman, here is a case of where the tobacco board was exercising a set of powers with regard to grading procedures when suddenly a telephone call comes.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister a number of questions and I hope he will reply later. Who gave these instructions to the local tobacco marketing board—instructions which reversed the decision of the local board when they had decided that the grading procedures of last year would apply in the year 1964? Who did that? Was it The Department of Agriculture? Was it someone in the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board?

And since, presumably, any decision as to change in grading and marketing procedures of a local board has to be made by the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board, would the hon. Minister produce the appropriate minute indicating that this was authorized by the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board? Or was it just somebody exercising these authoritarian and dictatorial powers as he saw fit, cracking the whip from Queen's Park? I hope the hon. Minister later will discuss and will enlighten us on that; and if he does not, I hope to come back to it.

The net result of all this, Mr. Chairman, of course, is that the local marketing board has been rendered powerless. The Big Daddy philosophy has been implemented to the full. Whatever collective bargaining strength the hon. Minister paid such homage to as being desirable for farmers, whatever collective bargaining strength the tobacco farmers had, has now been destroyed by this government through the agency—its agency—of the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board. This government decided by that edict, which was imposed on the local board last December, that we were now going to move to open markets, as far as tobacco was concerned. This apparently is government policy, and it is being imposed upon the growers.

Mr. Chairman, it is at this point that the Stinson report comes into the picture, and I would agree with both the comments of the hon. member for Huron-Bruce and the hon. Minister. The Stinson report did not alone produce what you have now down in Delhi, Aylmer and Tillsonburg, but it was one of the contributing factors. And it was one of the contributing factors because the main import of the Stinson report is that the tradition of production control—that has been painfully, meticulously built up down through 30 to 40 years in the tobacco industry—this government has decided, in its lack of wisdom, it is going to dismantle. It has been in the process of dismantling it or frustrating the efforts of the local board, and the Stinson report comes along now and places its stamp of approval on this, and, in effect, says production control should go!

The only thing they have conceded by way of easing the situation is that they will take five years to dismantle the production controls so that it will reduce the dislocation in the tobacco industry.

I was interested this morning to read in the Toronto Globe and Mail, this comment that:

William A. Stewart, Ontario Minister of Agriculture said yesterday that it was premature for growers to assume that the report's recommendations will be implemented in their present form. The report has not been considered yet. It will be a matter for us to look at and the growers themselves, he said.

Well I will tell you, Mr. Minister, there was a meeting going on just about the time you were making that comment down in Aylmer last night. And one of the pioneers of the tobacco marketing plan was commenting on the very fact that the hon. Minister said. And let me quote what he said:

Lyal Tait of Aylmer [of Port Burwell, I think to be exact] a former director of the board—

Oh, smile, because he is not in your political camp? I love the way the hon. Minister sloughs this whole thing off.

An hon. member: Which camp is he in?

Mr. MacDonald: He is in the right camp. To continue:

Lyal Tait of Aylmer, a former director of the board, said the report is a complete repudiation of collective marketing. He labelled the report brutal, documented evidence of the free enterprise thinking of so-called farm experts of the day.

Only one member of the Stinson committee, Lawrence Kerr of Chatham, recognized the need of controlling production and collective bargaining, Mr. Tait added. He declared that the government will no doubt reject the Stinson report in public but in truth has been implementing its recommendations since last July!

And that is the point I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman.

The Stinson report solidly—by coincidence or otherwise—comes along and places the stamp of approval on this government's policy as it has been evolving for the last few months.

And Mr. Tait is dead correct! The hon. Minister can say he is not going to implement the report, and this is nonsense because the government has been implementing the report ever since last July.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Old innuendo again, isn't it?

Mr. MacDonald: I continue:

Almost every major recommendation is already a part of the drastic changes in growing and marketing procedures forced on tobacco farmers by the provincial government and the board this past season, Mr. Tait said.

And finally, in the course of taking a look at the reactions to the Stinson report, I think, Mr. Chairman, it is well for this House for a moment just to pause and read the most important part of the Stinson report.

You had a so-called agricultural expert from Kemptville, who was chairman; you had a banker as another member of the committee; and then you had a farmer—a farmer—incidentally, whether he grows tobacco himself or not I am not certain—but he is not unaware of the problems of the tobacco industry. Indeed he comes from down in the burley tobacco area where they not only developed production control but some six or seven years ago, I have forgotten exactly how long now, they had perfected their production control to the point where, when they had a surplus they were able to get the producers to cancel all production for a single year in order that they would be able to resolve their surplus problem.

I think this is one of the most remarkable instances of discipline, and of collective action within a farm organization to deal with the problem, the kind of thing that this hon. Minister and this government should ponder when they go around treating farmers as though they were children who could not be trusted as responsible adults. However, Lawrence Kerr was the farmers' representative on the Stinson committee and what does he have to say about it?

I am going to read two or three paragraphs from his minority remarks. The first paragraph I want to emphasize because here is proof of the kind of man that Lawrence Kerr is. He is not looking at the tobacco farmers as angels who have done everything correctly, he is conceding the mistakes that they have made; but he is coming to the correct conclusion rather than the wrong conclusion that the other two members of the committee did:

Production controls in this industry have been relatively new and untried. They have probably been subject to abuses and certainly have suffered from a change in the governing organization. They have been administered selfishly and not too consistently. The public interest has had little influence on the level at which production has been controlled. In spite of these correctable defects they have brought an unusual degree of stability to the industry. They have created a capital value in the community. They have brought the producers an average income comparable with the provincial average and roughly double that of most other agricultural producers. This is a remarkable record.

Then on the next page he takes the industry as it is today and he glimpses the future. This is what he says:

The Ontario industry must be prepared to face three future possibilities. First, that the industry will continue to meet a stationary or gradually rising level of market demands. Secondly, that the consistently adverse medical reports emanating in one country after another will leave us with a diminishing domestic and export market. Thirdly, political upheaval in Southern Rhodesia might occur. In this eventuality Ontario would have an opportunity to greatly expand its exports, Mr. Chairman.

An industry so demanding in its capital requirements, and so exacting in its labour requirements, would need the stability and the assurance of production controls to expand rapidly and soundly in such a situation.

Whatever the overall future of the industry, said Mr. Kerr, there will be need that informed judgment of future requirements be made. These informed judgments may prove of little value without production control. There probably will be years when it will be in the public interest to expand production. Controls appear highly useful in ensuring that such increases are kept within the bounds of sound public interest. There probably will be years when the informed judgment will indicate a reduction of production to be in the best public interest. Without control such a reduction is unlikely to be fully accomplished. If partly accomplished it is unlikely to be equably shared.

It is agreed that the export market presents a challenge and an opportunity to the Canadian flue-cured tobacco industry. In order to compete on the export market, Ontario must produce a quality product, must produce efficiently and must present the prospects of stability in anticipating levels of future production.

This type of stability has been accomplished in both Ontario flue-cured and Ontario burley tobacco production through almost 30 years of control experience. It never existed or showed possibility of developing previous to the use of controls.

The present system, although obviously imperfect, has provided a consistently available supply of experienced and efficient people both as growers and as seasonal labour. It has provided a consistent supply of capital at rates extremely reasonable in an industry with such high risks.

In other words, what Mr. Kerr is in effect saying is that whether the tobacco industry remains stationary, goes down, or whether it finds that the political instability in Rhodesia wrecks their market and the production in Canada goes up, he makes a solid documented case for the fact that in any one of these cases if you are going to cope with the situation, you can cope with it best by having the kind of production control that the industry has built up over the last year and is now in the process of trying to perfect.

Now what is the result, Mr. Chairman? The result is, of course, that with the Stinson report coming in, and in effect putting a stamp of approval on what the government has been doing step by step over the past year, little wonder that the tobacco growers are in a state of revolt. No wonder, incidentally, Mr. Chairman, that with this kind of encouragement from the government that the companies are getting so arrogant that they are playing with the whole marketing process. They come in and bid six cents a pound for tobacco and that flat goes out and it comes back a little later and the same company will bid 46 cents for the same flat. In other words, as I said earlier, just making a mockery of the whole business.

The point I am trying to make in summation, Mr. Chairman, is that this government in its wisdom decided it was going to force open marketing on the tobacco farmers. Now if open marketing is going to be tolerable—the open marketing the farmers forsook 25 or 30 years ago—it is going to be tolerable only if the companies are willing to play ball.

But is there any evidence that they are willing to play ball? Is there not some evidence to the contrary? A very quiet toned but very pertinent comment is that of the Tobacco Forum by Dave MacLaren in the Delhi News Record on February 12 in which he said:

Once the open market system was instituted for this year the onus for its success or failure fell directly upon the shoulders of the buying companies. This prerogative of buying freedom, it was suggested, would be used with discretion to create a foundation upon which the market for tobacco might be expanded.

And then he concludes his article:

If, however, it does not achieve a considerable gain in the expansion of markets or show a marked improvement in the prices paid it is doubtful that the majority of farmers will be willing to accept an open market system of sales again.

But this is what the government decreed. This is what the government did in the December 3 order by which they stripped the local board of its negotiating and arbitration powers. This is what they decided they were going to impose upon them.

In other words, I say to this government you are the creator of the situation which you have now got and if you have to learn the hard way, that the tobacco companies are a ruthless group who will exploit the market and exploit the growers, then obviously you are in the process of learning it the hard way—even though in the process you destroy all the hard-earned achievements of the farmers down through the years.

Mr. Chairman, I turn in conclusion to a solution, because obviously the important thing at the moment, when you have an explosive situation as exists down in the tobacco industry, is to find some solution.

I must confess that I am sore put to know what it is, particularly in light of what is clearly indicated as the firm intentions of this government. What we need is to establish orderly marketing; what we need to do is expand our markets and if you are going to talk about expanding our markets, this means that you have to get out into the international markets—

An hon. member: That is what we are doing.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, you did it by selling at fire sale prices to Bulgaria so that Ontario is going to pay about $5 million in subsidy. We will get around to that a little later.

Just let me quote, Mr. Chairman, as we take a look at the international situation from the column in the Tillsonburg News of February 21, "Let's Talk it Over" by Bill Harrison. The final paragraph of a section of his column reads as follows:

Here is an item of importance. Did you know that last year the U.S. exported 570 million pounds of tobacco? Their exports increased eight per cent over 1962. Did you know that the average price paid for the American crop was 58 cents a pound? By the way, the '63 price was down two cents in 1962 but they still did okay.

How is it that the U.S. can sell 130 million pounds of tobacco to the U.K. at much higher prices than we can? Last year the U.S. exported three times as much tobacco as our entire crop. If we had a regular informative news letter many of the questions would be examined in depth.

In fact, I would like to know some of the answers. As a member of the British Commonwealth, Canada should enjoy preferential treatment in the U.K. It may do on some goods, however it does not apply on tobacco. Why?

Well, Mr. Chairman, there are some very pertinent questions asked there by Mr. Harrison, so just let us review the situation.

The United States is the biggest producer of tobacco; the United States is the biggest exporter of tobacco. In fact, last year they exported 570 million pounds. England is one of the biggest, if not the biggest importer of tobacco. Now what happened?

Last year, Canadian exports of flue-cured tobacco from January to August, 1963, were 33 million pounds—down 25 per cent. Canadian exports of flue-cured tobacco to England were down one-sixth in this period. American exports of tobacco mostly flue-cured to England, from January to October, were up 75.7 million pounds. An increase of 37.2 million pounds, or more than the total Canadian exports for the January-to-August 1963 period.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: What about the price?

Mr. MacDonald: What about the price? I just do not happen to have the figures here.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Because it was at the distress price that the American government offered to sell the tobacco and put 100 million pounds on the world market last year.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, was it at the distress price that Canada sold it to Bulgaria, too?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The price that Canada got was much higher than the other price that the Americans got.

Mr. MacDonald: From the United States?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, let us have some enlightenment on this later. But perhaps if you were sitting on a few million pounds of tobacco you might give a little attention to at least disposing of it at whatever price you can get. At the moment you are sitting on it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Oh no, that is not right and you know it is not right—

Mr. MacDonald: Not only are you sitting on it, but you have destroyed the possibility of the local marketing boards having production control so that you would not add once again to the surplus in the current year, because of the dictates that you have imposed upon them.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the other interesting thing is that when you take a look at the Rhodesian situation—because last year in Rhodesia, which is the other major tobacco-producing country, the price they got was 48.6 cents in United States dollars or 52 cents in Canadian dollars.

In other words, Canada last year had the lowest price of the three major production areas. In other words there is even, as we take a look at the international situation—and this is something I would like to see studied and explored a bit more—growing evidence of the fact that the Canadian farmer is a victim of international arrangements.

Is it an international cartel, I would ask, dedicated to this concept of a free market? What you have got in the tobacco situation, once again, is roughly comparable to the kind of thing that happened a few years ago when some of the older marketing achievements of farmers, including Canadian farmers in the wheat pools, sought to get a world wheat market which would extend orderly marketing to the international level. The grain exchanges both in Canada and the United States and elsewhere throughout the world tried to sabotage this, because they want free enterprise so they will be able to manipulate the market to suit their own ends. This is precisely what you have in tobacco at the moment. The Ontario farmer, who is building an orderly marketing procedure, begins to look as though he is the victim of this kind of situation.

So in considering a solution, after you have taken a look at this confused and uncertain international picture as the area for an expanded market, the only conclusion I can come to, Mr. Chairman, is in general terms. If the hon. Minister can be specific, I invite him to be specific now in the fashion he was not when he introduced his estimates.

Those general terms are that we have got to get back to first principles in farm marketing. We have got to get powers back to the local marketing board. We have got to quit meddling in the day-to-day operations of the farmers' business. Let them look after themselves, instead of you presuming to have all wisdom here at Queen's Park and dictating what should be done on a day-to-day basis. Let them implement effective production controls, using powers that are now being confirmed to some degree by court decisions during the past year, and let them build international markets to absorb the present surplus in the expanding production.

I was interested in the hon. Minister's comment when he replied to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon) yesterday, as to what the government planned. And the hon. Minister then, as he did today, evaded coming to grips with the issue. His reply was something to the effect that the tobacco marketing board had gone to Ottawa. He did not know why they had gone to Ottawa, but he was not going to intervene while they were up there trying to solve their problem.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know why the tobacco marketing board went to Ottawa. I look forward to learning why. Because they have a deficiency payment that puts a floor of 47 cents under tobacco. So I am intrigued as to why they went to Ottawa. But what I am not intrigued about and there is no mystification, Mr. Chairman, is that they did not come to Queen's Park. They did not come to Queen's Park because they know from past experience that there is no point in coming to Queen's Park. Queen's Park has been in the process, for the last year, of destroying their marketing scheme and if there is any solution to this, if there is any hope of getting out of this schemozzle of the present hour, obviously they must seek it in Ottawa.

I repeat, in summation, that if there is a situation in the tobacco industry that is now of explosive proportions, there are many factors that contributed to that situation. But one of the major contributing factors is this government's attitude and policy on farm marketing which they have imposed in the implementation of Bill No. 86—restrictive powers now in the farm products marketing Act—during the last eight months or a year, in the fashion that I have documented earlier.

There are other aspects of this that we will come to when we get to the detailed estimates.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with the estimates, I would like to say something in regard to the charges that have been made.

As I sat here this afternoon, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, as he spoke for the first time, I believe, representing his party on the budget estimates of The Department of Agriculture. I want to commend him for a constructive speech, because to my way of thinking it was.

I am not one to heap praise upon the Opposition, but I am one to recognize those who may not always agree with the things we do. As the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) so well said when he opened this House on January 15 last, we may not all agree with the things we are attempting to do, but we are all agreed on the fact that we are trying to do them for the greatest good of the most people.

This is the thing that to me motivated the remarks of my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce this afternoon. I have made careful note of many of his suggestions. Many of them have already been implemented. Many of them I think are worthy of further consideration.

But when it comes to the remarks that were made by my hon. friend, the hon. leader of the NDP (Mr. MacDonald) this afternoon, to my mind he reached a new low in vindictiveness that has been levelled against this government.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. If you want this House to degenerate into this kind of name-calling, you just let the hon. Minister get away with that kind of a statement. I dealt with issues. I dealt with what this government is doing, and instead of name-calling, let the hon. Minister deal with the issues.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I made no reference to my hon. friend in name-calling at all. I simply said he had reached a new low in vindictiveness. Now if that is a name, I do not know what it is.

Mr. MacDonald: Go ahead and deal with the issue! Why did the hon. Minister not deal with it when he introduced his estimates instead of running away?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I will come to the issues.

As I sat here and listened to his tirade against this government and what we have attempted to do for the farm people of this province—and he specifically mentioned tobacco because that is something that has topped the headlines in the news and we are all concerned with it, just as much concerned with it as he is.

He has tried to infer that he is the man who is supporting the little man. Now I want to know who he represents, because I can name and I can quote from the papers that he quoted from; and I can quote from the papers that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Huron-Bruce quoted from, where the farm organizations of this province, and we have some of them here in the galleries today, have said that we need further supervision by the farm products marketing board of the deliberations of some farm organizations in this province.

This is the thing that we are told we should do. And this is the man who comes here today and says we should not do it.

I want to know who he represents. Does he represent the small man who last spring came to me with repeated appeals and letters that I have on my files today, saying that because of the six-acre exemption that was granted by this farm products marketing board, to the flue-cured board, to enforce and allow the little man to grow his six acres of tobacco when, in fact, if he had had ten acres of tobacco rights and had had a 40 per cent exemption it would have cut him back to six acres—less than one kiln of tobacco? It was because of the little man, because of our interest in seeing that he had at least some type of income, that we asked the flue-cured board to take a second look at this and to allow that six-acre exemption.

Mr. MacDonald: Which you ordered them to change.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We certainly did ask them to take a second look, and discussed it with them on many occasions, and they voted it down—their board—and I am making no bones about this whatever.

Mr. MacDonald: And you dictated that they should change.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We certainly did and I make no apologies for this, but I shall tell you why—just for the reason I have mentioned, that my concern was with more than the big grower. The average grower in the province of Ontario today has 37.5 acres of tobacco-growing rights. What about the little fellow who has just a few acres of rights?

Mr. MacDonald: And your acreage transfer helped the big fellow.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We did nothing of the kind, nothing of the kind.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure you did.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: And regarding the transfer of rights, the hon. member has not told this assembly today that there was a lawsuit pending against the flue-cured board and against the farm products marketing board, which would have forced those people to allow the transfer of rights from one to the other had it been upheld in court.

Mr. MacDonald: But was it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That was the reason why we moved in—

Mr. MacDonald: Was it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It did not go to court because, to my way of thinking, we had a very weak chance of defending that legislation in court in the transfer of rights. This was something that had been going on for years, all through the history of the board. Even the men whom the hon. member so eloquently, today, has tried to defend, have been transferring rights. It has been an accepted custom, and is one of the greatest problems in today's Ontario marketing of the flue-cured tobacco.

Mr. MacDonald: The board the farmers elected is all wrong, and the hon. Minister is all right?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The board the farmers elected in this instance—

Mr. MacDonald: Is all wrong, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Not entirely. We agreed that they had a point here but they did not think they could defend it in law and neither did the solicitors. And this is why we brought this in. We were looking after the interests of the small producer, and this is the man we will continue to look after as time goes on.

The hon. member referred this afternoon to this matter of the method of grading. He went on at great length to say that it was a dictatorial order that was laid down by the farm products marketing board and this government, and referred to me as being the author of it by inference.

Mr. MacDonald: I did not refer to the hon. Minister at all.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: By inference it was certainly there. No question of a doubt about it. I want to say to the hon. member that he has not said this afternoon at all that of the 1961 crop there were seven million pounds of tobacco still in hand today; that of the 1962 crop last year there were something like 23 million pounds of tobacco still on hand, on which the government of the province of Ontario had offered a bank guarantee to pay the producers of that tobacco last year. This was done. This tobacco was on hand last fall.

Now then, our tobacco board went to Ottawa last fall and asked the federal government to grant them a deficiency payment for tobacco, which was granted at 47 cents a pound. This did not apply to any specific one of the 55 or more grades of Ontario tobacco today; it applied to all tobacco marketed by the flue-cured board through the auction warehouses. It was with this thought in mind that our flue-cured board, on their own agreement, agreed, because of the deficiency payment that there was no necessity of establishing grade prices and minimum prices, and negotiating those prices, and let the tobacco go on the open market to establish its own price. This is what happened; this is the truth.

Mr. MacDonald: It is very peculiar that some of the farm leaders out there have never heard of this.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is what happened. And if the hon. member wants documentary evidence—he says it was only a phone call that was made—I have the letter here which went out to Mr. George Demeyere under date of November 8, signed by J. V. Shannon, director of our inspection branch, authorizing the very thing that had been discussed with the flue-cured board, and had been agreed to by the flue-cured board, as would be the method of inspection on the flue-cured crop for 1963.

I ask the hon. member, who stands here in this House time after time and ridicules us because we are spending government money, I ask the hon. member would he suggest that we should have gone on the same basis of grading as we went on last year, and cost the government of Ontario thousands of dollars of unnecessary money? Is this what he wanted us to do?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, look at the mess you are in now.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It had absolutely nothing to do with what is happening now, absolutely nothing. The agreement was that a pallet of tobacco would be placed on the auction line and the grader, under the inspection service of our Department of Agriculture, would examine one bale of that tobacco and would determine the grade that he thought that tobacco represented. The tag would be placed on it unknown to the buyer, because the buyer has never paid any attention to the grades we have placed on this tobacco; they never have, because they say their graders are the people they will depend on when they bid and buy on tobacco, because they have certain types, certain blends, certain grades, that they want for specific purposes. To me it is an impossibility to get people to agree on the way tobacco should be graded. And if the hon. member was out there and could see it as I have seen it, he would recognize—

Mr. MacDonald: I have been out there, and I have seen it, and I have watched the grading.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member would be the first to agree, if he were honest with himself, that there can be a very great difference in opinion between four and five graders on the grades of tobacco.

With that thought in mind, I felt in a practical way, that the proper thing to do, for statistical purposes, was to put somebody there to give some idea to the grower and to the flue-cured board of the relative different types of grades of tobacco which were coming in from each respective producer, and that is the only reason it was done. It has nothing whatever to do with the price. And if we had had 1,000 graders there, it would not have changed the deal with the federal government at Ottawa and the flue-cured board one iota. And all of the innuendoes, and all of the things that have been said here against this government today, are absolutely for nought because they do not mean a hoot.

I think very definitely, my hon. friend, through you, Mr. Chairman, I take strong exception to the reference that was made this afternoon, in a very slurring innuendo-type of way, to our friend Mr. Stinson who is the chairman of this committee. Dr. Ford Stinson is recognized throughout the world as one of the greatest tobacco scientists the world has ever produced. He is so great that, after having been largely responsible for the establishment of the tobacco industry in Ontario, as an employee I believe of the federal government located at the test station at Delhi, he was asked by the Rhodesian government to go to Rhodesia and establish the Rhodesian tobacco industry, which he did. He was kept there for a number of years by that government, accomplishing one of the most magnificent operations we have in the world's tobacco picture today.

I do not say that everything this report says is right; I do not say this at all. I have not said, nor do I say today, that this government will implement it in part or in total, or in anything else, but I say it is worthy of consideration; and by that I mean the whole report is worthy of consideration.

Mr. MacDonald: It is mostly implemented already; what are you talking about?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Nothing of the kind, and you very well know that. But I do say this, Mr. Chairman, that I think it would be well before we make any conclusive decisions on this report; and before we enter into debate at this particular time, we should suggest that this report should go before the agricultural committee of the Legislature, and that we invite the inquiry committee to come before the agricultural committee of the Legislature at some time and discuss with them the report in order that we might have some idea of the reasons which went into the recommendations that they made. I think this is the proper place to handle it, in order that they may have a chance to say why they have made these recommendations.

I refer again, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that it has been the intent and the purpose of The Department of Agriculture here, and the farm products marketing board, to look after the interests of all the farmers in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend this afternoon in a great flurry of eloquent oratory suggested we should let the farmers look after themselves. I suggest to this House, through you, Mr. Chairman, that it will be the purpose of The Department of Agriculture to assume our responsibilities that we have attempted to fulfil and look after the interests of all Ontario agriculture.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the discussion of the difficulties in the tobacco market of the agriculture industry would be very much in order under vote 101, and I would like to call the attention of the hon. members of the House and the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the specific difficulties that have developed in the tobacco market during the past few weeks, and my view of what has led up to them.

I do feel that we have had an excellent debate notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, on the basic problems in the whole market. But I would like to talk about the 1963 crop that is presently being marketed. Unfortunately the auction arenas are closed and so this marketing has stopped.

Now you know that the local tobacco board saw fit to reduce the acreage for this year by 40 per cent of that which was possible to be grown, and so this 60 per cent acreage was supposed to be the amount that would meet the demands of the industry for this buying season. This was entered into and all of the growers, with the exception of ten I believe, agreed to abide by these acreage controls.

The House should understand that the marketing board does not control the amount of tobacco that any particular grower can deliver to the auction, but it does have control of the acreage he may grow. Of course it was a good growing year, and with the increase in technology and the knowledge of the use of fertilizers and irrigation there was a tremendous crop harvested, notwithstanding the fact that some individual farmers suffered some serious setbacks because of hail.

During the time that the crop was being planted, as has already been pointed out here, the Toronto board saw fit to overrule the local board and to permit a six acreage exemption from the 60 per cent rule or the 40 per cent reduction and also to allow the transference of acreage. It has been estimated by those who should know, that this increased the total crop by about 20 million pounds of tobacco, so a combination of a number of things resulted in a crop that was somewhat larger than that which was originally estimated by the representatives of the growers, that is, on the local board.

Nevertheless, when the auction did open, the House is already aware of the fact that there was a federal deficiency payment of 47 cents available, which everyone presumed would not apply since the market would not descend to that average level. At the same time the auction was conducted on an open market in that there were no minimum grade prices established so that any price could be considered a valid bid. All went well for the first few weeks and we looked at the functioning of the market with pleasure.

I must say the market, which had caused so much trouble in times past, seemed to be on a good sound footing. But then over the period at the end of the year and beginning of 1964, there were a number of body blows that added to the weakness that was inherent in the market that the hon. member for York South has already recounted to the House. And certainly, the extended publicity having to do with the possible deleterious affects on health of tobacco culminating in the Surgeon General's report a few weeks ago, was a very strong blow to the industry itself.

There was a very keen eye kept on the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) as a number of kites were flown about the possibility of an increase in the tobacco tax. And I am sure we will all agree, including the hon. Minister, that the report of the Stinson committee, while it certainly did not precipitate the immediate difficulties we are presented with now, had quite a serious effect as these difficulties were piling up.

We have all read in the paper of the difficulties at the auction barns themselves, where one specific farmer, a young man who had a crop to sell and a mortgage to meet, was not allowed to market his tobacco in the normal way since it had been tagged as having been sprayed with MH-30. I am not here to discuss that problem right now, but this was just something else that contributed to the general instability.

Then, of course, the thing that precipitated the events last Friday was the erratic manner in which the representatives of the processing companies bid on the farmers' tobacco. Having attended the meeting last Saturday, which has been already referred to, where the growers met together to protest the difficulties in the marketing, I had an opportunity to talk to a number of them. I can think of one specific case where I was talking to a most reasonable young farmer who was present with his wife, and it was quite obvious that both of them had worked long hours in the field and in the grading of their crop. They had a young family at home, a heavy mortgage on the farm and additional bank credit on the crop itself. They had followed the market carefully and he said, when his tobacco went up for auction, he knew for a fact—because he had graded the tobacco himself carefully and the grades had been confirmed by the government inspector—that similar tobacco had drawn 62 cents on the open market just a few weeks previous.

Now of course in the open market after a bid has been received, the individual grower can reject it if he does not feel that it is high enough. This farmer had come to the conclusion himself that he would accept 50 cents a pound for tobacco that had been going for 62. When the bid was 32 cents, he did the reasonable thing and rejected it.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that these pallets of tobacco are supposed to be offered anonymously and I feel sure that many steps are taken to be sure that they are anonymous in the eyes of the bidders. Nevertheless, a specific grade accompanied by a specific weight may make it possible for the individual bidders to identify to some extent certain batches of tobacco if they see fit. So he withdrew his tobacco from the market for a short time and was able to offer it again on the auction and at that time the bid was 3 cents. Now this was tobacco similar to that which had brought 62 cents a few weeks previously and it is because of this recurrent, erratic, irresponsible bidding on the part of those who are doing the buying for the large processing companies that the farmers have lost confidence completely in the market as it presently is.

This is not an isolated instance. I recount it to the House because I personally was very much impressed with the sincerity of the young man who presented this problem. He stated again that if he were unable to sell this tobacco, the farm for which he had paid a very high price and had borrowed a lot of money in order to make a down payment on, would be lost to him. More than that he would not be able to meet his bank payments that were coming up very soon and he certainly would be unprepared for the coming crop season.

So that when we read in the paper that there were bomb threats, tobacco farmers who said that they would burn down the auction before they would permit the auction to continue with this type of erratic bidding, we must bear in mind that the very livelihood and the way of life of the people concerned is in the balance. These people want stability.

There have already been some very concrete suggestions made by my hon. friend to the left for some solutions that might be possible. I felt that these were relatively long range and most of them were very valuable indeed but the market is closed at the present time. The warm weather is coming. The tobacco will mould and notwithstanding the hon. Minister's remarks yesterday about how well the market has gone up until now, it would be a disaster if the market were not put on strong footing immediately.

Now my question to the hon. Minister is: what immediate steps are going to be taken to put the market on a stable basis so that the auction can reopen with the confidence of the farmers involved?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Brant has raised a question that we would all like to have a specific answer for, and I make no secret whatever of the fact that I do not hold the key to all of the answers that can be found for problems that are as complex as the tobacco problem in the province of Ontario today, a problem that has plagued the tobacco industry as long as tobacco has been grown in this province. I would read to you, Mr. Chairman, an editorial which appeared in the last issue of the Canadian Tobacco Grower, February 1964. The title of the editorial is:

WHAT'S AHEAD IN '64

It's now approximately the half-way mark in the selling season for the '63 crop of tobacco. At this point tobacco growers are beginning to get an idea of how the 1963-64 marketing season is shaping up. They will also be quite anxiously awaiting the answer to what the acreage quota will be for 1964. Insofar as the marketing of the 1963 crop is concerned, it has proceeded in an orderly fashion without any interruptions.

Now this my hon. friend admitted a few moments ago. I do not question this at all. I read further in the paper here, "Flue Forecast for 1964", and I take one paragraph from this. It is a very interesting article. It says:

To date the Ontario markets have operated fairly smoothly and many growers are well satisfied with prices received.

This was the story right up until the last of last week. My hon. friend asked me what are we going to do, what are we going to do right today? My answer is the same as it was yesterday. We have been in constant touch with Mr. Demeyere through our farm products marketing board chairman, Mr. McCague, since he decided to close the auctions last Friday. Mr. McCague and his committee have gone to Ottawa. I understand they met with the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Hays, at Ottawa yesterday. I heard—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Demeyere!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Did I say Mr. McCague? Oh, I am sorry. It is Mr. Demeyere and his six-man group went to Ottawa.

They met with Mr. Hays, the Minister of Agriculture and I understand that they met also with the Rt. hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson.

Now whether they have returned or not this afternoon, I do not know. As far as we know they are still in Ottawa and I understand from newspaper reports this morning that they were to have another meeting with the Minister of Agriculture today.

We have instructed Mr. McCague that when they come back to Toronto if they visit Queen's Park as was intimated in the press that they intend to do, that we would immediately call together the tobacco advisory committee that was set up last summer and appeared to be working magnificently well. To me it was a new move forward in bringing the buyers together, the processors together with the flue-cured board, with Mr. McCague as the chairman, to sit down with these people and try to iron out the difficulties that have arisen between them. To my way of thinking it is a spirit of mutual co-operation and understanding that is required.

This we thought was working and we had every reason to believe it was working, indeed we are not alone, as evidenced by these editorials. Now we have asked that this be done if these people come back to us here at Queen's Park.

Now I think the next step will have to be revealed after we have that meeting. I do not think I am in any position to say this will be done, or that will be done or something else will be done. The discussions, as I understand it, are still going on at Ottawa and we hope that they will arrive at a solution there. I hope they do. If they do, fine and dandy.

We will work with Ottawa, as we have worked with them in the past. Our interest is to sell this product, to sell the crop, to stabilize the industry, because it means so much to our economy.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, there is a report in the press that the hon. Minister of Agriculture for Ontario was going to Ottawa to take part in those discussions. I wonder if he would comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would say that that report is just about as erroneous as the reports that appeared in the paper yesterday that read—and I am just quoting from memory—that “Bob Nixon the MPP for Brant had advised the Minister of Agriculture to close and keep closed the auctions out in the tobacco country.”

Mr. Nixon: That was in the Telegram, of course.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): I might say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, these conditions, as the hon. member for York South said this afternoon, were similar to the conditions when they started bale auction of flue-cured tobacco in this province. At that time, the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister of the day went down there and in a few days this tobacco was being sold, these auctions went on.

I think he should give very great consideration to that. I think the present hon. Prime Minister of this province must have as much power as the last Prime Minister. We hope he has. I think he should do everything possible—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: Is the hon. Minister going to comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No comment.

Mr. Nixon: Before we go on to something else, Mr. Chairman, I was very surprised when the local tobacco board decided to go to Ottawa in their hour of immediate need. Now we all know the legislation which governs the marketing, and actually the foundation legislation for the whole scheme in the tobacco area, is provincial legislation and surely it is surprising that the local board did not come to the board here in Toronto and to the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the department here. Would the hon. Minister care to comment further on what possible solutions might be available on the federal level as compared with the provincial responsibility?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, we have not had any official communication from the flue-cured board whatever as to why they went to Ottawa. I have no more idea than the newspaper reports. I do believe, however, that the local member, Mr. Roxborough, was very interested in the problem. It may be that there might have been some connection there.

I am sure that all hon. members of the House would agree the interest of the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, Miss LaMarsh, has in the line of tobacco growing and it could well be that perhaps that is one of the reasons they went to Ottawa too.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I cannot express this too well, but I find it most surprising that the whole bunch of you are not meeting together somewhere to iron out some immediate solution to this, rather than sitting back and waiting to be asked.

Mr. MacDonald: They have lost confidence in you, that is the problem.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I have a question in regard to the emergencies that existed last spring as a result of frost damage. Under what vote would I bring that up?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It could come under this vote.

Mr. Troy: Last spring I had communication with Mr. Ray C. Edwards, a former member of this House in regard to a suggestion from a farmer, a Mr. Richardson from Beverleigh Farms at Glandford Station. He had been in communication with the deputy Minister of Agriculture and I will read Mr. Biggs' letter to Mr. Richardson:

I have just received your letter of June

3rd with reference to the frost damage on your farm. This is a most unfortunate occurrence. I am very sorry to hear that you have lost most of your crop.

We are looking into the matter very seriously. You may recall that a short time ago there was a select committee on crop insurance and at that time the committee were advised by the farmers that the Ontario government should not get into the crop insurance administration. Then the farmers and growers expressed the wish that they would sooner take out insurance from private companies if they desired. Possibly this was a sound decision and recommendation by the farmers and growers at that time, but it certainly would have been extremely useful to have had insurance coverage at a time like this.

We fully realize that the average farmer and grower is not in favour of subsidies or hand-outs. On the other hand the Minister, the hon. Mr. Stewart, does appreciate that under current circumstances the government has a responsibility to try and provide some help. We are therefore prepared to match dollar for dollar raised within the municipality, provided that the government of Canada will do the same.

We are as well giving some study to the possibility of more adequate means of combating frost in growing areas. I understand this has already been discussed with Dr. Upshall of the Vineland Research Station.

That is signed by your deputy Minister.

Then Mr. Richardson had written to Mr. Ray C. Edwards, who was then the member for Wentworth, and this letter is to Mr. Edwards:

This letter will confirm our telephone conversation of June the 14th relating to Mr. Everett Biggs' letter to myself of June 7th, of which I am enclosing a copy.

I feel that the hon. Mr. Stewart's plan to match dollar for dollar with the municipal and federal governments is very commendable, although I do believe one would have to be very naive to think that these three agencies could get together in a plan of this type. Therefore I would like to suggest a plan I do think would ease the situation, and also be within the thinking of the Minister.

This plan is a low interest loan of perhaps two to three per cent repayable over possibly five years. I would leave it to The Department of Agriculture as to the mechanics as to how these loans would be approved, as the department is far better set for this job than I. I trust that you will be able to follow up this suggestion to the benefit of all concerned.

Then Mr. Edwards has written me in that regard, and I discussed Mr. Richardson's suggestion with farmers and others interested in agriculture in my area and I found there that the suggestion was a very reasonable one, in regard to a low interest loan.

However, as he pointed out, there are some mechanics to be worked out. This could be done quite easily. So, in emergencies of that nature, since there is no such thing as crop insurance, and apparently the committee on crop insurance did not recommend it, what do you think of such a suggestion as that, Mr. Minister—in the case of serious damage to crops, whether it is frost or no matter what it is—low interest loans?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, this whole matter of crop insurance is something which has been before the province and before the farmers for some time. I was chairman of the select committee, of which a good many hon. members of the House who are here today were members at that time. We investigated it. I think we were all agreed that there was very little interest on the part of Ontario farmers in crop insurance, as it was offered under the federal Crop Insurance Act.

We all recognize the fact that these disasters such as—I fancy you are referring to the frost damage in grapes last spring?

Mr. Troy: Yes, sir.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is right. This was of great concern at the time; and yet strangely enough, in the season that followed, at one time last year, just at harvest time I believe—the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Welch) will be able to correct me in this—the estimate at one time was that there would be a 15-per-cent-over-normal crop in total tonnage of grapes. I am not sure whether that actually materialized or not, but I do believe that the total tonnage of grapes was considerably higher this year than it has been in previous years, even with the grape frost damage we had.

Now mind you, this does not say that the farmers who lost their grapes through frost benefited by this great tonnage, but it just points out the whims of nature Ontario farmers have to work with as time goes on.

Your matter of the low interest loan is one which does have considerable merit. On the surface it would appear to be something which might have a good deal of implication and perhaps could be used widely. I understand there are loans coming out under the federal farm credit corporation, a revision of the present credit extension policies of the federal government. I have not had the privilege yet of learning what they are.

It may be that this is one of the fields in which they may be moving, because I think we have to recognize that in the province of Ontario we have such a diversity of agriculture. This is a thing we found in the committee. In western Canada one's whole crop may depend on cereal grains; a hail storm or a frost comes along and the whole crop is wiped right out. That is the only income a farmer has. Here, usually, the farmer falls back on livestock, because 72 per cent of our total income in Ontario comes from livestock and livestock products. So they say, "Well, we have a diversity here. We like to carry our own insurance, do you see?" And this, apparently, was why they did not really buy crop insurance as it was offered at that time.

This does not at all say that there is not a good deal of merit in your suggestion, and I would be interested to see that it might happen some time.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 101 agreed to?

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question in connection with item 3 under 101.

I noticed, in going through these estimates, that in most instances here the item given for maintenance has increased greatly. For example, I point out the maintenance in vote 101 and compare it with the public accounts ending March 31, 1963. Under this item at that time, the total maintenance was $5,998.87. This compares with an estimate for this year of $66,000. This is in the period of two years.

In other items, dealing with maintenance throughout the estimates, there is a similar increase and I would like the hon. Minister to explain how we could have such a large percentage of increase under maintenance.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Are you referring to the maintenance $74,600 to $66,000?

Mr. Whicher: I am comparing this one, $66,000. Two years ago you spent $5,998.87 under this estimate. In other items dealing with maintenance in your estimates there is a similar increase. Will you explain this, please?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This, I am told—and I can readily understand why the hon. member is concerned with what is expressed here; I would be too—is in the consolidation by the Treasury of the various accounts of maintenance under one item in the main office. Previously in that report these accounts would be scattered through the public accounts.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 101 agreed to?

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, in connection with vote 101, I have noticed that not only in this department, but in other departments, grants seem to play a very important part. Here approximately 15 different grants are made. Does the department require financial statements from these various groups before it authorizes the grant?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We get financial statements from all the various boards and societies and associations which obtain these grants. These grants have been in effect for a great many years and are not large in their individuality; but in total they do amount to a considerable sum of money. Reports and statements are submitted for all.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister is satisfied that there is need with each of the associations which have requested grants?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I would say that those who are recipients of these grants feel there is very great need of having the grants in order to carry on their various associations. We did, however, in examining them, cut out three grants that have been in there. They are not there this year, they were taken out. They were grants that we felt were being taken care of in other ways and we just simply deducted these three grants.

Mr. Newman: I am pleased that the hon. Minister is striving to cut out the grants and I would suggest that more than likely there are other grants that could be cut out if he perused their financial statements a little more carefully.

Now in the purchase of automobiles, I have asked this question last year as to the policy of the government, and the hon. Minister had replied that he purchased them from the locality in which they were going to be used.

When The Department of Labour estimates were up, I had asked if the hon. Minister considered purchasing athletic equipment from the areas in which the athletic equipment was going to be used and he mentioned the fact that this would be too costly and the government was interested in the saving of money. Has this department considered the mass purchase of automobiles from a central source, rather than the purchase from the area in which they are to be used?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member is an automobile driver himself and he has his own car. I would think that he would agree that service in the purchase of a car is a very big item.

Now the agricultural representatives' cars, the home economists' cars, are not any different to anyone else's car. They require service and we feel that when we purchase the cars locally that the dealer who sells the car is right there in the county or district, wherever it may be, and service can be given there without any problems whatever. This is one of the reasons we use this, and I think it is a very good one.

Mr. Newman: Well Mr. Chairman, if I may, all—

Mr. Chairman: It is now six of the clock. I do now leave the chair and we will resume at 8 o'clock.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 101:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Just before the supper break, I had asked the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) concerning the mass purchasing of automobiles and he had replied that one of the difficulties would have been getting service for the vehicle. I would like to tell him that all manufacturers and dealers will service their make of car regardless of the community in which the cars are purchased. That is one of the policies of the company.

Has the department ever considered the leasing of cars rather than the outright purchasing? It seems to be a very popular method of using automotive transport among large industries today. Has the department considered that?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I am advised that we do lease cars. For part of the staff, that is, the summer assistants, we have a leasing arrangement. But we have found it is to the economic advantage of the department and the government to buy the cars for full-time service.

Mr. Newman: One other question, and that is concerning the department's serious show of interest in the underdeveloped nations. I think this department is one department of the government that should consider the granting of scholarships in agriculture to students from some of the underdeveloped nations of the world. We could certainly show our concern and our interest in these underdeveloped nations by granting scholarships. Has the department considered that at all?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, we do that already. If the hon. member were to look at the source of the students who are now in OAC, the degree course, he would note there are a great many who come from outside, through the Colombo Plan, from various parts of the world, taking the course here at the OAC and at the veterinary college as well. I believe also that one of our leading economists in agriculture is in Somaliland now in an attempt to assist in the agricultural development of that country. We are in complete agreement with this and I think if the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) were here he would tell you that there are a great many people coming to the country through the money which has been set aside to subsidize the assistance to these students who come in.

Mr. Newman: I thank the hon. Minister, that is very nice. The other question now is, does the department supply teachers, educationalists, in the agricultural field of endeavour to these underdeveloped nations?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Newman: Does the department supply experts in agricultural endeavours to underdeveloped nations?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. As I mentioned earlier, Jack Clark is in Somaliland right now. He is one of the leading economists in this particular field.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Are you teaching them how to grow tobacco?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, Dr. Ford Stinson was in Rhodesia, but he was there at the invitation of the government of Rhodesia a number of years ago. He has since returned to Ontario. Helen Abell, who is one of the leading home economists of the country has been, and will be, made available to the African nations for the same purpose.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, are these isolated cases or is this fairly common?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is a continuing process.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister has named only two specific individuals. Would the hon. Minister say that he would have probably 20 or 30 from his department who could be sent to the underdeveloped countries?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Is the hon. member suggesting that our department at the expense of the Treasury here should send these people out to these various countries?

Mr. Newman: I think The Department of Agriculture should undertake a programme to assist these underdeveloped countries.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: To what extent?

Mr. Newman: To the extent of supplying them with a teacher who could assist in teaching our agricultural methods.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have already suggested that we are doing this very thing. I am asking the hon. member to what extent? Is it more than we are doing?

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has mentioned only two instances. The province of Manitoba does this on a much more progressive and advanced scale than does Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: How much more? Could the hon. member give me the individuals and the number of them?

Mr. Newman: I will take that into consideration. I will send the hon. Minister a letter.

An hon. member: In the fullness of time.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, under item 4, without wishing to single out any of these very prestigious organizations that are given grants under this vote, I should like to ask the hon. Minister through you, sir, just what is and who is the Ontario Beef Pasture Improvement Committee? I should invite him to make an explanation of what that committee does, what information it furnishes.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The Ontario Beef Cattle Improvement Association—is this the one the hon. member is referring to?

Mr. Sopha: Ontario Beef Pasture Improvement Committee. It is halfway down.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Is the hon. member referring to public accounts or to the estimates?

Mr. Sopha: I am referring to vote 101 and it is item 4.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. I am sorry I did not—for the life of me I cannot see it in my own copy yet, but it must be here. Oh yes,

I see it, Ontario Beef Pasture Improvement Committee, $6,000. This committee was established to put on demonstration projects in various areas of the province. There has been a marked improvement since this committee was established in the use that has been made of pastures. Quite frankly, I think if we are going to stay competitive in the beef industry in Ontario, we are going to have to learn to produce beef as cheaply and efficiently as we possibly can and one good way to do it is on good pasture. This has been amply demonstrated by these demonstration farms that we have had in operation at various places. The farms themselves this year will be abandoned from the project; that is the ones that have been in operation for many years, but specific projects will be undertaken in co-operation with the Beef Cattle Pasture Improvement Committee. Therefore, there will be a wider coverage of the province even for the demonstration of improved mixtures, fertilization on existing pastures, demonstrations on check plots to see what cattle will gain on unfertilized and fertilized pasture and on the new mixtures. We are aiming for this business of finding a pasture that will provide a legume so there will not be trouble with bloat, and all these kind of things that are really research projects. This is what this grant is for.

Mr. Sopha: Through you, sir, would the hon. Minister permit me to question him a little more closely? Is the committee a committee of government or appointed by the government?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The committees that deal with it at the government level are composed, I believe, of the director of the soils and crops branch, Mr. Parks; the secretary of the Beef Improvement Association, Mr. Starr; and I believe one other. There are three who are in the civil service in our department who administer the funds which are administered through the local county soil and crop improvement associations as local projects with local people, in the various counties that adopt this as one of their projects.

Mr. Sopha: I see. I have a very keen personal interest in this. I may sound prophetic but I hope not by very many years, but I am one of those who believes that the future of the beef cattle industry in Ontario is in northern Ontario. With increasing industrialization and the coming out of production of agricultural lands in the south, the only place really in Ontario that will provide the space to continue our great beef cattle industry will be in northern Ontario. In that regard,

I am trying to raise some myself, Mr. Chairman. I want to make the House aware of all the facts—

An hon. member: In on the ground floor.

Mr. Sopha: I suppose one should not refer to a resolution on the order paper in which one's name is involved, but right now in regard to my beef cattle I am trying to buy some land from the Crown and the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), instead of wanting to sell me the succulent green grass that my cattle need, wants to sell me trees. I have not trained my cattle—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Yet, my cattle are not trained yet like moose to eat trees. They still prefer grass, which is what I am trying to get.

An hon. member: How about your bull?

Mr. Sopha: He asks about my bull, I suppose the trees would be of use to him in shining his horns. But on the serious side, along with what I have said I must not forget that one of the great beef cattle producing areas of the country is to be found in Manitoulin Island. There is a department of government which has not yet recognized that the basic economy of Manitoulin Island is agriculture, and principally the raising of beef cattle. I will not leave the House in any doubt for very long about which department of government it is, for the hon. gentleman's colleague, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, thinks that Manitoulin Island is a tourist paradise. He thinks it is the Switzerland of Ontario, and quite overlooks the fact that probably Manitoulin Island is the residence of the last great group of yeoman population in Ontario who are engaged principally in the beef cattle industry. But I will leave argument on that score for another day.

However, Mr. Chairman, I do wish to take the opportunity to point out, believing as I do that northern Ontario is going to be the area sometime in the future—15, 20, 25 or 50 years from now, whenever it may be—that the beef cattle industry will have to find its home. I would urge upon the hon. Minister that more extensive studies be made in respect of pasture. I know the problem at a close personal level. Pasture in northern Ontario is to be found in a very wild state of nature and, principally, in very rocky terrain, at least in the northeastern part of the province. The terrain is typical Laurentian shield and, in order to afford sustenance and sufficient fodder for beef cattle, one has to take very great care of the pasture. And buying the seed, as we have to do, from southern Ontario, from people who are the successors in business to my good friend, the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), is a very expensive proposition—as I have found out.

I wanted to make those few comments to ask the hon. Minister to bend every effort towards a study of the feasibility of improving the pasture in that part of the province, by assistance to people who are trying to make a success in the beef cattle industry in northern Ontario.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, might I inquire if section 6 in vote 101 is the correct area in which a person could inquire as to some facts concerning the shortage of farm labour in certain sections of the province?

If that is so, I would like to give a bit of background material and pose a couple of questions to the hon. Minister. His assistant deputy is quite aware of the serious problem in Essex county, in particular, and in other parts of the province. I would like to draw this to the attention of the House:

In an article in the Windsor Star attributed to John Munro, the Liberal member of Parliament for Hamilton East, speaking at an annual vegetable growers banquet, it was said:

A study would be asked from the Canadian Economic Council on the problem of solving Canada's agricultural labour needs. This is a difficult problem because of the character of the employment, and farmers cannot guarantee long-term employment.

Farmers have failed to attract labour even in areas where our unemployment figures are the highest—mainly because the hours are long, the pay not good, and the work is of a temporary nature.

This is the reason the employment farmers have to offer has not attracted the rank and file of our unemployed.

Now the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has asked the National Employment Service to issue work permits to admit foreign seasonal workers to Canada to help in the fruit and vegetable harvest.

John Sandham of Vineland Station, secretary of the Ontario Fresh Peach Growers Marketing Board, told a meeting of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture:

Substantial losses have been suffered by Niagara fruit growers in recent years because of the lack of labour to pick and process these crops. Packing plants that should have been working 24 hours a day were only working one shift.

A further statement by Dr. John Brown, secretary of the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers, in an article regarding labour shortages, said as follows:

Labour shortages in various areas and facets of the industry occurred widely this past year, and there is every indication that the problem will be more acute in the immediate years ahead. Producers are affected directly by labour shortages in the fields, and indirectly by labour shortages in the processing plants.

Various solutions have been discussed, such as reviewing Canadian immigration policies to lay greater emphasis on bringing in the people with agricultural backgrounds, reviewing this situation of agricultural workers on unemployment insurance regulations, the need for provincial government to enter the field of recruiting and organizing supplies of temporary service help, the possibility of temporary entry of farm help from other countries, and ways and means to enable growers to increase the income of farm workers.

At present there is virtually no unanimity in the thinking of the industry as to the proper approach to these chief problems. Growers individually cannot solve this problem, so it is imperative that the whole industry, the can crop growers, the processors and the fruit and vegetable growers, decide which policy should be followed.

The fact is that the labour situation seems to become more bothersome each year and no end is in sight. More processors were dangerously short of labour last season. If they cannot handle a crop then it is left in the field or goes in the fresh fruit market and everyone is simply left holding the bag.

At various meetings to discuss the shortage of labour in which your department is represented, officials have pointed out that the immigrant labour is difficult to bring into the country because of the lack of continuous employment in any area. Immigration officials point out that now, few European countries have a surplus supply of good farm labourers. Growers have been told by experts in the field that they must provide some accommodation if they wish to recruit farm labour from other parts of Ontario or the remainder of Canada.

In Essex and Kent counties we feel we have taken the lead, and a survey is to be conducted to provide the National Employment Service with a projected picture of manpower requirements for harvesting crops in the two counties. I am hoping that your department, sir, will play an important role in this. I might say, further, that the growers of processing crops plan to assess the labour requirements at this time, as growers get their contracts for processing. In South Essex, the early fruit and vegetable growers are doing this survey in an undetermined manner as yet.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister several questions here but, before doing so, I would like to read into the record one article written by Mr. Frank Drea in the column "Dissent" contained in the Toronto Telegram, in regard to farm labour, and called "The Downtrodden":

For many years farmers and organized agriculture have been cementing their position as the most selfish group in Canada. They constantly plead for more and more special treatment, are busily working to make sure that no one else gets even a particle of the kind of protection and assistance farmers feel is their natural right.

Nowhere in Canada is this paradox more apparent than in southern Ontario. At one side of the vast economic gulf are the farmers, loaded down with social benefits, protected by the taxpayers against everything from the whims of nature to low prices: On the other are the people who work for the farmers, denied even the smallest of social benefits that other Canadian working people enjoy. These are the 10,000 migratory farm workers, the men, women and children who annually harvest the lucrative cash crops in the province—tobacco, tomatoes, sugar beets, onions and fruit.

The farm lobby at Queen's Park has now earned the province the dubious reputation of having the most exploited band of migratory workers in North America.

This is the first time I have ever heard that statement. Most farm workers want piece work because they will work hard, they will work long hours, and they will make more money.

But to make sure that these people will still toil for the lowest wages, and to deny the rights of other Canadians, organized agriculture now wants to import migratory labourers from other nations.

And so on.

The truth is that Canadian workers know only too well the kind of conditions that face us farm workers. Agricultural workers in Ontario are excluded from every known piece of social legislation in the province. Farm workers are denied the protection of workmen's compensation, which means they must sue an employer if they are injured.

I believe that article was in error because workers who are brought in from outside our province through co-operation between the two levels are definitely covered by workmen's compensation. Further with his—Drea's—statement:

This is a costly, lengthy and impossible business for any person who must move with the cycle of crop harvest. They have no unemployment insurance. Child labour laws are seldom enforced. Someone has apparently convinced the Legislature that back-breaking work in tobacco or beet fields moulds character.

This article continues on and I will read the last paragraph here before I pose my questions.

Now a challenge confronts the national employment service and the government of Ontario. It will be interesting to see if either will be willing to take a stand for reform and insist that the present migratory workers be brought under the scope of social legislation before a start is made in the business of importing new labour to be exploited.

In conclusion to these remarks both of Mr. Drea and myself, I would like to pose a question on this section of the farm labour service, whether there have been sufficient funds and men set aside to be of real service at this time of real urgency in this labour shortage. In regard to labour for market garden and fruit farmers in the province, I would ask the hon. Minister, has the province requested an extension of The Unemployment Insurance Act to cover farmers of this province?

Further, I would ask the hon. Minister if he has given thought to extending workmen's compensation to all farm labour employed in our province and I would further ask, has there been given any thought toward the implementation of a minimum wage which could be graduated over a period of years on these farms?

This labour problem is of very vital concern and not only requires immediate action, but also requires long-range projections, and I hope that this department will play a dominant role in the completion of this project.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend, the hon. member for Essex South, has posed four very important questions here.

In reply, I would first like to make some comment on the article which he read. I think the column is entitled "Dissent", if I am not mistaken. I would like to say that in my humble opinion as a farmer, and I am very proud of my profession and my vocation, that article and anyone who would read this article into the records of the House as a fact, is doing a disservice to agriculture in the province of Ontario.

I think this afternoon, a representative of the Opposition party who had led off in the debate said we must improve the public image and the public relations of agriculture in the province of Ontario in relation to the rest of the population. Certainly the article, and I know it very well, for I have read it and have it in my desk, is a gross misrepresentation of facts as they actually exist in the province of Ontario today. I gather the hon. member agrees with what I have said because I know he represents a very great rural area of the province of Ontario in which labour for harvesting the crops grown there—fruit and vegetable crops, particularly the vegetable crops—is a very important aspect.

In regard to the farm labour situation, we are very definitely interested in it. I think we should point out the fact that last year was one of the peculiar years, as far as harvesting was concerned, in a long period of time. We go back many years to the time when the war effort was on and we had high school students excused from their classes early in the summer and late in the fall in order that they could carry out harvesting assistance for the farmers. However, with the end of the war effort, we got away from this and we have found various sources of labour. Some of them are drying up now. I think the immigrant labour that came into the country here in great numbers following the war certainly assisted in this particular regard for some time. But, however, that source seems to be drying up and these people are getting incorporated into the various other industries in the province and are no longer available for this type of seasonal work.

The student body, the Grade 13 students and those below that level and some university students, have been of material assistance to the farmers in harvesting these vegetable crops in times past. However, last year, we had this rather peculiar summer. It was cold and dry throughout July and August and then we got that beautiful weather in September and on into October.

A good many of the crops that should normally have been harvested in August were not harvested in August. Fortunately, the season permitted that they should ripen and develop and be harvested in September, even on into October, and so the school students by that time had gone back into school and a great many farmers were left without a source of help. This is some background to what happened last year.

However, this has been pointed up to us in meetings that have been held, and three meetings have already been held. I think my hon. friend may have attended some of them. One was held in Chatham on Monday, February 3, another one in Leamington on Friday, February 7, another one in Tillsonburg on Friday, February 14. The significant thing out of all this, to my mind, is that out of these meetings a co-ordinating committee was set up to work with the national employment service in exploring all possibilities for farm labour. It was recommended that the national employment service appoint a co-ordinator to work between its branch offices in the area to evaluate better the needs in that particular area or in relation to other areas in the province, that might have either available help or need help, and to facilitate the movement of labour from one area to another. It was agreed that considerable publicity would be carried out in schools in the area and I think this is an excellent idea because normally a great many of these crops can be harvested before the students go back to school.

The branch of Indian affairs, sir, agreed to investigate the possibility of moving Indian families into the area where growers felt they could supply the necessary accommodation. Each of the local committees set up in Chatham and Leamington is presently surveying among its own growers the actual labour requirements for the coming year.

There was also mention made of importing seasonal help from the West Indies and of course we recognize that this decision as to whether or not help from the West Indies could be utilized would have to be made between the national employment service and The Canada Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

These are all distinct possibilities. They are things that are presently under consideration. I think there will be some answers provided.

In regard to the four questions my hon. friend asked, I am not sure I have them all here but he will correct me, I am sure, if I have not. I think the first was funds set up under the national employment service for assistance in this very regard. I believe that the indication of the meetings held, the co-ordinating committee that has been set up, the continuing effort of the co-ordinating committee, the fact that a co-ordinator has been appointed, or is in the process of being appointed, and the fact that our department is working with the federal national employment service are indicative that funds are being made available to do the job that has to be done.

As far as unemployment insurance is concerned, this is the responsibility of the federal government, and we have nothing to do with this as far as the province of Ontario is concerned.

The workmen's compensation board question—workmen's compensation is available to all farmers who wish to purchase it today. A special rate is available for those working in the fruit and vegetable industry. I believe the rate is $1.10 per $100 on the payroll for the vegetable industry. While I admit it is not on a compulsory basis, it is available.

As far as the minimum wage is concerned, I must confess that this is not in the purview of The Department of Agriculture and, as far as I know, there has been no discussion of it at the moment.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, the first question I asked I believe you did not interpret correctly. I questioned whether this department had sufficient funds and men allocated to play a dominant role in this farm labour shortage.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, our department has all the funds that are required, as far as our responsibility in the matter is concerned. This is a matter of co-ordination between our department and the federal people. The real onus, as I see it, rests on the national employment service. As a farmer myself, I know the national employment service has recruited farm labour for me on many occasions and I know they have for many others. I think they are an excellent source of farm labour. We think that, under the circumstances, as they have developed in the last year or so, perhaps more emphasis might be placed on this particular aspect.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, in listening to the hon. Minister's remarks, I have—speaking for my own riding—a number of people who certainly search for work eagerly and are interested in seasonal work. I am wondering if you are suggesting—I notice where you are talking about The Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the possibilities from the West Indies, and so on—I wonder if you could tell us why you feel that, if the work conditions are attractive enough, we are not getting people from Canada itself to work on farms. Is it because of a lack of employment opportunities here? I mean, what is—it the conditions or is it the fact that we do not have enough people seeking work?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say, and this is borne out by personal experience, that while there may be in your particular riding people available and anxious to work, in the areas where the crop must be harvested—and I am thinking of the area of my hon. friend from Essex South, Mr. Chairman, and my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Welch) over here, from Welland (Mr. Morningstar), where there is a great deal of this, in the Brantford area, too—this is really where the help is required. I think that if your people, and my hon. friend from Dovercourt, would advise the national employment service of the availability of the source of labour, I can assure him that the farm people would be more than anxious to get their services.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Minister. First, it would be very difficult for me to act as an individual employment agency to the national employment service, but I do suggest that perhaps the question that my hon. friend has asked I am sure the hon. Minister will pursue. I am not sure, and I say this with—just raising it as a question for the national employment service because I am not sure they are examining completely the needs in certain areas outside local offices, or trying to arrange the facilities and transportation to answer the needs of farm people in another area other than in their local office. I would hope that there could be much more liaison with respect to this.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, I want to commend first of all the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt) who did such a marvellous job for our party and for farmers in general. I, too, am a farmer and I, too, am proud of my calling.

I want to highlight two or three of the things which were in the hon. member's speech though. I am afraid that I may ramble on into—I will try to keep from doing this but I want to get over into a vote a little later on in connection with something I had to say with regard to the ARDA programme. I will try to leave that out of my remarks until we get to it.

There was one thing that I did want to talk about, and would like the hon. Minister to comment on, and that is the fact that in northern Ontario the dairying industry is "kaput," shot, for two or three reasons, none of which can be laid at the door of The Department of Agriculture. One of the big reasons, of course, is that we do have a shortage of urban consumers and we are not likely to have any more of these for the time—

Mr. Chairman: Vote 101 please! Keep on 101.

Mr. Farquhar: Well, I am afraid I cannot find where these remarks come in—

Mr. Chairman: Vote 105.

Mr. Farquhar: You want me to wait for 105?

Mr. C. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister to tell me where I could inquire about the humane society. There are 22 votes here, surely it must fit in somewhere, but I cannot seem to find it after reading all afternoon.

An hon. member: Under grants!

Mr. Bukator: Is it under the vote we are on now? Could you tell me where it is, then?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The humane society, Mr. Chairman, does not come under The Department of Agriculture at all.

Mr. Bukator: Then the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; does that come under the hon. Minister's department at all?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Bukator: Well, I will try it again.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I wish you would. I am sorry, I cannot hear. I wish they would turn it up a little bit. I cannot hear.

Mr. Bukator: Maybe I should have a longer microphone, like the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) has.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Just because it is embarrassing, do not feel ashamed.

Mr. Bukator: I do not think it is embarrassing as far as I am concerned. I think that these animals which are not being treated properly by human beings—

Hon. A. Crossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Are you referring to us?

Mr. Singer: Why would the hon. Minister think that?

Mr. Bukator: We have to get into this some time before the night is over so we might as well start now, I suppose.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I might inform the hon. member that if he will be patient and wait until the Treasury estimates come up he will find it.

Mr. Bukator: The Treasury estimates. I am sure the hon. Provincial Treasurer—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): He will not be satisfied with that.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, I would be. He is an honourable man, and if I am assured that I can speak about this topic at that time you can rest assured I will lay off for the time being at least. I will be glad to. But it is still a serious problem, and I do not think the animals in the province should be treated the way they are.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, under vote 101, is money provided for the departmental farm machinery committee?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, I think it would be. It is under the maintenance section of the vote in 101.

Mr. Nixon: I know, with the announcement concerning this committee during the past year, there has been some disappointment since the discussions in this House; the committee on agriculture last year gave us to understand there would be a strong committee able to make very definite recommendations and enforce such recommendations requiring the companies that provide farm machinery in this province to maintain parts depots and service, particularly in the seasons when the harvest is so intensive and important. I would like the hon. Minister to comment on the work of this committee and to advise the House as to whether regulations requiring these parts and service minimum requirements might not be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, as far as the farm machinery committee is concerned, the advisory board has been set up out of the recommendations that have been made in the report of the farm machinery committee that was set up a year or two ago.

At the moment there is an active board working with a chairman and a secretary, holding meetings with the company representatives, to try to iron out the difficulties which have been plaguing many of the implement agents across the country, if I may say so, as well as the farmers, in the availability of a source of parts at a central place in Ontario.

We think that progress has been made along these lines. As far as the availability of parts is concerned, we think it is a matter of getting a clearer understanding, a better working relationship between the head office, the distributor, the agent and the farmer. We think there is some onus on all of them, quite frankly. We think there may be some onus on the farmer that in off-seasons, when he feels there is a necessity for parts, that he order them in time and give his dealer a chance to get those parts and get them into place before the busy season comes on.

But the thing the hon. member as a farm operator is concerned with, and I am sure as I am concerned with, is the fact that in the midst of harvest or in the midst of seeding or haying, or what-have-you, a part breaks on a machine quite unexpectedly and one finds himself without availability of a source of parts on a Saturday or if it is a holiday, on a Monday, and it means that you have quite a long weekend with a machine out of operation.

It has been our intention and the intention of the committee, and we have a wide degree of acceptance on the part of machine companies, that they maintain a man at their central warehouse in order to disburse those parts wherever they may be needed. We have been able to accomplish this this year. I think as we gradually work towards this we will evolve a programme that will meet the requirements that I know the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, one of the biggest problems and the one that perhaps could be controlled by legislation is not concerned with the companies that have been giving good service for many years, but with those that import cheaper, odd types of machinery, and they are cheaper because no service is offered on them. A farmer will buy one of these machines and it may work for a short length of time and then when he finds that it requires some repairs, the repairs are not available or have to be imported from Timbuktu. Surely the committee must take some definite responsibility for either licensing these people or informing the farmers that service cannot be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The committee is certainly working with the farmers and working with these companies. I think the hon. member is referring to the short-line companies; I think this is the proper description of them. Some of them are based outside Ontario and ship machinery in here.

Just recently, as a matter of fact it was during the farm equipment show in connection with the recent soil and crop improvement annual meeting here, the chairman and secretary of the committee met with the president of an organization from the United States and its Canadian representative. They had a very good meeting and I am delighted with the report that came from both of them concerning this particular meeting. It was dealing with the very thing that the hon. member has mentioned. It is a concern. But unfortunately I would not want to leave the impression that it is only those companies which do cause the problem. We have instances of some of the major farm machinery companies which are causing some of these problems in the unavailability of certain parts for their equipment. I think it is something that applies to most farm machinery manufacturers—that they must recognize the responsibility they have, having sold a machine, to keep parts here in Ontario for it.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, does the department operate a conservation advisory committee?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No.

Mr. Nixon: There is no part of the department in the hon. Minister's responsibility that does any conservation work and this would all be left with the new department?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is right.

Mr. Nixon: I would like to ask then about the vertical integration committee. Is it still in existence?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, it is not.

Mr. Nixon: The final report of that committee evidently was under discussion when the Cabinet met with the Ontario Federation of Agriculture executive. What about this? Is it a hidden report, as the papers referred to it? Or was there any report?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Indeed there was a report, and I brought the recommendations to the House. They are recorded in Hansard of last year. I have not the page or the date. I am sure the hon. member is aware of what happened; they mention it in the brief, I think. The hon. member may have one there, I have one in my desk if he has not. But it was mentioned in the brief that they regret that we did not publish the report. We published the recommendations in the report but we did not publish the report.

My hon. friend, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) will recall that he raised this point a year or so ago and my answer to him at that time was that I had given my word to the men whom I had asked to work on that committee, made up of representatives of the producers, distributors and processors of fruit and vegetables, that if they would sit on this committee and examine this most contentious problem, one that affected all of us, that we would treat in confidence their deliberations and their report was to be submitted to me. This was the undertaking I made to them and I made it to the House. But when the hon. leader of the Opposition asked me if I would make this report public, I informed him at that time that I would not, but I would ask the committee if it had objections to the making public of its recommendations. And this I did, and they are recorded in Hansard. I cannot tell the hon. member the page but it is in Hansard of last year.

The recommendations included two amendments to The Farm Products Marketing Act that were made. It also included the establishment of the Ontario Food Council and this was done. So the report of the committee as far as its recommendations are concerned, was implemented in total and are now in effect.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to, and I am really coming back again if I could, get clarification from the hon. Minister. I am again coming back to my friend, the hon. member for Essex South. I am thinking of your remarks to me, sir, about the suggestion I should advise people from my riding to go out to the farm areas in connection with the opportunities of employment. As I listened to this, sir, to your answer to this, I noticed you said first of all the minimum wage was really a responsibility of the national employment service, or the federal people.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry to come back, but it is to get clarification on this point.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I said the minimum wage is something that had never been discussed and was not a responsibility of my department.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask you, sir, in view of the fact that during the election your party took great pride in establishing the minimum wage—I congratulate it on the amount it has done in connection with getting it established—who will be responsible for establishing a minimum wage for farm workers?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The Department of Labour is responsible for this entirely.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry. I should think that surely some initiative would come from your department with respect to it. Could I ask you if you are for a minimum wage and would advocate such to The Department of Labour?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this, that the farm wages have been a matter of private negotiation between farmer and his employee for as long as I can ever remember, and I can see no reason at the moment why I should recommend that there should be any such change. I have heard no such recommendation come from the farm organizations at any time whatever.

Now as far as minimum wages are concerned, I believe that even in the areas where they now apply that agricultural workers are exempt from that particular facet of it. In regard to my hon. friend's interest in finding employment for the constituents in his riding, I appreciate his interest in being of assistance to Ontario farmers. I would like to mention that if he has anyone there who would be interested in working in the seasonal work on the farms, that they might get in touch with Miss Wallace at the west Toronto national employment service office and they will be looked after. Miss Wallace has been working closely with the assistant deputy Minister, Mr. Bennett, in the work that has been done in co-ordinating the movement of seasonal labour from Toronto out of the respective areas to serve the farmers.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Would that include Welland too, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate this, and I think they have done more than that, may I say, in commending officials of your department. I know of four families within my riding who have moved out and settled on farms through the advice of your department.

I take it from your remarks, however, that you yourself then are not for a minimum wage for farm labour?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I did not say that. I made no comment on it.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I would say this, that you did say it is a private contract between the farmer and his employee. You are making no suggestion that you would advocate a minimum wage until you hear from them—

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Why do you not go on the farm for a couple of days?

Mr. Thompson: I would say this is a very important question to many people in this province. I would also say—

Mr. Yakabuski: You do not know anything about farms.

Mr. Thompson: I would also say with respect to this that I have worked on farms when I first came to this country. I have been a member of the—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Thompson: I have been a member of the leadership course and I feel for the sake of the members in my riding that I would like to have clarification about the hon. Minister's stand with respect to the potential opportunities they might have.

That brings me to the next point, sir, with respect to workmen's compensation. As I understand from your answer, you said that workmen's compensation could be worked on an individual basis, that a farmer could have compensation for his employee? Am I right in that or not? Is it a case of the employee having any option in this, or is it a case of the farmer making the decision?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The employee can ask the farmer if he has that protection. There are a great many farmers who carry it.

Mr. Thompson: Could you give me any proportion in connection with the—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, I can. I believe that the figure I heard quoted recently was something like 1,700 farmers that were carrying it on general farm work. This is $4.50 on the wage rate. I have not got the figure, I do not know whether any of you fellows have or not, for the vegetable growers. This is the group that I am referring to that have the special rate of $1.10.

But I do know, I am advised here by my assistant deputy Minister who has been looking after this in the past, that liability insurance is provided for the workers that come out from Toronto to work in the vegetable fields as protection for them.

Mr. Thompson: I realize, sir, in asking this, it is hard to pull this out immediately, but perhaps I could get the percentage of farmers who do not—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think that figure can be obtained. I have not got it with me, I must confess, right here. But I would like—

Mr. Nixon: Are there not 100,000 farm units?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Nixon: One hundred thousand farming units?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Are there that many covered, do you mean?

Mr. Nixon: No, is that the number of farming units, and two thousand have the coverage?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I did not say that. I said that of the general farm operators, there were something like 1,700 covered. That is the last figure that I have. Now, I do not know what it is right now. This is the last figure I have and it was a few months ago that it was given to me. I cannot give you the number that it covered in the vegetable growing industry.

Mr. Thompson: I am interested in the philosophy of the hon. Minister. I presume you believe in workmen's compensation as a beneficial social measure. I am wondering if you, sir, would believe in a broad extension of workmen's compensation both on behalf of the farmer and of the employee.

When I ask this, I am thinking again of my own constituents. There are two of them who have had work on farms, one in Manitoba, in which he was not able to get workmen's compensation because he was not covered. I wonder if the hon. Minister would answer, does he believe in a broader coverage of workmen's compensation to include all employees on farms?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would answer that question, Mr. Chairman, by asking my hon. friend if he is in favour of the federal government establishing unemployment insurance for all farm labour in the province of Ontario and in Canada?

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister has he made any approach to Ottawa in regard to having farm labour covered by unemployment insurance?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No.

Mr. Spence: Or workmen's compensation?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I have not.

Mr. Spence: Why not, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Because unemployment insurance is completely the responsibility of the Ottawa government. We have nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. Spence: Well, Mr. Minister, do you not think that your approaching Ottawa would carry a great weight?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not flatter myself with that opinion. It might be, I am not sure.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Spence: Do you not think, Mr. Minister, that this would be of benefit to agriculture in the province of Ontario, especially to fruit and vegetable growers who have a shortage of help in harvesting their crops? If they could receive these benefits they could get a better group of employment, or better labour force, to help to overcome this obstacle?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As far as I know the farm organizations have made no approach to us on this particular matter.

Mr. Spence: I see.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The federation of agriculture brief, and I have a very high regard for that organization, made no mention of workmen's compensation nor of unemployment insurance that I know of this year. I do not recall it being made in their brief.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. Minister that there is a problem here of shortage of labour which I understand the hon. member for Essex South has brought up here this evening.

If they had unemployment insurance and compensation benefits there would be a labour force available in southwestern Ontario, or it would encourage a labour force to help solve the problems of the fruit and vegetable growers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. Minister, through you, a question with regard to item 10 under vote 101, the fund for the purchase of live-stock for feeding research, $35,000. Now, first of all, what phases of research are involved; and second, what are the results of this research?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It was just established last year. I have the various projects that are in effect, in continuing effect, but I would say this, that the advice of the directors of research has been that while there are no conclusive findings yet, it has not been in operation long enough to really make public any of the findings that have been so established until they have given them another trial.

There have been some phenomenal results in certain aspects, but there is no conclusive evidence yet of the results of this research programme. I think it is a move in the right direction to determine the use of antibiotics in certain supplements; of estrus control and feeding heifers, the effect of drying on the feeding value of high moisture corn, the use of high moisture corn, corn silage versus pasture; and then we have a trial going on various crossbred steers, against some dairy-bred steers as well.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister another question in this regard. Is anything being carried on with respect to mastitis?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. We announced the mastitis control programme. It will take effect this summer across the province of Ontario.

Mr. Farquhar: Vote 101 please!

Mr. Chairman, there is one more thing to be added to our discussion in connection with workmen's compensation. I feel that in this day and age, with the technical equipment which is on the farm, the high-speed powerful equipment and its fast-moving knives, and the sharp equipment that is being used on the farm, it is much more important and calls for a little closer look, I think, on the part of the hon. Minister. I just think of our own operation, which involves a payroll, both farm and dairying. I think of our accident experience, comparing one with the other. I would certainly much rather be without the dairy coverage, which is compulsory, than I would be without the farm coverage. I think it calls for a closer look than we are giving it.

Vote 101 agreed to.

On vote 102:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, in regard to agricultural societies, at least community centres' grants for unorganized townships, shall I discuss this under this vote or under the extension branch?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, it is under this vote. Grants under community centres, item 8, vote 102.

Mr. Troy: Yes. I notice it again under vote 106 and it says further about grants to unorganized townships.

Sir, I notice in the public accounts that there have been certain grants to some unorganized townships. I presume they are for rinks or playing fields but it seems to me, sir, that this should be extended also to include community centres, because it is even more important to us in some of these unorganized townships that they have a community centre. Usually in the larger centres there are facilities and places of entertainment or auditoriums and things of that nature. Since there is no council, would not a legally constituted board like a school board be the agency to initiate so that they could get the full benefit of the Act?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, that is right. My hon. friend would note that in the public accounts there are two—

Mr. Troy: Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: You probably noticed them. The Pointe au Baril—is that the proper pronunciation?

Mr. Troy: No, that is down in the Parry Sound area—River Valley. The hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) would know where it is but it is mentioned here in the public accounts.

There is another question, a very interesting one, with regard to the community centre. I have before me a picture which shows the mayor of Sturgeon Falls and the treasurer and $10,000 cheque:

—representing The Ontario Department of Agriculture's share of capital expenditure for the construction of the Sturgeon Falls arena and recreation centre, was received by municipal officials this week and seen accepting the cheque which is from the people of Ontario are mayor John Valiquette and clerk-treasurer Roger Aubry.

That is the complete sentence. It does not say from whom they are receiving it, but you would get the idea as you read the next line that it was from the Conservative Party:

Sturgeon Falls PC association president Paul Leach had previously advised—

I presume he means "informed":

—Mr. Valiquette that the money was forthcoming from Agriculture Minister W. A. Stewart.

That was unfortunate for the PC association. It was not the picture that they intended to have, sir. The picture that they intended to have was one with the defeated Conservative candidate in the riding of Nipissing, and the PC president, Mr. Leach, present. They had arranged for the photographers to be there and—

Hon. C. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Why did you not show it?

Mr. Troy: Because I knew nothing about it, that is why. Just like your arrogant policy all through the piece. The—

Mr. Singer: Oh, come on, George, let somebody—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: The photographers were called for and they waited and waited and waited. "Where is the bride?" The defeated candidate did not come, but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, since this is money given by the people of Ontario, why should it be that the information be passed on to the association president and not to the elected member, the man who represents the people—or the woman, whoever it may be, in the riding?

After all, the town of Sturgeon Falls, the municipal officials, the chairman of the community centre, had been informed some years before that under the Act they could apply for this, and it came, not from the Conservative association—some of these chaps who get certain offices become very big for their boots and—but this money comes from the people and it is a strange thing to me, sir, that such a situation like that would happen in the Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I have a very good explanation for that.

Mr. Troy: Thank you, I will be glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have several letters before me. They all read exactly the same, other than the fact that the names and the designations of them are different. I do not happen to have the letter my hon. friend refers to, which went to the clerk of the township or the town regarding this community centre. But we send a letter out from my office, over my signature, whenever a cheque goes out for a community centre. I am quite prepared to read this letter, because, to my way of thinking, it represents the thinking of the government of the province of Ontario in a tangible way, supporting these worthwhile community projects.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may say, I have no knowledge how the Progressive-Conservative association learned of the cheque being presented or anything about it. I sent a letter to the clerk of the town, and what the clerk of the town did with the information or with the cheque after it was mailed to him, is surely not my responsibility. Now, this is exactly what happened and it happened in the case—here is a list of places: Algoma, Kenora, Kent, Lincoln, Oxford, Rainy River, Victoria, York. Every one of those letters went out on the same day; identical letters. In this particular case, it goes to Mr. Winninger, treasurer of the city of St. Catharines, Municipal Building, St. Catharines, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Winninger:

It gives me pleasure to enclose a cheque in the amount of $5,000, which represents a share of the government of Ontario in the cost of the Lincoln-St. Catharines rink. We are glad to have participated in this worthwhile project and trust this cheque may indicate in a tangible way the interest of the Ontario government and The Ontario Department of Agriculture in providing facilities for community activities.

Mr. Troy: I think anybody would applaud that letter, Mr. Chairman. It is a strange thing though that somehow there must be a leak somewhere, because there the mayor points out—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The Minister has answered the question.

Mr. Troy: Not the full answer, sir. I would just wonder then; the question is: How could it be possible that the president of this association would previously inform the mayor that he was getting it from the government? It is quite possible, of course; the hon. Minister would not be a party to any such thing as that, but somehow the information got out.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Mr. Chairman, might I just say one word? Vote 102, we are talking about, grants to agricultural societies and other exhibitions. As past-president of the Canadian Lakehead Exhibition, I want to take a minute to thank the department and the hon. Minister for the contributions they have made to that great exhibition through the years, which has made it possible to raise the attendance of the Canadian Lakehead Exhibition to between 150,000 and 200,000 a year. It is one of the great things of the year in the Lakehead cities and one that we are all very proud of.

While I am on my feet, I want especially, through the hon. Minister, to thank his staff, that is the judges of horses, cattle and all the other animals at the Canadian Lakehead Exhibition, for the wonderful work they do each year in judging those entries and arranging who is to get the prizes. We have had the greatest co-operation, and I am speaking of the last 25 years when I have been connected with that organization. The staff of The Department of Agriculture has done a very fine job and I want to thank any of them who are here tonight and to have the hon. Minister pass on to the other people in his department how much their efforts on our behalf are appreciated at the Lakehead. I might say that I had a letter from the president and manager of the Lakehead exhibition asking me to make these remarks on this vote through the hon. Minister to his staff.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, as the member for the riding of Nipissing, I want to thank the people of Ontario for the money that they have donated, which has been distributed through The Department of Agriculture to the city of North Bay, to the town of Sturgeon Falls, and to the township of West Ferris. We are grateful also. But remember that the money is voted by the Legislature, it is not from any special pot.

Mr. Nixon: On vote 102, does the department have some sort of rainy weather insurance for fairs; does this apply to all fairs?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, there is.

Mr. Nixon: The department guarantees a sort of minimum take, or what is it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is a guarantee up to $500 maximum, Mr. Lashley informs me; a guarantee of $500 maximum. This is to cover if the fair has a bad day, because it has certain expenses that it has to go ahead with. If it rains before three o'clock in the afternoon and the fair is considered to be washed out because of bad weather, the societies or associations through the department will reimburse the fair board up to the extent of the maximum $500.

Vote 102 agreed to.

Vote 103 agreed to.

On vote 104:

Mr. Thompson: On vote 104, I would like to raise a question. I raise it because of experiences in other provinces and I am thinking of both Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I am thinking of the situation of Indians who have left the reserve. I know in this province that Canadians of Indian background have a proud record and a proud accomplishment. I am thinking of the hon. member for Brant and the association he has with the Six Nations tribe. But I am also thinking of the problems of Indians who have left the reserve, and I am not sure, sir, with respect to this in raising the question, that there should not be a good hard look taken at the whole training of Indians as a responsibility of the federal government, but the training of Indians on the reserve.

I am thinking of the inadequacy of many of them when they leave the reserve and get into an industrial area, Mr. Chairman. I am thinking of what has been done in Manitoba under the co-operative division in which they have set up a department, a co-operative community programmes department I think, to study the numbers of Indians who have left reserves and are living, for example, outside St. Anne's, just outside Winnipeg. I think of Saskatchewan where the Indians have left reserves and are living in the Qu'Appelle Valley and also those Indians referred to as Métis, which are of Indian and white background. I understand that these Métis or Indians off the reserve fall between the responsibility of federal and provincial jurisdiction. In Saskatchewan I remember visiting the co-operative projects which were actively encouraged by the co-operative branch of the Saskatchewan government in setting up co-operative chicken farming. The provincial government encouraged some of the leaders among these wandering Métis to spend a period on an experimental farm and then go back with their own group in order to encourage them to settle into rural farming.

I know there have been a number of studies across the country done on this. I remember when I was a member of an Indian commission, one of the things I was interested in was the fact that there did not seem to be much of a report coming from Ontario. I know that in Manitoba, for all it has tried to do, we still hear of the plight of Indians in the Red Lake district. But I ask, sir, particularly with Indians off the reserve, is there any kind of approach taken to co-operatives?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, there is. There is an approach taken. We have a very definite programme carried on through the agricultural societies branch in assisting with fairs and such kinds of things. We have The Community Centres Act amended so that it provides for community centres on Indian reserves. There is also a very active programme going on with 4-H clubs and junior farmer activity on the Indian reserves. There is work through the Indian agents in co-operation with the local agricultural representatives in respect to reserves.

In relation to the affairs at Ottawa, insofar as our Indians being incorporated into agriculture in the province of Ontario is concerned, we have a meeting convened in Ottawa with the branch of Indian affairs that has been called for some time in the very near future, at which our top officials of the department will be represented, recognizing the importance of the integration of our great native race.

Mr. Chairman: I have been advised that I did not notice the member for Halton, so I am going to allow him to speak on vote 103.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, on the agricultural rehabilitation and development branch, the hon. Minister may recall that the town of Burlington was one of the first communities taking advantage of this legislation. This was even before the director, Mr. Crown, was appointed by the provincial government. I might add he is a very competent administrator and is greatly responsible for the success of this project to date.

I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister could give me an idea how many communities have taken advantage of this programme, this legislation, and whether or not sufficient time has elapsed as yet to indicate the success or benefit of the programme?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question there are 11 municipalities involved in ARDA projects today, varying from research projects to community pastures, and various studies are being made of prospects of the application of ARDA in rural areas. I would say that it is rather early yet to predict the success of the ARDA programme in Ontario, but I would say that we are progressing very satisfactorily in relation to the other provinces of Canada in venturing into this field.

Our legislation was drafted a year ago. We have something like $3.5 million worth of ARDA projects on the way now in Ontario, actually in operation. I think this is a significant step forward and I publicly pay tribute to our ARDA director, Mr. Crown, who has worked with the ARDA directorate, comprising the various departments of the government involved in the ARDA programme. I feel there are a great many possibilities in the application of ARDA.

In your own particular riding, as the hon. member for Halton, you will be aware of the study that is going on into the effect of urbanization in rural Ontario in the Burlington area. This is something I think we will benefit from when we get the results of this study.

Now there are other water conservation projects, and I believe that it is the intention of the hon. Minister of the new Department of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) to employ the services of ARDA in every possible way in further developing water conservation projects where ARDA will apply across Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 104:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I have another question of the hon. Minister; you passed over it very quickly. Is there a pilot project in northern Ontario at the present time under ARDA?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, in the Timiskaming district. A community pasture will be operating there this year. This is one of the two community pastures that will be operating this year. The other is in Victoria county.

Mr. Troy: Yes. And then from the results of that operation, we may be able to add to them in northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is right.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much.

Mr. Farquhar: Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not intend to hold up this vote, but I did miss something and I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question. On Manitoulin and in conjunction with the director of ARDA, Mr. Crown, we have organized, in the last short time, an association. We had a meeting on Monday night attended by 150 farmers. Interest is keen on this very imaginative plan. I wonder, if since this area is nearly all made up of unorganized municipalities and since we have an executive of what we call our Manitoulin Community Pasture Association now, whether at your meeting, at which I expect the terms of reference are going to be explained, of ARDA on March 11, if people other than wardens could be invited to this meeting. One or two people from this association, for instance, that would be able to carry back information for this group.

Would the hon. Minister like to answer that, please?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised a question there that on its surface would appear to have great validity. However, I think he would be the first to agree that a meeting such as we have proposed to call, indeed have called, to explain the operation of the committees that would be set up in the organized municipalities, could become unwieldy if we open the doors for everyone to come in. Might I suggest that the hon. member's committee—and I cannot quite recall, is it the beef cattle producers, is this what you say?

Mr. Farquhar: No, this is a new committee which we have put together lately, which is called the Manitoulin Community Pasture Association.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Very good. The Manitoulin Community Pasture Association, I would say, should get in touch with the committee of our department, and this can be done through our ARDA director or through our deputy Minister's office, directly with the committee which will be in charge of the northern Ontario grants, for the simple reason that there will be committees set up in each one of the northern Ontario districts to decide, and this is in relation to the northern Ontario grants. When we get to northern Ontario grants, Mr. Chairman, I will explain this more fully.

I think you will get your answer there, sir, if that is all right with you. I quite appreciate what you are saying here. I am just trying to evolve a better procedure than coming to that particular meeting.

Mr. Farquhar: Well, I certainly—we are not trying to load the meeting or throw anything in. I just wondered if it would be possible.

I do know, I am advised, that our agricultural representative is coming. He asked me if I could arrange to have the president of this association only. Now I do not need an answer to that tonight, thanks very much.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I am all in sympathy. I think this is a good idea for the province of Ontario. Of course in southern Ontario we will not have too many community pastures, is that right?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Not likely.

Mr. Spence: And of course in southern Ontario we will have cattle breeders who will have to buy property in order to put their cattle on pasture, which will amount to maybe $150 per acre.

I was wondering what the charges would be for farmers to put their cattle on these pastures in northern Ontario. They will be in competition with those in southern Ontario. Could you give me any line on what the charges would be? We would like to be fair.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The rate for pasture rental for these community pastures in northern Ontario is set by the local committee in charge of the community pasture and is established at the going rate for pasture in that particular area. They are not in competition with others. It is the going rate for that area and it is on a self-sustaining basis to pay the costs of administering, handling and operating the community pasture.

Mr. Chairman: We are now on vote 104.

Mr. Troy: Yes, on 104.

As the hon. Minister very well knows, in northeastern Ontario and northwestern Ontario and eastern Ontario farmers in the winter time supplement their incomes by cutting pulp wood. I understand sir, that farmers from northern Ontario, and probably from other sections of the province, had met with the hon. Minister last year to discuss the possibility of co-operatives for these farmers who cut pulp wood. Is that correct, sir?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is the marketing plan we were asked for?

Mr. Troy: The marketing plan, yes! I have before me the resolution of the township of Grattan, which was endorsed by a township in my riding, the township of East Ferris, supporting that resolution, in which they asked the agricultural stabilization board to provide price support for pulp wood sold by farmers and small woodlot owners in eastern Ontario. That was in the township of Grattan, but it was endorsed by one of the townships in my riding and that is what they asked, price support for the pulp wood or a co-operative.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is under The Agricultural Stabilization Act at Ottawa. We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. Troy: No, well then is there—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I might say, Mr. Chairman, the point the hon. member has raised

I believe comes under The Farm Products Marketing Act, market developments, I believe. I am not sure whether The Farm Products Marketing Act is dealt with here. This has nothing to do with co-operatives. The group that came in did not want a co-operative, they wanted a marketing plan, if I recall correctly when they came in to see me.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister has had no representations from northern farmers, that is, from northeastern Ontario particularly, in regard to the forming of co-operatives in the sale of the agricultural products of pulpwood?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I have never heard anything of it at all.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister, in his opening remarks, said very little about this branch. I think this a very significant branch of the Department of Agriculture and it is significant in regard to the independent progress of farmers in this province.

I wonder if the hon. Minister would take a minute and explain to the House the functions of this branch and their anticipated programme for the future. If you notice, the estimated amount of money in regard to this branch is very small and it seems it is not termed as a significant branch of the department. I wonder if the hon. Minister would take time to explain to the House just what interest they have in this particular branch.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am not sure what the hon. member is driving at here. As far as the actual cost of operating the branch is concerned, it may not seem like a significant amount, but the fact remains that the co-operative branch really is in charge through the co-operative loans board, of the loans that are made to co-operatives in the province of Ontario. This last year there was nearly a million dollars worth of loans approved in the province of Ontario for co-operatives. And this brings the total—although I have not got it before me, oh, yes—at the end of 1963 there were total loans outstanding of $3.3 million to 105 different co-operatives in all parts of the province. In addition to this, there was a bank guarantee in effect or in force concerning four co-operatives in the total of $201,500. This is really the work of the co-operatives branch, in assisting co-operatives to finance their operations and carry on their affairs.

Mr. Gisborn: I did not get a complete answer. I would like the hon. Minister to explain to the House: what is the attitude of the department in regard to the co-operative function in the province?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this, Mr. Chairman. The attitude of the department is reflected in the fact that we have this many dollars out in assisting the co-operatives to carry on. As my deputy Minister points out, we doubled our loans in 1963 over 1962. In fact, twice as much money went out in 1963 as went out in 1962. I do not know what more the hon. member wants than this.

If the hon. member is asking for my opinion of co-operatives, I am all for them. I am a member of at least three co-operatives in my own area and deal with them regularly. I do not know whether the hon. member is hinting at me or the branch or what it is he is referring to, but in my humble opinion our co-operatives branch is available to be of assistance to any co-operative that wants assistance in the management or the operation of its affairs. But I think we must recognize the fact that the United Co-operatives of Ontario really provides a management service for a great many of our local co-operatives across the province and as such it is, in effect, providing expert advice and assistance to those various co-operatives. I do not know whether the hon. member wants us to go into every co-operative and breathe down the back of every one of them and say, "We are going to run your affairs for you." That is not my interpretation of how we should do things in the co-operatives branch. I feel that the co-operatives are an independent group of people and are, on the main, run very well. We are assisting them in providing this extension of credit to them.

Mr. Troy: Just one final question. The hon. Minister answered me earlier regarding this delegation which came to see him about price support. I can ask for that answer probably under another branch, sir. But if farmers want to form a co-operative—that is, the pulp farmers who operate in the winter time and certainly also in the summer time in cutting the pulpwood—to whom would they write in the department for information and the necessary procedures?

Mr. Sopha: Write to the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would be very glad to have that letter. And I assure the hon. member I would be very happy to give it my careful consideration and best advice.

I would say this—that I believe, with great respect, there is a misunderstanding by the hon. member for Nipissing. He is referring to his pulpwood cutters wanting to establish a co-operative. My humble opinion is—and after talking to them—that they want to establish a marketing plan for pulpwood and there is all the difference in the world between a co-operative and a marketing plan. If it is a marketing plan that they want to establish, they should then talk to the Farm Products Marketing Board and, I believe, they did this. I believe they came to meet with the board at one time. I know they talked to me about this. But if they want to form a co-operative, then our director of the co-operatives branch, Mr. O'Meara, who is here before me, would be the proper man for them to see. I understand that they have the federation of agriculture, of course, to assist them in this particular matter, if they want advice in this regard, but this is the best advice that I can give the hon. member on the information I have.

Mr. Troy: Some of them want to form a co-operative; at least they have asked me to find out information about it. I might as well get that answer now. When they asked the hon. Minister for the price support resolution, what was his answer to them? When this group came to see the department about the marketing plan board, and price support, did the hon. Minister tell them how they could do it or give them any indication that he would encourage such a board for these farmers?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Why, certainly. We are always ready. We have 37 plans in operation in Ontario now, I believe it is. This would be one more. They have to make the decision themselves as to whether they want to do this or not.

Mr. Troy: But they got some encouragement from the hon. Minister, that is all I wanted to know.

Vote 104 agreed to.

On vote 105:

Mr. Nixon: On vote 105, the Ontario milk inquiry committee has, of course, been meeting since the late months of 1961. It has been holding hearings in various parts of the province and, I understand, has completed its hearings and is presently at work on the report. Comparing this same committee with the one that has recently reported on the affairs of the tobacco industry, they were appointed under somewhat similar circumstances. The department was pressed for solutions at a time of considerable difficulty, and certainly one course of action that is a good one from the point of view of the hon. Minister is the appointment of a committee to look into the difficulties over a period of time. One never knows what will happen to the situation as time goes on. It so happens that the report of the tobacco committee came down at a rather inopportune time. But we are now discussing the dairy branch and the Ontario milk inquiry committee is in the process of completing its report at the present time.

A few months before this committee was struck, The Department of Agriculture had great concern for the milk industry. I know the hon. Minister is not keen to hear this again but in his own words he said it was approaching a state of chaos. Many milk farmers were in a state of serious concern over just what was going to happen to the industry. Now many months have passed and the situation has changed to some extent.

I would like the hon. Minister to comment to the House on his view of these changes in the industry. We were approaching chaos. None of us feels that it is quite this bad now. Just what is the situation in the milk industry in the view of the hon. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Brant I am sure is quite serious in what he is asking. I feel very keenly about the appointment of committees. I have been criticized in the past for appointing too many. But I make no apologies to anyone for having appointed committees, particularly this milk industry inquiry committee.

Mr. Nixon: It has been well accepted by the farmers.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I agree. I think it demonstrates the democratic process in action in perhaps as formidable a way as can be possibly demonstrated. It gives everyone the opportunity to meet the committee, and, as the hon. member has said, I have learned they are well accepted by the dairy industry itself.

Mr. Nixon: Just as the Stinson committee was very well accepted by the tobacco industry.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Very much so. Having said this, I believe that had we not taken the step to appoint this committee in order to get at the basis of the problems that are afflicting the dairy industry in this province, there might well have been a very much worsening situation. I feel very definitely, and I am not trying to be political at all, that the appointment of that committee was a stabilizing influence on the whole dairy picture in the province of Ontario today. It has brought people up to an awareness of the interdependence of the four dairy groups, one on the other, and I believe that if it had done nothing else to date, it has accomplished that.

As far as the dairy picture is concerned, there are varying opinions that might be expressed on it. I would say in fact that the change in the federal dairy policy last year had a very marked effect on the increased use of butter among the consumers of the province. This, of course, has had a stabilizing effect on another aspect of the industry, the fact that powder has moved out—and I am referring to skimmed milk powder—has moved out and is now in relatively short supply, comparatively speaking. I think all of this is indicative of the fact that there is an improvement in the dairy industry.

Of course, the fact that our population has increased and that our total number of dairy cows, particularly in Ontario, is decreasing, is an indication—although the amount of milk produced and our average production per cow is up—that there is not a great deal of difference in the total amount of milk produced; but it is an indication that the dairy situation in Ontario may not be quite as grave as it was a while ago. But still there remains the basic difference in the four groups, in the fact that they are not particularly working all together. As my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce suggested this afternoon, there should be one single marketing plan for milk, in his opinion.

Mr. Nixon: And in your opinion?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have not said anything about it.

Mr. Bukator: Do you not have an opinion?

Mr. Nixon: What about that?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have appointed the committee to bring in their findings on this and I am making no comment on it. My hon. friend suggests—and where he gets the information that the Hennessey report is being prepared is something that I do not know.

Mr. Nixon: I thought they had completed their hearings. I naturally assumed they would be doing something with the information.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I assume they will, too; but whether they are through having their hearings or not, I do not know. The hearings have been carrying on in recent weeks. I assume that they report and I hope that it will be available as soon as possible. I hope this is the case, but we have no knowledge to this effect at the moment.

Mr. Troy: I know that last July they were in Sudbury. Before that I believe they were in Fort William. I understand, sir, that when you answered the hon. member for Brant you would not make any comment but you know very well the attitude of the northern milk producers. They feel that they are subsidizing southern producers and they request subsidy exemption. That was the burden of the brief which they presented to that inquiry board.

It is reported that Arnold Spaul, whom very likely the hon. Minister knows—he is the vice-president of the Sudbury, Coppercliff and District Milk Producers Association—has said that we in the northern districts earnestly ask for exemption from any arrangements now in effect. And as you very well know, great quantities of butter and cheese and concentrated milk, and concentrated liquid milk, ice cream, and so on, dairy products, are all imported into northern Ontario from Quebec, Manitoba and southern Ontario.

The northern milk producers are requesting exemption from this subsidy, but I do not suppose the hon. Minister can give his comments now as he will wait until the committee makes its report.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, all I would say, Mr. Chairman, is that I am quite well aware of the problems that the hon. member has raised. We know they are of importance up there. I was just noticing the number of meetings that have been held, and the fact that the dairy inquiry committee started their hearings in northern Ontario. The first one was held at Kenora on July 15 and they go on through the list. I notice there are a great many. There is Fort William, Sudbury, Emo, Kirkland Lake. There may be others here but those are ones I noticed right at the top of the list. I think this is an indication of the appreciation of our department, and also of the inquiry committee, for the problems which do exist in the dairy industry in northern Ontario.

Mr. Troy: Thank you. By the way, did Judge Currey get any salary when he was on the milk board?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes; $5,000 a year plus expenses.

Mr. Troy: Where is that shown?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is in public accounts.

Mr. Troy: I noticed in the dairy branch that it shows as expenses, but does not give Judge Currey's name; oh, maybe—was he chairman last year?

Mr. Sopha: Is he still chairman?

Mr. Troy: No, he is retired but there is nothing—it was $5,000 though.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, $5,000.

Mr. Farquhar: Mr. Chairman, just one thing more on this dairy branch in this vote.

I was privileged to produce and carry briefs to three of these inquiries, and I have to commend the hon. Minister and this particular committee because it did a terrific job. Mr. Hennessey's committee, as far as I am concerned, was one of the best committees; it entertained and managed the inquiry in a very constructive way. We have to say that nothing but good recommendations can come out of this committee, because certainly everybody was heard and the meetings were conducted very properly.

I think the only thing we need to worry about from here on—and I am thinking of course from the standpoint of northern producers and I will not beat this, it has already been mentioned several times. I will only mention that dairying is at a standstill, and will never go any further in the north unless some recognition can be made of the change in classifications between concentrated, liquid concentrated, and fluid milk. This is a big question, and the hon. Minister knows more about it than I do so I will not go any further with that.

The only thing we need to worry about from here on, I would say, is the possibility of this particular inquiry, and its results as a committee, falling into discard, as have some committees. Because this is going to be a good inquiry and these are going to be good recommendations.

Vote 105 agreed to.

On vote 106:

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I want to direct an inquiry through you, sir, to the hon. Minister, in respect of this vote of $180,000 under item 5 of vote 106 with reference to northern Ontario, and to adopt the phraseology of my hon. friend from York South (Mr. MacDonald), I am somewhat puzzled, if not intrigued, by the fact that—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mystified?

Mr. Sopha: No, I am never mystified. The fact is that two years ago, in the vote year ending March 31, 1963, the amount allowed was $200,000; in the year ending March 31, 1964, it was cut to $180,000; and this year again it appears as $180,000. I wonder if this, in some small measure, denotes some degree of cynicism with the programme of land clearing in northern Ontario and the preparation of land for agricultural production.

Further, sir, an examination of the public accounts for the last period which were provided with that document, that is to say March 31, 1963, reveals under this heading—"Land clearing and breaking, subsidies to farmers and settlers, sundry persons"—$141,428.86. I wonder, sir, why the public accounts did not give the names of the persons who received the subsidies, and why at least it does not show in which districts in northern Ontario those subsidies were paid. It is always a very strange thing to me, Mr. Chairman—maybe some day I will be on the public accounts committee, if I stay around here long enough—that in some departments—I look at The Department of Public Welfare, I look through the book of The Department of Municipal Affairs, The Department of Highways—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: Well, I am just making a comparison, sir, and I see the most detailed information in respect to the names of persons and organizations to whom public monies are paid. I would say to you, sir, that to make a bald and meaningless statement under The Department of Agriculture, such as the one I have just read, a meaningless statement—"Land clearing and breaking, sundry persons," $141,448.86, whatever it is—really informs the hon. members of this House, I was going to say, very little. I prefer to say: not at all. The statement is so meaningless from the point of view of giving information about what was done with some $140,000 of public money.

But for myself, and I cannot say, sir, that I have travelled extensively about northern Ontario in recent years, but I am quite familiar with the eastern part of the area and I have not seen any tangible results of the expenditure of this money. I have no idea whatsoever how it is paid, how the persons are selected, what the principles and rules are in respect of its payment; therefore, through you, sir, I would invite the hon.

gentleman to make some brief explanation to us about the details of this grant and principally, more important, sir, what is intended to be achieved.

In line with my earlier remarks that I see a great future for the agricultural industry in the northern part of the province and I merely repeat, sir, and I do not seek to bore anyone by the repetition, but I feel it is important enough to repeat and underline it, that if the agricultural industry is not going to be located in northern Ontario some time in the future, I do not know where it is going to be located. More and more of the agricultural land in the southern part of the province comes out of production, giving way to urbanization and industrialization and increase in population. Most respectfully, sir, I would ask the hon. Minister to elucidate by way of an explanation of what the underlying foundation in respect of this grant is.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, may I answer the hon. member by referring him to page 109 of the report of the Minister of Agriculture that was tabled in this House some time ago? He will find a complete detailed statement, district by district, of the number of acres that was cleared and broken and the amount spent, the number of wells, and the subsidy paid thereon for every district in northern Ontario, for the year you have just mentioned. It totals to $141,428.86.

He refers to $180,000. The present structure of the grant system for northern Ontario is based on the applications from the respective areas under the approved grants that are set up for their respective reasons. Land clearing, well digging, and lime may apply in northern Ontario. This amounted last year to $180,000. It is in our estimates this year for $180,000. Actually what was spent because of the prolonged dry weather this fall and the good operating weather our machinists had up there—they were able to clear more land than they have for years—required an additional Treasury board order of $65,000. So in addition to the $180,000, we spent another $65,000, making it $245,000 that was spent in northern Ontario in 1963.

I welcome the opportunity, that my hon. friend has presented, to discuss this matter of northern Ontario grants. We have believed for some time in The Department of Agriculture that it should be local people who decide what they want to do with the money that is available to them. For this reason, we have completely revamped the policy in relation to northern Ontario grants.

In the future, and right now, as a matter of fact, this very day, in northern Ontario, our agricultural representatives are meeting with extension branch personnel right across northern Ontario, in order to set up the structure whereby local groups can be appointed in their respective districts who will decide how they want to spend the available money under the grants for northern Ontario.

We have said in the past to these people, "Here is so much money for land clearing, so much for digging wells, so much for lime." This is the—well, I might refer to it as a sort of straitjacket into which these grants are channelled. But they have not had the opportunity to decide themselves, "Well now, we want to do a certain project here this year. We would like to use all of this money. Maybe we do not need it for land clearing, we may not need it for digging wells, but we could use it for something else." Now these people will have the opportunity in these local committees, under the direction of the agricultural representative, who will be the co-ordinator of these committees, to advise our office here that looks after the northern Ontario grants, as to what they want to do with the money themselves.

It may be they want to complete a specific project this year. It may be that they will want to have a continuing grant provided, say, for fertilization subsidy, or for lime, that becomes necessary on certain lands. These local committees will also be used as advisory committees under the ARDA Act. They will be the committees that I was referring to a moment ago, when the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin was mentioning his ARDA interest in Manitoulin Island.

This committee will be the advisory committee to our directors. I would think that in some of the districts as well, the areas being as large as they are, it might require subcommittees to work under the central committee, that would be advisers to our northern Ontario branch. We think this is putting it right back at the grass roots level where the people really should be deciding how they want to use this money.

Mr. Sopha: I am very interested in what the hon. Minister says and the longer I live and, I hope, achieve greater maturity, the greater understanding that I develop in these matters.

I can tell the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, through you, that so far as I know, I am willing to admit the district of Sudbury—though perhaps I should guard my words with more care—is probably the poorest agricultural district in the whole province. I think that is so. There is no voice of agriculture, so to speak. There are no local committees. I asked the Ontario Federation of Agriculture as I have for the last three years, when it was going to establish a branch of the federation in the district of Sudbury and I am no more informed than three years ago, when I asked first. There is none. I think it is probably the only district in the province of Ontario that does not have an affiliate with the Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

In that district there are no farmers' organizations. I do not know who the hon. Minister speaks to. In that district there is one representative of The Department of Agriculture—just one, Mr. Lemieux, who has to take care of the whole district and for all I know, part of the district of Manitoulin or Algoma or Nipissing also, in addition to his duties in Sudbury. That is the state of agriculture, and as long as you spend $180,000—Let me stop there.

I am interested that under this vote, salaries you will note, amount to almost $2 million, the largest item on the vote. Two million dollars, and then a piddling amount of $180,000 or approximately one tenth of the amount for salaries is allocated to the development of agriculture in northern Ontario.

Let me go on to what I was going to say, and that is this. I would suggest you do something about the establishment of a fertilizer plant, for example, in northern Ontario. I think I am correct in saying there is none, at least in northeastern Ontario. All of it is imported from southern Ontario.

I always thought that part of the riding of my friend from Algoma-Manitoulin, that is to say Manitoulin Island, Mr. Chairman, consisted of solid limestone. I thought it was solid limestone. I have been over there many times and you see the great limestone quarries. There may be different types of limestone. I am not a geologist. But to me as a layman, limestone means limestone and yet The Department of Agriculture does not go to Manitoulin Island and truck the limestone for agricultural use. No, where does it come from? It comes from the Niagara peninsula, down near Hamilton or Welland or some place. The Department of Agriculture pays 75 per cent subsidy to truck it into northern Ontario. Maybe I will be informed that the limestone at Manitoulin Island is not suitable for agricultural purposes, but I would be surprised if there are varying types of limestone if it is crushed up. After all, the only purpose of limestone as far as I can see in agricultural land, and I use it myself, is to alkalize the soil. If the soil has too high an acid content you put the limestone on to alkalyze it. Do not ask me what alkalyze means because I am not sure that I know.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): It sweetens it up.

Mr. Sopha: Sweetens it up. I bow to the hon. member's superior wisdom, knowing as I do that he comes from one of the better agricultural areas of the province. However, limestone is limestone, and as I say, they do not bring it from Manitoulin Island, they bring it from down in the Niagara peninsula some place and pay 75 per cent.

There is no artificial insemination station in the district of Sudbury. Once I picked up a publication of his department because I was interested in the subject. The book said: "Artificial insemination stations are strategically located so as to serve every area of the province." I remember the very words. I would almost take an affidavit that those were the words in the book—"strategically located." Let me repeat: "So as to serve every area of the province."

Nonsense! Complete and utter nonsense!

There is no artificial insemination station to serve the district of Sudbury. Every other area of the province may have one. But if you want to improve the quality of your herd, in Sudbury—I wonder if the hon. gentleman would stand apart so I can look at the hon. Minister so I can convince him—if you want to improve the quality of your herd in the district of Sudbury, then you get a private entrepreneur to come and inseminate your cattle. He charges you $10 for the insemination plus 10 cents a mile both ways. If he has to come back twice, then your investment—and I can tell from personal experience—for that calf, if it survives, is $55 to $65.

As the hon. Minister well knows, perhaps the inseminator—if that is what he is called—will have to come back three times. You get free services, the second two paying the mileage only.

Well, I myself—and perhaps I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to refer to my own experience as it may be typical of others—I have paid as high as $75 for the insemination of a cow and then, I hesitate, it grieves me to report, sir, that having paid it, the calf died.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): It would be cheaper to buy a bull.

Mr. Sopha: I have one, too. He is like the hon. Minister of Health, he is a Scottish bull.

I have pointed out three areas, three areas in which agriculture in northeastern Ontario seeks assistance. The first two of them much more important, and the first one the most important of all. That is, the establishment—and I have to be wary of the Chicago gang up here when I say it—the first one, that is to say the establishment of the fertilization plant is by far and away the most important, because that probably is the most expensive single item, hauling fertilizer from southern Ontario into the north in order that the lands may be enriched.

So finally, to sum up and to go back to where I began, the $180,000 a year is never going to be more than the veritable drop in the bucket to the improvement of agriculture in northeastern Ontario as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Spence: The hon. member for Sudbury was talking about fertilizer. From time to time we meet people from the United States who hand us papers, daily newspapers advertising fertilizers at half the price that they are in the province of Ontario. Has there been any study or any effort on the part of the department to find out why the cost of fertilizer is so high in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have heard nothing about the cost of fertilizer from anywhere else. I do not know what article the hon. member is referring to. There is a fertilizer advisory committee set up and working under The Department of Agriculture. But it has nothing to do with price as far as I know.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to furnish the hon. Minister with a daily or weekly newspaper which quotes the price of fertilizer in the United States, and also I could give him quotations from the province of Ontario. Not tonight, but give me a day.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I am not sure how we got on to the subject of fertilizer here, because I thought it was coming in a later estimate. However, since we are here and since you have allowed it, I am going to direct a question to the hon. Minister.

The current issue of the Financial Post gives us a picture of what we are facing.

We all know what has happened across the water where the Russian agriculture has run into a serious problem; to our benefit actually, but evidently this continent is facing something of the same problem. A recently completed market survey for one of the big manufacturers shows demand during the next decade rising at a steady 45 degree angle. This is particularly applicable to western Canada, but if it happens there, then we are going to face the same problem here.

So we are told in the headlines of this article: "Millions on the move in fertilizer boom." In the west several companies are moving into the manufacture of fertilizer. The problem we face here, Mr. Chairman, is that if this is a fact—and evidently it is—that around the world we are coming into this problem of adequate supplies of fertilizer.

If this is so as far as Canada is concerned, and a scarcity emerges, then of course prices are bound to rise. The farmers of Ontario may well face rising fertilizer costs before too long. If this is true, then has the hon. Minister given any consideration to this whole problem and has any step been taken to encourage the increase of production in this field?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. member were aware of the number of fertilizer plants that are going up across the province of Ontario today, he would not have much concern about whether or not there is going to be sufficient outlets for fertilizer, regardless of what the demand may be. I have never in my lifetime witnessed such an expansion of fertilizer outlets as is taking place across this province. They have gone up all over the area.

Mr. Gisborn: Why did not the hon. Minister tell us this in his report?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: What report? What necessity is there for me to tell you this specific thing in my report? Now, can the hon. member tell me, should I tell him everything that happens in the province of Ontario? I am giving hon. members the information right now and if the hon. member were aware, half as much as he thinks he is, of what is going on in rural Ontario, he would know that right now.

The hon. member for Yorkview, sir, suggests we should be doing something about this. It has never been the purpose of the government to develop plants—

Mr. Gisborn: The hon. Minister is the only one who knows everything—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not pretend to know everything. I admitted this afternoon I do not know everything, but this is one thing I do know.

Mr. Gisborn: I did not either.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: But one thing I do know is that there are a very great many of these fertilizer plants going up across the province.

Mr. Young: Then could I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman?

The farm movement after the war, of course, was greatly concerned when the nitrate industry particularly was transferred back to private companies; but the question I would like to ask is are the co-operatives of Ontario participating in this field of production of fertilizer, as well as distribution, today?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think they are. I am not sure whether they are the largest, but they are one of the largest fertilizer manufacturers in Ontario—United Co-operatives has a very large fertilizer manufacturing plant, with a wide distribution.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, the Nipissing Federation of Agriculture, and also those who are interested in agriculture in north-eastern Ontario, in addition to the transportation of lime, also hope that the hon. Minister would in some way—through the railroads, the Northern Ontario railroad and the other railroads—assist us in getting the same subsidy as there is on lime.

I understand that there is a subsidy on soya beans. There is a subsidy on corn. We in northern Ontario have been asking time and again for a subsidy on chemical fertilizer; that is in freight rates, on special freight rates, through the Ontario Northland Railway. I repeat that again, as I have done before.

In regard to the hon. Minister's farm safety programme—again, I have brought this point up before since there are so many, in eastern Ontario anyway, and certainly in the district of Nipissing, in the western district, they are all French-Canadians; there are a great number of farmers up in Cochrane North and Cochrane South and Timiskaming. In the hon. Minister's farm safety programme, I am sure it would be a very good thing if he had those booklets and—at least the literature and the illustrative material—if also it could be printed in the French language.

The last thing is, sir, the replacement for the late Mr. Beaudry who was appointed some time last summer—I believe in August—as a representative of the department. Has an appointment been made yet to replace him?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We have made a recommendation. It has not yet been approved by the Cabinet, but we have made a recommendation.

Mr. Troy: What about the suggestion, then in regard to those, you know—the illustrated material you have for farm safety? Do you not think it would be quite valuable if they were also printed in the French language?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I understand that it is done locally.

Mr. Troy: Locally?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Troy: All right. What about the material that you send out? Who pays for it locally?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: By the department funds locally.

Mr. Troy: Through the department.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Troy: Right-o.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister, based on page A-19 of the public accounts of the province, questioning how the funds to the various counties are allocated. As a new member I should certainly like to know, and possibly some of the other new members would: Is this based on the number of acres of land in a county, the state of development of a county, or the type of agriculture carried on in the county?

I ask the hon. Minister this question because I note that Essex county received $21,854.14 for this programme for the purpose of services, expenses, equipment, county and district offices, and to pay such expenses for the encouragement—and I wish to underline that—encouragement to agriculture as directed by the Minister. I note that 22 counties have received up to 50 per cent more finances than has Essex county and I question why Essex county receives this average amount when we are possibly the leading agricultural county in the province, with greater diversification, greater investment, and possibly the most complicated farming, in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member, and rightly so, has a very high opinion of his native area. I suppose all hon. members are inclined to do this. The budget for each county is set up directly related to the agricultural activities within that county served by the office so established.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, returning for a moment to the fertilizer question; if, as the hon. Minister states, there is a rather spectacular mushrooming of fertilizer plants all across the province, what explanation has he for the fact that they are not emerging in northern Ontario where there have been, for years, complaints about the costs and pleas for subsidization of rail costs to get it up there? Why is none emerging in the north country?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I believe, and I am only speaking on what I would assume to be the reason because I am not in the fertilizer business, but I assume that the fertilizer companies are building their plants and their distribution areas, their bulk mixing plants, in the areas where they can do a volume of business. The volume of business, I would assume, throughout southern Ontario, would indicate that there was a market there that perhaps does not appear at the present time. It presents itself in northern Ontario. However, I would think that if United Co-Operators of Ontario, who are very great producers of fertilizer, felt that there was a necessity for opening a plant in northern Ontario where co-operators are in effect—and we have very many active co-operators in northern Ontario—this would be an excellent opportunity for them to establish a plant right in the area and serve the local needs. I think it is based on the prospective potential market.

Mr. Young: Could we ask the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, through you, regarding raw materials in northern Ontario for fertilizer: are there deposits there which an industry such as this could be based upon, or do they have to bring in all the raw materials?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, the answer would have to be, "No". To my knowledge, the limestone which is available there is not suitable. It is not—and I am using a technical term here—soluble, that is, that it would reduce the acidity of land which might require it to perform that proper function. I do not think there are fertilizer materials available in northern Ontario. There are, in western Canada, outstanding potash deposits.

Mr. Farquhar: Mr. Chairman, I think that by the number of times northern Ontario has been mentioned here it must become evident to the hon. Minister that something needs to be done in northern Ontario in connection with agriculture. I imagine the hon. Minister knows that I have a resolution on the order paper to do with a northern agricultural school. I had a few pages ready on that but I do not want to dwell on it tonight. I would like to mention it under this extension branch, under extension funds.

I was privileged to go over to Guelph with a group two weeks ago and I enjoyed looking through the facilities there; they are very elaborate, they are very commendable, and a marvellous institution I must say; but we have to find some way to extend or project this knowledge, and these technical advantages, into northern Ontario. We have heard several things to do with the possibility, the idea, that the area is pretty well finished. I would like to talk about—a little later, not on this vote—the turkey business which is about to fold up on Manitoulin Island and which this government has a stake in at this point.

However, beef grazing is something else, and beef can be raised in Manitoulin Island, providing the people are taught and encouraged how to do it. This is what is lacking in the area, regardless of what the hon. members have to say about the needs for northern Ontario. The young people have left the area because they have been disillusioned and discouraged, and they are not going to come back until they are shown a future for agriculture; and the only way they are going to be shown a future is by education.

The hon. Minister knows that farming in this day and age is a technical business. It is not a matter of cutting hay, piling it away in the barn, and feeding it and selling the produce. There is an awful lot more to it than that, and this knowledge is not available to people in the north. This is their basic trouble, and they will not come back to the farm until they have been satisfied there is a future in farming, and they will not be satisfied with a future in farming until they have learned and have been taught about the potential, also until they have access to elementary bookkeeping in connection with agriculture, which is absolutely necessary in this day and age. And the farmers in the north at this point certainly cannot afford—oh, maybe the odd few, the odd one, will find themselves in Guelph or in Kemptville, but certainly not in numbers—and they will not until some type of institution is placed in their midst, and some degree of interest shown in their welfare and their future. Until that happens, thousands and thousands of acres of the best land in Ontario is going to just lie dormant growing grass.

I will not go any further with this now because I do, as I say, have a resolution I want to speak to later on. I am a little afraid that this resolution will not come until pretty late in the session and this is my reason for wanting to get it in tonight.

I wish the hon. Minister would comment.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, there is a continuing effort being made on behalf of our agricultural representatives, our home economists, to assist the young people of northern Ontario in every aspect that can possibly be imagined—increasing their interest in 4-H clubs, and the development of their interest in youth training programmes having to do with agriculture, through our extension branch service. The fact that my hon. friend from Sudbury mentioned a while ago—he is not in his seat now—he inferred that only $180,000 was spent. That is only a part of the money. That is only a part of the grants which go to northern Ontario. There was nothing said about all the agricultural representative services, the home economists; they are there, the farm management people who do provide a service there.

I have been through the north. I know this, because I have been with our agricultural representatives in every one of the districts in northern Ontario. I have been out to see the farmers. I have talked to the farmers and I know that my hon. friend paints a pretty black picture. There is a great deal of interest in agriculture in northern Ontario and I believe that, as time goes on, the necessity for the further development of this agriculture will make itself so abundantly clear that we will have a very definite development of agriculture there.

But I think my hon. friend would be the first to agree that we must recognize the limitations as far as climate is concerned in northern Ontario. That is, the land in my opinion can grow an enormous amount of grass and hay, but I think it has certain limitations in other crops that are growing now.

Mr. Troy: They grow the best potatoes in the world, champion—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Very true, that is very true in particular areas, but I am talking about the vast general overall area of that great country. No question about it. My hon. friend's riding had the world's champion potatoes in northern Ontario just last year at the Royal Winter Fair. This is quite true, but I think that generally my hon. friend would agree with that, and we must recognize those limitations. I will be very happy to discuss this resolution when the time comes, when it is called on the order paper.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in this vote I notice that the farm safety programme this year has been reduced by $5,000. Is that a curtailment of the programme or is the hon. Minister satisfied with the programme as it has been carried out in the past?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: My hon. friend says it is no longer in the estimates. It is no longer in the estimates as a grant. Is this what you said?

Mr. Newman: No, I said the farm safety programme has been reduced by $5,000. Is that a curtailment of the programme that has been carried out in the past, as a result of the hon. Minister's findings that the programme probably was sufficient, was satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It has not been reduced by $5,000. It is $5,000 in the main grant, but you will find, I believe, back under the main office it says, "plus $20,000 in extension," so there has been no reduction whatever. It is just simply incorporated as an association and now gets a main grant of $5,000, I believe it is, under vote 101.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am referring specifically to vote 106, item 6, farm safety programme estimates 1964-65, $20,000, and estimates 1963-64, where farm safety is $45,000.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: There was no main grant last year. It was $25,000 last year. This year it is $20,000 for farm safety programme grants and expenses. I think, if my hon. friend turns back, he will find under main office that there should be a grant, "Ontario Farm Safety Council, $5,000". That is on page 8 of the same estimates.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am not talking about a previous vote, I am talking about this vote. This is the vote that has been reduced by $5,000.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, supporting what the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin has said, I cannot understand the argument of the hon. Minister. Every other district, I think, every other county in Ontario, has an agricultural representative. There are 4-H clubs and farm forums and all sorts of clubs all across the province. In the area of southwestern Ontario, we have the agricultural school at Ridgetown. Over in eastern Ontario we have an agricultural school at Kemptonville. But there is nothing in northern Ontario. You had an agricultural school there at one time, up at Montith, years ago. I certainly think, as has been pointed out by a number of hon. members here and as has been pointed out in this House in years past, that as the industrial areas of southern Ontario spread farther and farther out, we are going to need the land. I certainly think, sir, that great consideration should be given to, if not a junior college, some sort of an agricultural school, comparable to Kemptville and comparable to Ridgetown. In the area in that section of Nipissing in the Verner area, they have very fine agricultural land. It would be an ideal spot for an agricultural school and I urge the hon. Minister to consider it deeply. The hon. Prime Minister is here tonight and he has heard these arguments and I am sure that in his good judgment he will approve of our recommendation.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 106 agreed to.

Vote 107 agreed to.

Vote 108 agreed to.

On vote 109:

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, under vote 109, marketing plans. The federal government introduced a two-price system for marketing of eggs. Some time ago I was in the hon. Minister's office and he informed me that this is a federal matter entirely. But, of course, many discussions come up. Of course there is no other province that has introduced this two-price system for marketing of eggs except the province of Ontario, which has indicated to me that the hon. Minister of Agriculture for this province must have given his nod to the federal government to use the province of Ontario for the introduction of this new pricing of eggs.

There is some complaint. Of course there are many, many in favour of this new pricing of eggs, but there is still a lot of opposition. Some of the opposition is that the spot price of eggs is advertised in the paper and on the radio but crate prices of eggs are not advertised whatsoever. A carton of eggs is not advertised whatsoever. There seems to be a great misunderstanding among some of the residents, so that the two prices should be advertised in the papers so they would know what each price is. I wonder if the hon. Minister could outline to me why the two prices are not advertised in the paper?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to set the hon. member straight, through you, when he suggests that I gave the nod to the present pricing system of eggs. I would like to inform him that the present government at Ottawa never even mentioned to me that it was going to change the pricing method of eggs until it was implemented, and did not even then. We had absolutely nothing to do with that method of pricing eggs nor the method of reporting the pricing of eggs whatever.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on vote 109, just before we leave that. I have a question on the order paper having to do with the sales of surplus tobacco and the prices that the marketing board has received for the tobacco it has already sold. I understand that naturally, sir, there might be some reluctance to answer the question and I would respect the good judgment of the hon. Minister in that. But might I ask him if the question is going to be answered or does he feel that perhaps it should be held over for other reasons?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I must respect the very good, wise judgment of the hon. member for Brant when he suggested there might be reasons he thinks it should be held. This is the very reason I did not answer the question. I feel that there is a very great deal of tobacco left to sell and I would like to see us get it sold, but I do not want to embarrass either the buyers or the previous buyers. I think we will get along very well this way.

Mr. Nixon: But eventually we will get the information?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: You certainly will. I want to get the tobacco sold.

Mr. MacDonald: In that connection, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. Minister referring to sales in Canada or international sales?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: International sales; that is where the tobacco has gone, it has been sold. There was none of that surplus tobacco sold in Canada to my knowledge. It has all been sold export as far as I know.

Vote 109 agreed to.

Vote 110 agreed to.

On vote 111:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, in connection with vote 111, I think something is happening which is rather healthy as far as the herds of this province are concerned. TB is pretty well disappearing now. The brucellosis, Bang's disease, is on the way out.

But I noticed, sir, on page 177 of the report that there is one district remaining without the necessary petition here, and I think the hon. Minister perhaps should call to the attention of the two hon. members from Cochrane that they should get busy to get the necessary petition under way, and thus complete, as I understand it, the districts for the Bang's disease programme.

The one matter which the hon. Minister mentioned a little while ago which I think would bear a bit more elaboration was the matter of mastitis. I noticed that in the report of the agricultural research institute some tests have been carried on during the past year, some rather significant tests. A little while ago, Mr. Chairman, in response to a question by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, the hon. Minister mentioned that a mastitis programme was going to be undertaken. I wonder if this might be elaborated upon. What kind of a programme is envisaged and how extensive might that programme be, because there is a very great deal of interest in this among farmers across the province?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I believe there are two questions the hon. member has raised. First of all, he has mentioned the matter of one district in northern Ontario not being covered as far as TB eradication is concerned. We have recently—

Mr. Young: Bang's disease.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Did I say TB? I am sorry, it is the brucellosis control programme.

This has now been accomplished as far as the agreement with Ottawa is concerned. I asked the hon. Minister of Agriculture for Canada to implement the programme in the Cochrane district and this I have just received approval of last week from the federal Minister, so this is under way.

Now as far as the mastitis control programme is concerned, I have no objection to elaborating on this, but the hon. member will find it recorded in Hansard where I explained before the orders of the day in detail the programme as it will be adopted and implemented across the province of Ontario. This was done about two or three weeks ago. It is in Hansard.

Mr. Young: I am sorry, sir, thank you.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member for Yorkview has mentioned the matter of the mastitis programme, I would just like to say that this, I believe, is the best evidence we can offer that the hon. Minister and this government have in mind the welfare of agriculture, this recent announcement by the hon. Minister that the government will institute a province-wide programme to control mastitis in the dairy herds of this province. I think the hon. Minister and the officials of his department, who have made a study of the inroads of this disease, are to be congratulated on the adoption of the policy that in time to come will bring about the elimination of a problem that for a great number of years has been of concern to the dairy farmers of Ontario.

Representing as I do a constituency that represents one of the chief dairy sections of this province, from both the producer and consumer standpoint, I am fully aware of the economic loss that is entailed as a result of mastitis. When one considers that the loss in all of Canada is between $25 million and $30 million a year, you come to realize that the loss to each county is of no inconsiderable sum; a sum that, in these days of high cost of production, producers and agriculturists as a whole cannot afford to lose.

This problem, which affects the dairy industry, is a problem that is also of indirect concern to the consumers. According to the latest figures available, over 41 million quarts of fluid milk were sold by dairies in my constituency last year. This figure does not take into consideration the large volume that goes into chocolate drinks, skim milk, buttermilk or cream. While milk consumed by the public is not affected by the disease as a result of pasturization, the Ontario consumer has grown to appreciate the high standard of Ontario farm products and will, I am sure, express approval of this most recent step on the part of The Department of Agriculture to ensure the quality of the food reaching his table.

It is gratifying to know that the programme designed to eradicate this disease will be on a province-wide basis. The dairy industry cannot afford the loss of production due to this problem and cannot as individuals combat the ravages of this disease.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, this is just another instance of the concern of the hon. Minister of Agriculture for the welfare of agriculture and the consuming public.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may, while I am on my feet, I would like to refer to item 11, which is The Meat Inspection Act. I listened with great interest this afternoon to the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, sir, when he discussed this matter. I would like to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I believe it is a very important subject and one which recently received consideration by the standing committee on agriculture. At this meeting of the committee we had the opportunity of meeting with some 200 or more smaller slaughterhouse operators in connection with the proposed compulsory meat inspection to begin on January 1, 1965.

Concern expressed by the small slaughterhouse operators was not with the regulations as proposed, but with the interpretation which they feared might be placed on the regulations by the inspectors of the health of animals division of The Canada Department of Agriculture. The House will appreciate that the agreement reached between The Ontario Department of Agriculture and The Canada Department of Agriculture, whereby the inspection of these small slaughterhouse operators not presently under inspection, will be carried out by The Canada Department of Agriculture inspectors. As well, misunderstanding could arise with the consumers if competition developed between the stores on the basis of federal versus provincial inspections.

However, Mr. Chairman, I would like to emphasize that great care and adequate action must be taken to ensure that the interpretation placed by The Canada Department of Agriculture inspectors on the provincial regulations and on their own regulations, becomes realistic and practical.

I believe that there is sufficient evidence to show that at least some of the inspectors sent out by the health of animals division at Ottawa are operating on a very high altitude, on cloud nine; and unless their rarefied interpretations become more realistic, they will force unnecessary and impractical costs upon a great many of our small slaughterhouse operators and this province will lose many of these small businesses which are performing such an essential and important service to all of our communities.

Mr. Chairman, The Canada Department of Agriculture inspectors have been dealing with larger plants, with plants involved in inter-provincial trade and with voluntary movement of plants into inspection. Many of the inspectors, I am advised, have been moved directly from graduation as veterinarians to these inspection jobs and I feel, without doubting their sincerity of purpose, that they have become idealistic and impractical in the interpretation which they place on their own regulations.

The health of animals division has a circular which is given to these inspectors and which is also given to plants which apply for inspection. This circular specifies the heights of ceilings, heights of walls, dressing facilities, office space for inspectors, and so on. I would suggest that possibly many of these so-called interpretations placed on these regulations in this circular should actually be part of the regulations and the decision of the hon. Minister and the Cabinet at Ottawa, and not the conclusions of federal civil servants.

These are interpretations which affect the livelihood of small businesses in this province and these interpretations, in all fairness, should not be left, to the extent they apparently are, to the civil service administration.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make it perfectly clear, and emphasize as a livestock man and farmer, that I am convinced that the meat must be slaughtered, and handled, and go forward to the consumer, in the cleanest possible way. To do this, there are basic facilities required. On the other hand, the attitude and the ability of the operator is most important. We have today in our communities, large homes with all the fancy gadgets you can imagine. We have small and simple homes with nothing but the essentials. Whether or not that is a good home which brings forward a good family, and whether it is clean, depends upon the attitude of the parents and not upon the fancy expensive gadgets, nor upon its size.

I suggest that the same situation is true in our meat industry and I would contend that, with limited but practical facilities, our smallest slaughterhouse operators can turn out just as good a product and, in some cases, a better product than some of the larger plants.

I am pleased to know that The Ontario Department of Agriculture is having meetings with The Canada Department of Agriculture, and that these meetings are going on now. I know the hon. Minister, with all his knowledge—and I have outlined and want to assure him that, in this particular problem, I will go all the way in helping him in any way I can, to ensure that this policy is practical and that good common sense is used in the treatment of these small slaughterhouse operators, so that the vast majority of them continue to fulfill the essential role they now occupy in this province.

Mr. Chairman, may I turn to a subject which, as a result of recent publicity in the press, has captured the attention of many households of this province? I refer to the manufacture and sale of pet foods, and reports that some of them, to say the least, are of dubious quality. I believe that the subject has previously been raised in this House, but recent reports indicate that now would appear to be the time to take some action or make some recommendation on the subject.

Mr. Chairman: What item are you speaking on now?

Mr. W. E. Johnston: In Canada, at the present time, there are no governmental controls in the manufacturing or the labelling of pet food.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. W. E. Johnston: The contents of the usually attractively labelled can is mostly known only to the manufacturer. Until recently, the average person has been inclined to overlook the importance in relation to the health and impact it has on our economy. Health should be the first consideration, because pets are the constant companions of our children, whose health we earnestly strive to safeguard. From the economy standpoint, pets play an increasingly important role; and the estimated value of dog and cat food sales in Ontario is between $7 million and $8 million.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The question that I asked quite some time ago, pertaining to this very subject, I was told came under Treasury, vote 2301, item 9, so I was asked to lay off until the Treasury Board report came in. I hate to have this hon. member steal my thunder.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: According to many well-informed sources, there are well over 1,000 kennels operating in Canada with approximately 60 per cent of them located in Ontario. In addition to the sale of pet food, another contributing factor in the economy is the provision of materials for the housing and supply of maintenance care for training of our pets. Yes, dogs and cats especially are playing an increasingly important role in our economic studies. At present it is estimated that it is a $15 million industry and that, within the next ten years, it might well double in volume.

Farmers and livestock men have long been associated with dogs and cats, with many of them working partners in the operation of their farms. This is all true, my friends.

It is also interesting to note the heavy concentration of pets in urban areas and their close association with the family, particularly the children. Medical science tells us that the family pet has therapeutic value, in the case of many children who otherwise would be emotionally disturbed. The companionship afforded by a pet has often brought an overly-shy child out of a social shell.

Mr. Sopha: Woof, woof!

Mr. W. E. Johnston: This close association is not without its problems, and when it was drawn to my attention that dog food was not inspected, that in some cases the content was unknown, I felt that it was time some attention was paid to this situation. The subject of some form of control over the manufacture of pet food is one that is being heard with increasing frequency particularly with the Kennel Club and cat fancier group, humane societies, veterinarians, and within the industry itself.

In the United States, a variety of laws have been established by the various states, with the result that there has been little conformity in the controls. This has resulted in a considerable amount of confusion on the part of buyers and manufacturers alike.

I would suggest that in Canada the main objective to invoke controls in pet foods would be to afford the purchaser an opportunity to know what he was purchasing. At the present time the purchaser has no way of determining the quality or the origin of the ingredients, particularly as far as the meat portion is concerned.

It is my conviction that both the public and the manufacturer could be safeguarded by controls or regulated labelling. This could come about by having only the factual statements on the label of the can or the container. A proper ingredient listing, and an indication of the origin of the meat and the meat by-products contained in the package, would provide some protection to both the purchaser and the family pet.

I would suggest that this House recommend to the proper authorities that some study be given the problem by the federal authorities and that some system of Canada-wide inspection be instituted which would safeguard our children and the health of our pets.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to the Act which the hon. member for Carleton spoke about, The Ontario Meat Inspection Act which will be in effect in 1965. As the House knows, this Act does not apply to the area north of the district of Parry Sound. In Sudbury, last Saturday night, according to a press dispatch, the director of the Sudbury district health unit, Dr. J. B. Cook, referred to this fact. He is quoted as saying that what he is afraid of is that animals that failed to pass inspection in southern Ontario slaughterhouses will be shipped up north and there will be nothing we can do about it. Of course I do not think we are at all afraid that the meat that is slaughtered in northern Ontario will be bad meat, but what we are concerned about is meat that is slaughtered here and does not pass the inspection, will be shipped north. What precautions will the department take to ensure that such a situation does not develop?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I saw that article, in fact I have it here somewhere on the desk. "Fear bad meat will go north"—this is what my hon. friend is referring to? To my way of thinking this is a very far-fetched statement that is meant to cause concern in an area it will never happen in. I would like to assure the people of Sudbury and northern Ontario that there will be no fear whatever of this kind of thing happening.

In the first place there is very little meat that goes into Sudbury that is not now inspected in federal health-of-animals plants. This is because the large suppliers in the interprovincial trade bring their meat supplies into northern Ontario largely from western Canada, as a matter of fact, and everything that crosses provincial boundaries must be inspected. There is no danger whatever. To me, it is most unfortunate that such a statement as that be made.

Mr. Troy: I did not make the statement, sir.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I quite agree.

Mr. Troy: I just wanted the assurance from you, sir. Of course the meat that we get from the farmers up there now is passed as very good meat. Thank you very much for your information.

What about this question on number 13, compensation for damage by hunters? The department compensates the farmer for damage. Do you then charge the hunter and get the money from him, or from whom?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We certainly would, if we could find the fellow who is responsible. There is the real problem: to find him and get a conviction. This is the problem and unfortunately we have not been able to do this yet, but I hope we will.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I fear that the hon. Minister may share the views of the hon. member for Carleton when in the words of the hon. member, he feels that the federal inspectors are on cloud 9 in their impractical application of the regulations for federal meat inspection. This was certainly brought home to those of us who were present at the agriculture committee meeting when this was discussed. We were assured time and again that the regulations which do pertain to federal inspection would not be applied in precisely the wording of the regulations, but would be in a sense changed to fit the special conditions for meat inspection in Ontario. This happened on several occasions, and at least once the chief veterinarian representing the federal inspection branch was at variance with the hon. Minister of Agriculture in his views of how these small slaughterhouses would carry on this activity.

I feel that this is a very serious problem that the hon. Minister must face. He is in a position of paying the piper and he is not in the position of calling the tune, because the "Canada Approved" stamp is very jealously guarded by the health-of-animals branch. I am sure it will not put itself in a position where its standards are in any way watered down at the request of the hon. Minister of Agriculture of Ontario.

I personally do not feel that the present plan is going to result in unified meat inspection across Canada or in Ontario. I would like the hon. Minister's views again on the subject.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to express my views. First of all, I did not say that the federal people were floating around on cloud 9.

Mr. Nixon: I said I felt that you did by your actions in committee the other day.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Oh well, I am sorry that you took that interpretation out. I can assure my hon. friend that as far as the health of the animal is concerned in inspections prior to slaughter and the inspection of the animal during slaughter and the inspection and stamping of the carcass following slaughter, that the inspection and the requirements of inspection and the standards of health and of the carcass will be identical, whether it is in a small slaughter plant or whether it is in one of the large packing houses that now enjoy the federal inspection.

The thing I think my hon. friend is concerned with, certainly we are concerned with, is the interpretation of regulations by the health-of-animals branch of The Meat Inspection Act of Ottawa. The difference that my hon. friend is talking about is in the requirements that inspectors may suggest should be made in small slaughterhouses as to heights of ceilings, the requirements of an office for the inspector, and the requirements of shower and washroom facilities, when in fact the plant may only be used a part of a day once a week, or something like this. These are things that I think we must take into consideration and be realistic in the interpretation of those regulations.

It is for this reason that our deputy Minister, our livestock commissioner and the officials of our department met with Dr. Wells, the Veterinary Director-General, and the senior members of his staff that will be in charge of meat inspection in Ontario, just last week. We were trying to get a realistic interpretation of those regulations with absolutely no thought whatever of there being any difference in the standard of inspection, but that there be some relinquishing of the requirements that might be put in for a man if he were building a new plant, to say that he should have ceilings of a certain height and he should have a washroom and a shower and an office and all these things for inspectors.

This is not necessary and Dr. Wells has made it abundantly clear to us that his interpretations of these regulations are at some variance with some of the people who have gone out through the province and have suggested, as someone suggested here today, I believe it was my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce, that there should be at least a minimum of 12 employees in the plant.

Dr. Wells made it abundantly clear the other day that there did not have to be any more employees in the plant than the operator himself. There was no minimum requirement whatever. These are the things we are trying to get straightened out. My hon. friend can rest assured, and the people of the province of Ontario can rest assured, that there will be one standard of meat in the province of Ontario as far as inspection is concerned when this Act comes into force.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly not one standard of slaughterhouse facilities. I would like to ask about the $50,000 that we are presently voting for the implementation of meat inspection. Will you begin to spend this as of January 1, 1965 or will there be expenditures before that time?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, there is no claim on it yet. This will be applied to the meat inspection as it is required, when the Act comes into force January 1, 1965.

Mr. Nixon: But is it not true that the federal inspection service will have to take on a much larger staff in order to prepare for this? It is hardly realistic to expect these people to be paid from the federal Treasury up until January 1, nor is it reasonable to expect these people to wait in the wings until January 1. There has to be some accommodation.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is a decision of Ottawa as to when they start. Our Act comes into force on January 1 next and that is when our agreement starts.

Mr. Spence: May I ask the hon. Minister a question along this line? Since this meat inspection Act has been discussed, a large number of those in the slaughtering of livestock would like to have one of the inspectors from the department visit each plant or a large number of plants to tell them what they would have to do in order to comply with the regulations that will be set down. Will there be men available to visit these different places to advise them shortly?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As soon as we can get this agreement on the interpretation of the regulations. Then I would say that the interpretation of those regulations will be provided to those people who operate those plants. This is our urgency in getting this done as quickly as possible.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask what this item 12 relates to—grants to beef improvement associations?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This grant relates to the Ontario Beef Improvement Association and the Commercial Cattlemen's Association in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: Once again may I point out that we do not seem to see anything in northern Ontario, peculiarly in my district, of any activities of these people. I did not get an answer earlier about the artificial insemination station. I did not even get an acknowledgment that there is a publication which does say that these stations are strategically located throughout Ontario to serve every area of the province. For that matter, I did not hear anything about the limestone, either.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, if the hon. member had stayed in his seat he would have heard me explain the whole thing, but he chose to leave. So for his benefit I shall have to repeat it.

Some hon. members: No, no!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: You do not want me to do this? Well, very good; he can read it in Hansard.

I would say to the hon. member, as far as northern Ontario is concerned, that—

Mr. Sopha: I am told on the contrary by my hon. friend from York South, who is getting kindlier to me as time goes on, that the hon. Minister did not say a thing about the artificial insemination. Is the hon. Minister alleging that he did?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am alleging that I had the information right here, and I would be pleased to present it to the hon. member right at this moment.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Minister, may I suggest that we deal with artificial insemination tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will deal with the second readings which are on the order paper, the private bills, and the Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.10 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the east gallery, students from Alexander Muir Public School, Toronto.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

TOWNSHIP OF HERSCHEL

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to set aside a certain tax sale of land in the township of Herschel for the relief of Wallace Bullied and Norah Bullied.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the title of the bill, I think, is indicative of the purpose. It is in fact to do natural justice which, in my opinion, has not been done because of a certain tax sale.

THE DIVISION COURTS ACT

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Division Courts Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to increase the monetary floor of the appealable cases in division courts, in line with the present-day value of the dollar.

THE NOTARIES ACT, 1962-63

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Notaries Act, 1962-63.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this subsection, as re-enacted, requires a notary whose appointment is limited to note the limitations under his signature.

THE VACCINATION ACT

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to repeal The Vaccination Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is outlined in the title. The original vaccination Act is more than 100 years old. Its provisions are rather anachronistic and it was felt advisable to repeal it in keeping with the spirit of the times.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Health Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, there are several amendments in this bill. The first is seeking power to make regulations with respect to distribution of agents for the control or treatment of diabetes, and to broaden this in order to accommodate the modern methods of distribution. The second is to embody, in The Public Health Act, all matters relating to vaccination set aside by the repeal of the present vaccination Act, but still necessary. And then the next amendment is to provide for more comprehensive regulations respecting public swimming pools. The next amendment authorizes township councils to pay the members and secretary of the local board of health for attending meetings. This amendment is to repeal the present section which is completely outmoded and outdated.

The next amendment is to cover work done under other Acts, as well as The Public Health Act. The next is to amend the Act by re-enacting the provisions in order to remove the necessity of having the Minister's approval for the appointment of sanitary inspectors. Next, as some health units comprise many municipalities, it is provided that all internal administration bylaws must be passed unanimously.

The next amendment will permit medical officers of health to remain in office on a year-to-year basis beyond 75 years of age. The next is to establish and administer maternal and child health programmes not now necessary under The Public Health Act, since much of this work has been taken over by The Ontario Hospital Services Commission Act.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Health as follows: What steps does the government plan to take in relation to the situation revealed in yesterday's statement by the chairman of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission calling for urgent action to end the serious hospital bed shortage in Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The steps taken by this government in relation to providing hospital beds in Metropolitan Toronto are actually outlined in the reported speech by Dr. J. B. Neilson from the report of which the hon. member for Woodbine apparently took the question he asks.

Last year, and largely because of the need in Metropolitan Toronto, this government increased the capital construction grants to hospitals by 60 per cent to $3,200 per bed and $3,200 per 300 square feet of certain designated service areas. This, on a per bed basis, in the average hospital building project, works out to $5,500; and this, in the average case, is one-third of the cost of construction. This cost refers to the building only and excludes furnishing and equipment which usually account for approximately 15 per cent of the total cost. On this basis the total cost of building, furnishing and equipping would amount to $19,350 per bed and this is quite a realistic average cost as noted by experience. Since furnishings and equipment are allowed as depreciable items in operating grants, no capital grant is provided for these.

When the grant increase was announced it was stated that this government had always considered that hospital construction should be financed on a three-partnership basis, with the federal and provincial governments and the community resources each contributing one-third. The province of Ontario is now contributing its one-third of capital construction cost thus giving leadership in this matter.

I believe it is not too much to expect that the federal government would follow our leadership, and I am pleased to see that the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare, in answer to a question put to her in the House of Commons, stated that this was now under consideration.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Minister permit a supplementary question? Are we to assume, from what he has just said that he disagrees with the statement at least attributed to Dr. Neilson in yesterday's press, that the level of government grants, including those of this government—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would like to inform the member that he asked the Minister if he would permit a supplementary question. I would ask that he curtail his remarks to a supplementary question.

Mr. Bryden: That was my intention, sir. I was—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Distill them.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Just getting primed.

Mr. Bryden: I was asking if he disagreed with the statement that was attributed to Dr. Neilson, to the effect that the present low level of government grants, including grants by this government, are not high enough to meet the requirements of the situation.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I would say that I disagree with the hon. member's interpretation of what was reputedly stated by Dr. Neilson.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to inform the House that the province of Ontario will participate in the 1967 Canadian world fair which will be held in the city of Montreal in conjunction with the celebration of Canada's Centennial.

It is our intention that this province should provide a major exhibit in the fair which, in all probability, will take the form of a pavilion, or temporary building, just for the life of the fair. This building will be designed to advertise Ontario as a good place in which to live; in which to do business, and to visit.

It is expected that during the currency of the fair, which will last from April 28 to October 27, 1967, it will attract about 35 million visitors. As many of these people will come from the United States, I think it is fair of us to assume that we will play host to some millions of these visitors to the fair. With this idea in mind I would point out that Highway 401 for instance, provides rapid access with very few obstructions from the Quebec border to Detroit, which leads into Illinois and Michigan, and to the Niagara frontier which leads into Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York, these very heavily populated areas of the United States. By 1967 we will be able to connect with the Mississippi Parkway at Fort Frances and of course the new International Bridge at Sault Ste. Marie.

What I foresee and hope will happen is that the people may come into Quebec province from the United States, go to the fair, and on their way home go via a different route and that route will inevitably lead them through Ontario as a result of the very fine system of highways which this government has constructed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It will be our intention to promote all areas of the province at the world's fair in order to encourage tourists to come and see our province. With this in mind, there is a delegation from the government meeting today in Montreal with people from all the other provinces, and the federal government, of course. They are meeting to discuss ways and means of developing and integrating the exhibits or pavilions, or call them what you wish, that will be developed in the fair. One of the purposes, of course, is to avoid duplication, so that what is done by the various provinces or groups of provinces will not be duplicated.

In our delegation are Mr. S. W. Clarkson, deputy Minister of The Department of Economics and Development; Mr. J. W. Ramsay, who is an executive officer of that department, and Mr. D. G. Creba, who is the chief architect of The Department of Public Works. We propose that our participation in this fair will be handled by The Department of Economics and Development, by The Department of Tourism and Information and The Department of Public Works, which will all work together in planning the exhibit in order that we may achieve the maximum utilization of the opportunities afforded.

The meeting in Montreal is being chaired by the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition. From this meeting being held today, we will receive the technical information that we will require in order to proceed with our planning.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

TOWN OF COCHRANE

Clerk of the House: The 62nd order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill No. Pr1, An Act respecting the Town of Cochrane.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I had two brief efforts at this Bill No. Pr1, and very simply in summation let me say this. The old section 379148 of The Municipal Act used to provide for fixed assessment with some seven safeguards. These safeguards included a vote of the people where a fixed percentage of the people had to vote; a fixed majority, two-thirds of the electors had to approve of the bill on a vote; a fixed majority of the members of council voted on the bylaw before the bylaw could become effective and be submitted to the people; that the assessment be for no longer a period than ten years; that no bylaw be passed in respect of a business that has at any time enjoyed a previous fixed assessment; that no person to whom and no person who is interested in or who holds shares in a company and no nominee of a corporation to which a fixed assessment is granted was to be entitled to vote on such a bylaw; that no such bylaw should be passed granting a fixed assessment in respect of a branch of industry of a similar nature to one established in the municipality, unless the person by whom it is carried on consented in writing to the grant of the fixed assessment, and so on.

None of these safeguards, Mr. Speaker, is in Bill No. Pr1. The debates of this Legislature in the year that subsection 48D of 379 was repealed, indicate that this matter went through this House without controversy at all. The matter was not discussed. It was so obvious to all members of the House, sir, that the fixed assessment provision should have been taken out of the Act, that the matter went through without any debate on it whatsoever. In that same year, Mr. Speaker, hon. Mr. Frost, the then Prime Minister, said in no uncertain terms that there was no reason to continue fixed assessment provisions because they were illogical and unreasonable.

There has been no special case made, Mr. Speaker, for the fixed assessment for the town of Cochrane. It is my submission to this House that where municipalities need special consideration, this should be given through the efforts of The Department of Economics and Development and that methods can and must be, in fact, worked out to provide special consideration for municipalities that need new industry.

It was never made clear before the committee what advantage, if any, the location inside the boundaries of Cochrane gave to this company as contrasted with its possible location outside the town of Cochrane. There was no indication given, Mr. Speaker, if municipal services were available, if the industry moved from the unorganized territory into the organized territory. There was a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that amity between provinces indicated that we should give this special favour.

Of all the arguments which were advanced, Mr. Speaker, the only argument of any substance, in fact, was the personal appeal of the hon. member for Cochrane North (Mr. Brunelle). He is a fine gentleman, and no one wants to take that away from him. But, Mr. Speaker, if this policy of legislating for individual industries and individual municipalities, based merely on the personality of one member of this House, is continued, there is really no point in having a municipal Act at all. There is no point in the Ontario Association of Mayors and Reeves making representations. There is no point in various other departments of government, the trade and industry branch of The Department of Economics, recommending that these things be done away with. There is no point in my hon. colleague from Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar) coming here and saying that Elliot Lake needs help, Mr. Speaker, because Elliot Lake is not able to afford this kind of help at the expense of the other taxpayers. There is no point in my hon. friends from Windsor coming here and saying that Windsor needs help, and that the only method of doing it is by breaching provisions which have gone on and apply to all the rest of the province.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is really no excuse to pass this Act at all. This Act gives complete carte blanche to the local council to carry on as they will, without any real restrictions being imposed by this Legislature at all. If that is the way the province is going to be run, then we are all really wasting our time. We suggest to you: Settle each individual municipal problem on the basis of an application by private Act.

There is no report, Mr. Speaker, there is not even a report from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) that he has examined this particular problem and there is some merit in it. Surely one would have thought that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs would have said, "There are five or six or ten items that I have concerned myself with, and my officials advise me that these safeguards have been taken," or that, "These additional points demand further action."

There is nothing before this House that justifies this bill being passed, and it would be my submission that the bill be not passed.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Downsview has undertaken quite a detailed analysis of this bill, both within its own terms and in relation to overall government policy. It is therefore unnecessary for me to make extended comments on it.

I would, however, like to put this group in the Legislature on record as to its position with regard to this bill.

We are prepared to go along with the bill, reluctantly, Mr. Speaker, for one reason and one reason only. That is that the town of Cochrane clearly needs more industry. It has had difficulties because of the closing down of railroad yards there. It is important that there should be new industries to take the place of what has been lost, and to produce the base for future development of the town. This we agree with, and for this reason only we go along with the bill.

We do it with the greatest reluctance, Mr. Speaker, and only out of deference to the good people of the town of Cochrane, because we think basically the policy embodied in the bill is totally wrong.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Well then, the hon. members should vote according to their convictions.

Mr. Bryden: The people of Cochrane have had to come to this Legislature because of the inadequacy of overall government policy, and we do not think that they should be penalized for the errors of omission and commission of the government.

The proper way, in our opinion, to handle the sort of problem that Cochrane is up against, is by government policy encouraging location of industry in communities such as Cochrane. What the bill proposes is that the ratepayers of the town of Cochrane will, in effect, provide a subsidy to a particular industry which is proposing to locate itself there, for a period of time. We think that, where special consideration should be given to industries to encourage them to locate in areas needing development, such assistance should be at the expense of all of the taxpayers of the province and not merely at the expense of the taxpayers of the community concerned.

It may very well be, and I suspect it is true in this case, that the taxpayers of Cochrane are less able to provide the assistance that is apparently required than the taxpayers of the province generally. Their community is in a difficult position at the present time. Why should they be particularly penalized?

As the hon. member for Downsview has stated, the fixed assessments were eliminated from the general legislation of the province, or the possibility of achieving them, about three years ago. It was quite clear in the hearings of the public bills committee that any arrangement or agreement, that may have been arrived at between the town of Cochrane and the industry referred to in this bill, was made after that change in the legislation was put through. And it is regrettable, I think, that we should now be asked to make an amendment in the general law for an individual case.

Sir, the former Prime Minister of this province used to say that hard cases make bad law; I think that is the saying. This is a matter the government ought to consider here. I hope that this will be the last private bill we have before this House asking for a fixed assessment.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. member does not make any sense.

Mr. Bryden: I hope that government policy will advance to the point where this sort of concession—

Mr. Sopha: He has given all the arguments—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Bryden: —will become unnecessary in the future, by providing means whereby a municipality and an industry affected may come to the provincial and federal governments to obtain the assistance they may need in establishing the industry in a municipality such as Cochrane.

I would hope also that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forest (Mr. Roberts), who is not here at the moment, will reconsider the policy of the government with regard to granting timber limits. One of the representations, as I recall it, before the private bills committee as to why Cochrane had to come before the Legislature was that the land in the neighbourhood of Cochrane was monopolized by large companies who have extensive limits which they were not developing, and the town was itself caught in a pocket of non-development.

I think the government should review a situation like that—should reconsider its policies with regard to granting timber limits—so that private companies, for their own benefit, may not retard development of the province as a whole, and of communities such as Cochrane within the province. These changes in public policy are urgently needed. Perhaps Cochrane has done us a favour by calling to our attention the urgent need for revised public policies regarding the location of industry.

It is quite apparent that, at the present time, both federal and provincial policies in this field are totally inadequate, are of little effect at all. Cochrane, as a result, finds itself in a position where the only way it can encourage an industry to locate within its municipal boundaries, for its benefit and for the benefit of the future development of its municipality, is by undertaking a fixed assessment. And as I said, we in this group do not want to see the development of Cochrane retarded; therefore we will go along with the proposition, since it is at present the only remedy available to them, and clearly—

Mr. Sopha: Very reluctantly. Political opportunism in the extreme.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Sopha: Principles go out the window.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury frequently avails himself of the opportunity to speak in this House. I will concede that he rarely takes adequate advantage of his opportunities, that his speeches are rarely of any—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Sopha: Stop him abusing me.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the member to stick to the principle of the bill and at the same time I would ask the member for Sudbury to let the member for Woodbine complete his remarks.

Mr. Bryden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The comments of the hon. member for Sudbury were no more helpful than most of his comments.

There is one point that I raised in the private bills committee, Mr. Speaker, that was referred to by the hon. member for Downsview that I would ask the hon. Minister or the sponsor of the bill to consider once again before this bill goes into committee of the whole House. Clause 1 of the bill, which is really the bill, is expressed in the broadest possible terms. It states that fixed assessment may be granted on such terms and conditions as the council deems proper.

I will say about any other bills relating to fixed assessments which we have had before this House, which I think this group has usually voted against, that there was a much more limited provision than that. Usually the terms and conditions were set forth right within the body of the bill, so that at least the Legislature knew what it was granting and it could be assured that the terms and conditions were of such a nature that at least the majority of the hon. members of the Legislature could subscribe to them, but here it is wide open. The assessment may be granted on any terms that the council deems proper.

I would suggest that there should be some sort of limitation placed in this clause. I suggested this in the committee without success and I will suggest it again now, that there should be some provision for review by somebody of those terms and conditions. Perhaps the municipal board is the appropriate body, I do not know, but I think that before the council is permitted to pass a bylaw granting a fixed assessment, the terms and conditions under which it contemplates to grant the fixed assessment should be reviewed by somebody. It is unfortunate that at this stage it is too late to set forth those terms and conditions right within the bill, but even if it is too late to do that surely some authority should review them before they become final. I should hope that the sponsor of the bill and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs will take another look at clause 1 of the bill before it is dealt with in committee of the whole House.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in support of this bill, I would like to preface my remarks by saying that I sympathize with many of the remarks made by the hon. member for Downsview. However, I do not think this is the particular time nor is this the particular bill to debate the principle of fixed assessment. I think that in view of the fact that negotiations have been going on between this company and the town of Cochrane for about five years indicates that this particular bill, the same as the Smith's Falls bill, should receive the support of this Legislature.

True, Mr. Speaker, there is no written agreement as there was in the Smith's Falls bill, but I do not believe that is necessarily an important fact. The important thing is that there were negotiations prior to 1961 and the amendment of The Municipal Act. I can imagine in Cochrane that there would be verbal negotiations and there would be an agreement and there would be a handshake, and I think that this would be sufficient as far as doing business was concerned in many of these northern communities.

I think the hon. members were rather surprised by the refreshing sincerity and frankness of the solicitor for Cochrane when he admitted this. He also admitted that the plant is now in Cochrane, that it is operating, and that if we do not approve this bill the plant will probably survive. I think at that point, Mr. Speaker, I believed him when he said that negotiations had been going on for about five years.

The fact that this bill provides for a fixed assessment for only five years, the fact that the plant employs about 125 people, as well as providing employment for farmers and woodlot owners in the area, the fact that there is possibly a $12,000 weekly payroll, are more reasons why we should support this bill. I believe we have a moral reason to make it possible for Cochrane to keep a commitment to this company.

Mr. G. E. Gomme (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this bill I first would like to make note of that record the hon. member for Downsview plays every time this comes before the House in any shape or form. He has carried this one longer than any of the rest. I think he has been three weeks making this speech. I want very strongly to support this bill. I believe that if the story were put in the right view, and we looked at the small town of Cochrane, which was about to lose whatever industry there was there and with the roundhouse being closed up, it entered into negotiations—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Gomme: It is all right, Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the choir, we are used to that in our church.

But the small town was faced with no industrial promotion and the town fathers did the thing which I think any of us would do under those circumstances—they started out to help themselves. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Halton, has pointed out that although some lawyers always feel that you cannot do any business without having your name on a piece of paper, there are still many honourable businessmen in this province who do business by word of mouth. This company came in and—

Mr. Singer: The hon. member is reaching, he can do better than that.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Gomme: The members of the profession of the hon. member for Downsview always have to look back on precedents to prove everything, and I think he will accept that we proved that we were right in passing the other three bills and we will be right in passing this one.

But what I want to point out is this small municipality was faced with losing its industry and these men came in to look around, to make a survey of the possibilities of timber and everything else. To my knowledge there was no tax being paid on that building. There was a small amount of money being paid in lieu of taxes by the railway on the roundhouse. We have the company coming in, it built additions to it, it has put this building in such an order that it can be used to manufacture plywood. Some taxes will be paid which will be as much as was paid in lieu of taxes by the railway. Men are given employment. Some of the timber is going to be taken out of the bush and again men will be given employment. So I think that any more talk against this bill is simply wasting the time of this House when a small community like this wants to help itself and some people try to prevent it.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot urge too strongly on the hon. members assembled here to get behind this bill, and without any more waste of time let us pass it and let the people go on and know that we are ready to help them.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to go into the details of this bill. My hon. colleague has presented the views of our party and they can stand as he has stated them.

On the matter of consistency, I want you, Mr. Speaker, to judge the comments of some people in this House when I remind you that there was one hon. member in this House who voted—

Mr. Sopha: That is not so. That is completely untrue.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: I am anticipating—

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the member that we are speaking to the principle of this bill. I will allow only the principle of the bill to be discussed. I would ask the member to keep this in mind.

Mr. MacDonald: I am discussing the principle of this bill and the need for consistency, and I am drawing attention to the fact that in discussing consistency we are dealing with the merits of this particular bill. I am drawing your attention, Mr. Speaker—for your edification—to the fact that, in one earlier instance when the same principle was being discussed in the committee on private bills, there was a certain hon. member of this House who spoke in favour of an exemption for Hershey Chocolates, and either voted for it or sat in his seat silent. Then he came into the House and voted against it. He happens to be the hon. member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: That is not so.

Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege—on a point of order, all right, whatever you call it, it still gets to become an offence against truth and accuracy, whatever it is called.

Mr. Bryden: It is not an inaccuracy; that is the absolute truth.

Mr. Sopha: At the meeting of the private bills committee I took the trouble to expose some of the methods and devices of our hon. friends to the left here, in impeaching that bill, which I thought were completely irrelevant and inconsequential to the principle being debated by the hon. member for Downsview. I did this, sir, at the committee; I showed our hon. friends that some of the vigour of their attack ought to have been mitigated by the fact that this Hershey company had a fine union in their plant that was going to provide employment for their people. And I did not, sir, if one listened to my words carefully, enunciate the principle ascribed to me by the hon. member. But all hon. members of the House know how quick he is to ascribe improper motives to other people.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sopha: I did not vote in a different way in both places and that is the actual fact; and the hon. member for Downsview will support me.

Mr. Speaker: Is the member speaking to a point of order?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, I would ask that the hon. member for Sudbury be asked to withdraw the totally unwarranted and quite improper assertion he made with regard to the hon. member for York South.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, by the same assertion, I state that he changed his vote. Let him go ahead and see if he can get me to withdraw it, because there were 20 people there who saw it.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support my colleague, the hon. member for Downsview, in opposing this bill. There is not a municipality in this province for which a good case for fixed assessments could not be made. I am going to attempt to point out eight different reasons why this bill should not be passed.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Woodbine has mentioned that Cochrane happens to be a one-industry town. My own community was likewise a one-industry town at one time, and we know what a loss of an industry or a substantial portion of an industry can do to a community, yet we did not come here to the House and ask for fixed assessments.

We believe, and I believe, fixed assessments are wrong in principle. A second point—fixed assessments favour one industry as against another. The third point—fixed assessments mean that the taxpayers of the area are subsidizing this industry which asks for a fixed assessment. My fourth point—this can be an invitation to other municipalities to unfairly compete for industry, and I know it can lead to a sell-out of a municipality to the highest bidder. Fifth—it may lead to unstable industries; industries which may be solely interested in taking advantage of industry-starved municipalities. A sixth point—it may likewise lead to plant movement; and when it comes to plant movement, Mr. Speaker, coming from an area of the province that has suffered from plant movement, we certainly know the effects that plant movement can have on the economy of the area.

An industry favoured by such fixed assessment subsidization might be willing to leave that area if offered more favourable concessions from some other area. Point seven—fixed assessments may have an adverse effect on educational grants, especially now that the grant system has been changed. And the last point—it is up to us here to protect municipalities against themselves. It is not for the municipal taxpayer to subsidize the industry. If this province thinks that that area needs the industry then this should be on a provincial basis. The government should come along and assist the area. It should not be up to the individual taxpayer. The federal government has attempted to do such a thing by designating areas. Let this province designate areas, then it would be up to them to assist by means of some type of subsidy rather than having the individual taxpayers subsidize that industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out eight different reasons why fixed assessments are wrong in principle.

Mr. R. Brunelle (Cochrane North): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to thank the hon. member for Downsview for his kind words. I would like to remark to him that this is not a question of personalities. I think this is a question of just good common sense, of which the hon. members of this House have plenty.

I also wish to thank the hon. members who have spoken in support of this, the hon. member for Woodbine, the hon. member for Lanark, and the hon. member for Halton.

Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill will be of great benefit, not only for the town of Cochrane, but also for all of northeastern Ontario. In a few words, this bill is merely honouring a commitment that was made several years ago, by the town council of Cochrane, to the principals of Cochrane Industries Limited, whereby they guaranteed them fixed assessment if they would build a plywood plant in the town of Cochrane.

I should like to briefly give you a short history of the economic condition in Cochrane. Until six years ago, the town of Cochrane was a major railway centre. It was the headquarters for the northeastern division of the CNR. This meant that more than 100 employees were employed in this town and, for a small town, it was the major industry.

Due to a new centralization policy, the CNR moved its headquarters further south. This, Mr. Speaker, was a major economic blow to the town. An air of gloom permeated the whole area. It meant the moving of these employees. It meant empty houses. It meant a loss of revenue in municipal taxes. It meant that the railroad was deriving less benefit; and so forth.

Cochrane, as hon. members know, and many here have visited northern Ontario—and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests will arrange another visit for the hon. members, because I can see from the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview, sir, and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville that they would need another visit to familiarize themselves with northern Ontario. It is entirely different than southern Ontario.

After the CNR moved out, the town council, realizing that Cochrane was in the midst of a forest area with a tremendous amount of poplar, decided to attract an industry that would manufacture poplar plywood. Within 60 miles of Cochrane, to the east at La Sarre, was a firm called Normick Limited, comprised of three young men, the Perron brothers. For years they had been manufacturing a very good product. Their sales were such that they were thinking of either expanding or building a new mill.

At the request of the town council, they were invited to come to Cochrane and look over the old CNR roundhouse. The CNR roundhouse was to be demolished, and they were told that if they established their poplar mill at this site they would be given a fixed assessment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the point I would like to make. My good hon. friend from Downsview has brought in the question of the town of Eastview and others, where the Act was amended to eliminate unfair competition between towns. I would like to remind this House that less than one per cent of northern Ontario is in organized territory. This means, Mr. Speaker, that this new firm could have located no more than 1,000 feet away, no further than from here to say, Dundas Street, and they would have been in totally unorganized territory—

Mr. Singer: What services would they have had?

Mr. Brunelle:—subject only to the provincial land tax.

Mr. Sopha: You do not really believe that.

Mr. Brunelle: I would like to tell the hon. member for Downsview that the CNR was paying approximately $2,500 in taxes. This roundhouse was to be demolished, which would have meant that no taxes would have been derived from that roundhouse.

Mr. Sopha: Are they going to move 1,000 feet?

Mr. Brunelle: Today this Cochrane Industries Limited is paying twice the amount of taxes previously paid. It is paying approximately $5,800 a year.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question?

Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, I think I should continue because my learned friend, being a lawyer by profession, can ask me legal points that I know I would find difficulty in answering. As I said before, this bill is good commonsense.

I also would say that the principals of Cochrane Industries come from the province of Quebec. Imagine. I do not think that the province of Quebec could have sent better ambassadors than these three brothers. They have been welcomed with open arms. After listening to the very eloquent speech of the hon. member for Sudbury approximately two weeks ago, I was hoping that his remarks, whereby we should extend the hand of friendship to our sister province, would tend to influence, in a sense, my good hon. friend from Downsview and that they could get together on this. The passing of this bill will be a tangible proof whereby an honourable commitment was made by the town council of Cochrane to these people from Quebec. This was made in good faith, the negotiations were carried over a period of several years, and this, in my opinion, would be a tangible proof whereby we are really having bonne entente between the two provinces. Our newspapers, up in northern Ontario, are all in favour of this. They have really commended the members for the progress in their approval of this bill in the private bills committee. Permit me to quote briefly from the Timmins Press, an editorial of January 18:

STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

Cochrane has shown that it can attract industries, and despite argument to the contrary, has proved that a municipality along with the provincial government can offer incentives to open up new branches of industry in the north.

The Cochrane Northland Post, in an editorial of February 20, has the heading, "The Case for Fixed Assessment." I will not bore the House with the entire article but there again it commends the hon. members in their wisdom for having approved this bill in the private bills committee.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would say that this mill is providing employment. It is providing approximately 150 jobs with a weekly payroll of approximately $12,000. Our ONR owned by this government is benefiting to a considerable degree, because most of this plywood is shipped by railway. The Department of Lands and Forests is obtaining Crown dues. More than 100 farmers and settlers are benefiting from this, because they are cutting this poplar and they are transporting this to the mill. As I said, in order to honour a commitment, I believe that this bill should be passed. And lastly, Mr. Speaker, I say to my hon. friend from Downsview, if this will allay his fears, I promise him that I will not bring to the attention of this House another similar bill. This is strictly tying up negotiations that have been carried on over a period of years.

Mr. Speaker: As many as are in favour of the motion will please say "aye." As many as are opposed will please say "nay." In my opinion the "ayes" have it. I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

BROCK UNIVERSITY

In the absence of Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland), Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park) moves second reading of Bill No. Pr10, An Act to incorporate Brock University.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

SCHOOL AREA OF THE TOWNSHIP OF ERIN

In the absence of Mr. J. Root (Wellington-Dufferin), Mr. Cowling moves second reading of Bill No. Pr12, An Act respecting the township school area of the township of Erin.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

CITY OF TORONTO

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could just hold that bill for the time being?

LILLIAN FRANCES MASSEY TREBLE TRUST

In the absence of Mr. H. E. Beckett (York East), Mr. Cowling moves second reading of Bill No. Pr18, An Act respecting the Lillian Frances Massey Treble Trust.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

CITY OF HAMILTON

In the absence of Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton Centre), Mr. Cowling moves second reading of Bill No. Pr23, An Act respecting the city of Hamilton.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before second reading of this bill is carried, I would like to express regret, on behalf of this group in this House at any rate, that an important section which was in that bill when it received first reading, is no longer there, having been deleted in the private bills committee. This was a section under which the city of Hamilton, or the council of the city of Hamilton in its wisdom, if it saw fit, could have made certain provisions to provide tax relief to old age pensioners.

I think that was a worthy request on the part of the city of Hamilton. I think it would have been a worthwhile experiment for the city of Hamilton to have tried out a procedure of that kind to see how it would work. It might very well have been that if the proposal had turned out to be successful in the city of Hamilton, similar legislation could have been made general for the whole of the province so that old age pensioners would receive some relief—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in view of this how can debate on principle take place on second reading of the bill? Should his procedure not be, Mr. Speaker, when the House is in committee to move that the section that has been deleted be reinserted?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may I just say one word on that?

Mr. Speaker: I assume that the member is still speaking to the general principle of the bill, and therefore, under those circumstances—I do not have the bill before me—if he is sticking to the principle of the whole bill, and not relating to this deleted section in particular, I will allow it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, for your information the city of Hamilton bill, like many of these municipal bills, consisted when it first came before us, and still consists, of a number of sections which are not particularly related to each other. It would be difficult to say that there is one overriding principle relating to any of these bills. They have a number of unrelated sections. What I was talking about was certain developments that took place in the private bills committee in relation to this bill.

I think a bill, when it comes before the House has to be considered in its totality. It is introduced on first reading, it goes through certain stages and it would seem to me that it is appropriate to comment on procedures relating to the bill in the debate on principle of the bill. When it comes to the committee stage, I would doubt if it would be possible for me to take any steps to have a deleted section put back in. I merely rose to express regret that the bill now before us on second reading is not the same bill as the bill that was before us in first reading, and I think this is a matter of importance for overall policy in the province. The city of Hamilton had asked when it came to this Legislature that it be permitted to experiment—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The member has a point of order.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I share the view of my hon. colleague from Sudbury. It would, sir, be quite impossible, in my opinion, to speak about the principle of a section that is not before this House. That section is not here and it certainly cannot be in order on this bill. It may be in order on many other debates but it is not in order, surely, on what is before the House now.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): I think the hon. member is right.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Speaker: Are you going to speak on the point of order before I rule on it?

Mr. Bryden: I think I have already made my position clear on the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would submit to you that a bill should be considered in its totality as it proceeds through this House and this is the only place in this House where it is possible to comment on the treatment that was given to the bill in the private bills committee. My Liberal friends are in a very fractious mood today—they apparently do not want the matter raised, but I think it should be raised.

Mr. Speaker: I think I shall have to rule against the member continuing with his remarks because he is referring to a particular section which is not before the House. The proper time to have discussed this section, which has now been deleted from the reprinted bill, was during the presentation of the private bills committee report to the House last week.

Therefore, I cannot see how I can let the member continue talking about the principle of a particular section which is not before the House at this time.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be noted, if you will permit me, sir, that some of the information provided by the hon. member who spoke just a moment ago is not quite in accordance with the law. Therefore, at the right time when the bill comes up again, if he does care to discuss this particular section that has been deleted from the bill by the committee, I will have something to say about it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may I ask then for future guidance?

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: A point of order?

Mr. Bryden: Yes, may I merely ask in view of what the hon. Minister has said, is it in order to discuss this section that I have been trying to talk about, at the committee stage of this bill? Could you now or later give me some guidance on that matter?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that I will have to leave that to the chairman of the committee of the whole House whenever the bill is advanced to the committee stage. I would say that if there is no section relating to what you are going to speak about, I would be of the opinion that you would have a difficult time speaking to that particular deleted section of the original bill.

THE GASOLINE TAX ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves second reading of Bill No. 40, An Act to amend The Gasoline Tax Act.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on this bill. I shall not repeat at great length the substance of some comments which I made a few days ago during the estimates of The Department of Transport. I recalled then to this House, and particularly to its new hon. members, the fact that some seven years ago a committee of this House chaired by the now hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and having among its members some three or four members of the present Cabinet, looked into the whole question of highway revenue.

The final report, on page 31, carries our conclusions. I might say this was a unanimous conclusion—to the effect that any move toward an increase in gasoline tax without first building in a basic equity through a weight distance tax—so that the heavy vehicles, the over 18,000-pound vehicles, would be making their fair share to our highway revenues—would just add further to this inequity.

I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that this is the second time in the last seven years that we have had an increase in gasoline tax.

In other words, twice now this government has moved to increase the basic inequity in our highway revenues on the basis of the study that was made by a select committee of this House chaired by the hon. Prime Minister.

I think the time has come when this government should face up to this basic fact. Perhaps they can have a chat with the hon. Prime Minister in Cabinet on this issue. The government added to the inequity within two weeks after the release of that report, some six or seven years ago, and now it is adding to the inequity again. In all of this period, as I detailed during The Department of Transport estimates, the government has been dragging its feet with studies on the question of whether or not we should have a weight distance tax.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Woodbine, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

In the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the imposition of a weight distance tax in preference to an increase in the gasoline tax.

Mr. Speaker: Moved by Mr. MacDonald, seconded by Mr. Bryden, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

In the opinion of the House the government should give consideration to the imposition of a weight distance tax in preference to an increase in the gasoline tax.

The discussion before the House now will be on the amendment.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the second reading of this bill and the amendment moved by my friend the hon. member for York South I would say at once that my concern and my opposition to this bill is based more broadly than that expounded by the hon. member for York South.

I have no intention of voting for this bill for a variety of reasons; and I want, in the next few minutes, to set them out before the House.

My hon. friend, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) is a very suave and personable individual, who comes before us this afternoon in his capacity as Provincial Treasurer and asks us to acquiesce in a $30 million tax bite for the benefit of the revenues of this province—a tax bite, Mr. Speaker, which is already in effect. The irony of this situation is that what we are asked to approve this afternoon is already a fact, and we are collecting tax.

It would indeed be quite a situation were the House this afternoon not to grant my hon. friend's request for an increase in the gas tax. However, looking around at the hon. members of the House, I seem to visualize and to perceive that there is a rugged resolve on the part of most of the hon. government members based, I presume, mostly on political loyalty and partnership and partisanship, too. It is a loyalty that will pass my hon. friend's tax bite in spite of what we say on this side of the House.

I have a basic opposition to the tax on the ground that, during the election campaign—and I think we have to go back to this in order to recognize what we are doing in regard to this tax—during the election campaign my hon. friend said nothing about the need for increased taxation. Indeed, I find, in some of the propaganda which was put out by the government during the election campaign, that in "Twenty-three Reasons Why You Should Vote for the Robarts Government," reason number 19 said this:

Tax concessions for our people. Your Conservative government has eased taxes in a number of ways.

That was just a few short months ago when the government, during an election campaign, suggested to the people in the broadest sort of way that, in voting for this Tory administration, they were voting for tax stability. Nothing was said by anyone that there was going to be an increase in taxes if the government was returned.

The government knew full well when it went to the people in September that it was going to have to increase taxation, but not a whisper, not a murmur of any kind, fell from the lips of government spokesmen which would indicate that the return of the Robarts government could be construed by the people as an indication that taxes were to be increased.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that there is political dishonesty in a stand of that kind.

An hon. member: He is right.

Mr. Oliver: I think the time has come in Ontario when a government, when it knows, as this government knew, that it was going to have to increase taxes, would have the political honesty to say to the people of Ontario, "We are bound, in order to pay for the services you require, to increase your taxation."

But they do not do that. They say, on the other hand, "We will maintain the level of taxation," and they go on to claim that in some instances there have been concessions as far as taxation is concerned. Now on that ground alone, one could work up opposition to this particular tax impost.

Then, of course, there is the added reason, that this tax unquestionably will add to the cost of goods and services in this province. No question about that. Transportation in all its aspects enters very definitely into the cost of goods and services. We are, in this province, making a desperate effort to get into world markets. We want to sell the produce of our farms, and the products of our machine age, of our industrial plants, to the world.

Does the government realize that, when we meet competition on world markets, that is a fierce competition—that great competitive market, made competitive by the fact that in other countries the cost of producing those products are less than they are in Ontario? Our only hope of getting into these markets, and maintaining a place for our products in those markets, is to cut our costs to the place where we can be competitive; and we are going exactly in the opposite direction in this regard. We are adding to those costs, we are making our position less competitive, our ability to compete less in the world's markets; and we are making the task of those agencies of government, who say that we should compete, very onerous indeed. For that reason as well, we cannot and will not go for this tax impost.

Another reason, and it seems to me to be a very pertinent one, is that no matter how many taxes, how much money we give this government in taxes, it does not get us anywhere. I think that is a very important thing for us to remember. Giving this government taxes is like throwing money into a bottomless pit. What it does with taxes is simply pay the housekeeping bills which have occurred during the year. There is nothing in its programme that would indicate that its financial house is being brought into order.

Last year we went $100 million into debt. This year we added three or four new taxes, and next year we are going to go $100 million more into debt.

Where does that get us? If there was any finality to the government's programme for financial stability then we might be inclined to go along with it, but no matter how much money we put in, we do not get anywhere. We stay in the same place, financially speaking, and we do not move to correct the financial position of the government. So, sir, it is impertinent, I would say, for the government to ask for taxes unless it can, at one and the same time, say that the gathering of these taxes will make for financial stability in the province, and that it will, at one and the same time, say that by these taxes we will move out into new fields and increase the tax potential of the province itself.

Another matter I think that one might talk about at this moment is that I think, before the government asks for new taxes on such a broad front as it has asked for them since the election—because this tax on gasoline may be the only one which comes before the Legislature, but it is only one of a company of taxes which have been put into effect by the government since the election, and we all know what they are. So we talk about this one and, at the same time, we remember the others that the government has put into effect.

I suggest that, at this time, the government has no right to ask for increased taxes from the people of Ontario unless it, as a government, says to the people of Ontario: We are practising economy. We are doing all we can as a government to do away with duplication, to cut out unnecessary expenses. We are doing our part and, after having done that, we need the taxes.

You know, there was a story a few weeks ago about the President of the United States turning out the lights in the White House, the ones which were not needed. It is just about time in this province that this government should turn out a few lights when they are not needed. And yet the government is not doing that, and apparently there is no intention of doing it. Until it practises economy, until it demonstrates to the people of Ontario that it is prepared to give a lead in this regard, I do not think it is entitled to new taxation of any kind.

And lastly, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the House that in the Speech from the Throne and in the Budget—the two documents that we have had which reveal government policy, if it has any, because they were stand-pat documents in the extreme and they did not take us anywhere—we have in this province a government which has not practised good financial housekeeping over the years. All it is doing by this Budget is bringing the inadequacies of the past up to the present and projecting them into the future. And that is not good enough for this province. This government should have laid down in the Speech from the Throne, and demonstrated its faith by putting it in the Budget, some down-to-earth plans that would seem to lead us out of the financial troubles that we are in, some way of developing our tax potential beyond where it is at the present time, remembering perhaps that it would not bring taxes to us at once, but over the years that it would eventually bring back to us those needed tax dollars with which we could balance our budget.

But nothing of that has come from this government, no plan for the future, no chart, no course, in order to better our conditions; simply an emphasizing of the same condition that has prevailed in this province for 20 years. No way out, no solution, just bad housekeeping being continued one year into another.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I cannot, and my hon. colleagues cannot, vote for this increase in the gasoline tax.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen on the Liberal benches this afternoon have been making a great noise about what they describe as consistency. I have now come to the conclusion the reason they think the rest of us are inconsistent is that their definition of consistency is exactly what any other person would call inconsistency.

The hon. leader of the Opposition has stated that he is opposed to the increase in the gasoline tax, and indeed I take it to any increase in taxes at this time. But on the basis of anything he has said in the Budget debate, or that his hon. colleagues have said in the Budget debate, sir, when they have directed their remarks specifically to the Budget, or that he said today, he clearly ought to be criticizing the government because it has not increased taxes enough. That is the only consistent basis on which he could criticize the government.

He has suggested that the government should turn out some lights. I would suggest to him and to the House at large, Mr. Speaker, that he should indicate to the government what lights should be turned out. I agree with him, I think everybody would agree with him, that everything possible should be done to control expenditure, to achieve maximum efficiency in expenditure. I will say, from being on the public accounts committee, that I believe the government has made considerable progress in the last two or three years toward achieving good control over expenditure. I would imagine in an organization that is spending well over $1 billion a year there is some inefficiency, there are some items that could be reduced. I hope that the public accounts committee, now that it is being given an opportunity to operate, will be able to be of some assistance in eliminating or reducing items which are now larger than they have to be.

The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that if a maximum job were done in that direction we would do extremely well if $10 million or $15 million a year was saved. That would not make very much of a dent in the net debt of the province. So when the hon. leader of the Opposition makes such a noise about the necessity for balancing the budget, then he has a responsibility, in my opinion, to suggest to the government exactly what programmes should be dispensed with. One can reduce expenditures to the point where the budget is balanced, only by sacrificing major programmes.

Personally, I do not think the government should make any significant reductions in any of the programmes it now has under way. There are some that I think may be revised. But my criticism of the government has been not that it has too large or too many programmes but that its programmes in several directions are inadequate. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that no one can charge me with inconsistency in making that assertion because I do not believe that balancing the budget is an important problem to this province at the present time.

I think there are infinitely more important problems, such as stimulating maximum economic growth, and such as providing the capital equipment we need to take care of the future educational requirements of the province. I think those things are far more important than to balance the budget, and indeed I do not think that the net debt of this province is a serious problem at all. Indeed, if one put any sort of valuations on the assets of the province—the highways, public buildings, and other similar assets—it would be found that we had no debt at all, in fact I would think we would probably find that we have the reverse of a net debt. My criticism of the government is not that it is spending far too much; it is that I do not think it is taking adequate account of the needs of the province.

I have suggested already that its proposed increased taxes may very well be disadvantageous at this time in that they may tend to discourage economic activity at a time when we should be encouraging it. I have also said on other occasions that I do not put major stress on that because I do not think that the proposed tax increases are that great in all. There are some increases but they are not what I would call major increases. The other one, the hospital premium, I will not talk about because it would not be in order here now, but we have expressed objection to it on other grounds.

But I would think that this group, on the basis of the submissions it has made to the House, both in this session and over the years, would have a basis for objecting to the increase in the gasoline tax at this time. I do not think that the Liberal group has any basis at all except the basis of total irresponsibility, of saying to the government that it should spend more and collect less and balance the budget while doing so. That is the only basis on which it can make that assertion to the government of the province. I think we have a basis for objecting, and we have objected to the increase in the gasoline tax, but at the same time, Mr. Speaker, one has to accept finally the fact that the government has control over the budget.

In the Budget debate we make our basic comments on government policies as revealed in the Budget, we make our comments on taxation policies. Then we get to the specific measures put forward by the government and when we do that I think we have to accept the fact that it is up to the government ultimately to determine whether or not there will be an increase in taxes. We have expressed our objection, but then the government is responsible for the financial administration so we ultimately have to debate the matter on the basis of the government's contention that it wants some increase in revenues. And when one works within that framework, as I think one has to do ultimately, then the matter at issue becomes what is also an important matter, the equity of the taxes which the government proposes.

We object to this increase in the gasoline tax, not only on broad philosophical grounds, but also because we think it is less equitable than other sources of revenue that would be available to the government. We are saying to the government at this stage that if it believes that it has to raise a certain amount of money from this area, then there is a more equitable way of doing it and that is by a weight distance tax. Therefore, we have proposed an alternative to the government that instead of the two-cent increase in the gasoline tax, it should consider a weight distance tax.

The problem at the present time, as we see it, is that the owner and operator of the private motor vehicle is being saddled with an undue share of the burden of highway costs. The major contributors to those costs are the large transports, which in our opinion, under the present system of taxation, are not paying their fair share of the cost of highways, either of construction costs or of maintenance costs. I think it has been estimated that approximately five per cent of the motor vehicles of the province are responsible for about 50 per cent of highway costs; and most particularly construction costs, because it is the large motor vehicle on the highway which makes necessary an extremely heavy and expensive form of construction.

We say that the government has not even now provided for an equitable apportionment of the burdens of highway expenditures between the different users of the highway. We suggest that, if it now feels that highways provide an appropriate source from which to look for new revenue, it should at least not make the inequity any worse than it is now.

We think it can avoid that pitfall by adopting a weight distance tax, which will throw the burden of the increased tax where we say it belongs, on the people who are creating the costs on the highways, the people who are operating large transports, miniature freight trains indeed, on the highways. These are the vehicles which are causing a large part of the increased expenditures on highways, and therefore we say these are the vehicles from which the additional revenue should come. Not the driver of the ordinary passenger vehicle who, in our opinion, is already contributing at least his share, and we say more than his share, of the cost of highway construction and maintenance.

I was rather tickled by the hon. Provincial Treasurer's reference in his Budget speech to the fact that this tax will now be no higher than it is in any of the provinces east of Ontario. This is a rather cute way of putting it because he will now be imposing, I believe, a tax which will be higher than the gasoline tax in any of the provinces west of Ontario. I think the provinces west of Ontario should also be considered in the overall calculation.

At any rate, we are mainly concerned with Ontario. We say to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that, even when one starts from his own assumption as to the need for increased revenue, he can get his increased revenue without increasing the gasoline tax for the ordinary motor vehicle driver.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, we have proposed an amendment which I think is an appropriate type of amendment on second reading, in that it puts forward an alternative to the proposal the government has put before us. We believe the amendment represents sound policy. I am not so optimistic as to believe at this late date that the hon. Provincial Treasurer is going to accept our amendment; but I would suggest to him that the government should quit fooling around with this question of the weight distance tax, which they have been doing for the last ten years, and really get down to business and study it, so that the next time he wants to increase taxes, that one might be within his area of consideration.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at first, although I suspect it is recognized by all the hon. members, that the imposition of additional taxes is not a pleasant responsibility. And I may say to the hon. members that the most careful consideration was given to this matter, because, after all, we became aware, as we studied the finances of this province, that additional revenue was necessary if we were to maintain the good credit this province has enjoyed through the years.

Having reached that decision, we looked about as to where this additional revenue might be derived. I should perhaps have said before this that, in the study of the finances of the province, we realized that a greater amount of money was necessary if we were to continue to build and to maintain our highways in the province to the standard we have had through the years. I think everyone in Ontario is proud of the highways, and of the roads and streets we have in this province.

Expenditures have been increasing on these, as the hon. leader of the Opposition pointed out today, or it may have been the hon. member for York South, who mentioned that gasoline taxes were last increased in 1957. Since that time there has been a tremendous amount of money spent on our highways and the results are apparent to everyone. We have a system of highways in this province of which we are all proud. We have maintained our highways in the winter time; our winter maintenance I think is superior to any other jurisdiction in the whole of North America.

Mr. Speaker, these things cannot be done without cost. So, as we endeavour to find new sources of revenue, and we did give consideration to the weight distance tax as has been mentioned by the hon. member for York South—and may I say to him that I was very interested in that tax at one time; perhaps it was because of the plausible way he used to expound the advantages of such a tax.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Prime Minister endorsed the idea.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not saying that. I was just saying how I was almost convinced—

Mr. Bryden: Then Toryism took over; is that it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No. But even while I was still more closely associated with highways than I am now, we gave this matter a great deal of study. I would point out to the hon. member that he has not looked all around this question, that there is not the lack of equalization he has mentioned. I would point out to him that we have a very fortunate situation with respect to highways in this province. I suppose other jurisdictions could say likewise.

We found, when we looked into this matter, that we required all the highway service that we have on weekends, when there were no trucks on the road, and we recognized how fortunate it was that the traffic was divided; that during the week there was a great deal of commercial and truck traffic, and during the weekends—when do we have our traffic jams? We have those on the weekends. When one takes into consideration that the right of way must be there, the road surface must be there, the winter maintenance must be there, we concluded that it was reasonable to increase the tax on gasoline two cents a gallon, which amounts to five per cent of the cost of the product. And when one looks about, one does not find many instances where the cost of any product has not increased more than five per cent in seven years.

So we did not feel that this was an unjust tax, or an unjust increase in tax having regard to its effect on our motorists. We must recognize that a motorist travels from place to place in much shorter time than he did even seven years ago. We think of the delays in traffic which have ceased to exist because of the great improvement in our highways. When we think of a four-lane highway which extends from Windsor to Montreal, with the exception of a very short distance where it is two lanes, we think of all these without tolls. I have in my hand a copy of a broadcast by Gordon Sinclair; if anyone was not convinced that this was a reasonable increase in tax, I should read this.

Mr. Bryden: Is he our leading economist?

An hon. member: Voice of the people.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, but he is a very wise observer.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: When he points out the very great advantages that the people of the province have now as a result of the improvement in the roads, I am sure that my hon. friends opposite would be almost persuaded to vote for this bill.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The hon. Minister lost me when he mentioned Gordon Sinclair.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member was already lost.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the contributions to this debate by the hon. leader of the Opposition but I would point out to this hon. gentleman, whom I am very fond of, that I find it difficult to know which day I should believe the statements that come from his associates opposite, because as I have listened to everything they have said—

Mr. Bryden: Consistency is to have different policies.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have heard nothing by way of advice to us that we should decrease expenditures in any way. The criticism that I hear always is that our expenditures should be greater. Some governments have tried to spend more and reduce taxes at the same time, but that is really quite a trick, if you can do it.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): You tell us about your surpluses every year.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We have surpluses. And I tell the hon. members about the sound finances of the province and I tell them that they may be sure that it was felt by this government that it was in the interests of the people of the province to keep their financial position sound, and that is the reason we have increased the tax on gasoline two cents per gallon.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, did I understand the hon. Provincial Treasurer to say that this is used to improve the roads in the province? Did he say that when he was talking there?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, every cent of it could be used for highways. The hon. member knows very well that taxes in this province are not dedicated, but the amount we are proposing to collect by way of gasoline and fuel tax and other taxes that are imposed on those who use the highways, is still not sufficient to pay the costs, to meet the expenditures that we make on those highways.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I am awfully sorry to have to disagree with the hon. Provincial Treasurer in what he has said because I use his own Budget figures. This year $218 million in gasoline tax, motor vehicle tax of $11.3 million, licences and permits of $84 million, for a total of $313.3 million, and the total amount to be spent on highways this year is $299,406,000. In other words, Mr. Speaker, they are making money out of the people who are driving on the highways of the province of Ontario. Those are his own figures and at the present time he denies it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would only get the proper information from me before he makes a statement, I could save him the embarrassment of making statements that were not correct. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. members of this House, that as you know The Department of Transport is a department, the services of which are used to serve the people who use the highways; likewise the provincial police, who police the highways, at a cost of $14 million per year.

Mr. Whicher: Do they not help with robberies in the province, too?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The section of the provincial police which polices the highways costs $14 million per year. This year, the year in which we are now, our total highway expenditures, including these two items last mentioned, are $289,944,000. Our revenue, and the last four months of the expenditures and revenues are estimated, as you know, is $265,158,000. In the coming year, after the imposition of the extra two cents of gasoline tax, it is estimated that expenditures will be $310,853,000, and that our revenues will be $302,309,000. So there is a greater amount of money than the amount that is raised from these sources being used to serve the people who use the highways.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I must remind the members now that we have discussed the principles of the bill. The discussion the member for Bruce has brought up could perhaps be more properly dealt with when we are talking about this matter in committee. As we are talking about figures and details, it does not have anything to do with the principle of the bill which we are discussing now.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, of course you can appreciate the fact that the figures were introduced by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, and I do not believe that there—

Mr. Speaker: Order! We shall vote first on the amendment before the House as proposed by Mr. MacDonald. All those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye". All those opposed will please say "nay".

In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 5, the "nays", 83.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe it is the standing practice of this House, followed at all times and reported in the rules of the House, that when an amendment to the second reading of a bill is negatived, the second reading is automatically carried. In other words, there is one vote. In my observation of procedures in this House, it has always been that when such a vote has been negatived, the Clerk stands up and declares second reading of the bill. That is standard procedure and it has been ruled upon by this House. I would refer you, sir, to rule 56 of the rules as published in Lewis's Parliamentary Procedure:

If on an amendment to the question that a bill be now read a second or third time it is decided that the word "now" or any word proposed to be left out stand part of the question, Mr. Speaker shall forthwith declare the bill to be read a second or third time as the case may be.

Mr. Singer: That was not the motion.

Mr. Bryden: The terminology there, Mr. Speaker, comes from the British House of Commons where the question is actually put, "Shall the words struck out form part of the motion", but it is exactly the same question as putting the amendment. The motion is now automatically carried.

The Liberal Party, apparently to its embarrassment, has voted in favour of the second reading. If they did not know what they were doing that is nothing new, Mr. Speaker, but I submit that the rules of the House should be complied with and the bill should be now declared read a second time.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the member for Woodbine that that ruling only applies to a hoist motion. You have heard the ruling and to the best of my knowledge that ruling only applies to a hoist motion and there is no hoist motion before the House.

I shall now call the vote on the main motion. All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, are we clear on the motion? Would you put the motion, please?

Mr. Speaker: We are now voting on the motion that is before the House, of Mr. Allan's bill, second reading of the bill.

All those in favour of the motion please say "aye".

All those opposed, please say "nay".

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 65, the "nays", 24.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL TAX ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves second reading of Bill No. 41, An Act to amend The Motor Vehicle Fuel Tax Act.

Mr. Oliver: We are opposed to this bill for the same reasons, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: How about the NDP?

Another hon. member: We do not know yet.

Mr. Bryden: Our position is crystal clear.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House the motion carry?

Some hon. members: Oh, no, no!

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Could we record the vote on the same basis?

Mr. Oliver: Is the position of my hon. friend clear?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! I declare the vote carried on the same division.

Clerk of the House: The 24th order—resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion, that Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair, and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. J. M. Gould (Bracondale): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the Budget debate, may I respectfully, by way of reiteration, state that I am today, as I did the other day, speaking as a Liberal in opposition. And if hon. members wish to regard that which I have said and that which I am about to say as my blueprint for Liberal action in Ontario, if I were privileged to lead the Liberal Party in this province, then they are at liberty so to do.

Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate I believe I was at the point where I had indicated that this government had failed to control expenditures and that Liberals would demand a public inquiry into our public accounts. Indeed, sir, I was saying that there are many more, but here are a dozen questions the Liberal Opposition would ask at such inquiry.

As I mentioned previously, question 1: How much was spent in the last 20 years by Tory governments on account of travelling expenses? I then proceeded to question 2: How many unpaid bills were carried over to reduce the total expenditure for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963? In addition to what I have already said, let me add that the capital accounts up to March 31, 1963 show that this government had on hand unpaid bills, which are normally charged as ordinary expenditures, to a total of $1,775,988.31.

One wonders, Mr. Speaker, to what extent this government resorted to the practice of holding over bills and accounts in order to reduce the expenditure picture? A probe of government surpluses would certainly be interesting. What would the provincial auditor, under oath, say as to these government surpluses?

With the government moving to increase its borrowing because its revenues are insufficient, the hon. Provincial Treasurer's (Mr. Allan's) statement that he is budgeting for a surplus of some $855,000 for the fiscal period ending March 31, 1965, is plainly unadulterated nonsense.

Question 3: How many millions of dollars were paid and will be paid by the Ontario taxpayer in United States exchange on account of loan repayments and on account of interest on loans made in the United States?

Question 4: And our sinking fund, how much does that really amount to today? Much of it, Mr. Speaker, is invested in securities, but how much is invested in uninvested funds? And where are those funds?

Some ten years ago our sinking fund was about $156 million, of which $127 million was invested in securities and the remaining $29 million was in uninvested funds. Investments then included investments in the Ontario Northland Railway, and in United States securities. We were investing our taxpayers' money in United States securities while pleading poverty and the need for more of such taxpayers' money. One wonders whether repayment to us is in United States funds and whether we actually receive the benefit of the United States exchange.

Question 5: Should $30,207,934.42 owing by the Ontario Northland Railway be written off as a government loss? Why is this railway operating at a loss? Should we put more Ontario money into this project without study of its operating costs and its management, I ask?

This amount is carried in our books as an asset. I suggest to hon. members that this is fiscal absurdity. This is no longer an asset of our government; this debt has been owing to the province of Ontario since 1936. It bears no interest and it seems to me that it will never be collected. For 30 years the railway has not paid the province one cent on account of this $30 million debt.

In the Throne debate I believe the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) made some comment relative to Moosonee and the feasibility of locating a port there. Like the hon. member methinks this government is indulging in wishful thinking. Methinks it is living far in the past when it speaks of Moosonee and a port. Mr. Speaker, a reading of Ontario history reveals that over 30 years ago, Conservative leaders on the completion of the Northern Ontario railway to James Bay, announced that the event opened fresh avenues to the progress of Ontario. The new terminus at Moosonee was destined to become an important distributing centre. I ask, Mr. Speaker, a distributing centre for what? Contraband firewater!

Mr. Speaker, I was up there two years ago, and so was the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and the only terminus I saw, and the only terminus he saw, was a 2 x 2 shack, and close by a garbage dump with Indian women rummaging through it for scraps of tin from discarded cans.

Hon. G. C. Wardrobe (Minister of Mines): I was there.

Mr. Gould: And the Cree Indian children—the hon. Minister heard this—they are truly among the lost souls of our province.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you. Some who are bright are taken from their homes, they are given training in schools and then they are sent back home to help hunt or fish or hang around in idleness. Why? Because our training scheme makes no provision for their employment after completion of their training. It is really a pity. We take these young people from their homes. We train them for jobs and when they have completed their training, we tell them, "Sorry, there are no jobs for you." Then we send them back home.

I say if Ontario has a heart it will also do something for these northern young men and women, the Eskimos, as well as the Indian.

Last year the Ontario Northland Railway lost over $500,000 in its operation and now, in addition thereto, Mr. Speaker, I understand the railway will be losing another $185,000 in mail subsidy from the federal government by reason of the proposed removal, by management, of one of its trains from its line. I suggest this is poor management. Instead of removing the train, management should keep it and make improvements to it. Why does management not continue with the mail on its Star Transport truck-line service?

Mr. Speaker, our northern towns are upset about this removal of two trains. There is actually one train with two runs—one up and one back. They are upset because the removal of the train will put about 30 men out of work; upset because the mail will now be delayed one day, since the mail will no longer be sorted while being carried on trains. Mr. Speaker, you just cannot sort mail while it is being carried by truck.

For some time, together with most hon. members, I have heard talk about a motel for Moosonee. But I ask: How can The Department of Tourism expect to attract tourists to Moosonee when, in the first place, the railway management concentrates on carrying freight and not passengers and, in the second place, when the government sets up a dozen trailers as the motel accommodation for tourists in Moosonee? Moosonee may not be suitable for an ocean port but it is certainly suitable for a modern motel for the accommodation of tourists. Today a tourist is a lucrative commodity.

And now may I proceed to question 6 which will be asked at the public inquiry? Does this government still have United States of America Treasury bills held in safekeeping in New York city, or any other American city; and, if so, have these been verified by actual account, and how much do they amount to?

Question 7: How many of our public accounts are there which are not certified by auditors? What are these accounts?

Question 8: Are there any individuals or corporations evading our taxation?

Sir, it is common opinion that wealthy residents of Ontario, who have incorporated personal companies in other countries and in far-off foreign lands for the purpose of evading our taxation, should be made liable to taxes. Our Treasury needs them, and I believe should account for some of their wealth made and accumulated here. One wonders how much of our much-needed revenue would be derived from these citizens.

Question 9: Hydro, with its loan debt of $351 million guaranteed by the province of Ontario—what did these loans to Hydro actually cost our Treasury? What did it cost the man on the street, or that man in the gallery?

It is interesting to note that, last year, Ontario paid over $57 million in debt charges alone. In ten years, 1949-59, Ontario actually paid $508,519,548.08 in debt charges. In 1963, about seven cents of every dollar of revenue was spent on debt charges. If money is readily available, as our hon. Provincial Treasurer suggests, then why cannot Ontario get it cheaply?

It is said "as Hydro goes, so goes Ontario." Mr. Speaker, if this is so, then one is prompted to ask, "Have we over-borrowed? How badly is our credit tarnished?" Indeed, one wonders if a second look at Hydro will disclose squandering of money and other questionable land deals.

Question 10: The 1963 public accounts show some $77 million on deposit in the Provincial Savings Bank, of which some $75 million are on deposit with the hon. Treasurer of Ontario and some $1.6 million is in cash, on hand, and in banks—now just where are our savings' deposits? In the hon. Provincial Treasurer's office? In the downtown bank vaults? And how much?

Question 11: How many special beneficiaries of government spending are there? Who are they and why are they being favoured? Is there over-budgeting; if so, to what extent? Is the government indulging in the mingling of accounts?

Question 12: How much has this government spent, and how much will it be spending, on control and education in relation to alcoholism and drug addiction, and in relation to the elimination of dangerous level crossings in our built-up communities?

Just what was done with the $1.5 million in the 1963 Health estimates in relation to alcoholism and drug addiction? Just where is the $1,876,000, ear-marked in the 1964 estimates for alcoholism and drug addiction—where is that going to go?

Mr. Speaker, last year the alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation spent only $250,000 on their total programme for both alcohol and all other addictions. Mr. Speaker, I again say to this House that, if I were leader of the Opposition, I would demand a full-dress inquiry into our public accounts to learn how we can best reduce the cost of government, how we can best go about retrenchment, and to learn how much our education programme has cost us and how much they will really cost us in the future.

Mr. Speaker, this government shouts from political rooftops that it is taking steps to expand industry and create jobs, but it seems to me that the steps are being taken in the wrong direction. We are moving in the wrong direction. In dealing with the taxable income of corporations our federal government in its effort to stimulate the economy and reduce unemployment, has provided by legislation for a three-year tax holiday, as well as an accelerated rate of depreciation, for companies in designated areas—sometimes popularly called "depressed" areas—which are certified by the ministry of industry, as a new manufacturing or a processing business which commences to do business in the 24-month period beginning in December, 1963 and ending in December, 1965.

Our hon. Provincial Treasurer, in his Budget address, indicates that Ontario will co-operate with the federal government by providing for accelerated rates of depreciation, but he does not propose to co-operate in the granting of the three-year tax holiday. And I ask: Why the half-way-only policy of our government? Why does our government remove 50 per cent of the incentive? I say, Mr. Speaker, to the extent that the Ontario government is not co-operating with our federal government, it is sabotaging the effort of our federal government to expand industry and create jobs.

The hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), and I wish he were here, with Napoleonic stance and triumphant tone announced to this House the other day that "Ontario was now the most fully automated province," or words to that effect. But automation, I point out, is no guarantee to our labour force that it will not destroy more jobs than it will create. Increased taxation does not create jobs. A prudent stimulus to encourage industry and help create jobs is tax cutting. Right now the United States is not increasing, it is reducing, taxes. And while economic experts keep telling this government—and I agree another government too—that tax reductions in the United States could result in deterioration of our competitive position if they are not countered by corresponding action in Canada, this government still goes on preaching about industrial expansion while increasing taxes, while increasing our net debt. I recommend that we spend a little of our education fund to teach our government's financial experts basic economic principles.

I would also call to the attention of these same Conservative fiscal dwarfs that in helping to prepare the Budget, they lost sight of the fact that there is a lot of truth in the saying that Canada is a satellite of the United States, and Ontario is both a major and important part of that satellite. They should know that a satellite is an obsequious follower and if the United States cuts taxes then Ontario should cut taxes. That, I suggest, would be a politically prudent course for our government to pursue at this time. The same course, I admit, that another government might follow at this time, too.

But is this government able so to do in the face of its planned increased spending, in face of the millions of dollars in loan repayments and interest payments which it will be obliged to pay on outstanding government loans? Therein lies the dilemma, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, there are many Tory things I am critical of but one which I am least critical of today is the matter of education in Ontario. I admit somewhat shamefacedly that this attitude on my part is influenced by the fact that I am a sentimentalist, influenced by the fact that as a public school boy I came here with class and teacher, sat in the east gallery, which I now face and look up to when I plead for that man in the gallery. I see myself once again as a school boy sitting there, leaning over the rail looking down on this House with hands under chin. Mr. Speaker, an opportunity for education was given to me and I should like to see others be given a similar opportunity.

I am sure so would the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), and every hon. Minister of this House, including every hon. member. They, too, would like to see every individual given an opportunity to become educated.

As some hon. members know, I was raised in a working man's home. As a matter of fact I was raised on the street known as St. Patrick Street some three blocks south of this House. I sold daily and weekly newspapers on the streets of downtown Toronto. I sold the Evening Telegram, the Mail and Empire, Toronto Daily Star, and some of you may recall, the Sunday World. I attended McCaul Street Public School, an elementary school, which was located at the corner of University Avenue and Elm Street, where now stands the new Mount Sinai Hospital. That is some two blocks south of this House. And then I attended Jarvis Collegiate Institute, a secondary school, still located at the corner of Wellesley and Jarvis Streets, some four blocks east of this House. Thereafter I attended the University of Toronto, well known as a post-secondary school, which is located across the way just to the west of this House. And from there under the supervision of the Law Society of Upper Canada I was privileged to attend Osgoode Hall law school, located at the corner of University and Queen Street, just three blocks southeasterly from this legislative assembly.

This opportunity was given to me without regard to the race, colour, religion or political affiliation of my parents. This right to an education, to go on learning, was given to my immigrant parents and to me as their son. I am thankful that one's countenance or tongue or complexion plays no part in our educational system, be he white, black, yellow and even red.

Mr. Speaker, most people start out in life intending to write one kind of story and usually end up writing another kind of story. No matter my ambition to be a lawyer—without an education, elementary, secondary and university, I might have today been an untrained, unskilled taxpayer speculating as to my next employment or who knows, worse still, I might have been persuaded to become a Tory or even an NDP politician, but perish that thought.

Mr. Speaker, for the educational opportunities afforded me by this province and its taxpayers I am ever grateful. Mr. Speaker, for the educational opportunities to be afforded others in days to come, I must pause in justice to our hon. Prime Minister. I must declare that I am not unmindful that when he accepted the portfolio of education he was inheriting a department which was operating on archaic policy and principle. They were suitable perhaps in the days of the red shack schoolhouse with its two-sided, two-door out-house appurtenant thereto. I declare that just a little more than ordinary credit is due to the hon. Prime Minister for his refreshing effort in moving—maybe a little slowly, but moving nevertheless—in refashioning Ontario's policy of education, even if he had some difficulty at the outset, in reading the writing on the wall. And I declare that if there is one department where this government appears to have made progress, and is making progress, then it is in The Department of Education.

Mr. Speaker, while I acknowledge first that with the recent scientific advances in other parts of the world, education has acquired a new significance, and secondly that more widespread education is one of the most essential measures to cope with unemployment, and thirdly that there can be no real equality of opportunity until such time as the amount spent on the education of each child in every municipality is approximately the same, and fourthly that the growth in enrolment in our schools continues to impose a heavy strain upon our resources, both financial and physical—while I acknowledge all of these things, I am still not in agreement with this government when it continues in this day of increasing costs and higher taxes to make the homeowner bear the cost of education in this province. Find the money for education this government will, as it must, but it cannot any longer, I suggest, come from taxes on real estate.

I listened to the hon. Minister of Education when he spoke in this House several weeks ago in relation to the Ontario Foundation Tax Plan. He stated one of the main objects of the plan to be, and I use his words, "to ensure that the ever-increasing costs of elementary and secondary school education did not bear too heavily on the homeowner and other municipal taxpayers of the province."

Here I agree for the moment that the scheme of provincial grants for school boards—provincial grants to school boards—under the plan is a step in the right direction. But I submit the government must go one step further. Sir, on the presumption that you have read the history of different administrations which have in years past ruled Ontario, I remind you that some 25 years ago the McArthur committee, set up by a Liberal administration to inquire into the cost of education reported, and I quote: "It is desirable that the burden of taxation on real estate for school purposes should be reduced."

That was the beginning, and from that time to this day the homeowner did get tax relief but it was and it still is only partial tax relief. Today, taking the provincial average, real estate pays 50 per cent more or less of the cost of education.

Mr. Speaker, the time is close at hand when this province should assume full cost of education and free municipal grants and funds for other projects. If I were the leader of the Liberal Party in this province I would go one step further than the McArthur committee and propose that the cost of education be wholly removed from real estate. Yes, I would pledge that the burden of taxation on real estate for school purposes would be removed after 1970. This is possible, this is coming, as we shall see, I predict, from the bid for support which will be made to Ontario electors, by all the parties in this House, at the time of the next provincial election.

This is no laughing matter, Mr. Speaker, and if the hon. Prime Minister and his Conservative government think it is, then I say to them: Keep laughing, you may find yourselves laughed right out of office in the very same way Mr. Henry and his Tory government was laughed right out of this very House some 30 years ago after he laughed when the Liberal leader of the day advocated in this very House that the cost of provincial highways should be wholly paid by this province. That Liberal premier in his first budget said, and these words may be familiar to many of the hon. members, Mr. Speaker, and I quote:

It should be the desire and object of this government to do everything possible to relieve the overburdened taxpayer and as a contribution to this end the entire burden of provincial highways will now be lifted from the municipalities and assumed by the province.

This proposal became a reality under the Liberal administration and the full cost of provincial highways was paid by the province from that day on.

Mr. Speaker, these same words will be applied to the cost of education upon the return of a Liberal administration in this province.

In this province today, and it is worth repeating, Mr. Speaker, our hon. Provincial Treasurer in his Budget address stated that Ontario increased its highway cost in the past 10 years from $103 million to $280 million, and that of the $280 million of our money some $200 million, $199 million to be exact, will be spent for new roads, and that this government intends to go on spending and increasing the spending of our money on provincial highways. I say, very good. But this money should not be spent for such purposes at this time when we are in the midst of a crisis in the cost of education. I have said the same before and I will say the same again, if need be, for emphasis.

Commenting on the Budget one hon. member said the biggest chunk of money is for education. Mr. Speaker, little critical or not of the government's education programme I am nonetheless critical of the government's proposed spending of $412 million for education and schools. I am concerned whether or not the government is spending this money wisely.

Now, I know there are many problems involved, but we are dealing with our children, yours and mine; we are dealing with our fellow men, yours and mine; and it appears that we must, even if it be with some reluctance because of the heavy expenditure involved, sir, we must take the position that support, financial as well as moral, should be given to our present education programme.

Everyone knows that mounting unemployment in the unskilled fields stands in the path of all Canadians. That the uneducated, untrained and unskilled are going to face longer periods of unemployment. That there will be, Mr. Speaker, many more uneducated, untrained and unskilled people amongst those who will soon be immigrating to Canada and to Ontario in the wave of immigration now planned by the Liberal government in Ottawa in order to help enlarge our domestic market so that we will have more people to sell our goods to at home. The unskilled, not readily able to earn a living, will look to the government for one form of relief or another. It is both in our interests and essential to our survival to devote a little more of our public funds to the training and education of our people. As time goes on we in Ontario will become less dependent on possession of raw materials and developed resources. We will find ourselves depending more on skills, knowledge and aptitude of our people.

In the United States, it is estimated 25,000 jobs become obsolete every week. As we face automation we must face up to the fact that this kind of change is going to take place in our country and it is going to be with us for a long, long time. About 70 per cent of the young people in this country drop out of school before they complete the high school graduation work or junior matriculation. They are filling the ranks of the unskilled and will surely face unemployment.

Now, academic training in basic subjects such as arithmetic, mathematics and the elements of science and the ability to read and write properly are necessary foundation stones, but in today's complicated and sophisticated society they must be considered only as foundation stones and not a suitable point at which the young person should step out into the world looking for a job. To my mind, the parents who want their children educated so that they will be enabled thereby to find suitable employment, must accept part of this challenge in the crisis years between now and the year 1970, I mentioned a moment ago, for it is they who, as taxpayers, will be paying the staggering amounts of money which will be needed.

But Liberals ask how much will be needed and can this taxpayer take the additional tax burden. Is this government over-budgeting for education? Will the money be spent wisely by this government? Of course, teachers and others in all levels of education who are keenly aware of the problems must also accept part of this challenge. And those of us in the front row to my left who sit in legislatures whether it be at this level or the municipal level or the national level, we and they, too, must accept part of this challenge.

Mr. Speaker, records reveal that Ontario universities admitted some 11,500 freshmen last fall, the largest number ever. This is 1,600 more than were admitted the previous year, and I understand from information available that, by 1970, we will have to provide in Ontario for approximately 100,000 university students.

Some think that the solution of numbers is higher admission requirements. That is wrong. Some think that everyone should go to university. This, too, Mr. Speaker, may be wrong. We cannot refuse anyone the opportunity to pursue his education as his abilities, interests and desires dictate. We must not only provide the facilities, but we must also convince parents that their children should not only stay in school but continue on until they have provided themselves with a suitable stepping stone to employment. We must discourage students from becoming drop-outs.

Lack of education at one time meant that the individual would have to be content with menial work. It is becoming evident that now, and especially in the years to come, as I have already stated, it will mean that such individuals will likely become a charge on public funds. For the well-being of our society, it is the duty of this government and any government which may succeed it, to see that as many young people as possible develop saleable skills; otherwise the problems of unemployment and delinquency in Ontario will be insupportable. Higher education is no longer a social status to be enjoyed by relatively few young men. Our universities must keep pace with the growing enrolment. In this way taxpayers' money will be put to good use for it will be an investment in the future.

Mr. Speaker, Liberal policy is to make Ontario an opportunity state, not a welfare state. Here then, by educating our people, is one way we can make it so. From figures available—may I go on? I find that, in 1962, government at all levels in Canada contributed approximately $63 million in capital funds to universities. Private sources accounted for a lesser amount of approximately $45 million. Of the latter sum, only about $8 million was provided by Canadian corporations. The corporate giving record today for education in Ontario is not sufficient, especially in view of the fact that among the chief beneficiaries of university programmes are the businesses which employ their graduates.

In the United States big industry is more oriented to supporting the universities. It should be the same here, I suggest, Mr. Speaker.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, our hon. Minister of Education visited Ottawa to consult with the federal Minister of Labour regarding an extension of the Dominion-provincial technical vocational scheme. I was pleased to learn that the Liberal government in Ottawa indicated that it would consider contributing to the operating costs of the schools now established under this plan. I am convinced that this Dominion-provincial scheme carried out by the Liberal Ottawa and the Conservative Ontario governments is a big step in providing certain young people with more than just a diploma. It will provide young people with specific skills in terminal courses which will upgrade them substantially in their pursuit of employment. And the move of the government to create a Department of University Affairs also is a major step forward.

There is some concern, I hear, over the possibility of government exercising control over academic programmes. If such be the case, then the government should now spell out in concise terms where it stands in this regard so as to allay the fears of those within universities and out who are concerned with academic freedom.

The programme of university expansion last year was assisted by government grants totalling some $70 million which went towards new buildings and operating costs and scholarship awards to graduate students.

Mr. Speaker, since we now, more than ever, must look at education from the standpoint that it is not just money spent, but money invested, it will be essential for our Legislature to determine what priority education is to be given in government spending. It is here that the Liberals in Opposition want to have some say.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to keeping costs at a minimum, a search for ways to improve our education system in this province should be a continuing thing. One of them is research in areas such as school construction costs. Architectural experiment with grotesquely modern school structures must be reduced to a minimum.

Another is the matter of university entrance. Competition for entrance to our universities is increasing and students feel they have to apply to three or four institutions at the same time to assure gaining admission.

More so is the case with non-scholarship and borderline students. Recently, I understand, the registrar of the University of Toronto suggested that there should be a special clearing house for all applications. Overflow or rejections from a students' college of first choice would automatically be passed on to the college of a second choice. The one application form would serve all Ontario universities.

I submit that this is an area where the new Department of University Affairs might well inaugurate a new and useful service. However, one of the unfortunate things about the Ontario system of education is the disparity between urban and rural schools, between the physical as well as the teaching conditions.

The complaints about frills on the one hand and primitive conditions on the other are part of the same fundamental problem. How do we provide an equitable system of schooling which does not give preferred treatment to some children but gives all children, wherever they may live, the same opportunity to become informed and prepared intellectually and technically for the future?

In my opinion, the day of the small area school board is gone. Considerable saving can be made in this province if the number of school boards are reduced from some 3,500 to some manageable number. The money saved would reduce the cost of our education programmes. I was happy to hear the hon. Minister of Education the other day in this House introduce a bill which would cut by half the number of our school boards. I agree that this is a step in the right direction. Steps should be taken to solve the Grade 13 problem. A serious look should be taken at the feasibility of introducing junior colleges in this province. And equally important are some of the problems facing us in the area of post-secondary education. I appeal to this government if it is to raise millions of dollars from its taxpayers that it must take more than a passing interest in how this money is spent by our universities.

It may be that our universities did not get all they wanted for their capital costs but they certainly got all they wanted from this government for their operating costs. When a university asks for money, they should show in detail the specific purposes for which it intends using such monies, and it should establish to our satisfaction that it has been spending our monies for the very purpose for which it was given to the university.

Last year our universities received grants totalling $70 million. Our hon. Provincial Treasurer reports that next year such grants will be increased by some $30 million to $100 million. This is, I understand, something less than the total amount our universities were seeking from our government.

Mr. Speaker, this House may be interested in knowing that our universities are in possession of a substantial fund composed of millions of our dollars not yet used by them for university purposes, and while this situation exists they keep demanding annually and our Treasury keeps shelling out more and more money to them. If this is so, then it must stop. If it is a fact that our universities have not spent what they were given last year, they should not continue to ask for more now. Now, I would ask this government to ascertain how much of our money given to our universities is still in their hands unused, for building and for education purposes. Hon. members, sir, including this member, will be interested in hearing the answer.

Mr. Speaker, may I go on by noting that the hon. Provincial Treasurer estimates in his Budget, and this is confirmed by the hon. Minister of Mines, that the value of mineral production will show a decline for the year 1963 and likely also for the year 1964. This is all the more reason why this government should seriously reflect upon the cry of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) when he clearly warned this House at the opening of this session that this province must now develop its vast natural resources with renewed vigour. The wealth created by our mining operations will be for some time to come a major factor in our whole economic structure. We have heard it said over the years that Ontario is blessed as to its natural resources. Most of northern Ontario and a part of southern Ontario are on the Canadian or Pre-Cambrian Shield, one of the richest mineral areas on this earth, with nickel, copper, gold, asbestos, iron and zinc. Some 25 years ago Ontario mineral production amounted to $219,925,000. In 1962 the hon. Provincial Treasurer reported that Ontario production amounted to some $902 million.

This is really a drop in the bucket, for the shield has hardly been scratched. There are still many more minerals to be found and many more mines to be developed in Ontario. Our natural resources should and can bring us billions of dollars in revenue. Right now there is an exceptionally heavy demand for our zinc.

Mr. Speaker, I say that there are billions upon billions of dollars in top ranking minerals covered by over-burden moss, birch, pine, muskeg and swamp, waiting to be discovered and removed from Ontario rocks. I am sure the hon. Minister of Mines, who is now taking his seat, will agree. Yes, I have seen the rocks for mile after mile in the northland, from Orillia right up to Moosonee, and so has the hon. Minister of Mines. It should be the duty of this government to encourage and assist prospecting and mining development by organizing and financing a search for new mines.

To promote exploration of Ontario mineral resources by airborne magnetometer survey, geological mapping and publication of mining reports as presently proposed by this government are not enough. I say these are never as good as man with tent, prospecting by foot in the bush. Let the hon. Minister send his government geologists into a field when there is evidence of a new find and let them, with their knowledge and their skill and their advice, help bring in a commercial ore body. Everybody benefits, I am sure the hon. Minister will agree, everybody benefits from a new mine—employment, sales of minerals and, what is essential, government revenue. I say, let Ontario venture a little risk capital in its own natural resource. It cannot lose.

The hon. Minister of Mines should immediately introduce legislation providing tangible incentives to prospecting and the finding of more commercial ore bodies. Failure to do so at this time will leave this government open to censure for some time to come. Our economy, our desperate need for revenue demands this kind of government action now. If I were leader I would recognize that we must expand our mining industry and that prospecting is a vital part of such industry. I would prefer expanding our mining industry to expanding the stomachs of some of our hon. Ministers or perhaps expanding another part of their anatomy.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Would you care to read my speech this year on the mining estimates?

Mr. Gould: I would say to the hon. Minister: Move that part of anatomy that I just mentioned. I would declare that Bay Street and James Street have been mined long enough. I would recommend mining our great Pre-Cambrian Shield, the Canadian Shield. I would recommend that Ontario go into the mining business; it would be a much nicer business and it would be more profitable than the liquor, race track or gasoline businesses.

I would have the government organize and finance one of the greatest manhunts for commercial ore bodies ever witnessed. I would grubstake 1,000 men to prospect the shield from end to end with hammer and portable drill. Before leaving this subject may I add a suggestion by way of friendly advice to the hon. Minister of Mines for whom I have genuine affection: If his Conservative Party would harness and apply in searching for new mines the same energy generated by it during the last provincial election in searching for Conservative votes, then many new commercial ore bodies in northern Ontario would soon be discovered and developed.

History teaches us that a Liberal administration brought Ontario back to the policy of cheap Hydro power for Ontario people. What then about government policy of obtaining cheap money for Ontario people, by our Treasury borrowing from our own taxpayers by the issue of the province of Ontario "prosperity" bonds repayable at a fair rate of interest and in Canadian funds? Of course, we have no such policy, because savings deposits in our provincial bank only total about $75 million; and because of the reluctance of our Treasury to alter their borrowing pattern for fear it might antagonize the United States clique of moneylending houses who might make it difficult for Ontario to readily borrow money in New York at some future time; and because our financial brain trust, while making a lot of noise, wherever it be and whenever it can, about "hippo" and "moose," and "look for made in Canada," are quietly paying out to United States financiers millions upon millions of our dollars in interest payments, with an added eight per cent United States exchange more or less.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Ontario should embark on a campaign encouraging "invest in or buy Ontario prosperity bonds—your money will be used by your government to promote and maintain prosperity in your province." Ontario should embark on a campaign to encourage Ontario people to deposit their money for safekeeping in our provincial savings bank. In the past 15 years, deposits in the province of Ontario—in our bank, our provincial bank, and there is only one—rose some $10 million, from approximately $65 million to $75 million. In the same period chartered banks in the province increased their deposits on an average of, approximately—and I am talking of the many hundreds of chartered banks—$.5 billion to $1 billion.

I ask, if our credit rating is as high as our hon. Provincial Treasurer says it is, that our revenues are buoyant, that our province is prosperous, that there is a lot of money in Ontario, that our people have money, then why do our citizens neglect to deposit their savings with our bank? What are they afraid of? Have our people no confidence in our province, in its potential, and in its ability to pay creditors?

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that a government-sponsored campaign encouraging deposits in our provincial bank would before long raise deposits in the same bank from the present $75 million to some billion dollars or more, part or most of which could be rendered available for loan to our Treasury by appropriately amending legislation, if necessary. Government members all know that we have a friendly Liberal government in Ottawa which is most anxious to help our Conservative Ontario.

Let us take a little money, earmarked for advertising, from The Department of Tourism and a little from The Department of Economics and Development, and let us advise our people to invest in their own future, in their industry, and in their jobs, by depositing their savings in their own province of Ontario savings bank. Use of our government of these savings could save Ontario, I venture to say, millions of dollars in interest now being paid out by our government on loans heretofore made. And what is also important is the fact that we would be free from the onerous United States exchange on Canadian funds. I say: Let us spend a little less on helping foreign companies acquire a Canadian image which, frequently, we now learn, is to the detriment of domestic industry.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Gould: In view of the unhappy position in which Ontario has been placed by the folly of this 20-or-more-year-old Tory government in issuing debentures payable in United States funds, we, the people of Ontario, are now paying many millions of dollars annually in interest alone. This interest will be paid in part by Hydro consumers—you will remember Hydro owes some $351 million in loans—and in part by Ontario taxpayers. This is dead weight—and I again spell it out: D-E-A-D—dead weight on the backs of Ontario citizens. It must be removed at the earliest government opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to possess any influence in shaping the monetary policies of this government, Ontario would borrow only on conditions requiring repayment in Canadian funds. People would be encouraged to leave their savings on deposit in the Ontario savings bank and, while looking for made-in-Canada, to buy Ontario prosperity bonds. I would keep stressing reliance, stubborn reliance, on the Canadian money market.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, if tomorrow each person in Ontario deposited $100 in our provincial banks. We would immediately have close to $.75 billion available for the government on short- and on long-term loans. Indeed, elimination of United States exchange premiums of eight per cent would actually mean a savings to the Ontario taxpayer of $365,000 annually. Last year, just on loan repayments to the United States, this government paid $365,596.61 in exchange. If we are to practise economy then, Mr. Speaker, I say this is another way in which such could be accomplished.

Mr. Speaker, it is acknowledged in more than one place that the backbone of our province is the small retailer, the small businessman, 120,000 of them in Ontario. It is about time this government concerned itself with the welfare of these people. It is about time this government restored them to their proper place in our network of communities. Mr. Speaker, if you were to ask me what other positive contribution this government could make to the economic well-being and development of the province and its people I would reply: Let us take measures to encourage more small industries to set up business in our small communities and more and more people from the cities to settle in our small towns. Since the end of the last world war, and for some time before that, from the farms, from the towns, from the villages, have come to our cities men and their families attracted by the prospects of jobs and enjoyment of higher living standards. This trek from town to city should be reversed to save our emaciated, our dying towns, in the southern parts of Ontario as well as in the northern parts of Ontario.

More industry and more people in a town will help the local businessmen, both the pioneer operator and the recent arrival. Greater demand for housing, for clothing and for food will be created; the purchasing power of all town residents will be increased; individual and family security will be strengthened, and our people will prosper in full happiness as we ask, sir, in our daily recital of prayer in this House. Yes, this, too, will help the farmer and the back concessioner. This will make our railway depots come alive again with freight, with traffic of business and our townsmen going places.

Let us help our small communities to thrive. We loaned thousands upon thousands of dollars in the form of second mortgages to assist our people in buying homes. Let us now lend the little city man some money to help him and his family get settled in the small town. The government is here not to help itself, but to help its people. If a man and his family wish to leave, say, my riding of Bracondale, which is located close to the centre of the city of Toronto, or even the riding of London North represented by the hon. Prime Minister, and such people are willing to settle in a small town, let us say, for a minimum period of one year, or if a small industry—and I am talking about a really small industry—from a city is willing to establish itself in a small town, and it appears that such industry would likely be able to operate for at least a year, then in each such case I would say let us help these people by small loans to them at little or no interest, or by spending small sums of money to help them get established in a small town.

Mr. Speaker, the existing loan plan for development of industries is cluttered by red tape, and it is not designed nor is it suitable for the small industries I am talking about.

Mr. Speaker, if I were now to lead a Liberal administration in this province, I would ask my government to approve the lending to our city people of a minimum of $50 million at little or no interest in support of a government-sponsored back-to-the-town movement. It would not be beyond the realm of good business to use for this programme part of the proceeds of the sale of Ontario prosperity bonds which I mentioned a few moments ago.

Mention was made by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) in this House of the advisability of a government consumers board, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) made some mention of food monopolies and the Ontario Food Council. May I then add a word or two about a consumers board and about the price of food. I say that presently many Ontario housewives and food manufacturers are wondering if this government will again remain silent and unconcerned when we experience a series of unwarranted food price gyrations like the recent and the current spiralling and outrageous sugar prices. What food price will spiral next? Will it be flour with an accompanying jump in the price of a loaf of bread? Will it be potatoes or will it be coffee, as is now being reported in our daily press, or will it be tea, or any one of the dozen or more commodities normally of daily consumption or use?

Crop records establish that the 1962-1963 world crop estimate of sugar was better than average. Last year Canadian sugar refineries announced 35 increases in sugar prices and during the same period United States refineries raised their prices only 14 times. Last year the wholesale price of a 100-pound bag of Canadian sugar jumped from $9.20 to $17.65. Two weeks ago it was $15. Last week it was up again at $15.50, and today it is about $13.50. When sugar was $17.65 in Ontario it was $15.96 in the United States where normally sugar prices are higher than in Ontario. Some say the price increase was by reason of a dock fire in Australia which destroyed some 75,000 tons of sugar bound for the Japanese market. Others say the poor sugar crop in Cuba caused the price jump. In 1962 and last year lots of sugar was stored throughout Canada and this government by a little investigation of its own could have ascertained such to be the fact. There was not, and there still is no real shortage of sugar in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, there is no justification for soaring sugar prices in our country, in our province. It is true that some growers did not get the benefit of higher prices because they sold their crop futures long before prices began to rise. Food brokers and futures traders profited and are still profiting from the state of confusion in the sugar market. Mr. Speaker, I charge that the failure of this government to protest on behalf of its people, has encouraged extensive public speculation in sugar to the detriment of the Ontario taxpayer. It is no answer for this government to say that this situation could best be handled by the federal authorities. We cannot leave everything to Ottawa, we must start to do some of the right things ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, action would have been taken if there were now a Liberal majority in this House. An immediate investigation would long have been initiated. Retail sugar prices would have been frozen as they were recently in the United Kingdom, resulting in steadily declining sugar prices. It is my belief that when there is abnormal rise in the price of food or essentials or public utility services, it is the obligation of this government to take a tough line on prices and insist on maintenance of some price stability. We should have our own permanent consumer price board, not too much unlike the federal government setup during wartime with power to investigate prices, to investigate extensive public speculation, and with power to subpoena unscrupulous profiteers and speculators; yes, with power to issue and enforce directives, as we have a right to do under The British North America Act in dealing with property and civil rights in this province of ours. Price fluctuation to the harm of Ontario people, as a consequence of control of supply and control of price by speculation and manipulation, should and must be brought under our government supervision. Be assured, Mr. Speaker, a Liberal government in Ontario will so do.

Mr. Speaker, I reiterate: The small independent retailer, unable to compete with the chainstore operator and the discounter, and fettered by early closing regulations, is losing his customer. A great number of our chain and discount stores locate themselves on the borders of built-up areas and thereby place themselves outside the limits of local government control. The result is disregard for observance of early closing hours.

To the chagrin of store employees, we now have longer store hours and a return to evening work in our retail shops, both chains and independents. It is inevitable that progressively more and more municipalities will have to cease restricting closing hours, or almost the whole of the business will go to the chain and discount stores and plazas just outside our cities and towns. The trend to keeping retail stores open for business during evening hours has displeased, and is displeasing, not only the independent store employee but also the departmental, chain and plaza store employee. He is starting to rebel against night work. He wants, and rightfully so, to enjoy the same things at the same time as the factory worker and the office worker.

Why should the blameless store employee be the one to suffer from competition between the big and the small retail operator, with their throat- and price-cutting fight to win the customer? Mr. Speaker, here is a place where the government must step in and swing the pendulum the other way, to shorter hours, to regular hours, for all retailers, to limit the evening hours, and to a provincial-wide closing applicable equally to the discounter, the supermarket, the plaza, the chain, the departmental, and the small independent retailer.

Mr. Speaker, if I were in the government today I would enact legislation so that it would be incumbent upon all retailers to open and close their shops at the same time in this province of Ontario. Shopping hours would be the same for everyone conducting a retail business in Ontario.

May I say, sir, as I entered the Parliament Buildings, today, I was informed that our chartered banks, not our trust companies, but our chartered banks, all of them, intend and are now planning to open branches in plazas throughout Ontario and stay open for business during plaza shopping hours. Thousands of bank employees will be required to work Saturdays and evenings. This is another reason for the need of an effective Ontario-wide early closing bill.

Mr. Speaker, in Ontario today we are witnessing a return to the old rat race for business. If there is to be a late closing then let it be one fixed day each week for all retail shops, both the big and the small. As I have said, it is a notorious fact that inroads made by the chain stores have made it tough on the independent storekeeper. The supermarket has hurt the independent grocery.

The small independent grocer and shopkeeper is dying, hit hard by the competition of supermarkets and large chain stores. Something should be done to help compensate him for the loss of income; something should be done to help him survive in the midst of these giant operations.

I am certain most hon. members know—to be sure hon. Conservative members in this House know—that in all provinces the sale of intoxicating beverage is under the control of the provincial government. Hard liquor is sold by bottle only through government-operated stores. Bottled beer and wine may be purchased at stores, also at retail outlets maintained by breweries, and by native wineries. If a man can purchase bottled beer at any one of many hundreds of government stores, or from any one of many brewers' retail stores, then why should he not be able to purchase the same at a small retail grocery shop in his immediate neighbourhood?

Now, there is no valid argument against this query. Mr. Speaker, people are demanding more and more convenient outlets for the purchase of liquor and for the purchase of beer. This is recognized, I submit in part, by statements in the Ontario Liquor Control Board report of March 31, 1962. I now read from part of that report, page 6, and I quote:

It should be emphasized that the increase in the number of stores shown in the report in no way indicates an attempt on the board's part to promote the increased sale of liquor. New stores are invariably the result of strong requests by municipal officials, and citizens' groups who demand as a matter of right that their new or growing communities should be provided with convenient facilities for purchasing alcoholic beverages.

I may say in this regard that the board received many more requests for new outlets than are approved each year. We take the view that our citizens desire, subject to reasonable controls, to be able to purchase alcoholic beverages in convenient and pleasant surroundings without feeling that they are committing any wrongdoing.

Mr. Speaker, although my consumption of hard liquor is most moderate and I am not a beer drinker, the words of the former chief liquor commissioner who just asked "Who wrote it?" supports my contention, sir, that Ontario people are seeking the right to go to the small shop or grocery and purchase a carton of bottled beer in the very same way as they may now purchase a carton of soft drinks, be it regular or sugar free.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec, our best neighbour province to the immediate east, has a most liberal law for the sale of beer. For years bottled beer has been sold through such outlets as the small grocery store. We talk about liquor control in Ontario. Control for what purpose? Well, I will tell you. It is not control of drinking, but control because it provides a convenient method of collecting the provincial tax.

It is not control of drinking, but control as to its quality. Our public accounts show that our government last year received $95 million in liquor profits and the only grant for education on liquor was something less than one quarter of one per cent. Liquor control in our province is a mockery. Ontario now has some 2,500 government licensed premises, 2,500 outlets for liquor.

Mr. Speaker, if I were Prime Minister, I would have no hesitation in recommending the sale of bottled beer in small retail grocery stores or shops across this province. This government should now follow the lead in this matter given by our neighbour province, since recent and current political events, hon. Prime Minister, indicate that this government is now more prone than ever before in our history to follow readily the leads given by the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, speaking as you will observe, from the second row in the Opposition, as a middle-of-the-road Liberal, as a descendant of reformers who championed the causes of those left outside the charmed circle of privilege, who championed the causes of the farmer, the worker, the immigrant and the minority, I respectfully tell Liberals, those who are in the row above protecting my party from unsuspecting political rearguard action, and Liberals in the row below who are fighting in the front line for the Liberal cause with shield and sword, and also those in the NDP rows, that the Liberal Party originated more than 100 years ago as a protest movement. It will continue as a protest movement. It is well able to do its own protesting without assistance from hon. members of the New Democratic Party, those bilious gentlemen over in the greens far, far to the left.

The fact that we acknowledge—I say to the hon. Minister of Health—that on occasions we Liberals must turn a little to the left—not too much, you understand, Mr. Speaker, and through you, the hon. Minister of Health—to win back the people who are our natural supporters, does not mean that Liberals are ready to join with the NDP as one party. In my opinion, Liberals and NDPs would make strange bedfellows indeed. Mr. Speaker, with all the sincerity at my command, I say as I have said before, on radio and from public platform, labour can have no fears when it deals with the Liberal Party of today in the province of Ontario.

Sure, we admit some of our efforts on behalf of labour in the past were not free from criticism. Sure, we admit there were times in the past when we experienced affliction and displayed infirmity, but we are not now decrepit. We are not on the decline, and criticism, believe me, will soon dwindle and our infirmity will soon disappear.

Mr. Speaker, Liberals are reformists, not socialists, and Liberals will remain reformists if I can help it. If I were leader of the Liberal Party, I would reject any movement—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): There does not seem to be the same enthusiasm—

Mr. Gould: —and I say this for the benefit of the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, I would reject any movement to merge the Liberal Party and the NDP. I would not countenance any overtures from the NDP to the Liberals nor from the Liberals to the NDP. Ontario, Mr. Speaker, is not ready for, and does not yet need, a mongrel breed of Liberalism. A merger would bring not strength but weakness to the Liberal Party. I am of the belief, and I may be of the old Liberal school, that what is good is worth holding on to. I respectfully disagree with Liberal and NDP diagnosticians who are saying the Liberal Party in Ontario needs a political transfusion. If the NDP insists that the Liberals need a political transfusion then I must counter by saying that the NDP needs a political enema, for it certainly is in error.

Mr. MacDonald: After three hours I know who is constipated.

Mr. Gould: I would say to the hon. member, I did not see him moving while I was making my address.

An NDP transfusion, Mr. Speaker, would not cure, it would destroy, the Liberal Party in Ontario. The New Democratic Party throughout this land is on the decline and on the way out. I would think that if the Liberals were to join or coalesce with another party it would be a party which is ascending, it would be a party which is moving upward, and not one descending, moving downward and out of Ontario's political history. But I think that hon. members—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Gould moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will return to the estimates of The Department of Agriculture and if we have time—we will have a night session tomorrow night—we will resume this very interesting debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We welcome to the Legislature today in the west gallery students from the Stratford public schools; in the east and west galleries students from the Prince Charles, Alexander Muir, Stewart Scott and J. L. R. Bell public schools, Newmarket; and in the east and Speaker's gallery members of the Lincoln County Women's Progressive-Conservative Association and the Dawes Road Ladies Progressive-Conservative Association of Don Mills.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. G. E. Gomme (Lanark), from the standing committee on private bills, presented the committee's ninth and final report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. Pr13, An Act respecting the city of London.

Bill No. Pr14, An Act to establish Rochdale College.

Bill No. Pr16, An Act respecting the town of Thorold.

Bill No. Pr34, An Act respecting the township of Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE SUMMARY CONVICTIONS ACT

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Summary Convictions Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, this bill confirms the power of provincial magistrates with respect to contempt under the Criminal Code and it also provides a procedure for registering a conviction where fines are paid out of court.

THE SECURITIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Securities Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this repeals a section of the present Act which provides for the renewal of all registrations on March 31 in each year following this year, in order that renewals may be staggered throughout the year. The dates for renewal will now be set by regulation.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENTS ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Fire Departments Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides several amendments to the Act which I will briefly sketch as follows: The first provision provides for the recalling of firefighters to duty in case of emergency and clarifies the section. There is a section which provides for a hearing before a discharge. The bargaining time is reduced from 120 days to 60 days. There are time limits set for the hearing and determination of differences under agreements, when they are reduced to arbitration.

THE CREDIT UNIONS ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Credit Unions Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the replacement of the Superintendent of Insurance by a director of registration on examination who will now be responsible for administering The Credit Unions Act, The Credit Collection Agencies Act, The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act and The Real Estate and Business Brokers

Act and, following April 1, The Bailiffs Act. The bill also authorizes the practice in certain cases and under certain controlled conditions whereby members of credit unions may withdraw monies on deposit by the means of a negotiable order. And finally, the bill relaxes to some degree the provisions of the Act requiring the accumulation of a guarantee fund over a certain figure.

THE CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this bill is for the purpose of preserving without question the security of tenure and title of real property in Ontario held under common socage. In Great Britain some time ago, new real estate laws were passed and they were presently dealing with the old laws and repealing certain ones which may affect the security of title in Ontario. This particular bill will ensure the continuation of the titles which are now held by persons in Ontario.

THE COMMISSIONERS FOR TAKING AFFIDAVITS ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Commissioners for Taking Affidavits Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this bill will expand the number of municipal officials designated as ex-officio commissioners for taking affidavits. It also provides for certain officials of corporations to be granted commissions upon application. As in The Notaries Act, it provides that every commissioner who signs must indicate in writing under his signature the extent of, or limitations of, his commission.

ONTARIO LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Hon. Mr. Cass moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to establish the Ontario Law Reform Commission.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to provide for the establishment of a law reform commission, with functions as more fully set out in the Act.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Attorney General. He has had notice of it.

What steps are being taken by the hon. Attorney General's department in connection with the so-called hate literature that is being distributed by hand and posted up in various places throughout the province, and which seems to be on the increase in recent days?

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, this is a delicate situation. I have in the past had occasion to discuss the matter with members of the community who appear to be the object of these particular attacks. We have also had discussions with officials in The Department of Justice. These matters are covered or should be covered by the Criminal Code. It is a very difficult situation, because in the first place, to locate the perpetrators of the actions is difficult and calls for skilful police action which is not always successful, and in the second place, it is very difficult under the present and existing criminal law to obtain sufficient evidence, because it must be evidence to warrant a prosecution or conviction.

I can assure the hon. members of this House, Mr. Speaker, that this matter has been receiving the consideration of the officers of the Crown in this department and I know that on several occasions we have referred to those in the federal field who are also interested.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The forty-seventh order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE (continued)

On vote 111:

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might invite the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) through you to make the answer to me which he was about to make when we rose the other night, with respect to artificial insemination stations?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): There are three artificial insemination distributing stations in northern Ontario, located at Nipissing, Algoma and Manitoulin.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask if they are in any way subsidized by this department?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. They are subsidized to the extent of $2 per service by The Department of Agriculture, to defray the expenses of distance transportation. The semen is supplied by the central unit; out of the new insemination building at Guelph.

Mr. Sopha: Well, if I may pursue it one step forward, may I ask the hon. Minister whether he intends to establish a unit in the district of Sudbury? In the near future?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We do not establish these through The Department of Agriculture. They are established through the artificial breeders' units. They do this to disperse their product throughout northern Ontario. We simply subsidize the service. Wherever they establish it we will subsidize it. If they want to establish at Sudbury, we would be happy to go along and pay the $2 there too.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, since, the other night when we were discussing the estimates, you allowed the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. W. E. Johnston) to speak on a subject that was not under this department, I wonder could we revert to vote 105? There is a question I had forgotten to ask the hon. Minister under that vote.

Mr. Chairman: The member was speaking on the meat inspection. Is that the one?

Mr. Troy: No. The question is under vote 105, the dairy branch, sir.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Carleton was not out of order. He spoke on meat inspection at the time.

Mr. Troy: I know, but he was talking about dogs and pets and cats and things. You allowed him to—

Mr. Chairman: He was talking about meat inspection.

Mr. Troy: I know, but I just asked you now—

Mr. Chairman: What did you want to speak on?

Mr. Troy: May I have the privilege, sir, of your indulgence, to ask a question under vote 105?

Mr. Chairman: I will allow you one question.

Mr. Troy: Thank you. The question concerns the granting of a licence to distribute milk in the North Bay market by a distributor from the town of Sturgeon Falls. The committee met in North Bay and also in Toronto, and I understand they were to meet again in North Bay, but they did not. Then we read in the papers that this licence had been granted to the distributor from Sturgeon Falls.

I know that, in the past, a number of distributors tried to get into the North Bay market, but they were not allowed. I just wonder which factors prompted the committee or the board to permit this distributor to get in there—other than the factors I think were responsible?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, in the first place the question is completely out of order. This is under vote 105. It was passed and dealt with the other night. I have not got the material before me for the dairy branch, neither is the dairy commissioner with us in the House today. I would be very happy to discuss the matter with the hon. member privately, if he wishes.

The answer of course lies with the milk industry board as to their decision. I have nothing to do with the decisions of the milk industry board. What their reason was for granting the licence at this time, I have no idea; but I am sure it must have been a valid one or it would not have been granted.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister how many inspectors the department employs for community sales barns. Are they all veterinarians? And what are they paid?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: There is a veterinarian at each sale barn, and I believe they are paid $15, $20, and $25.

Mr. Nixon: So that when the sale is in operation there is a veterinarian on duty there? Thank you.

Vote 111 agreed to.

On vote 112:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, on vote 112, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister to give us some explanation as to the operation of this branch. I know that, last year, there was a rather sizeable exhibit of Ontario products overseas; and in his introductory remarks, the hon. Minister referred to it again. But more particularly, if I may come back to the tobacco situation again, what role has this government played in attempting to increase sales internationally? And how does it co-ordinate its activities, in this connection, with the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to answer that question. In the first place, the marketing development branch was originally established to develop markets for Ontario-grown products. As far as the association with tobacco is concerned, in the exhibits overseas the Ontario flue-cured tobacco was exhibited through the flue-cured tobacco growers' marketing board.

In connection with the export sales we have been fortunate enough to make recently, this has been accomplished through efforts of our department working in conjunction with The Department of Economics and Development, working in conjunction with the federal Department of Trade and Commerce, agricultural products section. We have worked closely with both of these departments, and I think have been quite successful in moving a considerable amount of the product at the present time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, from what the hon. Minister says there are really three groups in the picture. There is the marketing board itself, for whatever product is under consideration. There are the provincial authorities and the federal authorities. But if you come back to the tobacco issue, obviously there has been considerable backbiting behind the scenes as to who was entitled to get the credit. For example, I happen to have in my hand the editorial of the Delhi News Record of February 12, in which something is said about the local federal member of the House of Commons and in the course of their comments they say this—I should say that they are making specific reference to the sales to Bulgaria or the USSR:

Contacting federal authorities for information they express considerable annoyance at the action of the provincial government, who apparently had rushed in to announce this sale. They [the federal authorities] felt that the announcement should have come from Chairman Demeyere of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board.

And in a further paragraph or so:

If the information of experienced tobacco observers is correct, the farmers whose tobacco was disposed of will take a substantial loss on this transaction, besides the levy which is to be deducted from their payments. As one farmer commented: "Anyone can make a sale if they are going to sell at fire sale prices."

Now Tuesday there was an exchange between the hon. Minister and the hon. member for Brant in which they agreed not to pursue this matter any further. Whether or not we pursue it in the House here is not too relevant, because it certainly is being pursued in the tobacco communities.

It is being pursued very vigorously on the grapevine, if you will, in discussions among farmers. As I have just indicated, it is getting into the editorial comments of the local papers but, in this instance at least, apparently there was on the part of the federal officials a feeling that the provincial government had rushed in and taken credit for sales for which it had really contributed very little.

Indeed, they end up with a final comment by way of prediction, and I quote:

Despite Mr. Roxborough's indignation at the low pressure publicity on the part of the federal government, it may be that the provincial authorities have grabbed some publicity which in the long run will do them more harm than good.

Because at some point—if the hon. Minister does not want to do it now, he is in the saddle, he will choose his time—at some point we have to present to this House and to the public what those sales were for and what loss was sustained. Perhaps at that point the provincial government will not be so anxious to be associated with it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Now, Mr. Chairman, I know of the matter to which my hon. friend is referring. I did not read it in the Simcoe Reformer but I did read the statement—

Mr. MacDonald: The Delhi News.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am sorry. The Delhi News. I read it in one other newspaper. My hon. friend refers to a statement I believe is attributed to Mr. Roxborough's objections, to the fact that a news item had gotten out that was attributed to our department. Now the truth of the whole matter is this, and I have no apologies for laying it on the table.

I will tell you everything but the price that was obtained. I think we have good reason to withhold it at this time. Certainly the public is entitled to it at the proper time, and they will get it. No doubt about this whatever.

The matter is simply this. We, with the federal government, sent Mr. George McCague and Mr. George Demeyere from the flue-cured board, our chairman of the farm products marketing board, along with two representatives of the federal Department of Trade and Commerce, agricultural section, I believe. Was it not that Mr. Stinson was one of them? Mr. Stanton was one of them and I cannot think of the other gentleman's name.

They went overseas on a tobacco selling mission to try to move this surplus tobacco into new markets. I think they were most successful. I think we have to recognize the fact that we were trying to break into a new market with this tobacco and for the benefit of the hon. members of the House, Mr. Chairman, I hope you will permit me to explain this to them. It is extremely difficult to break into a new tobacco market. It is one thing to sell wheat. It is one thing to sell barley. It is one thing to sell meat products. They are essentially the same, no matter which country they come from or under what conditions they are produced, generally speaking. But when it comes to tobacco, manufacturers of cigarettes, pipe tobacco or cigars have an established blend. They get the product from a certain source and they continue to combine that particular grade and blend to come out with the finished product that meets the tastes of a buying public that has become accustomed to it. This makes tobacco selling exceedingly difficult because buyers are reluctant to buy from a new market. They are, in effect, changing their blend, their grade, the flavour of their product.

Our people went over there—this group that I have mentioned earlier—and they travelled through Europe. They contacted the various companies, including the monopoly countries. Bulgaria was the one that was doing business through the Bulgartobac Company. This was what they called it: Bulgartobac. They buy the tobacco and distribute it through the Iron Curtain countries, as I understand it, and central Europe.

The order was placed for, I believe, 1.7 million pounds. They cabled back to us that this order was possible.

Before they got back here there was further indication that we could sell yet another two million pounds. Of course we were elated to know that this was happening. When they came back the deal was finally completed, after days of negotiation and correspondence, cablegrams and what-have-you. The deal was finally completed for 3.7 million pounds of tobacco. This was accomplished.

We announced this in the usual way. There was no great fanfare about it. It was simply announced that this sale had been made. I do not think there was even any press conference held on it that I know of.

An announcement got out that this had been done, and I felt it was very well done, through The Department of Economics and Development, and also the federal Department of Trade and Commerce. I give them credit for this, too, and our own Department of Agriculture.

We were able to contact the Japanese buying monopoly. I cannot think of the name of their company that buys tobacco, but they came in here as a monopoly company to buy this tobacco. We met with them. They came to the sale, saw our sales operation and saw the tobacco being sold. They had a look at the 1963 crop and had a look at the tobacco that was in the hogsheads and being held from last year or the year before. I met with them personally, as did the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), and our respective staffs.

They finally, after a few days longer, decided they were going to buy some tobacco. They decided they would buy an equal amount of tobacco held from the 1962 crop, and they would buy on the open auction an equal amount from the 1963 crop. This was a new sale and we were delighted to know that we had a new buyer on the exchange, bidding on this tobacco. And I think Japan was anxious to let it be known that they were now entering into the Canadian market to buy tobacco for the first time.

Here, to me, was something that was really a move forward. We had a new customer, just as we had with Bulgaria. So we had a meeting of the press with the Japanese people there. The vice-chairman of the flue-cured board, Mr. Miggins, I believe, and one of the other representatives of the board, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, and myself, met with the press to explain this new sale and the fact that Japan was now on our market bidding on tobacco, and also taking this shipment from last year's holdover.

At that very time, that very day, before the news people in that room, I mentioned the fact that this was the third new customer we had; that we had the Bulgarian deal closed, the tobacco was then in the process of moving overseas. In fact I think some of it was on the water at the time, and more of it was moving down to Halifax. Mr. Teasdale, I believe, was going overseas at that very time to make sure that everything was right on the other side, that this tobacco moved into the right channels, because this was our first shipment and a sizeable shipment. A lot of money was involved.

I made this statement—and to my knowledge it was not even mentioned in the press—that we had three new markets. I mentioned the fact that 100,000 pounds had been sold to Israel, that 3.7 million pounds had been sold to Bulgaria, and now this deal with Japan had been consummated as of that day.

Mr. MacDonald: What is the figure of 25 million in connection with? Bulgaria and the USSR? How does that figure get in there?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have never heard it mentioned, I am sorry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: This editorial in the Delhi News Record says it was done through government agencies and came from the 25 millions pounds of surplus tobacco—oh, I am sorry, my mistake.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Now then, to continue this story: When Mr. Teasdale came back from Bulgaria, having made sure that the tobacco arrived in its proper channels, and the deal was completed, he came back to Toronto. I believe that a reporter knew he was back and contacted him to find out how things had gone. I believe Mr. Teasdale, quite innocently, advised him that he had learned when he was in Bulgaria that Bulgartobac had designated, I believe it was, two million pounds of this 3.7 million to Soviet Russia. This is the way it happened; and immediately it became news. Here is Canadian tobacco going to Russia, and the headline came out in the paper saying that this is what had happened.

Of course, Mr. Roxborough immediately blamed our department, because he said, "You have grabbed all this publicity". Now Mr. Teasdale—I do not think he is in the House here today—but Mr. Teasdale is as conscientious and honourable a civil servant as one could possibly find, and had done absolutely nothing to try to steal any thunder from anybody. He just simply mentioned the fact that Bulgartobac had sent this over to Russia. But that was news.

There is the background of the story. There is complete harmony between our department and the department at Ottawa and The Department of Economics and Development. We are interested in selling tobacco, and we will continue to do this very thing.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I note that the hon. Minister of Agriculture complains that something he feels ought to have been in the press was not in the press. Bearing in mind the remarks of a very noted columnist this morning, in respect of the education the hon. gentleman gets from the press, according to this columnist, if they do not print something that he feels they should print. I suppose, to that degree, he is denied the capacity of self-education.

If I may make so bold, Mr. Chairman, as to make some remarks about the constitutional background of this very vexing problem—but before saying anything about the constitutional nature of the problem, really the problem is an economic one. Because, in tobacco, as in so many other areas of our great agricultural industry, we are the victim of the fact that we Canadians produce far more than we are able to consume. And, if we are to sustain our agricultural economy, it is trite to say we must needs sell our surplus abroad. The necessity of the sale of that surplus exacerbates the constitutional difficulty that is inherent in marketing.

We are the inheritors of a very narrow interpretation of The British North America Act by the judicial committee of the Privy Council, which, of course, was a foreign body resident at the seat of government at Westminster, which viewed our constitution from a very long distance. Those learned law lords, in times past, of course felt that they knew far better than we did ourselves what was good for us Canadians from a constitutional point of view.

When marketing came to be a popular device on the part of governments, the federal government of course tried to regulate various aspects of the agricultural industry. I recall very vividly one case which dealt with the marketing of agricultural products in the lower Fraser delta in British Columbia about which, when this legislation was first introduced, a judge of the high court of British Columbia said that if we were going to implement this type of state control in Canada, then truly—his very words—fascism had arrived on Canadian soil.

Those were very extreme words used by that judge in respect of marketing legislation. He held that particular bit of marketing legislation to be ultra vires of the federal government; that is to say, beyond its power.

The federal government for many years tried to regulate marketing under the trade and commerce clause of section 91 of The British North America Act; and in each occasion when it attempted to get into this field, the law lords of the Privy Council, and indeed as did the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, denuded the trade and commerce clause of any real meaning so far as to enable the federal government to do what it wished to do. The judges always held that the provinces have the right to control and regulate the production of agricultural products within the province. The only place the federal government would come into the scene at all, or come on the scene, was if those agricultural products moved across provincial boundaries or went into foreign trade. Only in respect of that movement, in the interprovincial trade and on foreign markets, was the federal government given any authority by the courts to regulate the production of the products.

The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) is going to Quebec on the last day of March to discuss these problems; and I, for one, hope that marketing and the sale of our surpluses will be a question which will have a very high place on the agenda. There are many problems in respect of our constitution, its development, and making it to conform more with the changing economy, the development of our nation, but I cannot think of any area which relates more closely to the future prosperity of our country, where the problems are more vexing, than they are in respect of marketing and the sale of what we produce.

That brings me to this point—with considerable interruption from the back row back here—that is to say, it seems to me to be the very essence of unreality that provincial governments should have the right and the power, and indeed the duty, to say to farmers: "Here is the quota that you are able to produce; here is a regulatory mechanism under which you will produce your agricultural products"—and then, when those products are produced in surplus, the farmers look to the federal government to get rid of the surplus.

That is to say that the federal government has nothing to do with the production of the products. The provincial government regulates that. But the federal government is left with the necessity of selling the surplus and, indeed, is subject to the pressures of that sector of the economy which wants the surplus sold. So really, in essence, in marketing, you have two senior levels of government, each of exclusive jurisdiction within its own field, in something of a conflict.

I noticed in a column by that noted columnist that he says that the farmers producing tobacco, who are faced with a very heavy surplus, bypassed the provincial Minister. He gave the impression, sir, that the provincial Minister, my hon. friend, was somewhat hurt by the fact that he was not given notice, that the farmers bypassed him and went directly to the federal government.

I do not know that the columnist can see inside the hon. gentleman's mind, or whether he can tell whether he was hurt or not, but it is symptomatic of the problem if they did that—symptomatic. The farmers know very well that, in respect of their marketing legislation, that is controlled and directed by the provincial government. But seeing the great economic necessity of the sale of the surplus of the tobacco, whether it be to Bulgaria, or Communist China, or to Soviet Russia; and I believe if I may mention that very august lady's name, I believe the hon. Judy LaMarsh made a remark not long ago that—

An hon. member: Is she the one who elected Robarts?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, so he says. So I read that she says that if, indeed, tobacco is carcinogenic, it is just as well that we give the cancer to the Russians by selling to them.

An hon. member: Nice humane attitude.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Well, I notice she said that. However, the need is there to sell this great surplus to someone and my plea, Mr. Chairman, is simply this. I believe in 1964 the province and the federal government have to get together and they have to devise some new method for the regulation of the production of our agricultural products. I must confess that at this time I am not prepared to say what that new method will be. But I can make a comparison.

In the United States, to the south of us here, where they also have large agricultural surpluses, the federal government, the government at Washington, has the right to control production, to take land out of production, and to subsidize farmers for not producing. In that way, the U.S. government seeks to cut down its surpluses. There is no corresponding power in our federal government to regulate in that manner in any way. Whether that is the best means of regulation, you have to ask people who are far more learned in this subject than I am myself. But by referring to it, perhaps it points the direction in which the discussions of the provinces and the federal government should go in order that we devise some system whereby the government that has to sell the surplus, and I always believe, with the greatest respect to my friend the hon. Minister of Economics and Development, that it is the federal government's responsibility and not ours.

We must devise some system, I say, where that level of government has something to say about the regulation of production.

Finally I say, I suppose the premiers when they meet at Quebec in March could set up a commission or a committee or some body that would have to study this problem for perhaps two or three years in order to come up with some suitable compromise between them. But we cannot go on long in this fashion, where the senior level of government does not have any say in the production of surpluses of agricultural products. A way out must be found within our constitutional structure, to devise some acceptable sensible method of the control and sale of agricultural products such as tobacco.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a brief comment on the point the hon. member has raised, not so much on the main point on which he laid emphasis today, namely, the question of whether or not the federal government should have control of production, but on another related point that he has touched on previous occasions and laid great emphasis on, and that is the unfortunate confusion of two senior levels of government getting into the interprovincial and the export trade.

Technically speaking, legally speaking, I suppose he is correct, that the province should stay in its jurisdiction and the federal government should look after the interprovincial and the international. But if this be law, the only point—and this is what provokes me to rise—is that it is bad law, because it is so far out of touch with the reality of at least the last generation or more, that I think it is about time we took a look at the law.

A year or so ago, the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay) catapulted this province into this field, and the irony of it was that he did so at a time when he was representing a constituency in which his federal running mate was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Presumably he was encroaching on the jurisdiction of his federal running mate, who was responsible for promoting trade and commerce for the Dominion as a whole, including the province of Ontario.

But this is not something new. Yet Ontario has got into this field with a degree of vigour. All I want to draw to the attention of the House is that most of the western provinces have been in this field for years. Indeed, one that I happen to be more than passing familiar with, from the time that the government was elected in 1944, is Saskatchewan, where they appointed what is sometimes referred to jokingly as an economics minister plenipotentiary—Mr. Graham Spry, a very well-known Canadian in London, who has been there now for well nigh 20 years. Mr. Spry made a very real contribution in developing the export of trade by that "white elephant" known as the Hudson Bay Railway, which had been built to capitalize on the shorter route of shipping grain, but had really fallen into disuse. This was primarily because of the excessively high insurance rates by the insurance companies. By negotiating with the insurance companies he got the rates down to a level where they were exporting many more million bushels of wheat.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I think experience has proven, whatever may be the law—and I am not disputing that this may be the law—is that this job apparently is so big that even with the federal and provincial governments getting in, and I trust without too costly duplication, but even with their joint efforts, the general conclusion one would come to is that we have got still more to do if we are going to compete in the highly competitive markets of the world. So whatever be the legal argument, I think experience has proved that the province has got a job to do as well as the federal government, and certainly more and more provinces are getting into the picture.

Mr. Sopha: May I add one addendum—the thing I meant to say and I forgot to say and my hon. friend now reminds me? There is no area that points up more significantly the value of what has come to be called co-operative federalism.

An hon. member: Good word.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Well I think I know what it means. Co-operative federalism means that as we appraise our constitution in the year 1964, the approach must be one of co-operation between the 11 different governments that we have in this country and in this area. I would urge upon my friend, the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, that when he goes to Quebec at the end of March, if he believes in the co-operative federalism that he talks to Mr. Pearson about and Mr. Pearson talks to him about, then in the realm of marketing, the hon. Prime Minister of this province can find himself a place in the history books of this country. That will come if he approaches that conference as one of the protagonists and the leaders of co-operation with the federal government in marketing legislation and the revision of our marketing system and the elimination of the conflicts that exist in it, the duplication, such as the two sets of inspectors that they have viewing the agricultural product, as my hon.

friend says, from whether it is going into the export trade or whether it is going to be consumed in the province.

I do not think that I have ever felt more serious about a subject than my urging upon the hon. Prime Minister that he, in his position of leader of the government of Ontario, when he goes to that conference, should say to the other assembled premiers and the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada that in the field of marketing, and bearing in mind the necessity of the future prosperity of our great country, its huge surpluses and a problem that we have to solve in the spirit of co-operative federalism. I admire the person who coined that phrase.

Mr. MacDonald: One of our contributions at the New Democratic Party's founding convention in 1961.

Mr. Sopha: Right. I admire the person. He should get a place in the history books of our country too. I hope that phrase "co-operative federalism" is one that gets into much greater currency between now and the year of our centennial, 1967, which I say is the last chance that we have in this country to rewrite our constitution and bring it in line with the changing economic and social conditions in the light of 1967 as contrasted with 1867.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I could not help but agree that there must be the very closest co-operation between the federal government and our own provincial government in every aspect of moving our agricultural products, in fact all products. But I think we have to recognize the fact that has been stressed by our hon. Prime Minister on numerous occasions, Mr. Speaker, that responsibility to the people of Ontario lies on the government of Ontario. As such it is our responsibility to do everything possible, be it in co-operation with the federal government or not, that we must attempt to move every product that we possibly can and find every new market that we can.

I would also like to point out to my hon. friends who have both spoken, that the marketing legislation that we have in Ontario today is only operative because we have the extension of powers granted by the federal government to the provincial government to operate our farm marketing legislation.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with extension of markets you will recall that earlier in the Budget estimates, and earlier in this session, I announced before the orders of the day, the very active participation of our Department of Agriculture in the Ideal Home Show being held in London, England, this month. We were shipping 100 tons of goods there and for the third time we were carrying on in this show our promotion of Ontario agricultural food products.

Today it is a matter of very great gratification for us to be able to inform the House that we are going even further afield in our effort to create new markets for the products of our farms and orchards. I am sure hon. members will be interested to know that, with the co-operation of several processors, the Ontario government will be a major exhibitor at the Israel International Trade Fair to be held at Tel-Aviv, June 16 to July 17 next. This fair is a biennial exhibition. In 1962, 33 countries participated with 660,000 visitors attending from 56 different countries. This year it is expected that more than 50 countries will participate and that more than one million visitors will attend. Of particular interest to us is the fact that the show is not directed entirely to Israel's 2.5 million population, but to all of the Middle East and at least half the African countries, whose representatives will be attending the fair. I see it as a wonderful opportunity to acquaint a large number of people with the quality and the availability of our very fine agricultural food products in Ontario.

Mr. B. C. Steers, commercial secretary at the Canadian Embassy at Tel-Aviv, and the Canadian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce feel there are definite prospects for Ontario canned vegetables, soups, honey, pickles and tobacco, of which we recently made a sale of 100,000 pounds. I just spoke about that a moment ago. The Ontario government has taken a prominent position in the Canadian pavilion being erected by the Canadian government. It will be devoted to a display of Ontario products, with explanatory literature in several languages. Services of translators have been arranged to meet the needs of any nationality who happens to be there.

Our experience has shown the successful promotion of foodstuffs is based on sampling, and on selling. A further exhibit will be located in the food building under the direction of a competent staff. The Canadian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce has now confirmed arrangements through M. Loeb Limited of Ottawa whereby the Canadian-owned Israeli firm, Supersol Limited, will be co-operating fully with the department in operating the large sampling and selling stand. This arrangement will assure a very strong representation directed to the consumers of our food products.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that our participation in this international food fair will emphasize the determination of the Ontario government and The Ontario Department of Agriculture to extend to the widest possible degree the demand for Ontario food products in the markets of the world.

Mr. Sopha: I am sure the hon. Minister did not mean to say, as his words seem to indicate, that the province gets its powers in the marketing field from the federal government. Or does it?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The interprovincial export boards get their extension of powers from the federal government. This is quite true for interprovincial and export trade, and this relates to several of the products that are sold on an export basis or an interprovincial basis.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, the hon. Minister's words did not delineate, as far as he has gone now. But I would not want the record to suggest, as his words seem to say, that the province gets any of its powers in marketing from the federal government. It gets them from the constitution.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, before we leave the discussion on marketing, will the hon. Minister tell the House whether he expects the representatives of the flue-cured tobacco growers marketing board to visit his department today or tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Here again, Mr. Speaker, I must confess, as was pointed out by my friend, the hon. member for Sudbury a while ago, that I seem to get my education from the press. I can assure my hon. friend, though, that if there was an inference in the newspaper that I was disappointed or miffed, if I may put it that way, that I was bypassed by the group going to Ottawa, I can relieve his distress right now. I can assure you that I am interested in seeing the Ontario tobacco for 1963, 1962 and 1961 sold to the best buyer as soon as it possibly can be sold.

Mr. Nixon: It is not true to say, then, that you were pleased?

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): The hon. Minister is happy that they are selling the tobacco.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say this, that I am very happy, my hon. friend from Brant, to co-operate with the federal government or any other government in Canada to promote the sale of Ontario agricultural products.

Now then, as far as the group coming back from Ottawa is concerned, I learned, again from the press, last night that the buyers and the flue-cured board had parted company, shall we say, at Ottawa, that they had broken up. So this morning we convened at 8.30 in our office. Our farm products marketing board chairman, our deputy Minister and myself advised our chairman of the farm products marketing board to immediately convene a meeting of the buyers' section of the advisory board that had been established last fall. This group had never been called together after the closing of the auctions last week to determine anything.

The flue-cured board just simply went to Ottawa, or their representatives went to Ottawa. I have been in discussion with the hon. Mr. Hays at some length on various occasions since they went to Ottawa, and I am advised this morning that he was meeting with the flue-cured board today. If they were coming back I wanted to be able to set a meeting so that they would be able to attend. But in any event, having been advised by the press that the buyers had left, I felt we should at least meet with the board members to find out what is going on. But I have learned since—and this was just handed to me since we came into the House this afternoon—that Mr. Demeyere has been contacted in Ottawa by telephone and asked to attend the meeting that has been set up for the advisory committee. He is a member of that advisory committee and he has been asked to attend, providing his meetings in Ottawa are concluded.

I am not sure when he is coming back. My deputy Minister advises that he has heard a report that Mr. Demeyere is coming back this afternoon. If this is the case, I am willing to meet him at any time, but as yet I have had no communication from him to this effect. But the meeting is set up for the advisory committee tomorrow, and I hope he will be there.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that the hon. Minister and his advisors are ready to meet the chairman of the tobacco marketing board and the other members of the board at any time. But I really must criticize him for waiting to be asked. I know that he wants to emphasize the independence of this board. Yet surely it would have been received in good grace, and received by the public in good grace, if he had extended an invitation to these people to come to Toronto and discuss this; or even to have offered to have his people go to Ottawa. Perhaps we could have even excused him from his estimates if he himself felt he might attend such a meeting. But, of course, this is in his own judgment.

I have some reason to believe, being a representative of at least three of the municipalities involved in the tobacco area, that there are quite a number of farmers interested enough in this to come to Toronto when the board members expect to be here. I certainly would not describe this as any grand march on Queen's Park, but I feel that I should bring to the attention of the hon. Minister, as perhaps the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) and perhaps the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McNeil) have already done, that there will be quite a large number of these farmers around here trying to speak to the hon. Minister, and perhaps to the representatives in the Legislature itself.

Before we leave the marketing section, I was wondering if the hon. Minister might comment on possible solutions to the difficulty. Would he advise the House whether the time was too late now to bring into effect, once again, minimum grade prices?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, this gives me an opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to make two comments I would like to make. There may be others.

In the first instance, in relation to the hon. member's criticism of me not asking these people to come to Toronto, I want to know from the hon. member how he would expect me to ask these people to come to Toronto? The auctions closed last Friday afternoon. I was not advised the auctions closed last Friday afternoon, and knew nothing about it, until I read it in the paper on Saturday and heard about it. At that time the group were then prepared to go to Ottawa, and went to Ottawa, on the weekend. I came back to Toronto on Monday morning, and the first thing I did was contact the hon. Mr. Hays on Monday to find out what was going on. He was not any more aware of it than I was. And I say this with the greatest of respect to the hon. Mr. Hays.

Nor did I have any knowledge of why they went to Ottawa. I contacted a member of the board who did not go to Ottawa and I said to him, "Why did they go to Ottawa? What is the purpose? What is the reason for the group going to Ottawa?" Not that I was indignant because they went to Ottawa; it is their right to go to Ottawa. Let the hon. member know, and he is the first who should know, that this group of people are operating under The Agricultural Stabilization Act through the federal government for the 47-cent deficiency payment. That brings me to another point I want to come to; that I was advised by the member of the board who did not go to Ottawa that he did not even know why they went to Ottawa.

It is fine for the press to say, and it is fine for the hon. members of the Opposition to say, that you should do this and you should do that and you should know this or that and you should know something else, because they have no responsibility whatever in the matter at all.

Mr. Sopha: We have a great responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: You may have a great responsibility to make political capital out of something, but are not at all interested in trying to do something about it.

Mr. Nixon: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I intend to keep the floor.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister cannot keep it on my point of order.

Mr. Chairman: What is the point of order?

Mr. Nixon: Well, if I can have the floor I will attempt to explain it to you.

The hon. Minister's statements that our remarks in this connection were endeavouring to create political capital are in error. I happen to represent these people and I am the only one in the area who is representing them, who has brought this matter before the Legislature. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Elgin has said nothing; the hon. Provincial Treasurer has said nothing in this House, we are not attempting to create political capital and we have been trying to keep our questions as moderate as possible.

I feel the fact that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has become disturbed at this point would indicate more than anything else to the people of this province that his handling of the difficulties has been incapable in the extreme.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member can say just as he likes about the handling of this problem by the Minister of Agriculture. I have not yet heard the hon. member for Brant nor anyone else in the Opposition, get up and offer one single solution to the present problem—not one.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the question which brought on the tirade from the hon. Minister was whether or not he felt it might be possible to reintroduce minimum grade prices—and I would still like an answer to that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: And the hon. member will get his answer.

Mr. Nixon: Let us have it, then.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member mentioned something before he ever came to that. I said there were two points when I stood up to speak, Mr. Chairman, the first point is the one I am dealing with. I will get to the other one in the fullness of time.

Mr. Nixon: If the first point is political capital, we do not have to listen to it here.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is very good for the hon. member to talk about this. He suggests he has a group of people ready to come down here and—

Mr. Nixon: Not at all, Mr. Chairman. On a point of order, I thought I was doing a service to the hon. Minister and to the House when I informed him that I am under the impression that a group of farmers will be attending their members here in the Legislature today or tomorrow, whenever the representatives of that board will be here. As a matter of fact, I have done my best to see to it that only representatives would appear. And I would certainly say I was doing this as a service with no thought of bringing any undue pressure on the hon. Minister; he is in a strong position, and I, for one, would not attempt to do this.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It may be all very well for the hon. member for Brant to say these things now, but the inference that was there was that he was putting pressure on us here.

Mr. Nixon: The inference was incorrect; there was no implication along those lines.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: If my inference was incorrect, I am the first to be delighted to know this because I believe that if there ever was a time in the history of tobacco marketing in the province of Ontario, when calm, cool heads should prevail, the time is now. This is what I think. And I believe—

Mr. Nixon: Will the hon. Minister get to the second point, please?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: When I am through with this point I will deal with the second point. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was dealing with the first point. I want to come to this point, too, if I may, Mr. Chairman, that I feel very keenly that the flue-cured tobacco marketing board has been elected by the tobacco growers of the province of Ontario. I have tobacco growers in my own riding. Do not think for a minute that the other hon. members of the House are not interested in this; of the ridings where tobacco is growing, two were mentioned, and there are many others in this province of Ontario in which tobacco is grown.

The hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Yakubski) in the Ottawa valley has tobacco growers in his own riding. There are some of them, I believe, in the riding of Huron-Bruce, the Port Elgin area. They are scattered all over the province; indeed, the Stinson report says the tobacco land in the province of Ontario is simply unlimited as far as our production is concerned.

But I do feel this: If our flue-cured board will sit down with the buyers and the advisory board it is the first step; then let us see what are the real problems. I was interested to know, and I spend a great deal of time on this; in fact I have done little else in the last two or three days but talk about tobacco in my own department. I think I have all our people in the department running around in circles on tobacco trying to find out where the trouble lies. This is the thing we want to know. I was interested in looking at the figures for last year, following the sales day by day, and we have a record of every one of these sales.

I was surprised to know that a great many sales had been made less than ten cents a pound last year and that tobacco went home. It was not taken off the market. There was no guaranteed price paid for it. It went home to the farmers—

Mr. Nixon: What was the grade of that tobacco? Would it be—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I cannot tell you the grades. I noticed the prices that were there. I can get the grades. Those things, it is non-descript tobacco, I am told. This went back—n.d. tobacco—this tobacco went home. Those prices were not even calculated in the average prices which were obtained last year; and yet this year, with 117 million pounds of tobacco sold and in the hands of the buyers today, 5.6 per cent of the tobacco offered to date has been rejected. This means about six million pounds, in round figures, a little more than that, has been rejected by the owners of the tobacco when it reached the auction floor.

How much of this tobacco has been re-entered and sold, I am not sure, but I do know this: We have had a man in the warehouses since the first week in February, from our department of farm economics and statistics, to watch the operation of this whole venture. This is how interested I am in this thing.

I think what we should point out to the hon. members opposite, for their information, and this is not critical at all, is simply that when the auctions started, about two per cent of the tobacco offered was rejected. Now this is the initial sales of tobacco coming from the farmers' kilns. This, I think, my hon. friend would agree is a very low percentage. The second lot was very little more. When the third lot came in, and this is the shipment which we are in now, that rejection graph started to go up.

I am not exactly sure of the percentage of rejections today, but I will have these figures before too long. I have heard varying figures as to the price at which that tobacco was rejected. Some of it, I understand, is at substantial prices. The owners felt it was worth still more money and rejected the price offered. This, of course, is their privilege. They can put it back in the line and maybe the next day it will sell for more money.

I would point out to my hon. friend that this often happens at the stockyards, for instance, and I point this out to him because there are several grades of cattle. This is not related to tobacco, but I only use it as an illustration. There are reds, there are blues and there are commercials, as the standard grades of beef cattle. There may be quite a substantial number of reds and blues on the market. But there may be a shortage of commercials. So the lower grade of cattle, commercials, is bid up on the cattle auction out here at the Ontario stockyards, because there is a scarcity of these cattle today, and in relation to the good grades these commercial cattle have come up.

For instance, a typical situation last year was to have choice steers selling at a price that was almost matched by heifer beef, which we all know does not grade out to the same dressing percentage as does steer beef, Mr. Chairman.

Yet, because there was a scarcity of that particular commodity the price went up. I suppose that the farmers who had good steers to sell—my hon. friend, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. W. E. Johnston), back there had as fine a group of steers as I ever saw in any one lot—these farmers found that the steers sold for little more than a good lot of heifers that the hon. member knew about, for that very reason, sir. Now what happened? This winter the scales went the other way, or the trend went the other way, and steer beef moved ahead because there was a scarcity, and the reds and blues moved ahead, but heifer beef dropped back. Just this last week, in fact in yesterday's Globe and Mail I read the livestock report, and heifers were in strong demand and sold within almost a cent per pound of steer beef.

I use this as an illustration to show what can happen in a free auction market and this is what we had in tobacco this year. My hon. friend suggests that there may be a possibility of going back to grade prices. This is fine if we go back to grade prices. A great discussion developed between my hon. friend the hon. member for York South and me the other day, Mr. Speaker, about this withdrawal of the minimum grade prices and the regulations contained therein. But I would point out to my hon. friend that the reason this was withdrawn is told in the full explanation of it which I have right here. This relates to a newspaper account of the tobacco meeting that was held in Delhi on Saturday, February 29. It includes a statement reported to have been made by a former member of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board, to the effect that the farm products marketing board, and this is in quotations, "has shorn the tobacco plan of its powers." This reference would appear to draw attention to the removal of the regulations from the tobacco plan providing for negotiation and arbitration. These regulations are mandatory on the tobacco board. Section 10, subsection 1 reads as follows:

There shall be a negotiating agency to be known as the negotiating committee for tobacco.

This was to establish minimum grade prices which my hon. friend from Brant just referred to. The tobacco board, this is the flue-cured tobacco board, decided not to proceed with negotiations, but instead said that the market would operate on the basis of open price.

This was done after the flue-cured board had been to Ottawa last fall, had negotiated with the Minister of Agriculture for Canada for a deficiency payment under The Agricultural Stabilization Act of 47 cents a pound. They came back to Toronto. They advised our chairman of the farm products marketing board, Mr. McCague, that this is what had happened and they immediately said, "We want to go on the open market."

In order that the tobacco board be not in breach of the regulations in the flue-cured tobacco growers' marketing plan, the regulations were withdrawn by the farm products marketing board. This action was taken after the growers' board had clearly indicated the basis of marketing the 1963 crop—this is significant—after the growers' board had indicated to the farm products marketing board, the basis on which it wanted to market the 1963 crop.

Mr. Nixon: Was there a two-way discussion on that before the formal indication came from the local board to the Toronto board?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I understand that there was negotiation before the board went to Ottawa, that there were discussions with the board as to how best to proceed with this, but the flue-cured board went to Ottawa to get some type of a guaranteed price on its tobacco.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister will permit a question since we are again in calm waters. Were the local members of the board in receipt of a recommendation from the farm products marketing board on the open market?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I cannot answer that question. The chairman of the farm products marketing board has come into the House and he advises me that this is not the case.

Mr. MacDonald: Would the hon. Minister permit another question?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Can you explain how and why for something like two to three months now, out in the tobacco communities the impression is widespread and accepted that the decision of December 3, or whatever date it was, was in effect a dictate from the Toronto board? It seems to me that if there had been an agreement with the local board, that this is a factual point that could have been clarified a long time ago and I am just puzzled as to why it has not been clarified.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer the hon. member. As a matter of fact, I did not know this was the case. No one had ever mentioned it to me that it was a dictate from this board. I knew nothing about it until, I believe, a court case last week that you referred to in your newspaper clipping the other day, indicated that this was indeed the fact.

I would like to go on, Mr. Chairman, to continue to read this because I think it does shed light on it. Now then, this action—and I stopped in the middle of the sentence there to say that in order that the tobacco board be not in breach of the regulations in the flue-cured tobacco growers' marketing plan, the regulations were withdrawn by the farm products marketing board. This action was taken after the growers' board had clearly indicated the basis of marketing the 1963 crop. The auctions opened on November 14, 1963. The regulations were withdrawn November 20, 1963, at the specific request of the flue-cured board in order that they would not be in breach of the regulations that had applied in previous years. The reference in the newspaper account must have been a misunderstanding or a misrepresentation of the facts surrounding this matter.

Should there be a request from the flue-cured tobacco growers' marketing board for the reinstatement of negotiation and arbitration, and this will answer the second question of my hon. friend from Brant stating that these regulations should be employed, the farm products marketing board would re-establish the regulations. It is entirely up to the discretion of the flue-cured board. I think it is only fair to point this out.

I referred a moment ago to the fact that I would have some information that I had requested to be compiled from the economics branch of our department. My deputy Minister tells me that this is a sample day, that I think pretty well illustrates what has been going on.

Before I read this, however, I do want to reiterate the fact that everyone thought this free auction—I should not say everyone, but that certainly most of the people that I had anything to do with thought that the auction method was working exceedingly well. My goodness, I read the paper every day; the London Free Press carries the tobacco auctions for every day's sale, the total number of pounds sold that day, what it sold for, the total number of pounds sold for the entire season, and the average price.

Mr. MacDonald: As long as the companies played ball.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Everything was going along fine. But I think that we should recognize the fact that we have come to the third shipment here, and it could well be that the stockpile of rejections are building up, and they are now coming back on the market. This is a possibility. I am not saying it is happening but I think it is a distinct possibility.

Here is a summary of the ten first catalogues offered for sale at the three auctions on Thursday morning, February 26. It indicates the following facts:

First: Of the 1,820 lots of tobacco offered for sale, 26.1 per cent of the offers were rejected. As indicated in the table this proportion ranged from a low of 24.3 per cent in Aylmer to a high of 28.9 per cent in Delhi.

Second: In total, 525 lots secured a price of at least 50 cents per pound on the first bid. Only 49 lots, or 9.3 per cent of these offers were rejected. Delhi rejected most with 11.5 per cent, and Tillsonburg least with seven per cent.

The third point: On 1,295 lots of tobacco the first offer was less than 50 cents a pound; almost one-third of this tobacco was rejected.

In summary, it is clear that growers rejected lots priced under 50 cents three times as often as lots priced over 50 cents. This is a summary handed to me today.

I think we have to recognize the fact that, even though last year we did not include the low sale tobacco at all, that is, the low sale offer which was taken home in the average price, this year it is being considered; and even at that we are half a cent a pound above the price which was offered last year—and we are including the tobacco which sold at the low price this year. Last year we did not, Mr. Chairman.

Now, I think this is significant. The fact that 117 million pounds of tobacco have been moved at a higher price this year in total, than the tobacco that sold last year, eliminating those grades of tobacco which sold at that low price and were taken home, is clearly indicative to me that this free auction system was working reasonably well.

All of a sudden it collapsed. Many reasons may be advanced for this; there may be many reasons. For instance the MH-30 thing that happened up at Aylmer, when was it, a week ago today or yesterday; that one of the growers blocked the door and refused to move his truck. This is a matter, a civil matter, between the flue-cured board and the growers; they operate the whole thing. As far as the MH-30 is concerned, I have been to Guelph, I have seen the tobacco which was taken from the respective lots in the various warehouses or auction barns. I have seen it taken to Guelph by messenger—it is not shipped by mail, it is placed in unidentified bags save for a number. No one at Guelph knows; I had no idea whose tobacco I saw being tested, but I saw it dried, ground and tested right before my eyes and saw the reading; and there was no doubt whatever in my mind that some of this tobacco is indicative of the very high use of MH-30.

Six pints per acre is the recommended use for proper suckering. Anything which shows two pints per acre or more is classed as MH-30-treated tobacco, but anything which shows any less than that, even though it is just the lightest shade on the colour chart, is allowed to go through because of the fact that there might be some difference of opinion there and some tolerance should be offered.

But I have seen those grades with my own eyes right from the beginning, from zero right through to six pints per acre. I compared the test with the chart they have there before them to indicate which category this fits into. If there is any doubt about MH-30 tobacco and the fact that our tests may not be right—and there is always doubt, I suppose, in someone's mind; who could say, well, "your test is not worth a hoot" but this is the test that has been proven to be absolutely reliable as far as we are concerned.

I would point out to my hon. friends that there have been 171 random samples of tobacco chosen by the inspector of our department who would walk in to the auction floor and take samples of tobacco out of the various owners' tobacco unidentified, put it in a plastic bag, seal it, put a number on it and send it to Guelph and have it tested in the laboratory by the technician. I was advised yesterday, and I spent a great deal of time yesterday examining this in detail, that not a single sample of the random tested tobacco proved positive for MH-30. Not a sample of that 171 tested positive; it was all free of MH-30.

I would suggest that if anyone doubts the validity of that test there is a laboratory here in Toronto—I am not sure of the name or location, I am sure that you men could tell me, I have heard the name—which will test this on a private basis. I understand that it is supposed to be absolutely fool-proof, but there has not been a grower, to my knowledge, whose tobacco has shown positive MH-30 treatment in the Guelph test, who has ever availed himself of the check test that is available in Toronto.

There is the story as far as we are concerned. This may have been one of the things that incited all this trouble. I regret it as much as anybody else does, but I think we have to assess this whole matter, bring these people together and try to work out the difficulties and, in the aura of calm reason, try to get this market open and get this tobacco moving. I do not think we can accomplish anything, Mr. Chairman—I say this with the greatest respect, in this House—by criticizing each other, or by saying we are going to have great droves of tobacco farmers come to Toronto, or that we should go out to the tobacco country.

Mr. Nixon: I am not bringing them; but I hope the hon. Minister will give them a cup of coffee.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Very good. I would like to say this though: There was a suggestion made the other day in the House, which I noticed was picked up in the press, that the last time there was trouble here, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister of the day went to the tobacco country and settled this whole matter. I want to make it abundantly clear that this matter was settled right here at Queen's Park between the flue-cured board and the buyers themselves.

Mr. Nixon: Can the hon. Minister do that again?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not know, but I am willing to try; I am willing to try.

Mr. Nixon: As soon as they ask the hon. Minister to try?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Not as soon as they ask me to try it; I have asked them to come here. I have asked them to do it. But I am not going to be accused by you people on the other side of the House of interfering with this group of people who went to Ottawa, and saying to them, in effect—as the hon. member suggested I should have said—"Call Ottawa. Come back here to Toronto. Sit down with me and let us iron this thing out."

Mr. Nixon: I said go down there with them.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well now, if I had gone down there with them and the plan had failed in Ottawa, you would have said, "If you had stayed home and minded your own business and let that great Liberal government solve it, it would have been done."

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister is the one with the political difficulties.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is the position we find ourselves in today. We have asked for this meeting. So here we are. I am just advised this very moment that Mr. Demeyere and his group have arrived in Toronto, they are at the Lord Simcoe Hotel and they want to see Mr. McCague, the chairman of the farm products marketing board. I would suggest that he should go immediately from this chamber and meet with them.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to come back to this. The hon. Minister has pleaded that we should treat this very calmly and I am going to attempt to.

Mr. Chairman: Is this going to be a straight question?

Mr. MacDonald: No, it is not going to be a straight question. And I do not think at this point, Mr. Chairman, that you can pose straight questions.

Mr. Chairman: Order. In my opinion the hon. Minister has given a very broad and thorough explanation of the problem that exists with the tobacco industry today. I would ask that since it has been explained, that any questions asked should be definitely posed to him to be answered.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I am going to be able to live within the restrictions you have just now imposed.

The hon. Minister a few moments ago said he wanted us to suggest to him what should be done in this situation. I have been trying for a number of moments in this exchange, and I want to come back to this, Mr. Chairman, if I can just plead with you to be a bit lenient for a moment. I want to suggest to you that the basic problem here is that we have a free market which will operate only if the companies are willing to play ball.

It is all very well for us to look back and say 117 million pounds have been sold. This is not the point. There is another 60 million or more to be sold. This is where the worry is—because of the attitude of the companies. Now when you had a scheme operating with regulations, the companies had to live within the regulations. Now you have a free market, at which the companies can do as they please. This is why the farmers are worried, this is why they said to close the exchanges until we find out exactly what they are going to do.

Your basic problem is that you have a free market. Up until now it was my belief that this free market was—and I use the word "dictate", so I shall repeat it again in the hope that it will not be inflammatory—that this was the dictate of the Toronto board. The hon. Minister has just read a letter in which he says that this is not true. He has read a letter in which he states that the Toronto board was only implementing what had been a decision of the local tobacco board.

Now I want to read to the hon. Minister a few quotes. I just happened to look through this clipping. And here is the basis of our problem: a very serious misunderstanding. It is so serious that to me it is mystifying, because as I look through the story that I quoted the other day when I was speaking on this—the one that was entitled “Black Day” from the Simcoe paper of December 3, not in November, when the word came down that the negotiating and the arbitration powers of the local board were removed. I note that there is a quotation which is perhaps from the same letter that the hon. Minister has just read. There is a paragraph that reads as follows:

The Toronto board’s explanation for removing the powers was the tobacco board’s decision—that is the local tobacco board’s decision:

—to have an open market and no grade pricing for the 1963 crop, the letter said. If the tobacco board does want minimum grade prices in the future, the sections could be put back in, said the Toronto board’s letter signed by Chairman George McCague of the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board.

Now I would judge from my hearing that this is the same letter the hon. Minister has just read.

What I want to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister is this: In the same story, what was the reaction of the directors of the local board to this suggestion that it had been done at their request? Just let me read some of it:

Director Csubak declared: “I don’t know why the Toronto board went ahead and revoked these powers without even asking us.”

Said director Ted Raytrowsky, “We had an open market in 1957 and these powers weren’t revoked then. Now the Toronto board revokes them and we have not had any say in it.”

Director Rene Strobbe: “The Toronto board has now taken away the plan we fought over in 1957—lock, stock and barrel. They have completely pulled the rug out from under us.”

Incidentally, these are all direct quotes. They are not just newspapermen’s interpolations.

Director Ernest Leitch asks the board: “Was it necessary for the Toronto board to delete all these things from the plan without our knowledge? We have to do something, such as make a strong protest, because of the principle here.”

Chairman George Demeyere explained that he had received a telephone call from Toronto earlier with the request that the tobacco board consider revoking these sections from the plan and this is the reason why he put them on the agenda.

In other words, here is Chairman George Demeyere saying that they had got a call from Toronto, asking them to consider revoking the powers, and further that Toronto had requested the question be put on the agenda. And the decision had been taken. Here are five directors asking the question: Why they had been taken out without their knowledge. That is not the end of it. Mr. Harris replied:

Mr. Harris, board solicitor, was asked by Director William Vamos if these powers had to be taken out of the plan for any legal reason.

Mr. Harris replied: “I don’t think that the reason was a legal problem as the plan you are now operating would be all right if the legislation was in or out.”

Director Ernest Duckett: “I think the argument with Toronto is this: We came here today to discuss a request of revocation of these regulations and we now find it has already been done—”

Hon. Mr. Stewart: What date was that?

Mr. MacDonald: This is December 3. In other words—well, let me finish.

Mr. Csubak: “We should put in a request that we want these powers back and we might want to negotiate with the companies. Then we could wait and see what happens.”

Mr. Raytrowsky: “I can’t see why the regulations were taken out of the plan without consulting the board. It was my understanding that we were to have a meeting with the Toronto board to see where we stand.”

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the light of all those—which are comments immediately upon receipt of Chairman McCague’s letter saying that they had acted on the local board’s request — here is the whole board saying: “This is nonsense. We did not want it done, we did not ask to have it done, we thought we had it on our agenda to discuss today.”

I think, Mr. Chairman, under those circumstances it is idle for the hon. Minister to come in here and to say that they had acted on the request of the local board, because here is the majority of the local board in direct quotes from the Simcoe Examiner of December 3 saying this simply is not the case—indeed, one of them saying: “We should have the powers put back immediately, because we may want to use these powers to negotiate with the companies before it is all over.”

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the hon. member has said here. I can understand from reading that newspaper article that he would be inclined to believe that everything there is the gospel truth. I have no reason to say that it is not in their humble opinion. But the facts are that as far as we are concerned we will reinstate the regulations tomorrow morning if they want it done.

We had a Cabinet meeting today, and I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. Prime Minister felt this was important enough for that board to want to have it done, we would call a Cabinet meeting to have a regulation put through to reinstate it. It does not mean a thing to us whatever. We did this—and when I say “we” it is the farm products marketing board acting with our solicitors and, as I understand it, the solicitors for the flue-cured tobacco growers marketing board—we felt that if the open auction were to continue with the regulation for the fixing of minimum grade prices and grading that the flue-cured board themselves would be in breach of the regulation. Now surely this is logical and it was on that advice—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Harris says no.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, there is something wrong someplace. The hon. member is quoting from newspaper reports. I am quoting from the fact as I understand it from my side because I am the fellow who signed the regulations and I know that this was why it was done. Now if there is anything wrong about it, and they want it reinstated immediately, we are trying—

Mr. MacDonald: Their complaint is that you took it away without their having a chance to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This, I am afraid, is hardly the case. I think my hon. friend can find all sorts of instances. He could quote from various statements that have been made from time to time by people in the flue-cured board. Perhaps one of our great problems is that the flue-cured board themselves are not always in agreement with the policies that the majority follow. This is one of the problems that we are faced with. I am sure you people in the Opposition who know and understand the tobacco industry know that this is a very real and vital problem. But we have to live with it. We are working with it, but it does create some problems at times, and this I think, is another instance of it.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I was out of the House when this discussion on flue-cured tobacco was taking place. I was meeting another delegation. The hon. Minister seems to indicate to me that he does not know too much about what is taking place through this drop in price in flue-cured tobacco.

Has the hon. Minister made any contact with the buyers of flue-cured tobacco? It does not seem to indicate that they do not know what happened to this price on flue-cured tobacco. It seems to me that the buyers should be met with to see if they have too much tobacco, or that they want this tobacco, or to question what has happened.

That is why I suggested the other night to the hon. Minister that I know when I was in this House a few years ago that they were burning flue-cured tobacco in southwestern Ontario at the tobacco auctions. At that time I read in the paper that the former Prime Minister of this province, hon. Mr. Frost, went down, and in a few days the tobacco market was stabilized and operating very successfully.

Now, has there been any contact with the buyers of flue-cured tobacco?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I regret my hon. friend was not in the House. We have been on this debate for a considerable length of time. I thought he was here but if he has not been here—

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, may I say that the hon. Minister does not need to answer me. I will read it in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well I am quite willing to explain the fact to him. I read a statement here. We have had a man at the auctions for a month from The Department of Economics and Development. One of the top men of our department has been there for a month because we were concerned.

We had heard rumours about various things and we quietly sent a man down there to check this thing out to find out for ourselves. The sales looked to be going wonderfully well. Then we heard these rumours. He has been there for a month. We have all the figures taken off every auction for, as I understand it, every day. We know who rejected the tobacco, at what price and who bought it the second time it was offered. We have no record as to what happened the third time it was offered, or if it came back from the farmers' place. But I read a statement earlier and it will be in Hansard tomorrow. Just handed to me this afternoon is a summary of last Thursday's auctions at the three different places. It is in Hansard.

So, as far as the former Prime Minister ever having gone to the tobacco country, to my knowledge this never happened. The question was settled right here at Queen's Park. The Prime Minister was involved in it at that particular time, but it was settled here, Mr. Chairman. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture of that day—I was a member of the House at the time it happened—were not involved in going out to the tobacco country at any time. The groups came here and I have asked the advisory committee to meet tomorrow. Mr. Demeyere is back from Ottawa this afternoon. I understand he has just arrived. I do not know whether my hon. friend heard that I read the announcement in the House that he had just arrived and that I asked Mr. McCague to leave immediately. He has gone. As soon as I made the announcement he left. I do not know what more one can do than this.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Nipissing has the floor.

Mr. Sopha: He does not want to speak on this problem, Mr. Chairman. I just want to make one final comment on this. One would not want to intimate in any way that one has a very close and searching knowledge of this very complex problem. I do want to say though, that I have had some association with the tobacco industry in that for five years when I was going to school I got to know something by virtue of the fact that for five consecutive seasons I worked in the harvesting of this crop. I got to know something of their problems.

The problem that pressed upon them the greatest was the sale of their product. Without going into any details that one would like to forget, the pressures that these people were subject to when they sold their product under the old method of the buyer coming around to the farm and examining the tobacco, making a grade and making an offer, were unimaginably objectionable. It was to get rid of those characteristics in the sale of this product that these auctions were opened several years ago. I think in that regard—my memory is very clear—the first auction opened at Tillsonburg and was very successful in its initial stages. There was a great measure of relief among those people I knew who carry on their lifetime activity in this great industry.

Now having said that, I want to go on and point out to the House that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has a very weird idea of responsibility and government. He made the startling statement to us, with reference to something the hon. member for Brant said, that we have no responsibility. He has all the responsibility. We have not. He does not even understand the function of the Opposition to bring these things to the floor of this House so that they may be examined and discussed, in a calm and reasoned atmosphere, in an endeavour by people on all sides of the House to get to a solution.

In regard to responsibility, each hon. member from the Liberal Party who has tobacco growers in his constituency is here present. They are: my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Whicher), my hon. friend from Kent East (Mr. Spence), my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Nixon), and my hon. friend from Essex South (Mr. Paterson). They are all here.

I look up there for the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Pittock), he is absent. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McNeil) just came in. He just came in a moment ago and took his seat. The hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) is not here. He represents one of the great tobacco growing areas of the province, Haldimand-Norfolk. I—

An hon. member: Durham is here.

Mr. Sopha: My friend, the hon. member for Kent West (Mr. McKeough) is here and has been.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sopha: But all these others? The hon. Minister of Agriculture—let me go on—talks about a Cabinet meeting being called. Well, as one who is often victimized for being present, the hon. Prime Minister is not even here to listen to this discussion. Finally, the startling statement was made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that although the tobacco auction closed last Friday he was not aware of it until Monday. "I read it in the paper on Saturday—"

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I did not say that. I said I was aware of it on Saturday when I read the press.

Mr. Sopha: Well—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Am I supposed to call the auction every night and ask them if they are still operating?

Mr. Sopha: Oh indeed! yes indeed! Because the hon. Minister has an agricultural representative at Simcoe who could inform him Friday night. His failure to inform the hon. Minister is the act of an official—my friend the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), when he was Minister of Lands and Forests, I heard him say something to the effect that if there is neglect in the department he would fire the person. I do not know whether it goes that far in this regard, but one wonders why this representative at Simcoe did not inform the hon. Minister Friday night—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: I contend, sir, I am in order. I contend I am in order discussing the very things the hon. Minister raised himself.

Finally, in order to make the record absolutely clear, the hon. Minister went on and made this offensive statement, which is offensive on this side of the House, very much so. He said not one constructive proposal had been advanced from this side of the House for the solution of this problem. My friend, the hon. member for Brant always spoke on this problem in the most reasoned and moderate tones, endeavouring to be constructive in every way. My friend, the hon. member for Kent East made the suggestion last Tuesday that the hon. Minister of Agriculture go to the very scene in the endeavour to achieve a solution and he pointed out the great precedent. Does it really depress the hon. Minister of Agriculture to that extent? My hon. friend pointed out the great precedent was that the Prime Minister of this province once went himself—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Which was in error!

Mr. Sopha: —to solve the problem. Well, that is what has been said, that he went himself to solve the problem—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Sure, it was said—

Mr. Sopha: —and the auction opened the next day. But is that so unreasonable a suggestion, is it so wild in imagination? My hon. friend from Kent East suggests that it is rejected out of hand by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Finally, those suggestions by the hon. Minister that no constructive proposals come from this side will never be accepted with equanimity so far as we are concerned.

Vote 112 agreed to.

On vote 113:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, just one question.

Mr. Chairman: I grant the floor to the member for Kingston.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comment and debate that has been going on this afternoon and I thought it might be a good idea to read you an article from what you might call a non-partisan area of the country. This particular article is an editorial which appeared in the Wednesday, March 4, edition of the Kingston Whig-Standard. It gives maybe a little different view of what this particular argument is about. I might mention that the Kingston-Whig-Standard is one of the finest papers in eastern Ontario, and I feel that this might bring a little bit of refreshing thought to what has been going on here this afternoon. It goes like this:

The hysterical reactions to the failure of a free market to absorb farm products at a price growers think "fair" is perfectly illustrated in the present tobacco marketing fiasco. The Ontario tobacco farmers concerned became so hostile that they actually forced the closing of the free market auction exchanges under the threat of violence.

Tobacco prices have fallen for various reasons, an instance of the drop being a day's selling at an average of 47.23 cents a pound, compared with an average for the season of 51.14. This is not something one would have thought would lead to violence but apparently the tobacco men resent any interference—whether from a "free market" or not—with the prices they have become accustomed to. It is also true that buyers have been offering ridiculous prices for tobacco, probably as a deliberate tactic of harassment, but since nobody sold at those prices all the fuss seems to be just a bit uncalled for.

Another cause for high blood pressure for the farmers is the Stinson report, which is the report of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Industry Inquiry Committee, released last week. This report called for the gradual abandonment of tobacco acreage control and the eventual opening to all farmers of the privilege of growing tobacco. As it is now, tobacco farming is restricted to those who have been granted acreage rights by the growers' marketing board. Anybody who thinks free enterprise means freedom should think about this remarkable arrangement, by the way.

One more element in the battle of the prices should be noted: a higher-than-normal percentage of green tobacco on the market this year. The industry does not want green tobacco and won't buy. It has also been revealed that most of the price cuts were directed at tobacco of lower grade—all of which, if true, rather robs the tobacco growers of their reasons for emotional display.

There are other, broader, implications in this situation which must be considered. The free auction system of selling was adopted by the tobacco board in the hope that more export buyers would be attracted thereby. Export buyers have long complained that the minimum grade price system, under which tobacco was withdrawn from the market when it failed to sell at minimum grade price, meant instability of the market. They could not, under this system, trust Ontario as a stable and continuing source of supply. It is pointed out that so far the new system has not stimulated export buying that the foreign buyers must be convinced that the new system will be a lasting one. They want to see Ontario get through a year without changing its selling policy.

It would appear that interference with the growing and selling of tobacco, or of any other crops, has much more to condemn it than to recommend it. Farmers inevitably argue that, since all the rest of the economy is managed and its prices administered, they should also use these methods. But rigidity of agricultural prices never works for long where a wide market is being sought. There are too many competitors who are not bound by arbitrary boards which refuse to let them meet market demands in their own way—this is, by cutting prices.

The rebel tobacco farmers who were in the news recently have the right idea and they should have taught the growers a lesson they badly need.

Mr. Chairman, I thought it might be a little bit refreshing to read this particular editorial to you, coming from a part of the country, you might say, which takes a bird's-eye view of what is happening up here. I realize it has no effect on the solution of the problem involved right now, but I did want to let you know what some people think of this particular problem that is causing so much concern here in the western section of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Nipissing has the floor.

Mr. Troy: No, as it is not on tobacco, sir, I will defer to the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, just briefly, it is always refreshing to hear the hon. member for Kingston and the island. I would like to say that the gist of the editorial that he has read, as well as the information contained in an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail yesterday, and to some lesser extent the comments of the hon. Minister, have left the impression that the average prices are down only slightly from what they were when the market was progressing smoothly and to everyone's satisfaction. With this I am in agreement.

The point, however, which has set off the difficulties at the auction has really very little to do with the average prices, but the prices that go to make these averages, and the fact that they are erratic and unreasonable. The hon. Minister himself said that he has questioned his assistants in the department to find some reason for this. I submit to him that it is an unreasonable situation in that the prices being offered are unreasonable and erratic. When he speaks of a curve of rejections it might possibly be related to a steady curve of price dropping. I feel to some extent this curve is unrelated to the actual facts, when the prices have varied from what would be considered by any reasonable farmer to be a good price, down to one which is considerably below a "reasonable return," to the ultimate extremes of the three- and four-cent bids that have been referred to previously. I think this is the important thing, and not so much the average price.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, just one question on this particular vote. When I asked a question earlier of the hon. Minister I was told that this subject should come under this vote.

I want to know, sir, if you can tell me, what was the result of the negotiations of the farmers who came to see the farm products marketing board with regard to forming a marketing board for pulp wood?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: What vote is this under, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Troy: Vote 112.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We are past 112 a long time ago.

Mr. Chairman: I made a mistake when quoting the number, and I had the member's name on my list from a previous time when he asked the same question.

Mr. Troy: What vote is this discussion on, in which the hon. member for Brant, the hon. member for Kingston, and the hon. Minister himself spoke?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 112.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I answered the hon. member for Nipissing the other night. He asked the same question the other night. I gave you the answer, and now you are asking the same question again.

Mr. Troy: I am asking the results of the negotiations.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The results of their negotiations? I have not heard anything more from them. Apparently they did not pursue the idea of going ahead and forming their own marketing plan for pulp wood.

Vote 113 agreed to.

On vote 114:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): On vote 114, we have had quite an influx of immigrants in the last five or six years. Some of the immigrants would be younger people and have gone into farming. Is there a requirement of citizenship for one to obtain a loan under The Ontario Junior Farmers Loan Act? I know there are residence requirements, but is there a citizenship requirement?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: They would have to be resident in Ontario for three years.

Mr. Newman: For three years. No citizenship requirement is there, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not think so. No citizenship requirement.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, sir.

Vote 114 agreed to.

Vote 115 agreed to.

On vote 116:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 116, one year ago I had asked the hon. Minister concerning amendments to The Weed Control Act. I spoke on behalf of those who were affected by ragweed, and at the time the hon. Minister replied that he would give this matter every consideration and would make some comments. The request did come from a constituent of mine, but it does affect the whole province when it comes to The Weed Control Act. The suggestion was that the destruction of the ragweed flowers be before the release of pollen. Has the department given any consideration to the three or four different suggestions that I made last year? Could the hon. Minister comment on it now?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am advised by the director of the soils and crops branch that there appears to be plenty of controls in the present weed control Act, which is enforced by local municipal weed inspection to control any weeds that happen to be in the municipality.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, that was quite true, but the suggestion was, and if I may read, section 3, subsection one of the Act now reads:

Every person in possession of land shall destroy all noxious weeds thereon as often in every year as is necessary to prevent ripening of their seeds.

The proposed amendment I made at that time was that, in the case of ragweed, the destruction shall be before the ragweed flowers have opened to permit the release of pollen. Likewise, I made a similar suggestion in section ten, subsection one, and section four, subsection one. The hon. Minister, at that time, replied, "Well, let me say, Mr. Chairman, we will be glad to give this matter every consideration."

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I would say this: We will take this matter under consideration entirely. This is up to the local weed inspectors in their municipalities. It may be, that if we put this into the Act, this means that every local weed inspector in every municipality has got to enforce this according to the Act. I think it should be left to the discretion of the local weed inspector to do these things. You could have one set of ragweed plants which would reach a stage of maturity and be ready to flower, and yet in another field in the same block, you might have a group of ragweed plants which would be at an entirely different stage of maturity. I do not think you want the weed inspector of the local municipality running to this one and running to that one, trying to enforce an Act that surely could be enforced with discretion, so that he might, himself, exercise good commonsense and judgment.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. Minister today, but he could have given me these same remarks one year ago and I would not have brought this up at all today.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 116 agreed to?

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, on one question put by me there, in reference to the junior farmers loans: Would the hon. Minister tell me whether arrangements have been made now with the banks so that the province can endorse for loans which were promised in the past and could not be done until a month or so ago?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The bank loan has been in effect for three weeks. I have a letter before me, which was sent out from the banks to their local branches, and a letter from our director to the Canadian Bankers Association. It should be in operation now, Mr. Chairman.

Vote 116 agreed to.

Vote 117 agreed to.

On vote 118:

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I would think that this might be the proper vote to raise the question I have in mind, inasmuch as this experimental station is close by my riding.

Over the past year or two a great deal of concern has arisen over the indiscriminate and maybe improper use of pesticides spraying, to the degree that it may be harmful to humans, to wild life and to plant life. It has got to such a degree in the United States that there have been very strong delegations and representations made to the committees to bring this type of spraying under state control.

I have had this question raised by a couple of farmers in my riding who are concerned about it. Apparently they were disturbed about the fact that small children had been affected by sprays when playing in the orchards, and there have been cases of adults who have been violently ill from the effects of the pesticide sprays.

Their concern is that the spray may not be being used properly because of the difficulty in understanding the charts given out. The formulas are of a technical nature and the mixture is of a chemical nature, quite hard for a layman to understand. I wonder if the hon. Minister would explain what concern the department has in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I appreciate the concern the hon. member has expressed. I am sure we all recognize that many of the sprays which are today accepted as commonplace in use are potentially dangerous if they are inadvertently handled or come in contact with people who might happen to be affected adversely by them.

It was with this thought in mind that The Department of Health, co-operating with The Department of Agriculture, are holding courses for the spray operators in order that they may become fully aware of the potential hazards which are involved and also to make them aware of the fact that there are dangers inherent in this; but, also, The Department of Health is registering all operators of spray equipment. I do not want it to get out and abroad that we are going to license and require all this kind of thing. This is simply that we may know, through The Department of Health, who operates these pieces of equipment and the products they are using, so that checks can be made and trace kept of use of these various products.

There are several courses being held in Ontario to which I referred earlier, and I believe that the operators of spray equipment—that is the custom operators who do roadsides, rights of way, commercial sprayers, some of them have contracting work—are all to be licensed by The Department of Health. Now this again is a recognition of the problem. We are co-operating, of course, with the federal government in keeping on top of this situation. I do not think it applies nearly as much in the province of Ontario as it might in the western provinces where certain chemicals have been used for insect control.

But we are aware of the situation, we are keeping on top of it. I do not think it is something we should become alarmed about, nor that it is any great hazard. It is like many of the chemicals we have used in the past. They are fine and safe, but let us know how to use them and be aware of their hazards.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. In order to set the record straight, I believe the hon. Minister of Agriculture said that the hon. member for Sudbury and myself had erred in saying that the former Prime Minister of this province had visited auction bale warehouses in southwestern Ontario. Now, I am referring to the debates of the Legislature of 1958. It says here:

Mr. Speaker, might I just mention the tremendous advance that has been made in the past year in farm marketing, that it is a very great subject indeed which time would not permit me to develop other than to refer to the situation which has been facing the tobacco growers in this province in that I now come before the House with a very considerable experience for this reason, that for a week or so I sat daily, almost hourly, with representatives of the planning board of growers of the independents and certain objecting groups.

I had the opportunity of visiting one of the fine friends of this House down in Aylmer, and also visiting one of the marketing places that has been constructed by the marketing board, the warehouse. There I had an opportunity of talking to farmers who were there selling a portion of their tobacco crop by the auction system. I would say that I came to the conclusion that the people there were overwhelmingly in favour of bale auction system and they wanted it and I spoke to the people who had sold a portion of their crop and they all assured me of their enthusiasm for this system.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I accept the explanation of my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, but we are talking about two entirely different things. My hon. friend the other day suggested, as did my hon. friend from Sudbury, when my hon. friend from Sudbury substantiated the suggestion of my hon. friend from Kent East, that the hon. Prime Minister and I should go immediately to the tobacco area and settle these problems. I said at that time that the Prime Minister had not gone to that area to settle the problem, they were settled here.

Mr. Spence: What I said—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Now, just a moment, my hon. friend, I listened to what you said. After the problem was settled, the auction was operating, and the tobacco was moving—the hon. Prime Minister was in the riding of Elgin at the time of my hon. friend's by-election, the hon. member for Elgin—he visited the Aylmer warehouse, and so described his visit in the words of Hansard which you have now read. This is what happened, and this is what I advised the press, after the session the other day, right here on the floor when they questioned me about this. I knew the facts, and what my hon. friend has said has substantiated them 100 per cent. We will try to settle it and we will try to settle it right here.

Mr. R. Welch (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, with respect to vote 118, I would like to clear up a point. I may have misunderstood the hon. member for Wentworth East, and if I have I apologize in advance. I understood him to mention that the horticultural experimental station in Vineland was located in his station is in my riding, in the riding of Lincoln.

Vote 118 agreed to.

Vote 119 agreed to.

On vote 120:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, in asking us to vote the $20 million-plus for the federated colleges, it might be in order to—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, no, not on this vote.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, I am sorry.

Vote 120 agreed to.

On vote 121:

Mr. Nixon: On this vote, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some remarks about the federated colleges and what may lie in store for them if the money we are here asked to vote is expended.

A week or so ago we had a most interesting tour of the facilities at Guelph. Those of us who took part in it were most impressed, not only by the facilities but by the staff which had been gathered there, not only to teach the students but to give the service that is so well known to the agricultural areas of Ontario. We note with great interest that well over $6.5 million is earmarked for research, and the fact that this is being directed under the new plan introduced last year is of great satisfaction to all of us, I am sure—that is, the overall control of research in the agricultural field in this province.

It is also true that we are very pleased with the announcement in the Throne Speech that the federated colleges are going to be chartered as a university, we expect, during this session of the Legislature, so that this money earmarked for research can be put to better use, and for many other reasons I will refer to either under this vote or at a later date.

Certainly the fact that the jurisdiction of the University of Toronto over the federated colleges did not allow research and graduate work beyond the master's level to take place, has seriously inhibited agricultural research in the province of Ontario, and in large measure is responsible for the fact that our better students, in pursuing Ph.D. degrees in agriculture, have had to leave the province of Ontario; and many of them, unfortunately, have not seen fit to return. But of course this has been discussed before; and I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the decision to charter this as a university in its own right, so that it can conduct research and graduate work at all levels, will do much to remedy this situation.

But here we are chartering a new university. I would predict that it will become one of the greatest in Canada, and I would think that it has a very special role to play in the province of Ontario, one that is not presently being played by our universities. This new university will have no history of private support; even though there will be fees to be paid in the future as there have been in the past. We will view with much interest any changes in these fees because, at the present time, I understand that the fees of the students are subsidized to a greater extent than is customary at other universities; but there is no history of private support.

This institution will be supported probably to the extent of 85 or 90 per cent by the votes of this Legislature—so that its development will be based on government money. In this connection I feel that it will be able to draw on its history of community service in order to move its facilities out into the community. I would predict, and I would hope, that it would be the centre of a vastly increased network of community colleges. It may be necessary to give them some other name in the future; they would have, as their centre of direction, the network of facilities in Guelph itself.

I hope that the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who is no doubt consulting with the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) and his colleagues in the Cabinet, would have this in mind as the bill to charter the university is under discussion.

But as well as this, Mr. Chairman, as we see the new university perhaps leaving behind to some extent its basic agricultural responsibility and moving more into the realm of community service and the realm of increased education at the community level, I am sure that he, sir, as well as all the other farmer members of the House and others, will see to that there remains in this new university a strong nucleus for the training of those who are going to continue their work in agriculture in all fields; as well, of course, as the essential facilities for agricultural research, and extension of these facilities.

Again then, Mr. Chairman, I feel that in these estimates we will have an opportunity to give our views to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, as these facilities are discussed under his direction for perhaps the last time. We do not know what the government holds in store for the new university. Surely they are going to maintain and increase the agricultural training and experimental facilities there. But it will not be possible to keep on regarding this as an agricultural university in the strictest sense if the university is going to fulfil its role and expand into the communities which require educational facilities at the post-secondary level from one end of the province to the other. I would be very interested to hear the hon. Minister's view in the future of the new university, under this estimate.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would say that it has been the proposal of the hon. Prime Minister to incorporate the university as outlined in the Speech from the Throne—the university at Guelph. I am sure when the bill is brought in to charter the new university, there will be ample opportunity for us to see exactly what is intended for the university, and for the respective colleges now established on the Guelph campus.

I would be in favour of what the hon. member has suggested regarding the emphasis which should continue to remain on agriculture as far as the OAC is concerned. Certainly we who like to think of ourselves as associated with agriculture in the province of Ontario, be it at the farm level or at agribusiness level, look upon the agricultural college at Guelph as the source of those who will continue to fill the ranks in increasing numbers, as time goes on, to meet the challenges which confront us in ever-increasing numbers.

We feel there must be a university established there to do as the hon. member suggests, to serve many communities, not the least of which must be agriculture. I would feel, with that in mind, we will look forward to the introduction of the bill which will incorporate the university.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member for Brant said I would like to underscore and agree with; but my comments, I think, would more appropriately come under the bill, or The Department of Education estimates, or the new Department of University Affairs.

I just want to make one point in passing, Mr. Chairman, and that is that when one recalls the sense of urgency underlying the report of the advisory committee on university affairs a year ago, and the need for a number of new university development including the independent status and the expansion of the Guelph complex if we were going to meet the number of students we will have in 1965, I am puzzled at the slowness with which this whole thing is taking place.

In my contacts and discussions out in Guelph, and from anything I have heard here around Queen's Park, I do not detect any move to provide the facilities for the increased number of students we must have in 1965 if this new institution is going to take its share of the 6,000 new places specified in the advisory committee report. However, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I think that might more appropriately come elsewhere.

But getting back to agricultural education, or at least education in relation to agriculture, I was most interested in a report that was given to the Ontario Federation of Agriculture convention this past fall by J. A. Ferguson, who has been for some years on the national, technical and vocational advisory council of The Canada Department of Labour, on the aspect of that committee's work in relation to agriculture. Without going into the detail, he pointed out how for years this committee had gone on with no reference at all to agriculture. Indeed when he came on to the committee some four or five or six years ago, if I recall correctly, he had to inquire of the chairman what was being done with regard to agriculture—and nothing was being done—and something was initiated.

Apparently—and I will just quote a couple of paragraphs from this report which was presented to the OF of A convention:

Earlier I referred to a conference on agricultural education held in Ottawa in October of 1962. One of the most important resolutions coming out of this conference was to the effect that each province or zone was to hold a conference to discuss their individual situations and their needs. To date nothing appears to have happened in this regard in Ontario.

Recently I received a notice of a meeting being held in Alberta for people interested in proposed agricultural programmes of study, as well as people interested, or possible employers of trainees of such proposed agricultural programmes. This is the kind of action which is important and which needs to be duplicated in many other areas across Canada.

We have excellent work being carried on now at the present schools in Ontario, and none of us are condemning these institutions, but we feel that agriculture today needs a different type of education than is currently being provided and certainly we need a greater degree of co-operation between The Department of Education, The Department of Agriculture, and the farm organizations, in establishing agricultural education and programmes in the future.

I was a little intrigued with this observation of his that, flowing from this national approach, other provinces or zones within provinces had been meeting to consider their particular needs, and his emphasis on the fact that nothing of this had been done in Ontario.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister why this is, and to what extent, in relationship to that, does he feel that the rather phenomenal development of technical and vocational schools across the province, as a result of the new 75 per cent capital grants which were supplied from 1960 on, has met this need? I mean, is this the reason we have done nothing in Ontario? If it is, I am puzzled as to why Mr. Ferguson would not be aware of it and would not have acknowledged it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: From what the hon. member suggests there, you would think nothing was being done. This is not quite the case. The representatives of our department do sit on this same committee with Mr. Ferguson, with the federal and provincial committee he refers to.

As far as the reference to the vocational schools, and their training of agriculture in vocational schools across the province is concerned, the committee look upon the schools at Ridgetown and at Kemptville and the associate course at Guelph as courses in vocational agriculture. I think we have to go back—and I would like to say this, at the risk of taking a little time, Mr. Chairman, to mention the fact that for ten years I was a member of a secondary high school district board where there were three fairly large secondary schools in operation. In those schools we found that it was exceedingly difficult to maintain the interest, to any degree, of any student past Grade 9. We made it mandatory in Grade 9 that all the boys entering that school should take agriculture, whether they came from the urban area or whether they came from the rural area. But past that it was difficult to maintain much interest.

There were a few who went on and took the agriculture course, and we provided a vocational agriculture course.

I was chairman of the committee of the board which had to deal with agriculture. I was exceedingly interested in it because I felt here was an opportunity for us to provide secondary education, vocational training in agriculture, for the boys of our community, the same as we were providing commercial courses to the girls in the same school.

We found, in discussing this with The Department of Education people, that in connection with secondary education there appears to be, generally speaking, very little interest among even our rural boys in vocational agriculture at secondary school level. However, I do believe that there is a very great need, after the boy leaves secondary school and goes back to the farm. When he starts to farm for a while, and begins to realize there is a great deal more to this business of farming than that which his father may have been able to teach him, and he reads of the advances of research and scientific application to practical agriculture, he says, "I have to get more"—but he has left high school. He may not have his Grade 13. But he may have Grade 10 or he may have Grade 12 or something like this.

This boy can now enter the school at Ridgetown, at Kemptville, or our associate course at Guelph. The directors of our schools here have found that those are the very best students they get, generally speaking, because those are boys who recognize the need, and they are there for a purpose.

We have these courses at these various schools filled, generally speaking, to capacity. There may be instances where we could absorb a few more, but they are fairly well filled. I do not think there is a great demand for more than is being provided in those various areas.

Along the very line the hon. member has suggested, we have set up an agricultural educational committee within The Department of Agriculture, of which Mr. Bennett, our assistant deputy Minister, is chairman. It is comprised of the dean of agriculture at OAC, the director at the Kemptville school, and the director at the Ridgetown school—to see how best we can serve the needs of agricultural education in the province of Ontario.

Frankly, I think there are things to be done. We are exploring various areas whereby we may change courses to improve our agricultural education facilities. I think we must recognize the fact that there is little point in developing rather expensive vocational courses unless there are going to be students to fill those courses. If the need develops, then I think we should go ahead and do that very thing.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, a number of educators and placement officers in the Ottawa area and some eastern Ontario constituencies have complained to me that many of their young people are unable to take advantage of the educational facilities of The Department of Agriculture because instruction is not given in the French language.

Mr. Chairman, you will realize that instruction in French would be more satisfactory to students who have received their elementary education in that language. I realize there might be a problem of available staff to give instructions in that language, but I would suggest to the hon. Minister that some planning be done to attract French-speaking instructors, so that in the near future many of the young farmers from that area would be able to benefit from these courses.

If it is not possible to give these courses in French in our own schools at this time, would the hon. Minister consider the possibility of an exchange of students between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. French-speaking students could be given the advantage of attending schools in agriculture in Quebec and, in return, English-speaking young farmers from that province may be invited to attend our own schools here.

This would serve a dual purpose. First, increase the facilities for training many of the farmers' sons from eastern and northern Ontario who are not being trained at the present time, and secondly, both segments of the population would understand each other better. May I ask the hon. Minister through you, Mr. Chairman, whether he sees a possibility of implementing such a programme in the near future?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, in answer to my hon. friend's remarks, I would like to say that this is a programme that has been going on for many, many years. My hon. friend the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs reminds me that many years ago, on his first entry to the House here, he brought this same matter to our attention, and in fact, at that time even, it was in progress.

We feel, in fact we know, there is a very close working relationship between the officials of The Department of Agriculture in Quebec and our own department people. My deputy Minister even says that he gets letters from The Department of Agriculture officials in Quebec written in French.

We have looked upon Macdonald College and Laval University in Montreal, where agriculture is taught, as a source at times for our bilingual extension workers. It is a very satisfactory arrangement. It has worked out. On the other hand, some of their students have come up here to Kemptville and some have come to Guelph. They have taken these practical courses. Macdonald College works out very well. It is perhaps a little more concentrated than our course at Kemptville. It is extended over a little longer period of time, but it is that type of a real, down-to-earth practical course. The Laval University course is a degree course. I think it is an arrangement that is working out exceedingly well.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, could I just say one word about this? This problem has been brought to me by some of the educators in eastern Ontario particularly, and they were worrying about those courses—not the graduate courses, but the courses given to the people who have been attending maybe Grade 9 or Grade 10 schooling and were finding it quite difficult to get the proper training. I am very pleased with the explanation from the hon. Minister and perhaps some of the agricultural representatives in the area could do their homework a little better in order to get those farmers' sons to attend those schools whenever they are available.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question with regard to research under this vote. It has to do with the question of blackbirds, which is quite a serious problem down in our part of the world. Last fall, the hon. Minister was visited by the wardens of the five farming counties of southwestern Ontario and at that time the deputation asked the hon. Minister to take steps to see what could be done about this problem. I would like an answer to this.

Before the hon. Minister gives an answer, if it is possible, I would like to put on record just what a serious problem this is. I think we can dismiss it very easily and say that blackbirds are a problem. But in Kent county—my own county—the commercial corn crop is a $13.5 million crop and the damage from blackbirds is estimated last year in the neighbourhood of eight to ten per cent. This means we are talking about damage in Kent county alone, which is where better than a third of the commercial corn is grown in this province, we are talking about damage in the neighbourhood of $1 million a year in one county.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the blackbirds attack the ears during the milk stage. They feed on the soft corn and of course a certain amount of the corn is then consumed and is not available for sale.

There are secondary effects. The damaged corn becomes warped and becomes dwarfed as well, and sooner or later if this happens rot will set in, and the corn is just not either the quantity or the quality that it would have been without this damage. Many fields in Kent and in other areas during last summer were rendered unfit for use and the blame is to be laid squarely on the blackbird problem.

This is not a new problem, Mr. Chairman, but it is an increasing one. It stems from the fact that nature over the past few years has got out of balance. A great deal of marsh land and low lying land, has been reclaimed and is now highly productive land, and the birds having more to feed on, have grown and multiplied. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that this is not something about which the good people of Kent, the good people of southwestern Ontario, are coming to the hon. Minister and saying, "What can you do?" They are coming in desperation, because they have been taking steps themselves over the last few years and frankly they are not getting far with the steps they have been taking, Mr. Chairman.

The only known method of controlling the blackbird problem at this time is the use of commercial bangers, as they are called, or shotguns. The problem is that these things go off all the time and the birds just move around from one field to another, so this really does not accomplish anything. Live ammunition is better. Many of the farmers during the season of the year patrol the fields, so there is not only the direct loss of the crop but there is also a tremendous loss in terms of manhours which are spent with this problem.

I do hope that the hon. Minister is in a position to give my people and the people of southwestern Ontario some assurance that his department will as soon as possible give the utmost consideration to some ways and means as to how the present population of blackbirds will be, not eliminated but reduced, so that nature once again will be in normal balance, and that the really, wholesale destruction of crops in our part of the world will be stopped.

Mr. Troy: Apropos of the remarks that the hon. Minister of Agriculture made to the presentations of the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Ottawa East, sir, the hon. Minister pointed out that there was a committee consisting of, I think, the deputy Minister and the principals of Kemptville and Ridgetown agricultural schools. Would you ask that committee to consider also the possibility of establishing, as I brought up before, an agricultural school in northern Ontario? And also, in regard to the programme that I understand was initiated by the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs for exchange of students from Ontario to Quebec, Mr. Chairman, are the schools throughout the province and particularly in the area of northern Ontario informed of that opportunity?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As far as I know there is every attempt made to advise the students of northern Ontario of the access to the college in Quebec. We have a considerable number of students from northern Ontario attending the Kemptville Agricultural School annually. I think this is indicative of the fact that they are aware that it is there, and are coming there to the school.

Mr. Troy: But the point I ask is this: Would you have that special committee consider the possibility of such a school in northern Ontario? Also, I hope the students of northern Ontario know that there is this opportunity, as there is an exchange of students from Ontario to Quebec, and also from Quebec to Ontario.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word and give the hon. Minister some credit in regard to the increase in expenditure in the Western Ontario Agricultural School at Ridgeway. I understand that your budget is $57,250 more this year than it was in 1963-64. The hon. Minister knows quite well what a wonderful job this school is doing in southwestern Ontario, and the large number of young men making use of the courses being taught there. I must say how pleased I am to see the increase in the Budget this year.

I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister that the dining room facilities are getting very crowded in the Western Ontario Agricultural School. As you know quite well, I think you were there not too long ago, Mr. Minister, there are many conferences, many meetings of farm groups, held at the farm and the dining facilities are getting very, very crowded. I hope the hon. Minister will take this into consideration and see if they cannot enlarge the dining room facilities.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, before this vote is passed I just want to make a comment in regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant.

I think, sir, perhaps, even although this matter will be completely debated when the bill setting up the new university is introduced and passed through the various procedures in the House during the estimates of The Department of Education, I should reassure all those in the Legislature who have a particular interest in agriculture, and in OAC and OVC particularly, that it is not our intention in any way to disturb the traditional place these colleges have held in the agricultural life and the development of agriculture in our province. We feel that the organization at Guelph can be more fully utilized and the functions can be expanded, but in whatever arrangements we make, I can assure all hon. members here, and indeed the great body of alumni of these institutions and those who have benefited and presently use the research and so on, that we intend if anything to strengthen the position of OAC, OVC and Macdonald Hall in this new structure that we will create. I just want to allay any fears anyone may have in that regard.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, previous speakers have mentioned blackbird research because of the problem it brings to communities that grow corn. However, there is a problem that affects municipalities and that is the starling problem. Has that been solved yet; is the department carrying out research on this?

Mr. Troy: Seagulls, too.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The hon. member for Kent West mentioned blackbirds. I think probably he was including the starling problem in this as well as the blackbird menace. It is all a problem. I can assure you that we recognize that this problem that the hon. member for Kent West has raised is one of the most significant ones that face agriculture in southwestern Ontario today. This is a serious matter and we established an inter-departmental committee immediately following the meeting which my hon. friend referred to, of the wardens from five southwestern Ontario counties who came in to see us. I have been to Kent and Essex counties in the last two years and have seen for myself at first hand the damage that these birds were doing. The matter is under active consideration in our department and I quite frankly feel that it demands our utmost interest and our very great concern as time goes on. It is a very great problem and affects more, even, than the province of Ontario. This is a problem of the United States, where it is, I believe, a worse problem than we have. There has not been any real answer found to it yet but I think we have to work toward the solution of this problem.

Vote 121 agreed to.

On vote 122:

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. Minister to say something about the loans in accordance with The Co-operatives Loans Act. Perhaps I could get him to say something with this question: Just who can start a co-op in the province of Ontario, how many men would have to be involved and how much money would they have to have to start a small co-op in order to qualify for loans?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: To form a co-operative in the province of Ontario, a charter must be obtained from The Provincial Secretary's Department, sir, under the companies branch, I believe it is. When this is obtained, then they can apply for a loan and I believe our Co-operatives Loans Act—I have not got the Act before me, I am speaking purely from memory—will grant a mortgage on the capital assets of the co-operative up to 50 per cent of the value with a maximum of $100,000.

Vote 122 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, before the close for the vote on agriculture here, I would like to keep before this House the fact that in my riding in North Grey in Georgian Bay, the Beaver Valley grows the finest apples in the world. I know that there is a concentration of agricultural schools and research in southern Ontario, and I would just like to keep before the House the need for an experimental farm in the Georgian Bay area of the Beaver Valley district. I spoke to the hon. Minister about this before, and I would like to know what plans he has in mind to bolster this industry, the finest in the world for apples, by setting up an experimental farm in the Beaver Valley area.

ESTIMATES, TREASURY DEPARTMENT

On vote 2301:

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise to present the estimates for The Treasury Department. Last year I commented upon the reorganization of The Treasury Department, which was then being completed. I am pleased to report that the benefits which we foresaw from this reorganization have materialized and that the administrative changes which were effected have assisted the department in discharging its vital functions. As a result of continuing studies of the various facets of departmental administration, it has been decided to strengthen further the revenue collection activities of the department by the establishment of a revenue inspection section within the revenue division. This new unit, which will have branch status, is responsible for ensuring that the various statutes under which taxes are collected are administered as efficiently and economically as possible. In addition, the new branch will study intensively the systems, procedures and controls employed in revenue collection. Improvements will be made where appropriate. The new branch, which began operations early in February, has been created with a minimum of additional outlay. Included among its staff will be officers on loan from other branches of the department. It is felt that experience in such work will provide valuable opportunities for development of staff in keeping with future departmental requirements.

As the hon. members are aware, tenders have been called for the construction of an addition to the present Treasury building. After careful consideration of the administrative advantages in relation to the cost of such a project, it was concluded that the general efficiency of the department would be significantly improved and that there would be, in addition, a number of direct savings on the dollar side.

For instance, the area at present under lease outside of government buildings to accommodate head office employees of The Treasury Department is greater than the area which the Treasury building itself provides. The hon. members know there are decided advantages in consolidating the administration of any government department within one building. They include convenience for the public; improved communication between branches, and resulting faster action, and integration of departmental operations. Therefore, the decision to proceed with the addition to the Treasury building is a logical follow-through to the decision taken in 1954 to construct a separate building for the department.

At this time I would point out to the hon. members that the expenditure estimates for all departments have, for the second year, been prepared on a programme basis. Such an approach to the presentation and consideration of estimates permits assessment of the benefits to be derived from existing and proposed new government activities in relation to the costs involved and total government policy. After a second year of experience with this method, we feel that programme budgeting is proving a valuable method of ensuring rationality and economy in the application of the taxpayers' dollars to the purposes of government.

The permanent secretariat to the Treasury board, established two and a half years ago, is continuing to assist the Treasury board most effectively in its scrutiny and control of expenditures. This is accomplished through the analysis of departmental programmes, staff requirements and proposed expenditures on a continuing basis throughout the year.

Another arm of the Treasury board concerned with promoting efficiency, economy and improved service to the public is the organization and methods services branch. Since its inception two and a half years ago, this branch has carried out a wide variety of studies of organizations, systems and procedures throughout departments in order to assist management of those departments in carrying out their responsibilities as efficiently as possible.

I am pleased to report that the Ontario Committee on Taxation, appointed more than a year ago, has just concluded a successful period of public hearings. A total of 36 private individuals and more than 80 organizations, representing almost every area of interest and activity in Ontario, submitted views and opinions on taxation and revenue problems, both at the provincial and municipal levels.

In addition, the committee has commissioned more than 70 studies covering every facet of the taxation and revenue systems of the province and its municipalities as well as of intergovernmental financial problems generally. These studies, which are being conducted by persons expert in their respective fields, will take into account both the structure of the various revenue-bearing arrangements and the economic considerations which underly them.

In framing its recommendations, the committee will thus have before it a broad cross-section of informed public opinion and the findings of an intensive research programme. In addition, the close liaison which has developed between the federal government's Royal commission on taxation and the various taxation study organizations which have been established by the provinces is providing an effective basis for an integrated approach to the taxation and revenue problems which all levels of government are experiencing.

Provision is made in the estimates of The Treasury Department for the first year of the operations of the Pension Commission of Ontario, which is responsible for the administration of The Pensions Benefit Act. In keeping with one of the major intents of the Act, which is to ensure portability of pensions, the commission to date has received information returns concerning more than 7,500 pension plans covering approximately one million Ontario employees.

In some cases, these are multi-employer plans in which a number of employers join in a single plan.

The analysis of these plans presents an administrative task of some proportions. The processing of statistical information on these plans is proceeding, and it is expected that registration will commence shortly.

Certainly I would be remiss on this occasion if I did not express my sincere thanks to my colleagues on the Treasury board, both for their personal support to me as chairman and for their devotion to the difficult task of discharging the important responsibilities which the board carries. The fact that the board has met on approximately 70 separate occasions since last April 1 is, I think, an indication of the increasing tempo of government business.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to acknowledge my thanks to all personnel of the department whose diligence and effort throughout the past year have contributed to the successful operations of this department.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, it will not be my intention this afternoon to take too long in dealing with the remarks which the hon. Provincial Treasurer has made this afternoon. I think that in the past, ever since I have been in this House anyway, there has been a tendency to more or less skip over The Treasury Department estimates. It has been looked upon as somewhat of a small department. But on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, looking today we see that in the total ordinary expenditure alone there is almost $155 million, and in the capital disbursements an amount equal to almost $20 million.

I was somewhat astonished in listening to the résumé that the hon. Provincial Treasurer gave and the fact that he told us some of what I would regard as some of the minor functions of the department, although interesting. I should not say they were all minor because I know that the functions of the Treasury board are most important, but in his remarks, so far as I can recollect, not one word was mentioned about an item there that stands out in front of us showing a total of almost $136 million insofar as public debt and the interest thereof is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I say that generally speaking not too much is known about this department among the hon. members and for this reason I would like to suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he follow very closely the public accounts committee that has been set up this year. To my view, for the first time, the public accounts committee is working in a proper fashion. We have met several times and certainly will have several more meetings before this Legislature rises and it has been most educational. We have had the provincial auditor in to talk to us, dealing with his department. We have had an official of the Treasury board. We intend to carry on from there to study probably one department of government, anyway as far as the accounts paid from that department are concerned for the last fiscal year.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, that quite frankly in this House very little is known about the method of collecting taxes in the province of Ontario by those of us who sit in these chambers, and furthermore, that very little is known about the actual paying out to the different departments of the estimates that go to each department. For this reason I would like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the public accounts committee should sit the whole year round. I think that perhaps it should sit not only because it could be described as somewhat of a watchdog of public expenditures, but because it would be a training for all of those members who sit on the public accounts committee. I would even go so far as to say that perhaps in any one Parliament the public accounts committee should be changed each year so that other members would have the possibility and the opportunity of learning just some of the great financial implications there are in the running of a province such as Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, the hon. Provincial Treasurer said nothing or very little about the public debt situation in the province of Ontario. I know that he is not worried. Certainly the critic for the New Democratic Party is not particularly worried about the fact that debt has increased greatly in this province in the past number of years. He feels, I believe, and I believe the hon.

Provincial Treasurer feels too, that the debt situation in Ontario is quite manageable and they have their reasons for believing this.

Those of us on this side of the House are not suggesting that the province is going to go broke either. But we do say, when we look at the item marked "Interest, etc." in the public debt under "Ordinary Expenditure" and see that this year it comes to $94,696,000, that this is a figure that is substantial indeed. I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is the gross interest that has to be paid by the province, but nevertheless to bring it down to figures that we all understand may I tell you that the interest we are going to pay this year, the net interest, is going to increase by over $5 million. This is a substantial figure. It is a figure that must be paid each and every year. If, as has been said by many people, the governments of today never intend to pay off their debt anyway, nevertheless one thing that we must remember is that the interest on the debt must be paid each and every year. In this the province of Ontario the item "Interest, etc." is becoming substantial and greater each and every year.

In the Budget criticism I gave, I pointed out that in 1939 the total Budget estimates in the year that the war started were less than the amount of interest paid now in the province of Ontario. I am not going to attempt to compare the standards of living and the degree in which the government spends money now with what it spent in 1939. Nevertheless, in 1939 the government representing this province looked after all of the various departments—highways, education, welfare, our hospitals and all the others, including interest on the public debt, for some $88 million. This afternoon we are going to be asked to vote "Interest, etc." of $94,696,000—over $8 million greater than the whole Budget in 1939.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this is a substantial figure and I am somewhat disappointed that the hon. Provincial Treasurer today might not at least have something to say about this. He could acknowledge that this is a substantial figure and agree at least that it is a figure that is costing the taxpayers of the province of Ontario a great deal of money out of their pockets and a great deal of anxiety to many people who are responsible citizens of this province.

Another item that I would like to mention under public debt in this province is that this year there has been provision for the sinking fund of $40 million. For those of the hon. members who have not been here too long, I might say that the figure five or six years ago might have been anything. It could have been $17 million or $29 million or $25 million, but I believe that it was last year, or the year before, that the hon. Provincial Treasurer said to us that the province of Ontario was going to set up a table for the reduction of the public debt, in the same manner in which Ontario Hydro is run. I believe that provision for the sinking fund was made so that the debt of the province of Ontario would be paid off in 40 years.

My question to the hon. Provincial Treasurer is simply this—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Thirty years.

Mr. Whicher: Thirty years? All right. The debt would be paid off in 30 years. My question to the hon. Provincial Treasurer is simply this. If this is correct—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have an explanation.

Mr. Whicher: Well I shall be glad to hear it. Why is it that the provision for the sinking fund last year was greater than it is for this year?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Would you like to know now or do you want to wait?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Whicher: That may be true. Of course they borrow the money that they—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): They borrow all the savings on deposit.

Mr. Whicher: That would be a very nice way for the rest of us to be able to do business in our businesses, I might say. But the hon. Provincial Treasurer says that he has an explanation for this and I will be glad to listen to him.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to conclude by simply saying this. During the past weekend I was with a gentleman who has just come back from California. He has a responsible position and very shortly will be the president of the Ontario Restaurant Association for the Dominion of Canada. He was talking about minimum wages—naturally he is in the restaurant business—and he talked about the fact that in Toronto and in this particular area this Legislature and this government has a minimum wage law of 85 cents per hour for female labour—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is 95 cents.

Mr. Whicher: Ninety-five? Well, all right. It was brought up to 95 cents. I was hoping it would be $1.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It soon will be.

Mr. Whicher: Soon will be $1. You will be interested to know that in California it is $2.54 per hour for anybody who serves coffee—$2.54 an hour.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Want that in Bruce?

Mr. Whicher: Just one minute. That is a great deal of money. As a matter of fact we cannot afford it in Bruce and you cannot afford it in York South either. But everything in California goes along the same line. For example, it costs $2.85 for bacon and eggs. It costs a great deal of money to do anything there. Everything is bigger. Wages are much more. Except one thing, Mr. Chairman. There is one thing in California, and to my knowledge only one, that is not greater than it is in the province of Ontario and that thing is taxes. The taxes in the province of Ontario are just as heavy as they are in the state of California.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Ever pay room rent down there?

Mr. Whicher: I am not talking about room rents. Workers get paid for being down there. This is the reason, of course, why they go. Room rents are much greater in California or in Los Angeles than they are in the city of Toronto, for example, and minimum wages are much higher too. Everything is on a higher basis, except the one thing we are dealing with this afternoon—taxes in the province of Ontario.

I suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this is something that must be faced by this government, yes every government in Canada. For California, I may say this. The hon. Minister of Mines asked me if I ever paid room rent in California. Yes, and I have also gone on the highways in California and I am not being critical of the highways in Ontario at all at the moment, but I simply say this, that in California they are better and the gasoline—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Whicher: —and the gasoline tax is less, Mr. Chairman. Now I am not going to—

Mr. MacDonald: Sounds like a Liberal programme.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Whicher: Everything is higher except taxes, Mr. Minister. That is what I tell you. Everything is higher except taxes and this is the estimate with which we are dealing this afternoon. All I hope is this, that inasmuch as the hon. Provincial Treasurer did not say anything about taxes this afternoon when he gave his little résumé of the department. I hope that before he is through, that somewhere along the line, he will give us at least a little consolation in the fact that perhaps his department is going to attempt sometime in the future to stabilize this thing so that taxes will not be continually rising, so that we drive people—literally drive them—out of the country.

I mention California. The incoming president of the Ontario Restaurant Association told me in 1966 there will be more people in California than there are in the whole Dominion of Canada, and that one million of those, Mr. Provincial Treasurer, are Canadian citizens. Live ones, not dead ones. People who are down there working today. Now it is not just weather that sends them down there. It is a combination of things. One of the things, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that taxes have reached such an extent, have gone so high in this province, and indeed in the whole country, that we are driving some people to get relief in other places.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose there is any point in trying to do anything to produce informed and intelligent thinking on economic questions by the hon. member for Bruce, or, indeed it would appear, by the whole Liberal group here.

During the Budget debate I recommended to the hon. gentlemen a little book published a couple of years ago in the United States called A Primer On Public Spending. Obviously he has not read it. I am not so hopeful as to think that he ever will, but I wish he would. It only takes a couple of hours and would, if he read it with a view to the content, shake the firm conviction he now holds and the antediluvian economic ideas he is putting forward.

He has suggested, I take it, that we try to stabilize the Budget and the public debt. There is one way we can do that and one way only, Mr. Chairman, and that is to stabilize growth in the economy, to halt further growth. If the province grows, and I hope it will, then the Budget will become larger and the public debt will become larger. That is inevitable.

Mr. Whicher: But not necessarily taxes.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bryden: Well, as a matter of fact there are countries in Western Europe growing a lot faster than Canada where taxes are substantially higher than here. However, it is very difficult to make comparisons of taxes because the application of a tax varies greatly. Also, one has to consider taxes in relation to what one gets in return for them. Therefore it is very difficult to make international comparisons.

I was rather interested in the hon. gentleman's assertion that taxes in California are no higher, I think he said, than here. I would not care to express any opinion on that, and I do not know that anybody else would, without a very detailed study of the question.

I have found, from what I have read, that people who have made detailed attempts at tax comparisons become less and less confident of the results they have arrived at because of the complexities involved. However, that is not essentially what I am concerned about at this time, Mr. Chairman.

In view of the references the hon. member for Bruce has made to the interest on the public debt, I would like to make one or two observations. Unfortunately, public thinking on questions of this kind is sometimes bedevilled by attempts to treat a government as if it were a private individual. It is as if managing the affairs of a nation, or a province, were the same thing as a housewife looking after the household at home. It is an entirely different thing.

I think one thing we should bear in mind about the interest on the public debt is that, to the extent that it is internally held, it really represents no burden on the economy at all. If one takes the question in terms of a country and assumes that its debt is all held, as is the case with most countries, by residents of that country, then there is really no burden on the economy. The government raises taxes from the people and it pays interest to the people. The only economic effect is that there is likely to be some redistribution of income within the community. Some people will get proportionately more in interest payments than they will pay in taxes, and that may have an economic consequence that is not entirely desirable. But apart from that, it has no economic effect at all.

In fact, if the citizens of a country held government bonds in exact proportion to the taxes they pay, there would not actually be any interest on the public debt at all. The government would simply collect taxes from them and pay some of the taxes back in interest. They would pay the interest to themselves. I do admit that it is not quite that simple, and that there are some transfers of wealth and income as a result of interest payments on public debt. But otherwise, there is no economic effect at all.

What I have just stated now is less true, I admit, of a province. A considerably smaller proportion of the public debt of a province is internally held. Considerably more of it is held outside the province.

I will accept the information just given to me by the hon. Provincial Treasurer, but I would think that with regard to the government of Canada, a greater proportion of its debt is held within Canada than is the case with Ontario. I am now talking about the debt of the province of Ontario, held within Ontario. I assume that is the case. I must say I have never checked, but if it is then what I have said is not as true of Ontario as it would be of Canada, although it is true to an important extent even so.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, even in Ontario the public debt, even to the extent that it is externally held, is surely not a major burden. The payment of interest on it is not a major problem we should have to concern ourselves with here.

Actually, what I regret about the constant hammering of the hon. member for Bruce and others on this question of public debt is that it bedevils genuine economic thinking and stands in the way of the kind of economic policies that will produce growth, and will mean that the administration of the public debt will not be burdensome.

A public debt is burdensome only in an economy that is stagnating or declining. It is not burdensome in an economy that is growing. And as to the idea of paying off the public debt, the public debt of this province has not been paid off. It never will be paid off. It will continue to grow as long as the province continues to grow.

There is not a corporation in this country that is going anywhere whose debt is not increasing. That may be too broad a statement, but I know of none. Those that are going somewhere have increasing debts; those that are expanding, that is a part of their expansion. I should think that the farmers of this province—I am not too familiar with agriculture, but I think farmers whose farms are developing and growing are borrowing money for equipment and buildings and as long as their revenue capacity is increasing—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The hon. member does not know how comfortable that makes me feel.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I must say I could not care less about how comfortable the hon. gentleman from Sudbury feels. The way he acts around here most of the time I would say he is rarely comfortable. In fact he acts as if he has needles in the seat of his chair.

Mr. Sopha: As ye sow, so shall ye reap. I will not be talking again.

Mr. Bryden: That is the best news I have heard since this session opened.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Sudbury interrupted me just before I was going to make my concluding point on this issue, but I will not bother going back to it.

There are some other matters relative to these estimates that I would like to take up with the hon. Provincial Treasurer. The first relates to succession duties. I suppose it is a brave man who ventures into that field because it is one of the most complicated tax fields there is. I will tell the hon. Provincial Treasurer right off the bat that I certainly do not understand The Succession Duty Act of this province in all its ramifications, or anything like it. But there are certain broader implications in which I am interested and they arise from the Dominion-provincial conference of last fall. At that conference, as we all know, various provinces got various types of increased assistance from the federal government, but Ontario got one concession only and that was in the succession duty field, as I understood it.

Essentially, and without going into the complexities, the concession made was this: The federal government agreed that it would increase the abatement under its law from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. That would mean that Ontario, and other provinces which collect their own succession duties rather than simply take a payment in lieu thereof from the federal government, would be able to make an increase in rates which could be charged against the federal succession duty; and, as I understand it right now, with the 50 per cent abatement—the provincial rates are somewhat more so—the taxpayer will pay a certain amount of double succession duty, both to this province and to the federal government.

However, that is not my main point. My main point is that it is now possible for the provincial government to increase its rates, and the taxpayer to get corresponding relief from the federal government. But what I want to know is: Is the provincial government going to take advantage of this opportunity? Under the present system, for the provincial government to take advantage of the present abatement it has to have its own succession duty legislation, with its own rates, Mr. Chairman.

Unless I am gravely mistaken, if it is going to take advantage of the new set up, it is going to have to increase its rates. If it does not, I think the beneficiary will be the taxpayer because I believe that he will still be able to claim the abatement; but unless the provincial government does something with its present succession duty rate structure, neither the province nor the Dominion will get the benefit of it. It will go to the taxpayer.

The estimate, as I understood it, was that if Ontario took full advantage of this situation, it would get something more than $14 million in a full year. I do not think that will become fully operative right away but in time it would get an additional $14 million.

I have been watching the order paper. I have not seen any bill or notice given of any bill to amend The Succession Duty Act. If the provincial government plans to get, or has an undertaking that the federal government will simply pay us, the money without it changing its present legislation, I think we should be advised of that. But if there is no clear understanding with the federal government at the present time, I think that this Legislature should be doing something about it.

I would hate to see us miss that $14.5 million, or whatever the amount may be. The House has given second reading to a bill to increase the gasoline tax by two cents, and by administrative action the hospital premiums have been increased. I certainly would not want to see us lose anything on succession duties which may be coming to us, and I would like some clearcut assurance from the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he is going to take whatever steps may be necessary to get that money.

I would also like to suggest to him that there are some other fields where he and the federal government together might start looking as to ways of getting more money without increasing any actual tax rates. I think that it is about time we started to take a look at our income tax legislation. I realize it is fashionable nowadays—at least no government considers it is up to date if it does not have a commission investigating the whole tax situation. I think every government in Canada has one now, and I know all these inquiries are under way.

I sometimes feel a little unhappy about these inquiries because it takes so long for them to produce anything. There is a tendency for any sort of reform to be deferred until the commissions have gone through the whole story and got themselves and everybody else thoroughly confused, which you are bound to do when you start inquiring into taxes. As a result, we do not undertake reforms that could be undertaken quite readily and quickly. I think certain features of The Income Tax Act are overripe for reconsideration.

This affects this province in two ways. First of all we get a certain amount of revenue out of the income tax. The federal government admittedly gets most of it, but we get some revenue. Also, I think the revenue situation of the federal government is of interest to us because federal money is an important part of our revenues here; it is an important part of the revenue of provinces all across the country. Anything which can be done to strengthen the federal government's revenue position, I think, will indirectly be of benefit to the provinces.

I think that we should take a look at The Income Tax Act and see if we cannot get more money out of it. There has recently been announced, as everyone knows, a 20 per cent tax reduction—as far as income tax is concerned—in the United States. I do not think that is through, but it is well on the way. The unfortunate part, as I understood it, is that what is now in the hopper in the States does not include what the late President Kennedy regarded as an integral part of the tax reduction, and that is what he described as tax reform. What he meant by tax reform was closing up the loopholes in the income tax and corporation tax legislation. In fact, one authority in the States estimated a few years ago that if all the exemptions and allowances under income tax legislation in the States, other than personal exemptions, were eliminated, there could be an overall tax reduction of 20 per cent—that is an overall reduction in rates of 20 per cent—without any reduction in revenues at all or any reduction in yields.

The situation is not as extreme as that in Canada because we do not have anything like the galaxy of allowances which are permitted in the United States, but we still have some which are costing us a lot of money. I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he take up with Ottawa the question of having some of these allowances eliminated, so that either the tax rates can be reduced without loss of revenue, or alternatively, increased revenue can be obtained without increasing the rates.

I would like to say, first of all, that I am not talking about personal exemptions. I think that personal exemptions should stand, I am not suggesting that they should be altered. I am not suggesting for the present that there should be any change in the progression of rates. But one thing I suggest should be considered very seriously, or reconsidered, is the dividend tax credit which amounts, on the average I think, to about 3.5 per cent of the total yield of the income tax.

In other words, if that dividend tax credit were eliminated the yield on income taxes could be increased by somewhere between three and five per cent without any change of rates at all.

It is also noticeable that the dividend tax credit is mainly of benefit to the people at the upper income levels. The average amount of the dividend tax credit in 1959—that is the last year I have. I admit there are more up-to-date figures but I have not had time to work them out. The last year for which I have the figures is 1959, but I have no doubt they are much the same now.

The average dividend tax credit per taxpayer was $13. This ranged from an average of $1, in the lowest income class, to an average of nearly $10,000 in the $100,000-and-over class. I just said a minute ago that the benefit of this accrues largely to those in the higher income brackets; the people in the lower income brackets get little or no benefit out of it. If they do hold ten shares of Bell Telephone they may get a few cents; but most of them do not hold even ten shares of Bell Telephone and a few cents makes very little difference to them anyway. This is a tax which discriminates in favour of the wealthy in a way that I do not think can be justified; and it does cost the Treasury—the Treasury of Canada in particular, but also the Treasury of this province—a fair amount of money.

I also think that we should take another look at the whole procedure with regard to medical expenses. I cannot now, and never have been able, to see the logic in permitting a person to put in as medical expenses amounts of money that are paid on his behalf by an insurance plan. I just cannot see the logic in it. I could see the logic of letting him claim, if the amount is sufficient, the premiums he pays for an insurance plan, but the actual amounts paid out on his behalf do not come out of his pocket. I do not know why he gets an allowance on his income tax for that sort of expenditure.

There is another area I think should be looked at, although I admit this is an area where one moves in with considerable trepidation. That is the whole area of charitable contributions. I believe that people should make charitable contributions. I believe that corporations should make charitable contributions. But I do not see why one should charge one's charity up to the government to some degree, and that is what we do under our present income tax law.

As a matter of fact, this again works very much more to the benefit of the higher income tax groups than the lower income groups. A person, say, in the $25,000 category, since his charitable donations are necessarily allowed at the marginal rate, can charge 50 per cent of them up to the federal and provincial governments, both of whom collect income tax. A corporation can charge approximately 50 per cent of its charitable contributions up to the government. But a fellow in a more modest income category can only charge up about 20 per cent of his. Indirectly, governments are being assessed for a large percentage of these charitable contributions for which corporations and individuals take so much credit, on the basis of which some of them no doubt expect to get to heaven.

Mr. Sopha: It stimulates giving to charity to some extent.

Mr. Bryden: I do not know if it stimulates giving to charity or not; but I think, if there is a true spirit of charity, the giver will not expect the government to subsidize him in his givings, and that is what the present system provides for.

Another area—and I think a more important one than the last two I have been talking about, at least it would be more important in terms of revenue—where there really should be a crackdown is the whole area of expense accounts.

Mr. Whicher: A fellow named Garland is looking after that.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. gentleman says a fellow named Garland is looking after it. At the rate the fellow named Garland is moving I would think we might have something done about it by 1990.

Mr. Sopha: He is a very ponderous fellow.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): A very intelligent fellow.

Mr. Bryden: He is now conducting a survey of taxpayers to find out just how they are chiselling on the expense accounts. I am not too certain as to the reliability of the information he will get from the survey. But the fact of the matter is surely beyond dispute. The high living on expense allowances should be treated as a form of income. The small income taxpayer, who does not have the benefit of any swindle sheet, is taxed on all of his income subject to the personal exemptions which I think should continue; but the president of the company will take a trip to Europe, take his wife with him and use as an excuse the claim that he is inspecting the European branches of the company. He may spend ten per cent of his time inspecting the European branches and 90 per cent having what all the rest of us would call a holiday. He charges the whole thing up to his company and it is not treated as income at all; the corporation to whom it is charged can charge it up against its corporation tax. That sort of racketeering should be ended.

An hon. member: What about Hoffa?

Mr. Bryden: I was very interested to hear one of the hon. gentlemen here—I do not know which one it was—mention the case of Hoffa. I was just going to deal with that case. I would like, while I am at it, to mention also the case of Banks. I think that men like Banks and Hoffa are a disgrace to the trade union movement. The sooner they are thrown out of it the better, as far as I am concerned.

But let us just consider what it was they did. They went in for high living on the basis of their union funds. I think it is despicable to use other people's money for one's own high living, especially when it is the hard-earned dues of working people. It was a despicable thing they did and I think they ought to be thrown out of the union movement for it. But what was it essentially? It was exactly the same thing that goes on day in, day out, in the business world, and that is where they learned it from. This is commonplace in the business world, and I think it is time we had a crackdown. I think a great deal of extra revenue could come into the federal and provincial governments if there were a real crackdown on these so-called swindle sheets, these expense allowances.

So I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, in view of his quite natural concern to maximize the revenues of the province, that those are certain areas that he should inquire into in co-operation with the federal government, since both governments are intimately interested in this problem.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few references to the savings offices of the province, which are covered by a statutory vote under this estimate. I can remember several years ago, at a meeting of one of the committees—I think it may have been the committee on government commissions, but I do not remember exactly which committee it was, it may have been public accounts—the hon. Provincial Treasurer indicated that he was very much interested in the activities of the savings offices and, more particularly, from his point of view, in the amenities, if I may call them that, which they can readily provide to a Provincial Treasurer by way of readily accessible short-term credit.

He said then that he was going to look into the savings offices and study their operations, with a view to considering whether or not they might be expanded. I think the hon. member for Bruce was present at the meeting. In fact, I think he is the man who raised the question at that meeting, and evoked that reply from the hon. Provincial Treasurer. I have asked the hon. Provincial Treasurer several times how his inquiry came out and I can never remember him ever giving us an answer. I would be interested in knowing. I suppose I have my answer. I know that nothing has been done to expand the operations of the savings offices in the province. I think this is regrettable.

We have another province in this country that is getting itself involved in setting up a full-scale bank. I am not suggesting that in Ontario it is necessary or desirable for us to do this, but I think we have missed the boat as far as savings offices are concerned. The trust companies have really moved into the field of personal savings and personal chequing accounts and are running the banks ragged.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Bryden: The answer of the banks—as far as I can see—is to take over the trust companies. But they simply have not been able to compete with the trust companies or, let me put it this way, are having great difficulty competing with the trust companies in the personal savings field. I think that our own savings offices should have been in there getting some of this business.

An hon. member: Should have been in long ago.

Mr. Bryden: They are sound asleep. I am not saying the administrators and officers are sound asleep. But the government has been sound asleep. The savings offices were set up a great many years ago. I believe they were set up under the farmers' government in the early 20s. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) can perhaps correct me on that if I am wrong. They were set up a great many years ago, and since then we have had succeeding governments that never dared to bring an end to them. But have always done everything possible to let them languish on the vine; done practically nothing to expand them and develop them.

This is a good institution for people, particularly those with small savings. The savings offices, the few there are, provide a real service. People who deal with them tell me that they get the best of treatment in the savings offices. They are very happy with the service they get from the staff and with the whole operation. Yet nothing is done to promote them. They are left, in many cases, in ancient offices that are badly in need of renovation. I think that we should be setting up these offices in as many places as possible and mobilizing savings, particularly small savings that would give the hon. Provincial Treasurer an important source of short-term revenue that he can borrow from these offices.

I think it is regrettable that we have allowed the trust companies to move right into the field. I do not blame the trust companies for doing it. As a matter of fact I am very happy that they have. They are giving the depositor quite a good break. He is getting a much better interest rate than the banks could ever be induced to give.

I am glad the trust companies have moved into the field, but it is a matter of great regret to me that the government has simply allowed the savings offices to carry on very much as they have always carried on, and has made no effort, or no noticeable effort, to promote and develop them. I would urge the hon. Provincial Treasurer that he revert to his good resolution of a few years ago and really take a look at this situation to see if he cannot do something to develop this very important facet of his department's activities.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I promised the hon. member for Bruce that I would make an explanation in connection with the lesser amount of money that is provided for the sinking fund this year, in order to do as we had planned and to retire our debt over a period of 30 years.

If we would just look back upon the statement that I gave to the House each year for the last two years when my Budget was presented; the statement, of course, is based on 8 months actual and 4 months forecast. If you will look back on those figures, which you can readily do very easily, compare them with the abridged financial statement that is published and furnished all the members later in the year after the results of the final financial operations are known. You will find that each year the financial abridged statement has shown that we have had a better year than I have forecast at the time of the presentation of the Budget.

As a result of that, our net debt each time has been less than was forecast. The provision of the $41.5 million mentioned in the Budget statement was sufficient to provide a sinking fund to cover the forecast that was made at the time of the presentation of the Budget. Since the lesser amount of money was borrowed, and since our net debt was less than had been forecast, a lesser amount was necessary to be provided in the sinking fund.

Mr. Whicher: But the net debt, surely, Mr. Chairman, is higher now than it was a year ago.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am sure everyone else in the House is understanding what I am saying, Mr. Chairman. The net debt is not as great as my Budget forecast indicated. As a result a lesser amount of money is necessary in the sinking fund than was provided. Because there was a surplus in the sinking fund from the last two years, it was only necessary this year to provide $40 million instead of the $41.5 million. I hope that I have made that clear.

Mr. Bryden: Do you consider this good management, or just bad forecasting?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It was good management.

Mr. MacDonald: True or false.

An hon. member: No conceit in his family, he has it all.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, we are very happy that our net debt was less than was forecast. If I should be blamed for a forecast that was not as good as it should have been, I am quite willing to accept that responsibility and to have the results better than they were forecast.

I just mention one other item to which the hon. member for Bruce referred. This, of course, I find very difficult to do as the hon. member for Bruce is continually suggesting that taxes be less and less, that expenditures be more and more; yet we should borrow less.

Mr. Bryden: "Balance the Budget."

An hon. member: It won't work.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I must admit that I just cannot perform that little feat. I would say to the hon. members of the House that this is a matter that receives the most careful consideration by the Treasury and by the Treasury board. We endeavour to reach a balance that is reasonable. I can agree with many things that the hon. member for Woodbine has said this afternoon. However, it is the policy of this government to keep our borrowing within reason, and that is exactly what we have—

Mr. Whicher: Is that what George Hogan said?

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is what I say.

It being 6.05 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, TREASURY DEPARTMENT (continued)

On vote 2301:

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, to continue to reply to some of the remarks of the hon. members, I would like to say that I particularly appreciated the comments of the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden), with respect to our policy as to the amount of expenditure that we should meet from revenue and the extent to which we borrow.

We are not in agreement, but I guess it is not possible for everyone to be in agreement. I think he recognizes that what we are doing is reasonable. We do not go as far as he does, but in our mind, as I said earlier today, we consider that our policy in this connection is a sound policy.

Mention was made of the collection of succession duties, and of the agreement with the federal government whereby it has agreed to abate 75 per cent of estate taxes in place of 50 per cent as previously. Mention was made in connection with the collection by us of the amount of revenue this year. The hon. member inquired as to whether or not we would receive this. I am able to tell him that we will. I mentioned the amount of $7 million, although the estimate for a full year is $14 million. That is because it takes six months to get the collections really flowing in, and although I am not able to advise the House tonight exactly as to how this will be done, I can say that a satisfactory arrangement is going to be worked out. There will be no double taxation as has been suggested tonight, and I am sure that when this announcement is made, it will be well received.

Mention was also made of our policy in connection with savings banks and I would like to say in reply to the comments of the hon. member for Woodbine that since the discussion that he mentioned tonight, the money market, so far as interest on deposits paid by trust companies and some other organizations, is concerned has changed materially.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): But you have not changed.

Hon. Mr. Allan: We did not need to change. The important consideration so far as we are concerned as a government is the cost of the money that it is necessary for us to obtain. It is the cost of the money to us, that is, as determined by the rates of interest that we pay. The trust companies are paying a rate on deposits based upon an interest rate that is much higher. It is based on the interest rate that they receive when they lend that money. It is much higher than the interest rate that we pay for the money that we borrow.

Our experience in connection with the money that we have borrowed has been exceptionally good. You will have noticed that we have not entered the savings bond field. I am not indicating that we never will, perhaps we will at some time, but the reason we have not expanded the savings banks operation is because if we did, and if we got out and were competing in a big way with the trust companies particularly and the interest which is paid on deposits, our money would cost us more than it is costing at the present time.

Mr. Whicher: You could get ten times as much money

Hon. Mr. Allan: We have all the money we need.

Mr. Whicher: How much have you got in the savings banks?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Seventy-five million dollars.

Mr. Whicher: But you could get—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, let us be reasonable. I am doing my best to be reasonable in the explanations I am making. If the hon. member wants to have a political repartee, that is another thing.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Let us not be political.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): No, the hon. Provincial Treasurer is never political.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The cost of the money we borrow is the important consideration to us. Our money is costing us roughly 5.25 per cent; it has over the last years. If we were to pay interest rates in our savings banks comparable to the interest rates paid by some trust companies, our money would cost us more than that. If we were to have savings bonds, taking into account the redemption of these bonds, the money would cost us more than it is costing at the present time. The reason for following the policy we have of borrowing money is because this has been the most economical policy for us to use.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer a question. Of the total public debt in the province of Ontario now, how much is payable in American dollars?

Hon. Mr. Allan: An amount that is equal to six per cent of the loan outstanding or about $80 million.

Mr. Bryden: Has any of that been floated recently?

Hon. Mr. Allan: A loan became due in the United States last May, and we refunded the loan in New York—$20 million.

Mr. Bryden: But it was already an American loan? It was refinanced on the New York market?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It was already an American loan, that is right.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I will make my perennial comments concerning items 7 and 8. Here, once again, we see substantial grants being made to horse-breeding societies. Just about two weeks ago, when I attempted to obtain a grant for a most worthwhile project—that is, something in the development and assistance to physical fitness, concerning a coaches' association—it seemed practically impossible to stir this government. Yet here we have the Canadian Standardbred Horse Society's grant being doubled, from $30,000 last year to $60,000 this year; and we have the Canadian Thoroughbred at $70,000; $130,000 being given to horsemanship; yet for the grant that I requested, which would have amounted to between $200 and $1,000, you practically have to get on your hands and knees and beg for it. It certainly is a shame that this government considers the horse-breeding societies far more important than it does amateur sports.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, on this subject I would like to direct the hon. Provincial Treasurer's attention to question 13, on page 10 of the order paper, standing in my name in four parts as follows:

1. Does the Canadian Thoroughbred Horse Society—I did not ask about the standardbred association, I am more interested in the thoroughbred society—give the hon. Provincial Treasurer an accounting of its distribution of the annual grant made to it?

2. If not, on what basis is the amount of the grant arrived at?

3. If so, how many breeders received grants in (a) the fiscal year ended March 31, 1963, and (b) the current fiscal year to date?

4. In each of the said periods, what breeders received individual grants in excess of $1,000? And how much did each of them receive? I wonder if the hon. Provincial Treasurer can give me an answer to that question now. It has been there for quite a long time.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give the answer to the question tonight, but I assure you I am getting the information and that I will give you an answer to the question in full.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Provincial Treasurer is not in a position to know how much each breeder gets, is he?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have asked for that information. I might say in this connection that the grant is made to the breeders, to the society. There has been a method of distributing it. The grant is made and the awards are paid to the breeder of the winners of the purses. It is based on five per cent of the purse that was won by the horses, but the award is not paid to the person who races the horse.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, is this entirely for race horses, or has this something also to do with the development of the heavier draft horses?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it applies only to these two breeds. The total amount is determined by the amount of money that is paid in the purses. Mention was made that the amount had been doubled for the Standardbred. The reason for that was that the purses that have been paid were greater than they were the year before. This is an estimate—not an exact amount. But that is the basis of the grant, five per cent of the purse. I have suggested to the racing commission that they discuss this matter with me and with the breeders association, to determine whether this is the proper, the most advantageous way to distribute this money, or whether it is not. It is presently distributed on the basis of five per cent of the purse won by the horse, and it is paid to the person who bred the horse.

Mr. Young: Could I ask this further question, then, Mr. Chairman? Is the hon. Provincial Treasurer convinced—I think there was some doubt in his mind a minute ago—that this is a wise expenditure? Adding five per cent to the very large purse now available to the winner does not seem to be much—

Hon. Mr. Allan: It does not go to the winner.

Mr. Young: It does not go to the winner?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It goes to the breeder.

Mr. Bryden: It goes to the breeder, who, especially in the Thoroughbred area, are some of the richest men in the country. Nobody is in that Thoroughbred breeding field if he is not a wealthy man to begin with.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Not everybody.

Mr. Bryden: I am waiting for the hon. Minister's figures, but I suspect that E. P. Taylor will get a substantial subsidy out of this. What he needs a subsidy for, heaven only knows.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if my memory serves me correctly, some time a few months ago—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just wait, one at a time.

Mr. Singer: Has the hon. Minister of Labour taken over the chair here? If he wants to make a speech I will be glad to sit down and let him.

Mr. Chairman, if my memory serves me correctly, a few months ago there was an announcement from the government that these grants were being cancelled. Then as I recollect, again, a great howl of protest went up and then there was a further announcement that the government had changed its mind. Could the hon. Provincial Treasurer take us through that thinking?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to clear this matter with the hon. member for Downsview. I believe that a motion was passed by the racing commission suggesting that the award be discontinued.

Mr. Singer: And then the protests.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Then the protests.

Mr. Singer: From the racing commission.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The racing commission really do not have—it is not their decision as to whether or not the grants are made.

Mr. Singer: We will probably get it from the racing commissioner when he makes his remarks.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, and the hon. Minister, I subscribe wholeheartedly to the comments of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, since I discussed this vote with him in other years. I am interested in item nine, the Ontario Society for the prevention of Cruelty to Animals. What I want to know, sir, is what is done with this money. Is it to assist the various societies across the province or just to pay the expenses of the director? Does the hon. Provincial Treasurer get a financial statement as to what is done with this money, the $20,000?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, this grant is made to the Ontario society. It does support the organization, that is the provincial organization. My understanding is, and I gained this from studying the annual report, that some of the societies throughout the province do make some contribution as well to the provincial organization, but this is not sufficient to give any security to the operation of the Ontario society. It is with the thought of keeping that society sound that we increased that grant this year from $15,000 to $20,000.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): May I ask, sir, I am just interested in the logic of the government. I am thinking of the report that was made a number of years ago about having some kind of system in connection with departments and their estimates. I do not quite understand why the Canadian Standard Bred Horse Society comes under his department. I do not understand why he suddenly thinks the standard bred horse society and St. John Ambulance Association are in his department and he is giving grants to them. I see grants, for example to the St. John Ambulance Association, and it would seem to me—I understand that it is in connection with health; not the health of horses but the health of human beings—it would appear to me it would more logically come under The Department of Health. Could the hon. Provincial Treasurer explain to me the reasoning behind his department being in charge of these grants?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be correct to say that for several years certain grants have been attached to various departments. The reason that the grants to the horse breeders associations were made from this department is because the racing commission reports to the Provincial Treasurer, that is the chairman of the racing commission reports to the Provincial Treasurer.

The revenue, sir, that we have received from the tracks in the current year is approximately $8 million. It may have been that it was felt that because of the revenue, horsemen might receive a little more sympathetic hearing from the Minister who received the revenue. That might be the reason.

Mr. Thompson: What about the other two, sir?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think these grants have been attached to this department since before I was Provincial Treasurer. They could be very well attached to any other department. I would have no objection to them being moved. However, they are presently in these estimates.

Mr. Thompson: The way it has always been.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, the thoroughbreds and the standard bred are just one society now, are they not?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No.

Mr. Troy: They were meeting in Ottawa just this week and I think the newspaper report said that they were one group.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about the meeting in Ottawa.

Mr. Troy: All right.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It may have been that the horsemen were meeting together, but they are two separate breeds, two separate societies. For the information of the hon. members I have this much information that has been picked up, that has been given me just now. Awards were made to 160 thoroughbred breeders, and there were 477 awards to standard bred breeders.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with grants to voluntary agencies, I would just like to suggest that it seems to me if I was representing a voluntary agency and appearing before the government it would be very natural I would want to be attached to the hon. Provincial Treasurer's department for obvious reasons apart from his geniality. He is giving grants to voluntary organizations, and there seems to be much discrepancy throughout. I know that in other estimates we stand up and we ask them why they are giving so much of a grant, say, to the VON—I am looking across at the astute hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), as I am speaking here, peeking over the top of that article or whatever it is he is reading.

But in connection with this, in order to get a clearer picture of why he apportions certain amounts of money, I would think it would be logical—and I am sure that he has a very logical mind himself and would like to see system in it. I would suggest to have a voluntary agency either fitting into the department, where it is obvious that the interests they have are part of the voluntary activity supplementing what the government department is doing, or else having them grouped together in some way other than this haphazard way. The explanation you give—"Well it was done before I came along"—with great respect I say that you have been in this Parliament for a very long time. If that is the basis of your following procedure, it seems to me it is one that should be perhaps re-examined.

While I am on my feet, having said that sir, I would like to ask under the expense for Dominion-provincial conferences, if you have either a Minister or a department set up to keep in liaison with the federal government? When I say that I am thinking of two other provinces, which I understand do have either a Minister, or else an office, set up to keep close contact with the federal government and with other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the first comment, I would like to assure the hon. member that I appreciate his comment and will give it careful consideration.

We have no Minister designated as a Minister of federal-provincial affairs. I think our experience has been that it has been wise to have the Prime Minister take the lead in this connection.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Chairman, I noticed in the public accounts last year, housing mortgage branch, a sum of $26,000-odd. This is certainly not under the head office vote, but there is no vote at all this year. Has that been transferred to some other department? I know it is not under head office vote and I apologize to you for bringing the matter up now.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I can inform the hon. member that the expenses in connection with that vote, which are becoming less each year in the cleaning-up process, are transferred to the accounts division and are included in that.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Is that Housing Corporation Limited?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes—vote 2302.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Well I notice—is it in order to discuss it here? Or under a later one? Under the accounts division—the next one?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes; vote 2302.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, in 2301, item six, I note that we have $300,000 allocated for special studies. There are special studies in a number of departments. I wonder if the—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is mainly the estimate of the cost of the Ontario Committee on Taxation.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, as everyone knows, I have always bled for the hon. Provincial Treasurer when he has been beleeboured by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Bruce and others for his extravagant expenditures. I have been intent upon helping him out wherever I could in these estimates.

I have not been able to find any items in the estimates until now, sir, that I really thought could appropriately be reduced or struck out, and these hon. gentlemen have not suggested any to him either. But in an effort to help him to weather these attacks to which he is subjected, I am now going to make a concrete proposal. I am going to move, Mr. Chairman, that item eight be struck out of vote 2301.

We have not got complete information on it, but on the basis of any information we have been able to elicit up until now, my opinion is as it was at the beginning, that it is not a vote that is required. In my opinion, subsidies to E. P. Taylor and Connie Smythe are among the less urgent expenditures of this province, therefore I think this vote should be struck out. That will at least save the hon. Provincial Treasurer $70,000.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 2301 carried?

Mr. Bryden: No, Mr. Chairman. I moved that item eight be struck out.

Mr. Chairman: Is that a motion?

Mr. Bryden: Do you want it in writing?

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, before the motion, would the hon. Provincial Treasurer tell us again how many people were affected in this item?

Mr. Chairman: It has been moved by Mr. Bryden that item eight of vote 2301 be struck out.

Shall the motion carry?

All those in favour please say aye.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, an hon. member has been trying to catch your eye to speak to the motion.

An hon. member: Too late.

Mr. Bryden: Well, he was trying before the vote was called.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I cannot support the amendment so I can speak on the issue for a moment, can I not; or am I out of order, as usual?

There are thoroughbred horse breeders in the province who do not come in the same category as Conn Smythe and E. P. Taylor. I do not know either one of these gentlemen and I have never met them, but there are thoroughbred horse breeders in this province who are small people. As I understand it, this particular grant is given to the horse breeder, regardless of who owns the horse after it was bred in his stables; he takes part and collects five per cent of that purse as long as that horse runs and wins. There are many small horse breeders in the province who would be deprived of a small amount of money to which I think they are entitled. And I believe they should be encouraged to raise horses.

I felt that, on this particular issue, you should at least know that in my riding there are people who have one, two, three, or four horses; and they have been winning from time to time—

Mr. Bryden: Cut the peanuts out of the fund.

Mr. Bukator: You know what that man reminds me of? He would cut the sunshine off the poor people, of which there are many more than the two people, Conn Smythe and E. P. Taylor.

I understood, Mr. Chairman, that when a man was elected to the Legislature he was to do what, in conscience, he believed was right.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: He says he is questioning my judgment. Well I tell you: I have a lot of people, in the riding I represent, who are in this business throughout the county of Welland, who are benefiting by this particular grant, and I cannot see, under any circumstances, how I could support this particular amendment conscientiously. I just could not do it, and in good judgment too. I have had people contact me about this very matter. I have listened to their problem, but I will tell you this: Six months ago I knew nothing of how they collected on this particular grant you have set aside. I know now, and under no circumstances can I support the amendment.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): May I have a word to say here? There seems to be a wrong conception entirely among a number of our people regarding E. P. Taylor. First of all, let me say this: The hon. Provincial Treasurer has told you, I believe, there are about 165 thoroughbred breeders in the province of Ontario. Of these 165, only seven, I believe it is, receive over $1,000 in breed awards. Only seven.

Mr. Bryden: And they get the most of it, do they not?

Mr. W. E. Johnston: A great number of them receive from $50 to $150. There are a few receive $300 or $400.

Mr. Bryden: How much do the seven get? The hon. Provincial Treasurer would not tell us, so we would be happy to know.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: I would like to put before the House some of the observations that I have made, in my short while as a member of the racing commission—of the work that E. P. Taylor has been doing for racing in this great province. Until the racing commission was created in 1950, the government of racing was done by the seven race tracks to the detriment of the horsemen and the public.

At that time Mr. Taylor was a director of the Jockey Club. Colonel Marshall was its president. However, as time went on the public confidence increased in the racing commission and in the honesty of racing. Shortly after the creation of the commission in 1951, ten jockeys and one trainer were suspended for life for being involved in fixed racing.

Mr. Taylor became president of the Jockey Club. Under his ruling the Jockey Club acquired the other six Ontario race tracks. This was all to the good, despite many deficiencies in racing of that day.

All of them were scrapped, except Fort Erie I should say, and about $50 million was spent to provide three race tracks. The so-called New Woodbine, Greenwood, sometimes known as Old Woodbine, and the Fort Erie track were completely rebuilt. Today these three tracks have no superior on the continent, which means in this great world of ours there are some bigger. But the best race tracks in the world, and I consider New York is one of them, is no better. Just three times the size, that is all the difference there is.

All security measures that are in existence on any other race track on the continent exist at Ontario's three major race tracks. It is freely admitted, of course, that the Jockey Club Limited has a monopoly in the field of thoroughbred racing in Ontario.

Mr. Bryden: Point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: But it is, and has to be a monopoly.

An hon. member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. MacDonald: This is under the racing commission.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to you that this would be a very fine speech under vote 2305, but I do not think it has anything to do with the—

Mr. W. E. Johnston: I am speaking to your motion, sir.

Mr. Bryden: You mean you have a prepared text to speak to a motion that I just thought up 15 minutes ago?

Mr. W. E. Johnston: The financial report of Jockey Club Limited shows that their net profits are about $1 million less than their income from admissions. Their share of the handle is eaten up in overhead, purses to horsemen, salaries, and so on.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: In 1950, the tax was 22.5 per cent. Now listen to this—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: —the government income from racing was about $4 million and now it is 15.5 per cent—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. W. E. Johnston: The racing commission—

Mr. Whicher: Call the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I would ask you please to request the hon. member to deal with the subject under vote 2305.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, we are very interested in the hon. member for Carleton running around the race track. It was a good demonstration of a good race there, but I would say this in reply to the hon. member for Niagara Falls: I also have in my riding people who breed poodles, and some who breed some very fine cats, and these people get no subsidy as far as I am aware.

An hon. member: What kind of cats?

Hon. Mr. Allan: We do not get any revenue, either.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this vote is a carry-over from years gone by when horses were a little more useful and—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: A horse is a horse is a horse.

Mr. Young: All right. At the present time the number of people who have been given us as benefiting from this are very, very few indeed. My guess is, and I think it is the estimate of most of us in this House tonight that this breeding would go on just the same whether the subsidy were there or not.

An hon. member: Just natural.

Mr. Young: Just natural, my hon. friend says. Right. This does not help in any real sense except to put a few more dollars in the pockets of certain individuals. I think in all fairness before this vote is called tonight that the hon. Provincial Treasurer should have given us the answer to the question from my friend, the hon. member for Woodbine, as to who is getting these subsidies and in what amount.

The fact is that those amounts are known. The hon. member for Carleton seems to have them, and therefore the hon. Provincial Treasurer should have them as well. So I support this amendment and—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Young: Well, perhaps we should ask the hon. member for Carleton to pass them down over the rows there so we can get the answers. If we had the answers, we could vote more intelligently. But since we have not the answers and, since the suspicion is that the breeders in question simply do not need this subsidy, I think it is time we stopped this kind of archaic vote and help to cut down the budget the way my hon. friend wants.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, as one who is particularly knowledgeable in regard to this particular matter, I was just coming into the House when this matter arose. Imagine such a subject coming up at this particular hour of the night.

I want to say to the House, Mr. Chairman, that this is a bit of a political trick on the part of my hon. friends to the left. They used to get away with this kind of political trick.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that remark is quite out of order and should be withdrawn. I put forward a motion within the rules of the House and the hon. member has no right to accuse me of trickery, because that has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, as usual my hon. friend raises a very trivial point. Surely I have the right to say, in my opinion, this was part of a political trick. I mean they are engaged all the time in those things. This is not any exception to the general rule.

But on the point at issue, and speaking seriously on the matter, I would say this. In my opinion there are perhaps one or two, or a small number of breeders, who do not need this grant. Consequently, I suppose, they should not be getting it. But for the one, two or three or so that are getting the grant who do not require it, there are many tens, in fact, over 100 I would say out of the 160—the small breeders out in my hon. friend's country, up in my own riding and all the other ridings of the province—who do a substantial amount of good in the improvement of the breed.

I do not see what my hon. friends, if they want to be, have in their minds. Economy?

Surely they can hit on something that is more susceptible to the mood they have in mind.

Mr. Bryden: What do you suggest? This is our idea.

Mr. Oliver: My hon. friend does not need to be facetious. In fact, when he tries to be facetious, he makes such a mess of it that he becomes even more ridiculous than even before he started to be facetious.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Oliver: And so I just say to the House, Mr. Chairman, that so far as I am concerned I am not particular which way it goes, actually, except that I feel that this amount of money is still doing a great deal of good for the breed of horses mentioned in this vote. And for that reason, while admitting at the same time that money is perhaps going to some individuals who do not need it, I would certainly be in favour if a line of demarcation could be drawn between the two classes of those who need it and those who do not. I hardly know how you can do it. And for the general good that comes from the expenditure of this money, personally I am going to support the vote.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Yorkview was speaking he mentioned about poodles and cats. You said you get no revenue from dogs, but you certainly can if you would permit dog racing in this province.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is that a party plank?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Are you in the leadership race?

Mr. Troy: No, I am not in the leadership race; if I were I would be praying—

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, this five per cent, as I understood the hon. Provincial Treasurer to point out, was five per cent of the earnings. Am I right? If this is five per cent of the earnings—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Purse.

Mr. Hodgson: —or purses, it then is part of the contribution of the winner back to the actual people in the racing field.

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, it's a grant.

Mr. Chairman: Order. All those in favour of the motion by the member for Woodbine say "aye".

As many as are opposed will please say "nay."

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 7, the nays, 65.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

On vote 2301:

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with item number six, I realize that we have discussed item number seven. But one of the principles that seems to me to come out of the discussion of item seven, which is applicable to item number six—that is why I can talk about it—is that really there does not seem to be a lot of facts presented to this House. I am suggesting that the question was raised about who these seven distinguished breeders were. I think, sir, that what I am referring to has to do with item five. I am talking about Dominion-provincial conferences.

My question is this, sir. In my own peculiar fashion I will arrive at it. If you will listen first, it will come in due course, in the fullness of time, sir.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I cannot hear.

Mr. Thompson: Can you hear me now, sir? I count that one of the principles that came out of the last vote is applicable to what I am talking about now, and that is why I am talking about the last vote at this point. One of the principal things is that surely we can get all the information we can, presented to us. As I said on the last vote, we never did understand who these mysterious seven were who received the grants. We hope, among them, were some small people.

Coming to this item number five, I had asked about Dominion-provincial conferences and the amount you are giving. I wondered if you were setting up some form of liaison branch between the federal and the provincial governments? I say that because, once again, we see that the facts do not seem to be presented properly. I think that you should have a permanent secretariat set up.

I am thinking, for example, of the remarks of the hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop) in which he said that one of the problems with the federal pension plan and the provincial plan was that it seemed to get into a political issue beyond the technical understanding of it. I would suggest, sir, that we see in the letters written between the hon. Prime Minister of this province (Mr. Robarts) and the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada—the questions raised by the hon. Prime Minister with respect to the pension plan, to know about the integration of existing plans in the federal scheme.

The reply from the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada stated that he would hope that experts from both provincial and federal fields would get together and work on these things. I am just thinking of that one area. It would seem to me that, rather than just saying you rely on the hon. Prime Minister to keep an eye on the relationships between provincial and federal governments, there should be some permanent secretariat setup. This relationship has become so interwoven.

I understand that, later in the month, the hon. Prime Minister will be going to a conference in Quebec. Among questions raised there will be shared-cost programmes, hospital insurance, whether unemployment insurance should be grouped together with other welfare services and so on. I suggest, because of the apparent confusion taking place with respect to pension plans alone, that it seems to be all the more essential, that instead of just giving a grant to a Dominion-provincial conference, that you should set up, as two other provinces have, a permanent secretariat.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, Mr. Chairman, I should perhaps have pointed out before to the hon. member that there is a continuing technical committee. This committee is composed of certain senior officers of Treasury and Department of Economics. They meet regularly, not at a definite date but at quite constant intervals, with technical people from the other provinces; and, I suppose, in those provinces where they have a department of federal-provincial affairs, with those persons. So there is what amounts to a secretariat, and this exists, I think, in all the provinces.

Mr. Thompson: I noticed in one of the letters from the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada with respect to the question raised by the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, where the hon. Prime Minister of this province was saying that he would like to know how the pension programme of this province would be integrated with the federal pension scheme. In reply to that letter—and if I could just remark about this—he expressed concern about the pension plans for the people who had these plans. It struck me as somewhat ironical. I would suggest that the majority of people who have these pension plans in this province are people who belong to unions. And yet it would seem to me that the spokesmen of the unions, from what I have read, do not feel that the hon. Prime Minister should be continually querying the plan. They are suggesting that we get on with it.

After all, it is the union members who are the consumers with respect to the holders of pension plans in this province, so for the many union people the union representatives were saying, "Let us get on with it." However, the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, because he was speaking, I presume, for persons other than the consumers of the pension plan and other than the persons who are contributing and hoping to get a pension, was asking, "How do we integrate this?" And the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada was suggesting, "Well, why don't your experts come up and discuss this with us." If you had a continuing committee, I think this would have been an excellent example where it should have got together and should have—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I just want to inform the hon. member that we have discussed, that is, the technical people from our government have discussed, this pension arrangement with the technical people at Ottawa. But a stage is reached when the decisions are not made by the technical people and it was to that that the hon. Prime Minister was referring.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, if I could still continue on this, I think it is a very important question to everyone not only in this province but across Canada. We now find that the technical people—and I am talking about this Dominion-provincial conference which we are paying for—yet we find that the technical people have arrived at answers, they have worked something out. But you are saying it is not their question, it is the hon. Prime Minister's. In other words, it is a political decision, and a political question on his part that he wrote about rather than a technical question that he was writing about.

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is not very clear.

Mr. Thompson: It will be clear to the people in Hansard.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I want to direct a question to the hon. Provincial Treasurer about the field men of his sales tax office.

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is vote 2303.

Mr. Troy: Right.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, I would still like to discuss this—the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Pertaining to that particular group, did the hon.

Provincial Treasurer not get a brief from it requesting certain legislation? Maybe I had better read the letter, it might bring this to the hon. Provincial Treasurer's attention, I realize he is a busy man. Mr. Chairman, I received a letter from the SPCA and it says:

The Ontario Humane Society has submitted a draft of proposed legislation to regulate and license dealers in animals for research containing necessary safeguards and proper enforcement.

Our society strongly endorses this proper legislation which is long overdue. Ontario SPCA so strongly endorses Ontario Humane's proposed legislation that it would have the effect of requiring any municipality in the province of Ontario to provide certain minimum standards of accommodation for impounded animals, together with adequate care, and if not returned to the owner, a humane death. Such unnecessary cruelties are a disgrace to Ontario. Strenuous action on your part could help in their elimination.

Apparently there are people who have animals for research. They pick them up, put them in some kind of kennels that are not properly maintained, and then send them on for research. The SPCA group throughout the province feels that there should be legislation so that when one has these animals for research purposes or for sale or impounded to sell to citizens, at least they should be given proper care. According to this letter it would indicate to me that there was a brief submitted to some government body and I would take it it would be the department of the hon. Provincial Treasurer.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it would not be my department.

Mr. Bukator: It would not be that department?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, Mr. Chairman, this has to do with municipalities and should have been directed to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Bukator: Would the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs care to comment on it? Did he get a brief on it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have never heard of it.

Mr. Bukator: Pardon, I did not catch that?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I have not heard anything about it. If the hon. member would like to send me the correspondence, I would be glad to have a look at it.

Mr. Bukator: I think perhaps this is a good place to discuss this matter and I have another letter from a gentleman here. If this is true, then I think somebody should look into it and I think it is this particular estimate where I should discuss it. This gentleman writes me a letter and tells me that:

We would like very much to endorse proposed legislation regarding the licensing of dealers in animals for research now being proposed by the Ontario Humane Society. While the use of animals in research is a very necessary evil, there is no reason why it should not be done in a humane manner, with some consideration given to the health and comfort of the animals while they are being kept for disposal.

I think that is just about as clear as I can make it. I feel that these animals should not be treated in the manner that they are treated, from what I gather. People have been fined for not giving animals proper treatment, and I understand they go right back again and use the same process. In the meantime, they are making a lot of money. This particular group says that "they speak for those who cannot speak for themselves".

The hon. member for Carleton did a good job the night before last, speaking on behalf of inspection of dog and cat food. If a man is going to buy a can of this food to feed an animal, Mr. Chairman, at least he should know what the contents of that particular can are. And I think his point is well taken. That was under The Department of Agriculture and I suppose I should not dwell too long on it.

But if we are going to buy anything in this province, we should know what the contents of that particular can are. If we are going to have places where animals are impounded, they should be treated properly if people are going to commercialize off them and make money. I feel that someone, somewhere in this government, should take that matter up. It seems at the moment at least, that two of the oldest and most capable hon. Ministers in the government are passing the buck, one to the other. And I have never accused the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs of ever doing that before, but he says, "send me the letter and I will look into it".

For five years I have been talking to this particular group of legislators and they are going to look into it, but nothing comes of it. A year ago you thought it was a good idea to inspect dog food and cat food. When people buy something they should know what they are getting and what they are feeding their animals, and you say you are going to look into it. Yes, there is a man barking like a dog over there, I bet a lot of animals have had better training than he has had in his home.

I get a kick out of the little man in the black hair, if you do not mind my deviating for a moment. Everybody does, you know. And I hope you do not call me out of order. The black-haired man over here from Woodbine with the black hair reminds me of one of the disciples, the one that committed suicide. He is for and against everything that comes along. You cannot lose that way, but at least the member for Niagara Falls has taken this one stand for five consecutive years.

An hon. member: He got under the skin of you fellows.

Mr. Bukator: Not a nickel's worth.

An hon. member: There are some guilty consciences.

Mr. Bukator: I suppose a louse can crawl under the skin of a man, that is true, he is not much bigger than that.

Mr. Bryden: Are you for or against dog food?

Mr. Bukator: I would say, Mr. Chairman, getting back to this particular subject, it is an important matter and I think someone in this government should look into the possibility of licensing the people who are impounding these dogs and making money off them.

Vote 2301 agreed to.

On vote 2302:

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer a question about the housing and mortgage branch—I am sorry, I thought you said it was on the accounts division.

Last year there was about $26,600 spent on it. I noticed in the provincial auditor's report he has listed the deficits of this particular corporation since 1958. Why is there nothing in the estimates for the next year? There has always been something for the last fifteen years. If I remember rightly most of those mortgages are for 15 or 20 years. This should go on for another four years at least. Has it been transferred to another department yet?

The next question is, who are the present directors of the Housing Corporation Limited? I assume they have changed since last year?

My whole purpose in bringing this matter up, of course, is that a number of the hon. members do not realize that this government at one time was in the second mortgage field. I feel that if we are going to pay administrative charges every year in any event for this corporation, then I think it would be an extremely wise thing to reactivate it and also put it under the Minister who should be looking after these things, namely, the Minister of Economics and Development.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should explain what the item is that the hon. member for St. George is speaking about. This is the Housing Corporation Limited and it was a second mortgage operation.

From May, 1948, to December, 1949, sir, an amount of about $16,614,000 was lent on second mortgages. The present operation consists of the collection of the payments on these second mortgages and that is why it is in Treasury. Last year the money that had been in a separate vote was included in the accounts division vote because the operation was getting small enough for the accounts division to take on the extra work. That is the reason why it was discontinued as a separate item. Presently there is only a principal of $1,710,000 still outstanding. The reduction during the last year was $384,545. There was a total of 14,695 loans in the beginning. There are still 4,336 outstanding as of January 31, 1964. The president of the corporation is H. E. Brown, deputy Treasurer; vice-president, H. H. Walker; secretary-treasurer, W. C. Browning, and the fourth director is D. P. Holmes.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: I just wonder if, because there are administrative charges on this, and it is still an existing corporation, especially if the old loans are now being retired at a very rapid rate, that this might be a possible vehicle for getting this government back into the second mortgage field. In our select committee on consumer credit, of course, we have heard a great deal about the second mortgage business in Ontario. This might be a vehicle for the government to get back into the field and if so, of course, I think it should be transferred over to a different department.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): I would just like to support what the hon. member for St. George said. I am surprised that the matter of second mortgages comes up under here. As it was being discussed, I recalled what success the Drew administration had with second mortgages, and I believe they were second mortgages on new homes. Then the government retired from this field and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation came in. But what is needed and what could be used right here under this division, as I suggest and as the hon. member for St. George said, is to transfer it to another department. It is for this government to go into the second mortgage field on older homes once again, because in many districts, such as my own district of Parkdale, there are many people who can raise a first mortgage, but as we have learned through the press, so many find themselves the victims of the second mortgage racket. It is most unfortunate that this government has not taken action to reactivate this account and to get back into the second mortgage field.

Vote 2302 agreed to.

On vote 2303:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat a question that I asked several times before of the hon. Provincial Treasurer. In his sales tax office in North Bay and among his field personnel who cover the area from North Bay north, has he yet added any to that personnel who are bilingual?

Hon. Mr. Allan: We have added very few to the personnel within the past year. It is our practice to employ bilingual people in those areas where both English and French are spoken.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, up to last year in an area where, as the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs very well knows, most of the smaller storekeepers are French-speaking and where the hon. Provincial Treasurer opened the office, if it was his practice, certainly it was not a practice that was followed in the North Bay office. There was not one, not one. I do not know if he has added any personnel, but if he has not added any since the past year then he still has none.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, would this be a proper vote to speak about succession duty forms? It would be, would it not? There is no other one? This would be it.

This is an extremely petty matter and it only concerns the legal profession in the province, but I would like to draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that—I do not know whether it is a fact or not, but I would assume that the succession duty forms for the province of Ontario have not been changed for 50 years, as far as the form of them is concerned. I do not think there is a practising lawyer in the province of Ontario who does not curse the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario every time he has to make up one of those succession duty forms. They are extremely ridiculous, extremely cumbersome, extremely bulky, and nine-tenths of the items on those forms really went out with high-button shoes. As a matter of fact, I think there is an item on there for the value of high-button shoes, I am not sure.

The estate tax forms of the federal government, of course, now are quite easy to make up as far as lawyers are concerned. As a matter of fact, they are so simple that they can be made up by people who are not in the legal profession. I would suggest to you, sir, that a close look be taken at the estate tax forms and something along that line be made up so that the information is easily changeable and the same headings are used, so it would be a lot easier to make up the succession duty return. They are pretty outdated. There are just reams and reams and reams of paper to go through and most of it does not mean a thing and does not help the department in its assessment of the value of the estate. I have promised three or four people in the profession that I would make this plea to you, sir, and I am now doing it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is a matter that I would like to place before the hon. Provincial Treasurer that has been brought to my attention by a good many of my constituents, particularly women with small children, or children of various ages. It relates to the exemption of children's clothing and children's footwear under The Retail Sales Tax Act. I am far from an expert on these matters, but the information given to me leads me to the conclusion that there is something wrong with the definitions given to children's clothing and children's footwear in the regulations. From reading over the regulations on this point I assume that the department simply followed standard commercial practices in the sizing of children's clothes or the description of the sizes. I understand that these commercial practices are a long way out of date. The Canadian Association of Consumers, I believe, has taken considerable exception to practices within the trade with regard to the size designations put on children's clothing. I think one of the factors involved is that the average size of human beings is increasing and children, age for age, are now considerably bigger than they were even a generation ago. I think some of these sizing practices relate to children of a generation ago rather than the children of today.

I am told by women in my constituency that, because of the application of the regulations, it is not uncommon to have to pay the sales tax on clothing for children of 12 years of age, and even as young as ten years of age in some cases. I am also assured that, with regard to footwear, you are lucky if you can provide a child of six or seven with shoes without paying the sales tax.

I do not think that was contemplated when the Act went through the House. I think it was contemplated that the clothing of children, in some meaningful sense, say children under 16, would be exempt from sales tax; also their footwear. I realize there is a problem in designating an age, because proof of age is practically impossible by the time the auditor of the division gets to the store; but I think the whole question of sizes should be reviewed, to try to ensure that they are related in some realistic way to at least average sizes of children up to 16 years of age.

I think, when the Legislature passed The Retail Sales Tax Act, it contemplated that, as far as was humanly possible, the clothing of children up to about that age would be exempt. But, unless I have been gravely misinformed by women who regularly have to buy clothes for children, that is not the way it is working out at all. The cut off is at a much lower age than most of us had in mind when the Act went through.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, replying to the comment of the hon. member for St. George: I think he knows, as we all do, that the committee on taxation is studying all our taxing statutes.

It is not our intention this year to make revisions, except of a housekeeping nature, in any of our taxing statutes; but we look forward to a very thorough study of these taxes when the report of the Ontario committee on taxation has been received.

With respect to the comments of the hon. member for Woodbine, Mr. Chairman, I may say that this is a very difficult problem, and has been to the sales tax branch from the beginning. You have probably heard often that our problems in the administration of the sales tax branch come from the exemptions, rather than the tax. We went to the greatest pains in determining the sizes which would be designated as children's sizes when the sales tax Act was brought into effect. We based our judgment on the advice of an association of standards, an association which determines standards for the retail trade, and those were the ones we used—although I can quite freely admit that there are cases where the parent must pay tax on clothes for children who are younger than other children of the same size.

Mr. Bryden: I think it is more general than that.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Our experience has been that if we did adopt the children sizes—I know it is true that our children are larger for their age than they used to be, but this is a difficult problem. Although we are very sympathetic, you have to remember that we do want to collect tax from the persons who are adults.

Mr. Bryden: What age did you contemplate? I realize there are variations from the norm, but what age on average were you hitting at as the dividing line?

Hon. Mr. Allan: If I can remember correctly, it was 12 years of age.

Mr. Whicher: Rather young.

Mr. Bryden: I would suggest—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Of course the problem arises from the fact that there are many adults who are no larger than those children of 12 years of age; and even then we endeavour to separate the tax and exemptions—

Mr. Bryden: You talk of different styles of clothing though.

Hon. Mr. Allan: By the styles of clothing; we endeavour to use that as well.

Mr. Bryden: But children are dependent, nowadays, completely dependent, well past the age of 12. I must say that when this Act went through, I thought the hon. Provincial Treasurer was thinking of about 16 as the dividing line.

In fact it is illegal for children to leave school before 16, except by permit. I would think that the department would try to extend the exemption up to at least that age, by some method of regulation. I say that while admitting that there is always the problem, some people are bigger than the average.

Vote 2303 agreed to.

Vote 2304 agreed to.

On vote 2305:

Mr. W. E. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, since I was rudely stopped a while ago, may I proceed now? I just want to make a very brief statement on some of the workings of our commission.

First of all, I should tell you that the commission, in 1963, held 51 meetings and continued its policy of hearing anyone who expressed a wish to be heard at a commission meeting. In this way, a large number of disputes between commission and licensees were settled, thus avoiding the necessity of an expensive and long-drawn-out litigation in the courts.

In addition, many persons having complaints, once having been heard by the commission, either found that their complaints had no foundation, or if complaints were valid, had them satisfactorily adjusted by the commission.

Joint meetings were held with Jockey Club Limited, the Canadian Trotting Horse Association, the Ontario Harness Horsemen's Association, the executive committee of the Horsemen's Benevolent Protective Association, The Jockeys' Benefit Association and representatives of the federal Department of Agriculture—all with an effort to improve the standards and integrity of racing.

It has been long-established commission policy that, before any amendments to the rules of racing are made or changed, all entities of the sport be asked to attend a meeting of the commission, to express their views on such amendments. This was done again in 1963. This has always been done in previous years and it is proposed to be done in the future. This policy we have found, over many years, is a successful one. In most cases there is unanimous agreement amongst the various entities—race tracks, owners, trainers, jockeys, and so on—about any suggested rules, before amendment is made.

Our chairman and some members of the commission have attended a number of annual racing conferences held in the United States and Canada during the past year. Some of these conferences were as follows: the federal Department of Agriculture racing conference, which is a Canada-wide organization, held in Winnipeg, Manitoba, on April 9, 1963; The Jockey Club round table conference at Saratoga Springs, New York, August 11, 1963; The Jockey Club Limited Ontario round table conference at Fort Erie on August 18, 1963; The Jockey Club Limited harness racing round table conference in Toronto on November 28, 1963. Harness racing was permitted, night racing was permitted, as you know, in 1961, and has since been carried on from the hours of 7:30 to 8:30 on each racing night.

You might be interested in knowing that a great deal of work is done through our veterinarians examining every aspect of the condition of horses prior to racing each day. Dr. R. W. Ford is the commission veterinarian, who is assisted by other veterinarians and veterinarian clerks. This work is carried on during the forenoon of each racing day. Veterinary pre-race examinations were carried out much as in previous years. Every horse in the entries was subjected to a physical examination by a full-time commission veterinarian on the day that it raced.

These examinations begin at 7:30 a.m. to 8:00 a.m. each morning, and include identification, body temperature, pulse and heart action, respiration, general appearance, manual examination of legs, and walking and trotting on the halter. Occasionally a horse is galloped under saddle if this seems desirable or necessary. Any horse which, in the opinion of the commission veterinarian, is unfit to race because of unsoundness, lameness, sickness, injury or any other physical disability, was reported immediately to the stewards with the recommendation that it be taken out of the race. All such recommendations have been implemented by the stewards.

A commission veterinarian is on duty in the paddock at the starting gate for each race, and the veterinarian supervision continues until the race is started. A permanent history card is maintained for each horse which races on the Ontario track, and the findings of each pre-race examination are recorded on it, as well as any injuries or ailments detected during or after a race. These history cards are carried during the pre-race examinations.

The following is a rough outline of the veterinarian examination procedure: Last year in 1963, they made 13,994 veterinarian examinations. Out of this, 186 horses were scratched because of a condition unfit for racing.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): What do you mean by "scratched"?

Mr. W. E. Johnston: Taken out of the race.

Mr. Singer: Keep on the bit!

Mr. W. E. Johnston: Horses placed on the surgeon's list as unfit to race numbered 317 in one case, and 127 in another period of time. In the year's operations, ten horses were destroyed.

Perhaps you would be interested to know that licences issued during the year were to owner-trainers, trainers themselves, jockeys, apprentice jockeys, jockeys' agents, jockeys' valets, occupational licences, parimutuel licences, and harness racing licences.

I do not think that I should belabour the House with any further information. I just want to say that the main purpose and thinking behind the commission's activities is to up-grade the conduct of racing throughout this province. We believe, in this province, that this we have accomplished. We believe that the racing in the province of Ontario is second to none on the continent; certainly this is true in the case of the thoroughbreds. We must give a great deal of credit to the presiding judge in the case of standardbred racing, and to the senior steward in the case of thoroughbred racing. Perhaps later I will have more to say to you, unless somebody has a question they would like to ask. Thank you.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments I would like to make on this vote. I am sorry I have no questions to direct to the hon. member for Carleton.

The members on the standing committee on government commissions had the opportunity this year to hear a report from the racing commission, and I must say that it was a very illuminating one in many respects. Out of that came some information, along with other information we have been able to glean along the way, which raised some questions in my mind to which I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Provincial Treasurer.

I tell him at the outset that I find it increasingly difficult to separate what might be described as the public affairs of the racing commission from the private affairs of The Jockey Club. And I suppose, strictly speaking, The Jockey Club is not up for consideration here, it is the racing commission itself. But in the first instance, for example, we have had many people make the observation, in the course of earlier portions of this debate, that The Jockey Club has done a fine job in providing plants and racing tracks in the province of Ontario which are second to none on the North American continent.

In the words of the hon. member for Carleton, sir, the only difference between those in Ontario and those in New York, are that the ones in New York are somewhat bigger.

But let's face it: It may well be that these great plants which have been built by The Jockey Club have been built with public funds, because it is at least a debatable issue that a great deal of the monies they have had to expand this great private concern are monies which might well have been coming into the public Treasury. I am just referring, without going into the detail again, to the old argument we have had as to whether or not the take, or that portion of the take that is coming back to the public Treasury, is a large enough one.

But when you move from that into the mixed private and public affairs, I think there are some things which go on in The Jockey Club which are of concern to this House, and concern to any responsible hon. member of the Cabinet. For example, I think the evidence is now conclusive that The Jockey Club is viciously anti-labour. They have people, for example, working in providing service. Two or three years ago an effort was made by a union to establish the employees into the Beverage Dispensers and Bartenders Union. This is the kind of situation they found themselves faced with: The waiters will be getting $12 a week wage; for the rest of it they live on tips. The bartenders were getting something like $36 a week wage. In many instances the waiters have to kick in a certain proportion of their tips on a compulsory basis—and you either do it or you are out—to the unit “maitre d'”. This kind of a situation makes it impossible for any normal implementation of collective bargaining rights, because the people at the top have a real stranglehold on the workers.

This happened two or three years ago, and efforts to form a union got nowhere; but we have a more recent example. There are a number of employees at the race track who are known as platers; in the more old fashioned and more familiar term, they shoe horses. Last year they came to the conclusion that they were not getting a fair deal and they sought, as is their right, to get collective bargaining under The Labour Relations Act. I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, and I draw it to the attention of the hon. Provincial Treasurer, exactly what happened. They were immediately fired.

They began to discriminate against them and the way The Jockey Club got at them was this. Anybody who wants to operate around The Jockey Club, has to make application for stalls; but when you make an application for a stall, you have to specify in your application who your plater is, who your veterinary surgeon is, who are the various people you are using. Anybody who applied and said that the plater they were going to use was one of the key people, the president and the secretary of the union that was about to be organized—anybody who made application for the stalls, and put these men down as the platers they were using, simply did not get the stalls. Until they were willing to use somebody else as a plater, they did not get the stalls at all.

So you have this back-door kind of discrimination. It did not even end there. I know that the hon. Provincial Treasurer is a person, I think, of basically decent human instincts and I think he will be rather shocked by this. These people were in effect blackballed by The Jockey Club, but they had their permit. That is not perhaps the correct term—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to shut off any discussion, but I am wondering if this should not have been brought up at the—

Mr. MacDonald: It was.

Hon. Mr. Allan: At the committee?

Mr. MacDonald: I did bring it up at the committee but—

Hon. Mr. Allan: If it met the commission, because the racing commission is an independent body—

Mr. MacDonald: I will show you in a moment where I feel there is a relationship here.

Hon. Mr. Allan: —deals with the various tracks—

Mr. MacDonald: I will show you where the racing commission comes in if the hon. Provincial Treasurer will just bear with me.

I was just going to point out here that the racing commission issues the passes which give people the right to go onto the track, so that these men who had been blackballed by The Jockey Club still had the right to come onto the track, though they could not work. Here is another case of where The Jockey Club is a private concern and the commission is a public agency and their efforts overlap. But while these men could come onto the racecourse out a Woodbine, The Jockey Club actually assigned guards who went around with them, sat down when they were eating, followed them when they went to the washroom, and in other words just hounded these people so that they could not do anything by way of attempting to organize. They could not work, because they had been denied the opportunity to work at their trade. But they just hounded them so that they could not continue to do organizational work.

Another point that I would like to draw to your attention, and this admittedly may or may not be of any concern to the hon. Provincial Treasurer directly, but the general rule in the province of Ontario is that if a person gets a liquor licence he cannot sublet it. The Jockey Club traditionally sublets its licence. It sublets it to what it calls the Sports Services Limited. When I put this to the chairman of the racing commission, he said that there are only four cases in the province of Ontario where licences are sublet. They are sublet on the basis of the lessee not being able to make any profit out of them. They cited a hotel, for example, in Peterborough, where the licence was sublet, but the owner does not make any profit out of it all, it is just to—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Are you talking about the racing commissioner?

Mr. MacDonald: I am talking about the racing commissioner.

Hon. Mr. Allan: How would he know about a hotel in Peterborough?

Mr. MacDonald: No, I am sorry. It was Judge Robb of the liquor licensing board who explained that there were four cases in the province of Ontario where, on a management basis, licences are sublet. Normally, for example, if a hotel keeper gets a licence, he cannot sublet it. It is his and his alone. It is in effect trafficking or it comes close to trafficking.

But this is the kind of thing that has gone on in the instance of The Jockey Club. It is subletting and I would be very curious to know who is getting all of the profit that results. I think it would be worthwhile for the hon. Provincial Treasurer or somebody to study the books to see whether or not the person who is subletting the licence is not making something from it, this Sports Services Limited.

Let me just point to the inconsistency here, because another interesting development took place out at the racetrack this year. Suddenly the news stories began to appear that the veterinary surgeons who were at the racetrack were going to be forced to come into some sort of a clinic and to establish what was dubbed in the press as "Medicare for horses." I know, without naming any names, that there was considerable determination on the part of the commission that this was going to be driven through. The veterinary surgeons were going to be called in, and in effect, they were going to have Medicare forced on them.

Unfortunately, Mike Armstrong of the Toronto Telegram—and perhaps some of the other reporters—wrote stories about this, thereby emphasizing the inconsistency of one government agency forcing Medicare for horses on a group of veterinary surgeons, at a time when the government is taking such a standoffish and completely voluntary approach to the whole issue of Medicare. The inconsistency of this was just so striking, that when we got to the committee stage, with Magistrate Bigelow, the commission had retreated to the point of saying that it was going to meet with the veterinary surgeons, and if the veterinary surgeons were not willing to go along with it purely voluntarily, they would have nothing more to do with it. I have reason to believe that this was because of the pressure of public opinion.

But the interesting thing is that the reason why they had moved in this instance, vis-à-vis the platers, or why they had moved vis-à-vis the veterinary surgeons, was that they thought the owners were not getting a square deal. So in one instance you have the commission or The Jockey Club moving against certain people, whether it was the veterinary surgeons or whether it was the platers, if they thought the owners were not getting a square deal. But they will sit back and fold their hands if the workers are, for the variety of reasons that I have just spelled out, incapable of organizing the collective bargaining unit. It is apparently all right if they move to protect the interests of the owners, but it is all wrong if they move to protect the interests of the workers.

In short, Mr. Chairman, I just suggest that there are many activities and decisions in labour relations and in other matters, with reference to The Jockey Club, that to some extent comes under the jurisdiction of the racing commission. In other cases, they just wink at it. I think that, as the responsible hon. Minister under whom the racing commission comes, this is a matter that perhaps the hon. Minister should take a look at.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 2305 and on the racing commission, I would like, through you, Mr. Chairman, to ask the representative of the racing commission here, the position of the racetrack that is to be set up in the Windsor area. Will the track be all set up late this year?

Mr. W. E. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, this is a question I am unable to answer. All I can say is that as far as the racing commission is concerned, we do not have one thing to say about whether or not there is a track at Windsor. We have been asked to allocate racing days at Windsor, which we have done and approved. Whether or not the track is built, or the plant is built, and whether or not there is racing there in 1964, remains with the group that is building the track at Windsor.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the next is, not too long ago we had a trade crusade going on in the province. We sent trade ambassadors all over Europe, into the United States, everywhere that we could possibly send them to bring in a little business to our province. Yet here we have a racing commission that still insists on sending out passes that are printed in the U.S.A. This may be a minor thing, but surely we should ask our chairman now to get after the racing commission—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member is quite wrong, the racing commission does not send out any passes.

Mr. Newman: I know that, Mr. Chairman. I am simply asking that the—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I am telling the hon. member.

Mr. Newman: —chairman of the racing commission use his influence, what little he has, to convince these people to have this type of work done in Canada rather than the United States.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, the thoroughbred people and the standard breds, I notice, were in conference in Ottawa and while they discussed off-track betting nothing concrete arrived from their discussions. Before that—I believe he is the president of The Jockey Club—Mr. E. P. Taylor discussed off-track betting and gave certain points about it. At the meeting of the committee on commissions at which Mr. Bigelow, the chairman of the Ontario Racing Commission, was present, he said at that time that off-track betting in his opinion was legal. Everybody knows that most of those who go to the races do not go there for any other purpose than to bet. I do not think they care how good a horse is as long as he wins or comes in first, second or show. Also, it is well known, according to the report of the Roach commission, that there is a great amount of off-track wagering with the bookies that is illegal.

What is the opinion, or the position, of the hon. member who represents the government on that commission in regard to off-track betting? I certainly think it should be allowed if the receipts are funnelled into the parimutuels. What is the opinion of the hon. member of the commission on that?

And also what is the reason for their antipathy and their strong objection to having dog racing in this country? In many other jurisdictions it is allowed. Certainly in England one of the favourite pastimes is to go to the dog races at Epsom and other places. Also, in the United States, some states have it. What is the objection to having dog racing, too?

I wonder if we could have some comments from the hon. member for Carleton.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I think I will reply to the hon. member. The commission does not set the policy of the government and our government is opposed—it is not the policy of the government, let us say—to allowing off-track betting. Neither is it the policy of the government to have dog races.

Mr. Troy: What is the objection of the government to off-track betting?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I have told the hon. member that that is the policy of the government.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. member for Carleton a question. I addressed a question earlier to the hon. Provincial Treasurer and he corrected my faulty memory. The discussion about the cancellation of these grants to thoroughbred racers had originated from the commission. Then they changed their mind. In view of what the hon. Provincial Treasurer said, I wonder if the hon. member for Carleton could explain to us why the commission suggested this, and then reversed its field?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Provincial Treasurer said he did not know, it was the commission. Now surely the hon. member for Carleton should be allowed to answer.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the hon. members had an opportunity to discuss these matters with the commission at the meeting of the committee on commissions.

Mr. Whicher: We are not all on that.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I suggest that if there are any questions that the hon. member would like answered in connection with the racing commission, I will do my best to answer them.

Mr. Singer: But, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Carleton is a member of the commission, and I understand—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Singer: No, but the hon. Provincial Treasurer was objecting. I was just laying the groundwork for this. The hon. member for Carleton should have got up and explained many things about the racing commission. When he sat down he said if there are any questions, he would be glad to answer them. Now earlier on this evening I had asked a question of the hon. Provincial Treasurer and he said that was not—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The provision was made for you to question the commission. They came and they—

Mr. Whicher: But many of us are not on that committee.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This is an independent commission.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest respect to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, this matter is before the House. It is the proper vote; the representative of the people of Ontario in the Legislature on that commission is here, and he has offered to answer questions; and it seems the hon. Provincial Treasurer is not going to allow him to answer questions.

Mr. Whicher: And he is capable of doing that.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, before you finish this, it seems a very hypocritical attitude when it is the policy of the government to sell booze. They take money from booze. They do not have any sales tax on pulp magazines, and all sorts of those things. But it seems to me that they are very hypocritical about off-track betting.

Vote 2305 agreed to.

On vote 2306:

Mr. Young: As a new member, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer: We have a savings bank in the province and it is a provincial savings bank. How much business does this bank do in the sense of, say, handling current accounts?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Does the hon. member want me to answer him now?

Mr. Young: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it is a savings office. It does not do any banking business except savings. The savings are turned over to the government for the use of the government.

Mr. Young: So that the government itself would not make use of this bank for any of its accounts?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, we deposit any surplus funds we have in certain areas. That is, for instance, there might be surplus funds in Guelph. Some of the institutions might have surplus funds, and they would be deposited there. It would be transferred here and taken into the Treasury.

Mr. Young: But The Treasury Department itself would not use that bank to do its banking for its current work? And that is not possible under the legislation?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not sure that I understand the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Young: Well, if I could clarify it, then. Could a department of government—and I use the department of the hon. Provincial Treasurer just as an illustration—use that bank to deposit its income; then write cheques and do its business through the bank?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes, it could do that.

Mr. Young: If that is possible, then does this government, or any of its departments, use the service of this bank?

Mr. Bryden: How much of your money do you deposit there?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, we use it for accountable warrants, mainly. Not for our regular banking business.

Mr. Young: Why not for regular banking business? Because it seems to me here there would be a great deal of saving in service charges, and so on, and a very convenient method of doing government business.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I might inform the hon. member that we would not save anything by the way of service charges.

Mr. Bryden: Well, your own agency would get them instead—

Mr. Young: You would be paying to yourself instead of to another agency, would you not, in this case?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The statement I made is quite correct: That we would not save any money by doing it.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Provincial Treasurer is answering in a purely technical sense?

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer, at what rate of interest does he pay on the savings in the Ontario—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Three per cent on the minimum monthly balance.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I extend my thanks to the hon. Minister for the improvements that they have put on the bank in the city of Windsor? It is a real credit to the province, and likewise to the downtown area. But I would suggest that he do exactly the same in other communities as he has done in Windsor. Moving the offices from the second floor to the first floor has been a tremendous asset, not only to the bank but also to those who are interested in doing business with the province.

I would also like to make a suggestion that he do a little advertising for the bank, because there are a lot of people in the community who do not realize that the province has a savings office in the community and they could do business with them.

One question now, Mr. Chairman, and that is: When was the last time the employees in there received any upward revision in their salaries?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I do not have that information. It is very easy to obtain and I would be glad to get it for the hon. member. Of course, as the hon. member knows—I do not know what he really means by that question. The employees receive increases in salary each year until they reach the top of their class, so long as they are satisfactory in their employment.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I understand that; but my thought is that the employees in the Province of Ontario Savings Offices are not paid a comparable wage to what they would receive were they to work in another banking institution, a privately run one. I think it is time that the government seriously considered increasing salaries for all personnel in there. Otherwise, it will be most difficult to keep them. They are well trained, but will go to other banking institutions.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, we have the largest business in the province of Ontario in the government, and we have our own bank, and I cannot see why we do not do business with our own bank instead of using the chartered banks. There must be some logic in the hon. Minister's thinking, but why do we not do all our business with our own bank?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I have already made a statement. I do not intend to go into the details of our banking business with the chartered banks, but I have made a statement which is correct and which I think should satisfy the hon. members. That is that what we are doing is being done in the most economical fashion, and that to do as the hon. member for Grey North suggests would not be a saving.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I fail to see the reasoning of that because the other banks are—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have done my best.

Mr. Sargent: The other banks are not being operated at a loss, I do not believe.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well I am not running the other banks—

Mr. Sargent: Well this is public money we are spending and it should be spent the best way we can. To do business through other banks, letting them loan us money, when we have our own banking system and we are not using it—I cannot see the thinking of this government. On this banking system we have, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville mentioned the good job being done in the banks there. I think that the majority of the province of Ontario banks, as I know them, are a disgrace to the province. Either the government should get out of the banking business or go into it properly.

Vote 2306 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Treasury Department.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE

On vote 301:

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the estimates of The Department of Civil Service, I would like to state that The Department of Civil Service which provides for the estimates of the Civil Service Commission and the operating staff of the department under votes 301 to 308 inclusive is asking the approval of this Legislature for a total budget of $1,058,000.

The estimates submitted for the year ending March 31, 1964, totalled $922,000, so that the increase requested is $136,000. The largest part of this increase, $89,000, is to provide for increased staff and services in the recruiting and examination branch and to establish a new employee relations branch.

Since I described the work of the civil service department in considerable detail last year when the estimates were presented, I do not intend to repeat a detailed statement on this department except to report upon the events of the past year and to explain the requirements of the department in connection with each of these items.

Last year, in an amendment to The Public Service Act, two major provisions were enacted. The first provided for a joint council for collective negotiation procedures between employee association representatives and management representatives.

The second major change was to provide for certain privileges in regard to political activities and municipal candidacy which are contained in the various sections of the Act.

The Public Service Act, with the amendments of last year, represents a statute which has attracted international attention.

We have in Ontario, over the years, established the basis for a fine civil service. The Public Service Act provides for the methods of recruitment and selection, appointment by an independent Civil Service Commission, the statutory responsibility rights and privileges of civil service administrators, and the method whereby regulations may be passed to provide for terms of employment and conditions of work with the public service.

The amendments in regard to political activity replaced the old Garrow resolution of 1897, which stated as legislative policy that no public servant should engage in any form of political activity or in municipal government activity, with new provisions which allow public servants the full rights and privileges of citizenship. Section 15(a) of the regulations sets out the positions in schedule II which are excluded from political activity rights; generally at the level of branch head, up to and including Deputy Minister.

Another effect of these provisions has been to clarify for employees and management within the public service what is to be done when the responsibilities of citizenship come into conflict with those of public employment. Last year three requests for a leave of absence to engage in political candidacy were made and approved. However, any person standing for election will be covered by a leave of absence. If elected, he must resign, but is entitled to return to the civil service employment within five years without a break in service, except for the period of his absence being a hiatus in employment. We know of a number of public servants who have been able to participate in municipal life because of the provisions of this statute. Since the onus is on the officers concerned not to engage in any activity which will conflict with the interest of the Crown or with the performance of his duties, we are not aware of the actual numbers who have engaged in such activities under this section, since approval is not required.

A word about the joint council. The Act spells out the method of appointment of the council briefly: Four members of the staff side and four members of the official side meet under a chairman who has no voting rights. Any item may be placed on the agenda by a member of the council relating to working conditions and terms of employment. The council, however, drafted interim rules in its meetings last summer and requires that, before an item is placed on the agenda of the joint council, it must have been negotiated with the agency with authority to make a determination. The council meets every month and has held special meetings as required to deal with urgent matters. When the council makes a decision it is signed by the chairman and the vice-chairman, who is the senior representative of the staff side, and it is transferred to the appropriate authority to be implemented. This means in effect that the decision is binding, subject to any requirements for another body to act in a formal matter, such as the passage of a regulation by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

The only matter excluded from the agenda of the joint council was contained in regulations which excluded any matter affecting the police officers and constables of the provincial police force. This was at the request of the members of that force.

If the matter cannot be negotiated to conclusion in the joint council, and the side initiating the matter feels that a deadlock has been reached, the chairman will refer it to a civil service arbitration board appointed in accordance with the statute.

Because of the increased activities of civil service administration in regard to the Ontario joint council and employee relations, votes 307 and 308 were increased by $17,500 and $47,000 respectively. I shall describe in detail later the reasons for these increases.

There were a number of amendments to the regulations which will be of interest to this House, even though there are no direct financial implications on the estimates of The Department of Civil Service. The regulations in respect to overtime were amended and clarified and meal allowances were increased.

With the establishment of the Ontario joint council, the joint advisory council system had to be reconstituted. Accordingly, the regulations respecting departmental councils were redrafted to provide for the continuation of branch and department councils and to simplify election procedures. These provisions are contained in part 4 of the regulation, under sections 17 to 24 inclusive.

The grievance procedure was continued without amendment.

The new regulation (8a) was introduced to provide, sir, for medical examinations for employees frequently absent and unable to perform their duties. The expense of such examinations will be borne by the department concerned and a report filed with the commission.

The disciplinary powers of the deputy Ministers were broadened and clarified under section 14 of the regulations—continuing the rights to grievance procedure on any disciplinary action.

The practice of granting maternity leave was continued in the regulation providing for one such a leave as a right. It also established the privilege of reinstatement in regard to a subsequent maternity resignation, if the public servant returns within two years of resignation, in which case service will be deemed to be continuous.

There are many other changes in the operating rules of the Civil Service Commission, and in the directives of the commission to improve standards of the administration and to provide for the needs of a modern and up-to-date civil service.

I have mentioned these developments since the estimates of the civil service department are largely intended to cover the costs of salaries of officers appointed to administer personnel management procedures in the civil service.

Returning to the actual votes themselves to explain the need for the increased monies I shall first deal with vote 301 which provides for the expenditures of the main office.

The main office consists of the chairman of the civil service commission, two part-time commissioners who are not charged to this vote, the executive director and administrative and clerical staff. Although this vote showed an increase of $24,500, offsetting this increase, however, is the fact that the programmes and standards officer and his secretary, formerly charged as a separate vote, have been transferred to main office, reducing that item by $19,000; and a filing clerk and a commission officer have been transferred from administrative services branch and the position administration branch to main office and they have not been replaced in those branches. In actual fact, therefore, there are no increases in complement or cost of the main office, except to provide for salary adjustments. This was as a result of the reorganization of the department, establishing the employee relations branch, and strengthening the civil service commission secretariat.

Out of the total figure of $88,500 for item 301, $82,000 represent provisions for the salaries of 11 persons involved, $3,500 provided for travel, and $3,000 for maintenance.

The commission continues as it was constituted last year; that is, Mr. D. J. Collins is the chairman, Mr. A. E. Stacey continues as a member part time, as does Mr. Carl Brannan who is now the secretary of the Treasury board.

Mr. Stephen is the executive director of The Department of Civil Service. His position and his staff are charged to the main office. Mr. Collins fills the position also as deputy Minister of The Department of Civil Service and therefore serves in a dual capacity. The purchase of Quarter Century Club pins and buttons formerly charged to vote 307 now comes under the main office vote.

Vote 302 concerns the position administration branch and provides a total of $204,500, as compared to the estimates of last year of $187,500. The increase of $17,000 is made up of $14,500 for increased staff, and $2,500 for increased maintenance cost. The increased maintenance is a capital expenditure for office equipment. This branch is charged with the responsibility for evaluating and classifying positions in the civil service using classification and point rating techniques. The branch is divided into two major parts: Classification section and the planning and audit section, both headed by highly qualified supervisors. Mr. H. Copland very ably directs this branch.

Phase one of the reclassification programme has been reported and the revised classifications and pay rates affected some 16,000 employees. By the end of the year 118 new classes were established, covering 15,000 employees; and within the next month all of the remaining positions will be completed.

General classification studies were continued, establishing new series for the following classifications: Legal officer, economists, statisticians, community planners, tax administrators and tax auditors, photographers, architects and property officers.

Grievances filed with the classification rating committee, of course, involved this branch; and the determination of these grievances involve technical features of classification rating. In the previous year, 40 grievances were presented to this committee, compared with only 18 in the past year. Ten were withdrawn from grievance, four decisions were given in favour of the grievor, three against and one deferred.

It is essential to maintain a good position administration plan to ensure that proper information has been supplied on the position and the evaluation of the job is maintained up to date. This is the functioning of the planning and audit section, recognizing the continuing need for planning improved techniques and the development of more efficient procedures and classification rating.

Thus the departments are more involved in classification ratings and the writing of positions. This provides considerable assistance to civil service commission officers in covering a civil service of the size of the Ontario public service. During the year, 84 organizational units were studied, involving 1,236 positions in 18 departments. This demonstrates the wide scope and the demanding type of work carried out by classification officers. This provides the necessary basis for pay determination on the duties of the job and its responsibilities.

The total complement for this branch is 32, an increase of one over the previous year.

Under vote 303—the recruiting and examinations services branch headed by Mr. Alex Clark—the request is for a total budget of $241,000, an increase of $42,000 over last year. Thirty thousand dollars of this increase is for four more staff in recruiting, and two in examinations for a total of six. With the present method of programme budgeting it is necessary for the department to demonstrate the need for increased staff not only through increased services and work to be provided but also to identify the level of the job concerned. In this case, for example, our requests are for: a clerk, two; a senior clerk stenographer and two personnel assistants, one; as trainees for recruitment officers. In the examinations section the request is for a clerk three, and a senior clerk. This requires an increase in salary vote of $24,400 for recruitment and $13,400 for examinations.

In the year 1963, and this is interesting, there were 13,100 interviews with 2,700 vacancies filled, an increase in volume over 1962 of approximately 13 per cent. It is anticipated that this will continue into the new year. In regard to the examinations section, this is a specialized service to the recruiting branch and to operating departments to test applicants for qualification standards. Persons tested cover a wide range of positions from entry level clerical positions up to and including the director level. The heaviest concentration of work is in the areas of test development and the validation of tests.

Examinations officers work directly with the departments to develop appropriate testing standards to ensure that the commission recruits only qualified persons for vacant positions. In addition, examinations are conducted to aid in promotional selection. Examples of such examinations are those for attendants, rehabilitation officers, provincial police officers, retail sales tax field representatives, engineering aids, computer programmers and others. The hon. members will be interested to learn that last year, Mr. Chairman, 8,114 tests were given in over 90 categories of work. This has resulted in an improved standard of performance for the persons employed in these areas.

The highlights of the year for the recruitment branch include the establishment of eligible lists throughout the province for certain positions, for appointments to every vacancy in the Metropolitan Toronto area, and the clearance of all eligible lists and appointments outside Metro Toronto. In particular, the recruitment branch was engaged in an accelerated programme for the recruitment of constables and cadets in the Ontario Provincial Police. Indeed the Civil Service Commission actively supported the concept of the recruitment of young graduates of the secondary schools, of at least the Grade 12 level, for future career officers, engaging them as cadets and giving them the appropriate training and experience.

In co-operation with The Department of Health, the recruitment branch obtained some 50 trained nurses in the United Kingdom and participated in a special recruitment programme of The Department of Municipal Affairs for qualified municipal accountants.

Great attention is paid to establishing relationships with the universities and high schools, so that the best graduates of these institutions will turn to the Ontario government for career opportunities. A recruitment officer, for example, in February, made personal visits to the guidance departments of 52 Metropolitan Toronto secondary schools to publicize the civil service, and spoke to massed student groups at nine of the schools. It is interesting to note, too, that the educational level of intake has improved since, out of 139 students recruited for positions in the Toronto area during May, June and July of last year 94—that is 94 out of 139—had at least Grade 12 standing.

In the fall, the first edition of a newspaper entitled "The Ontario Call" was published. This had a very favourable response throughout the schools and gave necessary literature to the vocational guidance counsellors to assist the students in choosing appropriate careers.

In October, the department was one of 36 exhibitors in the three-day career exposition sponsored by the Galt "Y's" man's club. Over 4,800 students and parents from Galt and the surrounding areas visited these exhibits. Through the activities of the recruitment branch and the training branch of The Department of Civil Service, the universities are now aware of the opportunities for study and for work in the Ontario government—several post-graduate students are preparing masters' and doctorate theses on provincial government. In addition, the universities recognize the greater careers in public administration at the provincial level.

In connection with the Ontario Provincial Police recruiting programme, 4,250 applications were received and 2,300 of these who met the minimum standards were interviewed and wrote the examinations. Of these about 1,700 were successful and passed through the final stages of interview by the selection board.

By the end of the year, some 437 appointments of well-qualified Ontario candidates were made to the Ontario Provincial Police. This cannot help but strengthen the Ontario Provincial Police force to the benefit of all citizens of this province.

In order to obtain information on the attitude of high school students about Ontario government as an employer, a survey was conducted. A sample of about 1,000 students, drawn from 14 high schools, participated at the levels of Grades 10 to 13. The results of this survey will be a guide to recruitment programmes and indicates the need for information released by The Department of Civil Service to correct some misunderstandings about government employment.

Vote 304 requests a total of $101,500 for training and development services. This represents an increase of $7,000 over the budget requested last year. The bulk of the increase is an item of $5,000 in regard to salaries—$1,000 additional is provided for maintenance and for general training costs.

In brief, the programmes conducted in the new fiscal year will include a senior officers' conference, a personnel officers' conference, a continuation of the certificate course in public administration, the publication of self-development booklets, a survey of existing training activities within the service and within the community, and assistance to the departments in ascertaining their training needs and planning for the future.

Although in the coming year the internship programme will not be continued, the money which was available to it will be continued—an amount of $25,000—to conduct a survey to further identify the needs of the service in regard to training programmes. One difficulty in the Ontario public service which is experienced by other large employers, is that there are some problems of retraining in the re-assignment of persons to new and emerging tasks. This must be given careful attention.

The survey is projected to ascertain two conditions: (1) the gaps between present staff qualifications and those qualifications which are required to do the work at a high level of efficiency, which will be reflected in the job descriptions of the Civil Service Commission. And (2) the present staff qualifications in relation to the jobs that such staff will be expected to perform in the near future.

The staff to conduct this survey will consist of two interviewers—a research assistant and a clerk stenographer—under the supervision of the officers of the training branch.

We have many dedicated and energetic persons within the civil service who lack some element of qualifications to proceed to higher and more technical duties. It is our hope to identify the training needs and to assist the staff to take appropriate development programmes, thus bringing their qualification standards to a higher level in order to compete for these positions. Education and training does not end at the school-leaving age. We have learned that mature persons can re-equip themselves through training programmes for more responsible tasks.

Technical developments and the high levels of competence required today demand re-training programmes for such persons. It is our intent to do everything possible to assist departments in preparing for future needs through development programmes for present staff who measure up to certain standards.

One of the important tasks of the Training and Development Services Branch, under director Stephen Davidovich, has been to develop criteria for the granting of educational leave. It is anticipated such leave will be granted on three bases. When it is in the interests of the department to release the employee for a duty assignment in regard to further educational training, it will be at full pay. If there is a request by the employee to engage in a training programme which will provide an advantage to the department, and an advantage to the employee and it is in the interests of the department to grant such leave, the leave will be on the basis of half pay. If, however, the employee wishes to advance his own knowledge without any direct relationship to the duties he fills with the department, the leave will be on the basis of leave of absence without pay if it is supported by the department.

The senior officers' conference conducted last year from May 12 to May 31 at the Ontario Agricultural College was very successful indeed. Dr. R. O. MacFarlane, Director of the Department of Public Administration of Carleton University, Professor Walter Thompson, Associate Dean of the School of Business Administration, University of Western Ontario and Professor Craig Lundberg of the School of Business Administration, also of Western, acted as consultants in planning this conference; with Dr. MacFarlane being one of the co-directors. Twenty-eight officers from the Ontario government departments, boards and commissions participated in the conference. A representative of the government of Canada and one from the province of Nova Scotia also participated to enrich the experience of those who attended from Ontario.

The certificate course in public administration went into its second year. The results of the first course led to a certain number of changes to meet the needs of the participants. The new course consists of four major subjects—political science, economics, human factors and public administration—and it is intended that a new group will begin this course this year.

In establishing and maintaining a training and development services branch, and in obtaining Mr. Davidovich, formerly director of citizenship and before that assistant director of community programmes branch in The Department of Education, as the director of this branch, the government demonstrates its support for the development for new skills and knowledges within the civil service itself. This programme will assist the member of the civil service to meet the increasing challenges of positive government.

Vote 305 provides for the administrative services which continue under the direction of Mr. A. Hemmingway. This branch deserves the commendation of the hon. members of this House, Mr. Chairman, because it has cut out some unnecessary procedures and is relying upon data processing equipment. In relying upon data processing equipment it has been able to reduce its costs by $7,000 over the amount requested for the budget of last year. The total budget, therefore, of $276,500 represents a reduction of $7,000 compared to the amount voted last year.

The major responsibility of this branch is for the implementation of all personnel and salary changes within the government service under the jurisdiction of the commission. It provides office services to The Department of Civil Service itself, maintains files and an inventory of the positions which exist in the government, and processes all appointments and certificates. This involves more than straight processing since each transaction must be carefully checked to make certain it is accurate and proper.

Under this vote it is appropriate to mention that the perquisites officer of the civil service commission is responsible for administering the perquisite charges as they apply to civil service employees. Payroll deductions for all types of perquisites in the calendar year of 1963 totalled $1,129,048. These include living accommodation, maintenance services, furnishings, meals and laundry. This represents an increase of over $80,000 over the previous calendar year, Mr. Chairman. A new procedure for the setting of perquisite charges was developed, with rentals established on a more current basis with adjusted rates effective April 1, 1963.

In regard to separations, 28.6 per cent of the employees who separated had over five years' service and were eligible for the payment of a gratuity of their sick leave credits to a total cost of $1,153,948. This money was paid to 1,206 former employees. This together with the rights of the vesting of the pension after ten years' service demonstrates that the Ontario government as an employer treats its former employees fairly and protects them against future contingencies.

Vote 306 concerns the monies requested by pay research to carry out pay research studies. This branch is responsible for conducting pay research studies for all classifications in the service, making comparative studies of fringe benefits and conditions of employment in outside employment. Since studies are conducted on a cyclical basis, it was considered necessary to provide for a total of ten staff members to conduct these important studies. Two economists and a civil service commission officer will be added to meet the staff requirements of this branch.

Because of the provisions in negotiating procedures with the employee association it is even more important, sir, that we have accurate pay data so that both the official and staff sides can make responsible decisions in the light of salaries and fringe benefits which exist outside the civil service. In the year just past reports were provided to the civil service commission on a great many classes including clerical, typing, stenographic, institutional, cleaning and caretaking classes. These were complex detailed reports which accompanied recommendations for revised salaries.

Last year 276 new classes were formally established with new pay rates. Three hundred and fifty five other classifications were given revised salary ranges. As a result 17,600 civil servants received increases costing approximately $5,850,000 on an annual basis. In addition, $525,000 was needed to establish new classifications associated with new and increased programmes. A long list of positions received salary adjustments as a result of the foregoing. In addition, many more classifications were granted the rights of semi-annual increases in the initial stages of employment. Under Mrs. Etchen, this branch has established a very high reputation indeed, for accurate and complete studies in regard to pay administration and fringe benefits, which is, of course, most important to the civil service commission in making appropriate recommendations to the government.

In regard to the reclassification programme, the salary adjustments were all effected on the basis of September 1, 1962 when the first adjustments were reported. The delays, therefore, which were unavoidable in such a difficult and comprehensive study meant that those persons on staff with us received retroactive adjustments back to September, 1962 and received the full adjustment in pay. Some positions, of course, were red-circled because of being previously overrated. The reclassification programme classified positions on the basis of duties of the position in order to pay a proper rate for the job.

Vote 307 concerns the Ontario joint council and grants moneys for the continuation of grievance boards and the constitution as it may be necessary of the civil service arbitration board. It was necessary to increase this item to $40,500 over $23,000 last year in order to provide for three additional staff: an executive officer and a secretary to assist the official side of the joint council in staff work and the personal assistant to assist the secretary of the various boards, since the activities of the council and the grievance boards will require more than one executive secretary to be available. Mr. Culliton, who has served as secretary to the classification rating committee, the public service grievance board, the joint advisory council and now the Ontario joint council has a heavy load of work and at times it has been necessary to obtain the temporary services of another officer to cover two simultaneous meetings. An assistant to him will be provided so that this important work can continue without interruption of secretarial services.

As the hon. members know, Mr. Chairman, the appeals procedure of the Ontario civil service is divided into two parts: One concerns grievances in respect of dismissal, working conditions and terms of employment and these grievances are heard by the public service grievance board under the chairmanship of Professor Ralph Presgrave; in the other classification grievances are heard by the classification rating committee as constituted by the chairman of the commission with Professor J. A. Sargeant as the regular chairman.

I would like to pay particular tribute to these two chairmen and also their vice-chairmen, Mrs. D. A. Homuth of the grievance board and Mr. J. A. Bridges of the classification rating committee, who is also manager of the personnel department of Toronto Hydro, for their fine work as impartial arbitrators.

During 1963, the public service grievance board met 45 times to hear and dispose of 39 grievances. Out-of-Toronto hearings were held at Kenora, London and Mimico. A change in the board was required because of the resignations of Messrs. Silk, Spence and Bayly, and in their place, Mr. T. R. Hilliard, deputy Minister of Energy Resources, and Mr. D. A. Crosbie, senior solicitor of The Department of Highways, were made by The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The work of these boards continues to grant protection to Ontario public servants in regard to conditions which a public servant may feel discriminatory. An employee in the Ontario public service, therefore, can serve without fear of unwarranted action and indeed we have a true career service based upon the merit principle.

Vote 308 constitutes a new employee relations branch which is headed by the former president of the civil service association, Mr. H. J. Mace. This branch will initially consist of four persons, that is three officers and a secretary. Its responsibilities include: to maintain relationships with the employee association, the employees and the public in regard to matters related to civil service employment; to publish general information concerning the civil service departments, staff transfers and promotions; to prepare employee handbooks; to advise the commission and operating officials on civil service matters; to investigate problems respecting conditions of employment and to suggest improvements; to address persons interested in civil service matters; to meet informally with employee groups to resolve misunderstandings and to recommend to The Department of Civil Service appropriate steps to offset problems in personnel administration.

A large part of the budget, $15,000, is provided to grant sufficient monies for an employee news publication which will appear on a regular basis. This is new to the department. It will describe civil service developments, explain new programmes and generally act as a news medium for public servants. A civil service handbook will be published at the cost of $5,000.

Mr. Chairman, one of the largest employers in Ontario, if not the largest, the Ontario government must provide for a good employee branch to give the employees the necessary information about their jobs and about developments in the service, and at the same time to correct some misunderstandings by the public in regard to civil service careers. This branch will work closely with the other branches of the department and with other departments of government to check into areas where misunderstandings might develop and assist in negotiations with employee groups on matters respecting their employment.

I would commend to the hon. members of this House the passage of the estimates presented to you for The Department of Civil Service. With 20 operating departments of government it is essential that we have a strong central agency to keep uniform treatment and balance among them to maintain salaries up to date. Keeping our conditions of employment attractive is one of the fundamental policies of the government that is managed by the civil service commission. We are fortunate to have fine and dedicated men and women serving in this department in the interests of strengthened personnel administration. The civil service is stronger and more competent because of their endeavours.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, it now being 10.40, I think that we could very well adjourn for this evening and so I would move that the committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Tomorrow we shall proceed with the estimates of The Department of Civil Service and the Budget debate. The list which I have of the estimates next coming up after the civil service next week, will be Public Works, Provincial Secretary, Reform Institutions and Highways.

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, can the hon. Minister inform us as to what the programme is next week as to the sitting time? I understand there might have been some change.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) will be here tomorrow and if there are any changes he will advise the House. I do not think there will be any.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.45 o'clock, p.m.

FRIDAY, MARCH 6, 1964

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are pleased to welcome to the Legislature today, in the west gallery, students from the John G. Althouse Public School, Islington.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Workmen's Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for an extension of the definition of those to whom benefits may be payable. It provides for an adjustment of certain payments to beneficiaries under the fund. It provides for special provision for the expenditure of monies by the board pertaining to rehabilitation, and it further provides the machinery for adjusting the rate of assessment, having in mind the need for greater attention to safe working practices and conditions.

THE MARRIAGE ACT

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Marriage Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the Act.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): At the present time a certified copy of the document dissolving or annulling a previous marriage is required to be deposited with an issuer of a licence. This will provide that the original document may be filed.

THE VITAL STATISTICS ACT

Hon. Mr. Yaremko moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Vital Statistics Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, wherever it was necessary to change the record of a person's birth by reason of adoption prior to 1959, the registrar-general could make a notation on the record. There was an amendment passed by this Legislature which provided for a formal procedure by way of application. It is felt that the two systems should be in effect, and we are now so providing.

THE CORPORATIONS ACT

Hon. Mr. Yaremko moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Corporations Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a number of amendments to various sections of The Corporations Act.

A year ago we passed an amendment to The Corporations Act permitting insurance companies to use their official name in a language other than English. This is now extended to cover all corporations incorporated in Ontario.

Another provision extends to the auditors' report by the addition to the statement made by the auditor of the words "in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles applied on a basis consistent with that of the preceding period." This is now the general practice and we are putting it into law. It will enable shareholders and the investing public to make a more valid comparative analysis of all financial statements.

There is a provision now which will enable charitable corporations to give notice of their meetings by publication in newspapers.

A prohibition of life insurance companies in not investing in a company which carries on a general insurance business is now removed. The power of insurance companies to invest is extended by an increase from 10 per cent of the shares in another corporation to 20.

There is a provision which makes clear that where a change of head office takes place, by virtue of an annexation or amalgamation, that that is not a legal change of head office through The Corporations Act. Nothing has to be done by the company.

There is a provision which enables non-share capital corporations to elect their officers directly at a general meeting.

Under the Act the department, through the Provincial Secretary, has the power of cancelling charters for failure to file annual returns over a period of three years. That is now reduced to a period of one year. And the periods within which an application may be made for revivor in such instances is reduced also from three years to one.

Mr. Speaker: There is a question before the orders of the day.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): My question is to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile). Has the hon. Minister any knowledge of the report yesterday on the TV at Kingston that a provincial welfare worker has allegedly threatened a welfare recipient because she had testified in the coroner's inquest held earlier this week in that city?

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Sir, I would like to advise the hon. member, through you, that I received his question. After investigation, I found out that no one knows anything about this as yet. I have given instructions to find out if there is anything, and I will report later.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement which I am sure will be of interest to all hon. members of this House, and to the public generally:

I am pleased to announce that a director of research has been appointed to the staff of The Department of Reform Institutions. This we regard as a major first step in the setting up of a research section within the department.

The large number of offenders receiving training and treatment in our institutions provides a useful source of research material. No jurisdiction in Canada has, as yet, a suitable research and statistical department for the purpose of collating and assessing all the information which should be available from the ten provinces and the federal authorities.

About two years ago, the federal bureau of statistics began to set up a system which would help to solve at least the statistical problem. Without the necessary co-operation of the provincial jurisdictions, the federal government's efforts will not be as effective as desirable. Further, the great volume of source material in the files of the various jurisdictions is not being properly mined for the wealth of material available.

Therefore, the setting up of a research branch in our department will not only assist the federal authorities in their efforts, but, we hope will encourage the same action in the other nine provinces and will go a long way towards the ultimate aim of a well-integrated system of research, including statistical information, in this country.

Our department has included in the estimates for the ensuing year, a grant of $30,000 towards the operating costs of the centre of criminology at the University of Toronto.

I emphasize, at this time, the importance of this centre as a study and research body in the field of crime, its causes and prevention, as well as the treatment of offenders. I recognize that present collaboration between the university and the department in the field of applied research must be greatly intensified. This appointment is a major step in intensifying this collaboration. It is most necessary that, besides the basic research which will be done by the centre of criminology, there should be a strong programme of field research which can only be done by our department and which must be directed by our own staff.

To head this research section we have been fortunate in obtaining the services of Dr. Tadeusz Grygier, who has accepted this appointment, which will take effect on April 1 of this year. Dr. Grygier is both well qualified and long experienced in this field. Academically he possesses a diploma in political science, he is a master of laws, a doctor of philosophy in psychology, and a fellow of the British Psychological Society.

Dr. Grygier came to Canada four years ago to head a special project at the University of Toronto to develop advanced teaching, research and consultation in the field of corrections. His main interest has been in operational research, which uses research techniques to solve practical problems, and he has been particularly active in investigating social and emotional needs of juvenile delinquents and adult offenders in the care of The Department of Reform Institutions.

In this field he has developed new techniques to evaluate the effectiveness of treatment programmes.

Dr. Grygier was born in Poland, where after training in law, political science and psychology, he was called to the bar and was working on his doctorate at the Institute of Criminology, Warsaw, before the outbreak of World War II. During the war he was deported to a Siberian forced-labour camp. After release from the camp and evacuation from Russia, he became director of the department of studies at the Polish Ministry of Information in London. After studying the victims of German concentration camps, he continued research at the Institute for the Study and Treatment of Delinquency in London, England. A Rockefeller fellowship enabled him to work at the American universities of Harvard, Illinois, Chicago and California. Returning to England he established a department of clinical psychology and research at Banstead Hospital which involved post-graduate teaching to psychologists and psychiatrists as well as an extensive research programme.

Dr. Grygier is chairman of the research committee of the Canadian Corrections Association, and is a member of the scientific programme committees of both the American Society of Criminology and the International Congress of Criminology. I think hon. members would agree that we are extremely fortunate in obtaining the services of Dr. Grygier, and I am pleased to inform this House that a significant factor in our discussions, and Dr. Grygier's acceptance of this post, has been the progressive and co-operative attitude which he has found within the department during the last four years.

I am very pleased at this time to report to this House that we have been able to make this appointment, which augurs well for the future progress of corrections, in this province particularly and in Canada generally.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Mr. Speaker, on March 6, I do not know in what year, but it was a while ago, there was a fellow born in the province who finally at the age of 22, I think it was, entered this House and he has been here for some 38 years. I think that one of the things that all of us like about him is that he is a real man's man. The only thing that I know that he has ever done that was wrong, was that one night in a game of cards—we found out after it was all over of course—the man beat a pair of kings with a pair of three spots.

But other than that I think it can be honestly said that down through these years he has served his people and served them well. He was not always a member of this party, but, of course, I was not either. But I want to say, sir, that I think there is one thing that we ought to mention and that is the fact that you do not really understand the operation of the various parties until and after you have been a member of all of them.

Mr. MacDonald: Best rationalization I ever heard.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You'll never get to be a member of this one.

Mr. Reaume: We are getting, I think, closer all the time, I hope. But 38 years, of course, is a long time. I can say that 34 years is a long time. But one thing that you learn in the occupation of office is that regardless of party, you do meet many, many fine people. It is true that while in this House there might be many bitter arguments, but once we walk out of the doors of this House it can also be said, I think with honesty, that we are friends. In doing it in that fashion we can be of better service to our people. There is really no need for any man or woman occupying office to walk around the streets of the community with any hate in his heart for a person who does not agree with everything that he might think is right. This man who is now the acting head of our party is a man in whom we are well pleased. We are happy that he is here at the head of our party, and we feel that we have a man who has been a man among men, a man who has served his people well. In purchasing a little present for him we were thankful for a great man over in England, Winston Churchill, for whom you could not buy a better present than a good five-cent smoke. So we purchased this little box and I want to give it to him with the best feelings and wishes of the hon. members of our party and I hope with the best wishes of every hon. member of the House—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reaume: He holds the honour of having put more Tories out of operation than any man in the House but I do hope that he and his wife will spend many, many happy years together and that this House will be honoured with his presence until such time as he himself will choose to quit. We hope that that will not be for a long, long time. Thank you very much.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have two pleasant duties. One is to welcome back the hon. member for Essex North with his ribald flow of rhetoric and nonsense; and two, to join with him in congratulating the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) on his sixtieth birthday.

According to the information given to me he was born in a place called Priceville and entered this Legislature first in 1926. I would echo with my friend the hon. member for Essex North the wish that he may stay precisely where he is for a good number of years.

It is interesting to note that he became Minister of Welfare and Public Works in 1941. As I have said on previous occasions he has found it necessary to bring his organization into drydock occasionally. He resigned in 1942. Really I think he has been a great tower of strength to the Liberal Party, and all facetiousness aside, I am delighted to join with the hon. member for Essex North and congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition, not only on the fact that he has achieved his sixtieth birthday and in doing so has established a record in this House that I think will not be supplanted for many years, but he has been a great public servant.

We would all join with the hon. member in doing this, particularly because this is the first time we have heard from the hon. member for Essex North for some weeks because he has been ill. But I really would want to be quite firm in our position that we are delighted to honour the hon. leader of the Opposition because it will fall to few of us to serve as long and as vigorously as he has. I note that he was leader of his party in 1945, again in 1954 and again in 1964, and of course as I have said on other occasions in this House, I am not consulted. I know not what goes on in the inner councils of the Liberal Party but all I can say is that from sitting on this side we are delighted to have him there and to have him speak and conduct the affairs of the Liberal Party in this House. We are delighted to join, through you, sir, with the hon. member for Essex North to congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition on his sixtieth birthday and for 38 years of service to the people of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to share in this occasion for two reasons. One, I am certain that the hon. member for Essex North is correct when he says that all hon. members of the House will join with enthusiasm in expressing congratulations to the hon. member for Grey South on the occasion of his birthday. I express those congratulations enthusiastically.

The other reason why I rise with pleasure is that I noted in the remarks of the hon. member for Essex North that the only way you know a party is to be in it for a while. He has been a member of every party, except ours, up until now and I take his words as a forewarning. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): I rise on a point of personal privilege. I would like to join with the hon. member for Essex North, the hon. Prime Minister, and the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party in extending good wishes to the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. leader of the Opposition is 60, of course, but he is 60 years young. If you do not think so, just try to keep up with him.

He is not only the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, but he is dean of this House. He served not quite as long as two former members of this House who were both, incidentally, former Prime Ministers, the hon. P. L. Kennedy and the hon. H. E. Nixon. But by the end of this particular term of this Legislature he will have served longer than any other man who has served in this House. We hope that he will continue to serve.

Do you know, there is one thing I have never been able to understand. In his moving around from party to party I cannot understand why he did not complete the circle and come over here.

Now the hon. member for Grey South, the hon. leader of the Opposition, the dean of the House, has many attributes of heart and mind that endear him to the House and endear him to a multitude of friends. Personally, I value his friendship and I value his advice. He has made a great contribution to the political life of this province. He has made a great contribution to the political life of Grey South. If I could offer a wish this morning it would be this: Mr. Oliver, I trust and hope that he will live just as long as he wants to, and never want as long as he lives. Thank you, very much.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are occasions when one finds it rather difficult to give expression to the feelings that we may have at a particular moment. This is one of those occasions. But I do want first of all to thank my good friend, the hon. member for Essex North, not so much because of his person, but because of the gift that he has given to me on behalf of the caucus. As for the gift itself, you often hear people say, "It is not for the monetary value, it is for the feelings that are attached thereto."

Well now, this has a double meaning. I mean we are not to get an increase in salary. The necessities of life must then be purchased by some means. The feelings of the caucus and the monetary value of the gift are both very important because of those considerations.

I thank the hon. Prime Minister, of course, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, and my old and real friend, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe for their expressions of congratulations. But when one gets to be 60—and the continuous repetition of that milestone in the House this morning almost suggests to one that they are trying to draw attention to that number of years—perhaps the suggestion is that one has been around here long enough.

Now I just wanted to say to the House that 38 years in any Legislature is a long time. When I came into the House, Mr. Ferguson was premier. He resigned a few years later to go to England as High Commissioner. He was succeeded by another gentleman, Mr. Henry, a man who remained in office until 1934 when he was defeated by Mr. Hepburn. That period ushered in, perhaps, the most prosperous era we have had in this province since the turn of the century.

Hepburn, in turn, was succeeded by Mr. Conant and Mr. Conant by Mr. Nixon. Then came Mr. Drew, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Frost. Now we have my hon. friend Mr. Roberts thrust upon us for the time being.

That covers a long period of years, a great number of premiers, and in that period of time of course, irrespective of what party was in power, this province has moved forward toward its proper destiny.

In those long years I have enjoyed the participation in the debates in the House, and participation in government itself. I do not think I have enjoyed a session more in those 38 years than I have the present session. When my colleagues asked me to give them temporary help at this time, I determined upon the course of action and I have, with their help, carried it out resolutely through this session. I think it is having its imprint. I was determined at the outset that there should be a wider participation on the part of the hon. members of the Opposition in the debates in this Legislature, a greater responsibility on each one of the hon. members than I felt they had shared previous to the present time. Both those responsibilities my colleagues have accepted with the proper spirit, and it has made the load lighter and the responsibility less onerous than it otherwise would have been.

My chief difficulty, of course, in this session has been with those who should really be my friends, these fellows from the NDP. Yesterday it was exemplified in real form. My hon. friend from Woodbine, Mr. Speaker, is a very clever debater. But I want to portray the difficulty that a leader has at times. My hon. friend yesterday afternoon would have spent millions without a word of caution, almost, and then last night he becomes quite mean. He would in one fell swoop grab the crumpled dollar bill from the poor horse's mouth. How do you contend with situations like that?

That is what makes a man's hair grow gray, and have less of it than you had the day before. But you have to live with that sort of a situation. I am sure that my hon. friend was doing what he thought best, but in order to reach the ultimate in good, sometimes devious ways are employed. And that, too, you have to learn to live with.

I just want to say here that I hope to be in the House for some years to come. I hope to continue to make whatever contribution I am capable of making, in order that all of us together, not one party but all of us in this House, may help to make this province, as Mr. Hepburn used to say, a better place in which to live. Thank you very kindly.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, in calling the next order of business, I might say that the hon. gentleman has displayed all his political sagacity in taking advantage of the only opportunity he will have in this House of having the last word.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The fifty-fourth order. House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE (continued)

On vote 301:

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, at the outset, in view of the friendliness and mellowness with which this day has started, I would like to also both add my compliments to our leader and also to another gentleman, whom I think has many of the same qualities as my leader—perhaps not all of them, but you certainly have got many of them. I think, sir, that in your kindly way you have tried to give us as much detail as you can. From our side we appreciate that the text of your address on the civil service was sent to us. I appreciate the late hour in which it was sent, the late hour in which you were introducing it—I am sorry, did you send this bill?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): No, we did not.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I take back my remarks and say we had to steal it. There is something rather beguiling about the hon. Provincial Treasurer. That smile provokes me to think he is more genial than he is sometimes.

However, sir, I will stop short those congratulatory remarks right now and deal with the discovery I made.

I notice that there were two points you seemed to have made. First, you talked about the joint council for collective negotiation procedures between employees' association representatives and management representatives. I would like to say, if we look not too many years ago into the whole situation of the civil service of Ontario, that we realize how vitally important it was that there should be some form of collective negotiation.

The representatives of the civil service surely should have the same consideration in collective agreements and collective bargaining—as you state with almost a clarion call—as a principle to industry. I am looking at the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) as I say this, and I think it would ill-behoove any government to have a Minister of Labour, sir, on the one hand stating a principle to industry and unions, and then to have a government itself not standing as a shining example. As I look at the method of your joint council, I think somehow that perhaps you yourself should have a look to see that it is a shining example in the process of collective bargaining—and I question this very much.

I suggest, for example, that it seems to me to almost emasculate some of the civil servants when they appear, as they think, in true faith before a bargaining committee and then find that such insidious approaches as orders-in-council can take place when they are talking about negotiations in good faith with the government. I say this, sir, giving three examples.

I think of the example of the woman who had to leave for the noble purpose of being pregnant and of having a child. When this is one of the points that the civil service representative wants to discuss with you, that there should be a leave of absence, we find—and for the life of me I cannot see the logic in this—that an order-in-council comes out saying that if a civil servant, a female employee, should have two children and has to have a second leave of absence, then she will not get paid during that period.

As I look at the hon. Minister, I would think he believes in family life and the encouragement of children. Surely he himself is shocked at this near brutality on the part of a government, in restricting the leave of people who want to do something to increase the population, to get a leave of absence to do so. If you give it for one, why on earth cannot you give it for as many as people would wish to produce?

But the point I am making is that this came up before the joint council. They were thinking they were bargaining in good faith, and then we find that an order-in-council has been made by the government; so they are bargaining, but the government itself has means of getting around it with an order-in-council.

Let me give other examples. Hours of work: I understand that when the civil service representatives want to discuss hours of work with their employers again an order-in-council comes out with respect to this. Another example is the situation with respect to financial arrangements for employees living in government housing. I understand that if they bargain in good faith with you, here again you consider some order-in-council, or may have already passed this, in respect of the occupancy of government housing.

I would say, therefore, that the civil service had hoped that this joint council of collective negotiation procedures will be based on the fullest good faith between employer and employees. And the example that I point to I am sure would suggest that the civil servant is, indeed, handicapped when the government, through order-in-council, even while negotiations are going on, can make the decision rather than listen to the full negotiations.

The next point I think you discussed, sir, had been with respect to grievances. One point that interests me in connection with grievances from the civil service is, first of all—and I think, as a previous civil servant myself, there is always a certain apprehension on the part of an employee to go through the procedure of grievance because he does not know the repercussions which can take place by his superiors, when he makes a formal approach with respect to grievance.

One thing, it seems to me in the civil service, is that the step a civil servant has to take in order to get his grievance processed seems to be very long. And I suggest to you, sir, that it is almost a brutality in method, like someone waiting in a cell for a sentence and the time of apprehension and fear that takes place before the final judgment.

With the civil servant, he may have to wait 110 days as this grievance procedure takes place. I appreciate there should be certain time periods because obviously the grievance has to be looked into and studied from both sides. I understand there are three steps in the grievance procedure. The first step is that the civil servant will go to his first-step supervisor. The second step is that he will go to his deputy Minister who appoints someone to look into it, or rather he goes to someone prior to the deputy Minister, an intermediary, and then it comes to the deputy Minister.

I am suggesting that there need not be that second step. I would think that deputy Ministers on the whole are very closely in touch with their departments. After a civil servant with a grievance has gone to the first-step supervisor, instead of having to go to someone who will report this back to the deputy Minister and then from there to decide if it can go on to the deputy Minister, surely he could go from that first step right through to the deputy Minister himself and then on to the grievance committee.

One question that I have, sir, is that I noticed in your last estimates that you mentioned, I think it was 15 people who had presented grievances in which their point of view had been regarded as valid and their grievance had been upheld. This was out of 60 that came before the grievance committee last year. The question I have—and I realize this is a difficult one—is, what happens to the man, for example, who has won his grievance? He goes back again to his department. I would like to ask of those 15 who won their grievances last year, if it might be possible to know if they are holding equivalent positions. Are their opportunities to continue and move up in the service still there?

I might say about grievances that often we feel that someone with a grievance really is a bit of a crackpot. I would just like to leave this message with the whole House, in connection with grievance procedures in the civil service or indeed in any other government or any other body, that the great contributions to civilization have only been made by men or women who had grievances. I ask that you dwell on that a bit, that the men or women who are complacent with their society are the men and women who really do not contribute to progress. Therefore I think, particularly in this large organization, the largest in Ontario, that we should see that there is a complete flexible approach, an unbiased attitude and that there is complete fairness given to the man with a grievance, because he, as through the ages, may be the man who is contributing very vitally to the progress of this province.

If I could, I would like to talk again about something that we have brought up continually. That is that you, with great satisfaction, stand up and tell us the civil service is a wonderful organization and that you are indeed proud to be administering it, and that the people in the civil service, coming under The Civil Service Act, are people contented and happy, progressive and giving of their best to Ontario. But the thing that one wonders is why, with your feeling of humanity for a lot of people who work for the government, you yourself perhaps have not been more aggressive to encourage the benevolence that extends to civil servants, to try to spread the umbrella further, because there are many who for some reason or other are excluded. They are working on behalf of the government of Ontario but they are excluded from being within the civil service category.

I am speaking of the casuals. It has always struck me as somewhat ironical that a man can work for 25 years in a department and he can still be considered a casual employee. It is not only ironical, it is pitiful, when you think of the superannuation funds and other benefits which this man is deprived of. I would hope that increasingly there will be a study of this. If it was not the hon. Minister I was speaking to, and knowing his kindly attitude, I would suggest that the reason for so many casuals who are working in permanent positions is because of a Scrooge-like quality on the part of the Treasury board in trying to exclude people who are doing the job from having the benefits which they should be entitled to.

Another point I would like to come to with respect to this same principle—and it was discussed in the last estimates—is the point of the boards and commissions. The hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) made the distinction, I think, in the estimates of last year, between Crown corporations and between other administered bodies which are run by the government or which are delegated by the government. We know there are 90 such boards or commissions in Ontario.

I think the question had been raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) in the last estimates. What about the men working for the parks commission—these people that he was fighting strenuously for, as he always does, for the benefit of his constituents in Niagara Falls? He was asking about the working conditions and I am sure he will have more to say in these estimates about this. But if I recall the reply that the hon. Minister made when he was asked why The Public Service Act does not extend to people who are working on commissions and in Crown corporations, the hon. Minister agreed when the hon. member for Woodbine suggested Crown corporations are in a different category from other administrative boards. The reply that the hon. Provincial Treasurer gave, sir, was that we would welcome employees to come under this umbrella of The Public Service Act and the implication I got was that it was up to the employees to do this.

Sir, I know that the hon. Minister with his many years of experience and knowledge of government realizes that civil servants are not going to be able to change the Act which sets up commissions in order that they can come under The Public Service Act. I would suggest that this change must come from the government benches themselves. I would suggest it should come, because in this province there is no question that there are men and women working on these commissions and there are double standards. I would suggest that across this province for employees working for the government there should be equal standards and they should be good standards.

The next point, sir, I would like to come to is with respect to recruitment. I think of my own riding, for example, and the people who have come to me and asked me about job opportunities in the civil service. I would suggest that they go to see the civil service commissioner and would look up the telephone number and phone. But I think how different that is from the federal government's approach. I think it was one of the hon. members, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman), who showed that the federal government really makes an effort to tell the people of Canada that there are opportunities in their government and in every post office across the land you can read about job opportunities. When I think of the money that this government pays to McKim Advertising and some of its other warm-hearted friends in the advertising business, surely, sir, something could be done to recruit the best people by letting the public know what jobs are available.

I noticed that you were asked last year whether you would consider putting advertisements in post offices across Ontario. I am sure that you will have an answer to that because I am quite convinced that my friend the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville will be raising it.

I would like to raise a question about the internship programme. I notice that in the hon. Minister's previous estimates he had spoken of this. It seems that he was enthusiastic and felt that this was going to be a method of getting young men and women who would—something like a doctor getting an internship—move on through the ranks of the public service of Ontario. Then I read here that the internship programme has been discontinued. This really raises the question of whether enough is being done in training. Is enough encouragement being given for training on the job, and is enough encouragement being given to people who have joined the civil service and who have been with it, to fill promotions in the civil service?

I suggest, sir, that when you look, for example, at The Department of Travel and Publicity and the recent furor that was raised there, it certainly raises the question that perhaps not enough credit is given to experience on the job and that what is being looked for is academic background. With respect to that, I again come down to a particular to make a point. I think of one man I referred to the civil service commission about three weeks ago, in connection with applying for a job. This man had told me he had difficulty in writing examinations. He was very nervous when it came to writing examinations and he applied twice. One time he had frozen and just could not give an adequate representation of his ability in an examination. He could have another chance, the civil service commission said. He has had two chances and that is it. Now there may be other reasons with respect to this applicant and those particular circumstances.

I would suggest, sir, that—in fact, sometimes it must frighten you, as it does me, all this great conformity of approach, all these tests and evaluations taking place. I realize that on the one hand we do not want to have such flexibility that we go back to a situation that even Edmund Burke had fought against; and that is when it is so wide open that if you were so tempted, patronage could move in with respect to appointments in the civil service.

It has been a hard fight to assure that their qualifications are the reasons for their entrance into the civil service. And yet, in going to another extreme on this, where tests and evaluations are emphasized, I sometimes think that the hon. leader of my party (Mr. Oliver), or the hon. Minister, or I could include Winston Churchill in such company, and the difficulty he had with exams. There are other things than examinations which denote the ability of a man. I think that when we look at the whole merit system, look at this whole evaluation, we must recognize that there are some things that cannot be evaluated. Character and energy, and so on, do not come out in a paper. I raise this really as a point of warning that we do not go overboard on the other side with respect to evaluations and examinations.

I would like to come, sir, to the point I suppose I mentioned before, that Edmund Burke had fought against. Certainly, throughout the ages this has been fought against. That is the thing, which in my opinion, corrupts the civil service, and the good name of the civil service, and that is when the foul hand of patronage does come in. In connection with the recruitment, or the advancement, of people in the service, and I would suggest that there are still indications that this does take place.

With all respect to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Comme)—I think I am correct—he stood up and told us a couple of days ago that he had helped to arrange the appointment of a driver inspector—I think it was the hon. member for Lanark—and he felt, and I appreciate this, that he had made a very good choice. It seems to me to be a very noble choice: a man who had some physical handicap, but was able and capable. But the question that surely would rile an hon. Minister in charge of the civil service, is why on earth are appointments being made by an hon. member of Parliament? Why on earth is an hon. member of Parliament standing up and saying: "I selected this man."?

He said that he made the appointment. The question was raised, and he said: "I did this." I would suggest that there is no question when an hon. member himself will stand up, and I have seen other sides of this. To me, this is a sign of corrosion that is taking place which will defeat the very purpose the hon. Minister is trying to achieve when the hon. Minister speaks of the nobility of a civil servant.

While I am on it, I will talk of the liquor control board and many others. They say, I do not know why it is, but there is something that comes to people who go down to apply for jobs, who want to work in the liquor control board or want to work cleaning here in the Parliament buildings. Somewhere some little whisper comes that it is a good idea to go and see your member of Parliament and get a letter from him.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): That is nonsense.

Mr. Thompson: Perhaps it is nonsense, but let me say this—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You know it is perfectly true.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The letters that you wrote are the same kind of letters that I have written.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Well, why do they have to be written?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They do not have to—

Mr. Bryden: Because the people will not even be considered unless they have a letter. What else can you do?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I just want to emphasize that we should have an unbiased approach. The people who judge the qualification of a man or woman applying for the civil service should not be the members of Parliament, or the eloquence of their letters, but the civil service commission itself. And I would even feel—and I know of this in the federal civil service—in situations where the civil service commission have looked on the fact that a letter written by a politician advocating the appointment of a man as a basis for feeling that the applicant does not understand the principle of a civil service. That is that the man should be beyond political patronage.

This is something that I hope the hon. Minister will speak on, and I hope he will do something about. I have other questions, such as the question of the fact that apparently a man who has a capable wife who wants to work, yet both the man and his wife, as I understand, are not able to work.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. Thompson: I am wrong. I am very glad that that has been changed, because I would think when we think of the quality of men and women, there should be this opportunity.

I apologize in one sense that I have been rambling a little. I am sure that my hon. colleagues will be more incisive in connection with the question. I hope, also, that I may have the opportunity to ask further questions as we go into each individual estimate.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, in making some introductory comments on this estimate, I want to start with two general points.

The first one is that, in some ways, this is the most important estimate that comes before this House. As the hon. Provincial Treasurer has indicated, the government of Ontario is the largest employer in this province, some 40,000 employees. We, in a sense, are the board of directors, or management, that employs these 40,000. In the last analysis we are responsible for the conditions under which they have to work. And therefore I think there is a very personal responsibility on hon. members of the Legislature when they review estimates of the civil servants, because they, in effect, are passing their judgment, placing their stamp of approval on those who have acted as trustees for those people who work for the people of this province, namely, our civil servants.

The second point is that for the last two or three years—I will be very frank with the hon. Provincial Treasurer—I have had the feeling that we were making some progress in the civil service in the province of Ontario. My criticisms were, to a degree, muted; because when you begin to break new ground I think it is only fair that those of us, who have to watch what is being done and make observations, should perhaps withhold any criticisms until we get a clear picture of exactly what is happening in the new chapter that has been launched.

But I want to say to the hon. Provincial Treasurer this morning that the longer I have watched, particularly in recent months, what is happening in our civil service commission, the more I have been puzzled as to what in heaven's name is going on. The hon. Minister rose this morning, as he has risen so many times, and was spreading this feeling of optimism and progress—or rather that was last night. Even at the end of a heavy day he was still spreading his optimism and progress. Just to try to get the picture a little bit back into perspective, let me quote from the September issue of the Toronto branch news of the civil service association. A page 1 article reads as follows:

Mr. D. J. Collins, chairman of the Ontario Civil Service Commission, is reported in the Globe and Mail of September 7, 1963, as having advised the annual meeting of the Institute of Public Administration that public service jobs were unalluring and that Ontario public service often attracts the unsuccessful or the insecure rather than the vigorous and the confident. Mr. Collins went on to say that some government agencies promoted insiders most of the time and looked like private clubs to qualified job applicants from outside.

I will just pause there and let the hon. Minister absorb that.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Would the hon. member like me to tell him the truth?

Mr. MacDonald: No, the hon. Minister has had an opportunity to tell the truth.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I will tell the hon. member the truth.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister has told us what he thought was the truth. Now I am going to present the opposite side of the story and give the hon. Minister an opportunity—and the hon. Minister should not get so exercised because it is early in the day.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am not exercised at all. But I have always felt that the hon. member likes to know the truth.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. We listened for 20 minutes, or half an hour, to the hon. Minister's version of the truth and now we are going to give him the other side of the coin. He can, if possible, correct it a little later.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It makes me feel badly to have the hon. member misinformed.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me proceed—the hon. Minister is obviously exercised.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I am not.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me proceed with reading this article:

Now we do not disagree with these remarks, as they are in some respects soundly based. We wonder, however, why more stress was not placed on the corrective measures that have been instituted to help combat these conditions.

Firstly, there is job advertising, which is still not very satisfactory because it is a hit-and-miss proposition, with each department setting its own standards of selection and even selecting those jobs which will or will not be advertised. There is, in addition, a firmly held opinion by a great many civil servants that job advertising is a farcical procedure when conducted by a department, as in most cases the departments have already picked someone for the job.

Secondly, we have revamped a recruiting section of The Department of Civil Service and, if we are failing to attract intelligent qualified outsiders, there must be something wrong with the recruitment section.

Thirdly, we have adopted, in part, modern management practices partly gleaned from public administrative bodies and partly from business, and this has largely resulted in the propagation of a red tape machine unmatched in the history of the province, with no apparent benefit to either the employees or the taxpayers.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this is the official publication of the largest section of the Ontario civil service, and they start out by quoting from the chairman of the civil service commission, and I do not think the hon. Minister can dismiss this is out of hand.

For example, if one takes just one aspect of what they are touching on here, namely, the question of advertising. Last year when the hon. Minister was presenting his estimates, on page 1506 of Hansard, this is what he said:

One of the most important developments in the last year, which will carry through into the next fiscal year, is the advertising of vacancies. This occurs both at the recruitment and promotional levels so that any qualified person can apply and be considered.

I want to suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this is simply not the case.

The neat summation of the situation, which I got in talking to one person in the civil service association who is in a position to know, was that it was "quite spotty." But here you have the chairman of the civil service commission himself, as in the article I have just referred to, saying that some government agencies promoted insiders most of the time, and it looked like private clubs to qualified job applicants from the outside. Then there is the subsequent comment by the civil servants themselves, that there is job advertising which is not very satisfactory because it is a hit-and-miss proposition, with each department setting its own standards of selection and even selecting those jobs which will or will not be advertised.

In face of this evidence from people who know, because they are the head of the civil service commission and civil servants who are living in face of these conditions and in contact with these conditions all the time, I think it is idle for the hon. Minister to interject and say, "Do you want me to tell the truth?" This is close enough to the truth that it cannot be dismissed.

Hon. Mr. Allan: It is not anywhere near the truth.

Mr. MacDonald: In fact, during this past year, there has been a growing belief among civil servants that sometimes the proposition of advertising for employees is a device used just to suit the purposes of the department. The classic example emerged during the past year, when The Department of Travel and Publicity in its wisdom, as a result of a survey I understand, decided they were going to revamp their structure. So, the first thing they knew, the three or four top branch heads were fired and were told they would have an opportunity to apply again for these top positions.

As the Toronto Globe and Mail pointed out editorially, it was rather a strange way to be improving the situation and making economies, as has been alleged; because it was also said, in trying to cope with the public reaction to these tactics, that people would not be given jobs at a lower rate of pay. Here was a device to get rid of those they had now and get others they wanted. Those who were fired could apply for the new jobs if they wanted; some got back and some did not.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It was not economy; it was just trying to bring order out of chaos.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I think there were almost as many interpretations of what was going on in that department as people making them. But let us go back to the basics of this.

Last year, Mr. Chairman, I discussed at considerable length, in the introduction to the estimates and the querying of the hon. Minister, the Stevenson and Kellogg report. The origins of the Stevenson and Kellogg report are worth reminding the House about. During the years 1955 to 1960, when I first came into this Legislature, I was extremely impressed with the fact that every issue of The Trillium came out with the most blistering kind of observations on the prevalence of patronage in our civil service—the extent to which it contributed to the inefficiency of the civil service, and the extent to which the taxpayer was paying a bigger bill because of this widespread patronage. There were articles, there were letters, there were editorials, and the general reaction, of course of people on the government side. This is also the kind of thing you hear from the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) when he says that anything that is done by the government is done less efficiently than if it is done by private business, which of course is utter rot. But the general reaction was this kind of criticism. So the civil servants said, "Fine. If we cannot get the government—

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member for Bruce did not say anything like that.

Mr. MacDonald: You read his Budget speech.

Mr. Thompson: I have read it.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine, I will read it and mark it for you then.

Mr. Singer: Co-operative effort. Co-operative federalism.

Mr. MacDonald: The civil servants decided they would do something about it themselves—an almost preposterous kind of situation, in which the employees decided that since management would not move to survey the situation to discover what inefficiencies there were in the service that they, the employees, would do the job themselves. So through the Civil Service Association of Ontario, they hired, or they took the steps to do a pilot project in one of the departments. It was at this point that the government felt that it could not sustain the embarrassment any longer and moved with the appointment of the Stevenson and Kellogg group. It was announced to the House by the hon. James N. Allan as reported in the 1961 report of the civil service commission. It was announced in the spring of 1960 and as a note in this report indicates, and I am quoting:

The firm was authorized to commence a complete job evaluation plan for the whole service in two stages. The first stage, which was to be completed in approximately one year, was to cover all office institutional positions in the service—approximately one half of the total number of positions. A team of consultants planned and organized the project. Invitations were extended to all deputy Ministers to supply on loan to the project competent persons who would be trained as job analysts and raters. Approximately 35 civil servants participated in this phase of the programme which was well under way by the close of the fiscal year.

This was in the fiscal year of 1961. If you read the debates for last year—and perhaps I can just recap them briefly—we discovered that the government had called the whole project to a close. They had got a report from Stevenson and Kellogg on phase one only. I discovered, after rather detailed questioning of the hon. Minister, that the Stevenson and Kellogg report itself had cost between $400,000 and $500,000. As has just been indicated in the 1961 report of the civil service commission that I quoted, in addition to this, employees in the civil service commission were seconded to work with them and this represented something approaching another $250,000 expenditure. So that the total expenditure on the Stevenson and Kellogg report was in the range of $750,000. I drew to the hon. Provincial Treasurer's attention that according to my information from most reliable sources, they could have got for much, much less, the kind of survey they were seeking from the Public Administration Services of Chicago, which has done comparable kinds of surveys in some of the western Canadian provinces.

However, my chief reason for complaint, Mr. Chairman, is this, that the government came to the conclusion that it was not getting value for the money that it was spending, and certainly it appeared to be spending a great deal of money—$750,000. So it called it to a halt and presumably was going to continue by the survey through in-service operations to complete phase one, and then presumably it was going to proceed to phase two as originally envisaged.

My question to the hon. Provincial Treasurer this morning is how close are we one year later to even completing phase one? How many classifications are there yet to come? How many people have been red-circled? Last year when we were discussing this, the hon. Provincial Treasurer intervened and, with that normally optimistic way of his, he said that:

One of the great results of the present personnel administration practices is to improve the morale of the entire civil service. I believe I can say without fear of contradiction that it is at the highest point today that it has even been.

Now, that is to be found on page 1509 of Hansard.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, this simply is not the case. You can go around this building and talk to any civil servant. You can go to the cafeteria and talk to civil servants and you will find that the suggestion that they are at the highest peak of morale that the civil service has ever been, simply is not the case. Indeed, just let me document it again. This is the January issue of the Toronto branch news of the Civil Service Association of Ontario, an editorial to be found on page two. I will just quote three brief paragraphs from it:

Under the reclassification survey more than 450 civil servants in the clerical series were red-circled. The extent of the down-grading dismayed senior civil servants and dealt a vicious blow to morale. No such extensive adjustment had been expected.

Probably the worst feature of the reclassification is that it hit the long-service male employees over 50 years of age harder than any other group. This group encompasses the most faithful, dedicated people in the Ontario public service. Also some departments were hit much harder than others.

In all this the fault does not lie with the CSAO. The objection taken is not to the rates established but to the application of the classification to incumbents. The trend is definitely downward. Promotions were scarce. The result is grievance by the courageous, and sullen resentment by the silent. Many red-circled personnel feel that the classifications awarded are not correct.

Here is a responsible official publication, once again of the largest branch of the civil service in the province of Ontario, namely, in the Metro area here.

But in my introductory remarks, for example, I commented on being puzzled as to what in heaven's name is happening in the whole department, the civil service department. Let me just document that. Last year in the introduction to his estimates, the hon. Provincial Treasurer had on page 1509, a rather enthusiastic announcement of a new development. I quote:

I mentioned earlier in my remarks that I would say something about programmes and standards. This is a study of programmes and standards that was going to follow the Stevenson and Kellogg report and phases one and two. This is a new branch to be constituted in the coming year. The basic work of this branch is to develop standards and procedures whereby personnel administration will be improved in the coming years. This branch will engage in personnel research, studying the effective use of manpower to improve both conditions of employment and utilization of our labour resources with the result that we will improve civil service management and meet the demands and challenges of the future.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, but I will not bother. Obviously, the hon. Minister last year felt that he was moving into a new and important chapter in the development of better personnel management.

When we had to deal with our estimates last year, the final estimate in the civil service estimates was, "Estimate 308, Programmes and Standards," $19,000 to get the matter launched. Now we turn to the estimates this year, Mr. Chairman, and it is found that there is no "Programmes and Standards." It has disappeared. The department has not been developed. It has been dropped apparently. I ask the question again, what is happening?

We were moving, as I stated in my introductory remarks, we seemed to be moving a year or two ago. We seemed to be moving toward some new stage of modern management approach to the personnel problems in the province of Ontario. Now we seem to have bogged down. We have not completed phase 1.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, we have not.

Mr. MacDonald: Well you say this, but the civil servants say otherwise. As a matter of fact, I have talked with officials of the civil service association so I know that I am not misrepresenting the situation. I talked with them recently enough to know that I would be up to date when these estimates were called.

Let me finally, in these introductory remarks, turn to the phase of the question that the hon. member for Dovercourt dealt with, Mr. Chairman. This is the whole operation of the joint council and the collective bargaining rights which, the hon. Minister indicated, would be part of the function of the joint council.

I can remember, some five or six years ago, an occasion when I was making a plea in this House, when the civil servants were so exercised that they were even considering that most horrible of prospects, affiliation with the trade union movement of this country. When I raised the issue in the House and said that it was the kind of attitude manifested by the government, in refusing to give collective bargaining rights, which was going to drive them to this conclusion, the Prime Minister of the day intervened and said, "They are the union; we bargain with them."

Strangely enough the provincial council of the civil service association was meeting at that very time; and within 24 hours, there was a press release to the effect that, "Well, if we are the union, we would appreciate being bargained with; because, as of yesterday, there was unilaterally handed down a decision and we were presented with a fait accompli, and told that if we wanted any changes we could get it in the next round of considerations, a year or two hence." As my friend the hon. member for Dovercourt has pointed out, this kind of thing is still going on. The joint council is a body which sits down to consider issues but, right in the middle of the consideration of the issues, such as the issue of hours of work, there will be an order-in-council unilaterally presenting them with a decision. At least this is what they tell me.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister: What has the joint council done by way—what points have been negotiated? And have they ever come to a decision before the government unilaterally moved in and presented them with a fait accompli? I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that there is a growing belief, which I think is valid, that the joint council is only a façade which does not provide even the rudimentary elements of collective bargaining. There is no reality of collective bargaining.

Does this government have such serious reservations that it will not concede them genuine collective bargaining rights, just as it will not concede them to municipal employees as long as it retains section 89?

I have raised a number of points and some expressions of unhappiness. My criticism is not quite as muted as it was in the last two or three years, because I think it is time we began to examine this. I will appreciate the hon. Minister's comments on some of this and we can get down into details on the later estimates.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in replying to some of the comments which have been made by hon. members opposite, I would like to inform the hon. member for Dovercourt that I appreciate his comments. I appreciate his kindly feeling toward the welfare of everyone. Perhaps, as I look back upon my life and wonder how I could have been more fortunate, I would have to say that I am very sorry that I cannot claim to have any Irish blood in my veins. The hon. member is more fortunate in that respect. That race is noted for their kindness and sometimes for their misunderstanding of things.

I am quite sure that, in those instances where the hon. member has criticized unjustly, it was misunderstanding because I do not believe that he would do it intentionally.

One of the first items that the hon. member mentioned was the joint council. I may say, and I can include these remarks for the ears of the hon. member for York South, that the joint council has been set up as a sincere effort on the part of the government and the civil service association to provide a means of negotiation between management and the employees.

This joint council has authority which is almost unknown in the treatment by a government, and in the dealing by a government, with their civil service. In other jurisdictions there are very few where such efforts are made at proper and reasonable negotiations. The hon. member mentioned orders-in-council, and I am sure that was a misunderstanding because the decisions of the joint council, if they are agreed upon, are acted upon by the government—and all that have been agreed upon have been acted upon. If there is not agreement, the matter goes to a board of arbitration.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate your remarks about me. So that I can get clarification on this, I cited three examples. I cited an example with respect to the female worker who was getting a leave of absence. Now, as I understand, on the agenda of the joint council, this was being considered, and that—

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member is misinformed. It has not been considered by the joint council. The regulation which was published was a regulation formulated by the civil service commission and, in reality, improved the position of the person who found it necessary to have maternity leave.

Mr. MacDonald: Why would he not discuss it with the joint council?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, after all, who decides what the joint council will discuss? The members of the joint council, the representatives of the employees, the representatives of management. The joint council is as independent as the sun as far as I am concerned, or as far as the commission is concerned.

Mr. Thompson: Surely, sir, this would come up before a grievance committee? I understand this situation must have been very pertinent to many of the civil servants. I would think that you would bring it up before the joint council. There you have gone through a grievance committee on this.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The regulation and the case that came before the grievance committee is quite separate and distinct. There is no relation between those. When the matter came before the grievance committee, and I am speaking from memory and my recollection could be wrong, but as I remember, the grievor was successful in the grievance. The grievor was successful, and one of the observations that was made—I suspect perhaps it was by the chairman of the board, I could not state definitely—was that the regulation had to set out the manner in which these maternity leaves should be managed. As a result of that, the civil service commission did make a regulation which covered maternity leave. As far as I know this has been well received by the employees and we feel that it provides for understanding of government policy.

There was mention made of grievances. The hon. member, in speaking about them, created doubt in mind as to where he stood so far as grievances were concerned. I thought at one time that he was opposed to grievance procedures, that he did not think there should be a grievance procedure—

Mr. Thompson: Well, I will just clarify that right now, sir. I certainly feel very strongly there should be a grievance procedure. The point I was making was—several things. One is that if you do not recognize people with grievances—I thought I got really philosophical about it, about Bertrand Russell's remarks in an essay he wrote about the fact that in relation to morals and everything, it has been people out of tune with society who have made contributions. I went into this.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I am glad to understand the hon. member's feeling in that connection. I remember the hon. member stating that this was an ordeal, that it was an ordeal for the employee. I think I remember him saying that it was an ordeal for the employee to have to go through this grievance procedure, that there must be some other way of doing it.

Mr. Thompson: No, I am sorry, sir. The point I made was this, and I still suggest this: It seems to me that if you look at the odds on grievances, of 60 people last year from what the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) told us, who came before the grievance committee, 15 of them won their cases. And in order that we will know it is not an ordeal, I would like to know how those 15 are doing now and whether they stayed with the department. My suggestion is this: That it takes courage at times to make a grievance if you are going to go back to the same shop, and so on.

My other point was that it seems to me there is delay with respect to this grievance. It has so many steps in it, and I would suggest that you eliminate one of the steps.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, we gave that a great deal of consideration. It is for the good of everyone, I think, that the procedure is considered to be satisfactory. The hon. member asked about what happened to those persons who grieved. They are all 15 still with the department.

The first person has been promoted. As for the second person, the grievance has been corrected and he is still with the department. That is true of the third person as well, as it is with the fourth person. The fifth person is still with the department, and has been promoted. The sixth person is still with the department, as is the seventh and eighth. The ninth has maternity leave and is at present not working. In the case of the tenth one, the recommendation of the grievance board was carried out and the person is still working. The eleventh one is reinstated and still working. The twelfth has had the grievance corrected and is working, as is the case with the thirteenth and fourteenth. The fifteenth person has been reinstated and is still working.

I think the hon. member will be pleased to know that we are earnestly endeavouring to make this grievance procedure work. We urge, and have from the very beginning urged, the supervisory staff of the departments to lean backwards to be fair to these persons who grieve. The results indicate it.

Mr. Thompson: These are the successful ones and I am very happy to hear that. I am thinking of the 45 who were not successful.

Hon. Mr. Allan: As we feel that the judgment of the board was correct when we lost, I think the other persons have to feel that the judgment of the board was correct when they lost. The board could not be right only when they found in favour of the grievor. I do not think we would want to conclude that.

Mr. Thompson: The point I am making, sir, is that when you make an appeal and you are successful in your appeal, well then it seems we say "God bless you and good luck to you." But the other fact when you have made an appeal and you are not successful, are you penalized? I do not actually—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, of course, what happened to the 45—

Mr. Thompson: I know. But surely I can make a grievance or an appeal and for the rest of my life I am not going to bear the scars of having shown the initiative and the courage to make the appeal. That is the point I make.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I can inform the hon. member that even in some of the instances where the appeal, or where management was upheld, to make it clear, the grievor may have been dismissed. Whatever the result was, of course, many of those who grieved are still in the employ of the government. These are the ones who won—

Mr. Thompson: How many actually? Could we get that?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I do not have it now. I think we could get it for the hon. member. I do not know how many of those are still with the government. Some of the grievances were as the result of dismissal. I would want to say this about the civil service commission—I have said this on many occasions and I give them a great deal of credit for their stand in supporting efficiency in the civil service—that although they act for these persons who grieve, the civil service commission is entirely in favour of efficiency in the civil service. Of course, many of these grievances were as the result of an effort on the part of management to get that efficiency.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the matter of casuals was mentioned. I have a few figures I would like to give the hon. members of the House. A great deal of progress has been made in the bringing of casuals into the public service. In 1960 some 1,731 casuals became public servants. In 1961 there were 1,604; in 1962 there were 1,262 and in 1963 there were 2,341. So there has been a great deal of progress made in that connection.

Mention was made of the employees of the Niagara Parks Commission and of the fact that they are not civil servants. There are two views, I may say, with respect to some of the boards and commissions. Two views on the part of employees, as well as management. There are those who feel that the regulations that affect civil servants, or public servants as they are now called, are too strict, that promotion is regulated too much. There are those boards and commissions, and employees of them, who prefer to remain outside the civil service because—

Mr. Thompson: We know that. This was asked last year. How do you know that the employees of these administrative groups want to remain outside?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, of course, at the present time I am not dealing with the estimates of the Niagara Parks Commission. I do not have any information that I could pass on to you, I am afraid, that would be very helpful. It would only be an opinion. But as far as the civil service commission is concerned, we welcome the employees of any of these boards to become public servants under the jurisdiction of the civil service. Now the matter of recruitment—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order!

I would ask the member to allow the Minister to complete his reply.

Hon. Mr. Allan: If it is a short question, I do not mind.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I am just wondering, for example, about the liquor board commission. Is the principle the same?

Hon. Mr. Allan: The same is true of the liquor control board. I would suggest that the place that the actions of the liquor control board should have been discussed was at the committee on commissions. Here again, I have nothing to do with the management of the liquor control board.

Mr. Singer: But you have a fair bit to say about the running of this government board.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, well, that is not a part of government. That is the liquor control board, an independent board.

Mr. Singer: That is a very true statement.

Mr. Bryden: That is the law for the Tory party.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I have not seen any of it.

Mr. Singer: A law in itself.

Hon. Mr. Allan: To come back to the mention of recruitment and our policy with regard to recruitment. Here again you find a difference of opinion and I thought I again recognized one of the characteristics of the Irish that I admire so much—

Mr. Thompson: I am very suspicious of you, sir.

Hon. Mr. Allan: —because in one statement the hon. member was holding up as an example the federal government and its means of recruitment which is based entirely upon examinations—written examinations—and on the other hand, he was suggesting that we should not pay too much attention to examinations, that there are some people who freeze when they go to write examinations.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, whether it is my brogue or something, I do not seem to have the ability to get across my point here.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I thought you said that.

Mr. Thompson: Could I clarify it for you? First of all, when I referred to the federal government I referred to the fact that was mentioned by the hon. member for York South also, that it seemed to me the federal government was much more aggressive in publishing job opportunities in post offices and so on. That was the point I was making about the federal government.

With respect to exams, I just raised this point that you can go overboard sometimes and get a rigidity. I appreciate our pendulum swings and that if you did not have any kind of exams that I am sure you would not have this rigidity but there would be some who might take advantage of the fact there were no exams and would have political appointments put in, so we have to have some form of exams. On the other hand, I think that when you have exams you must also recognize the exam does not indicate the man's character or his geniality or his method of perhaps misunderstanding or understanding when a question is placed before him—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I think what we are doing is exactly what the hon. member would like us to do.

Mr. Bryden: It is rarely true.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am sure that is true, we do try. The examinations are quite simple, as a matter of fact. They are taken by persons, and the civil service commission then qualifies them if it feels that it is proper they should be qualified. It is from that group of qualified applicants that the department selects the person or persons it wishes to employ.

If you will remember, this is practically the identical procedure that was recommended in the Glassco report and it has this advantage, which I think is worthwhile considering and that is that the department has something to say about the persons it engages. There is a weakness in the other plan, where the person is engaged and sent to a department and if that person does not appeal to those with whom he works or his supervisor, he or she may have a difficult experience. We agree entirely with the desirability of the training programme. We are doing our best to expand this. We are thoroughly convinced that the way to get a good public service is to do a great deal of training and develop our staff within the service.

I might just remind the House and the hon. member, particularly, that the civil service commission, again, is an independent commission. I think the hon. members all realize that I have nothing to say about the actions or the decisions of the civil service commission as far as recruiting is concerned. If it is a question of staff, or how many they have, or something like that, I endeavour to go to the Treasury board and get the staff for them. But the commission is an independent commission and you would want it to be an independent commission.

There is a tendency, I think, for those who are not in the government to feel that everyone in the government is a politician, and all the members who are not in the government are not politicians, but that is not entirely correct. But just for fear that the members of government might be politicians—

Mr. Thompson: I think you have some Irish in you, the way you are double talking.

Hon. Mr. Allan: —you would not want the decision as far as the recruitment is concerned to be entirely in the hands of the civil service commission and it is. I will go into the matter of recruitment and advertising when I reply to the remarks of the hon. member for York South.

I think that deals with the questions I have a note of here. I hope I have got—

Mr. Thompson: I am glad you are satisfied.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are, too.

Mr. Thompson: I am sure you are.

Hon. Mr. Allan: The hon. member for York South—here again, I have always given him credit for wanting to present facts to the House. I tried to save him the embarrassment of making statements which were not factual, but he would not let me, so I think for the benefit of the House, I should read the letter that was written by Don Collins and what the Toronto branch of the civil service people have to say about it. I would remind the hon. members of the House that the official organ of the civil service association is The Trillium and not the Toronto branch news.

I have a copy of the address that Don Collins made and I am going to send it over to the hon. member. Following the appearance in the Toronto branch news which was read to the House by the hon. member for York South, Mr. Collins wrote this letter to the editor of the Toronto branch news:

DEAR MR. PRATT:

In some of the recent issues of the Toronto branch news there have been certain erroneous and sweeping statements made in regard to the reclassification programme.

In the last issue, the Toronto branch news commented on an address I had made to the Institute of Public Administration without ever requesting or receiving a copy of this address. In the article headed "The Unalluring Public Service" and in the editorial, the criticisms were based upon incorrect reporting concerning an address which summed up the public service problems of the various jurisdictions in Canada.

As you will note in my address, a copy of which is attached, the progress made in Ontario was stressed. I should have considered it at least courteous before attacking a statement to check on its accuracy. You will find on page 6 and 11 of this statement the actual contents of my remarks which makes the editorial criticisms ridiculous.

(Signed)

D. J. COLLINS.

These are the extracts from the address. Page 11:

In regard to the question of whether or not we are on the track, I feel that we have hedged the public servant with so many restrictions and protections that we have created a sacred-cow attitude that is not attractive to persons of initiative, vigour and of independent mind.

The public servant tends to cast this new employee into a mould and restrict his activities and undertakings unnecessarily. Unfortunately the advice of the counsellors of schools and universities is not favourable to government employment because of the image that has been created.

Do we get our share of the best people? I believe that, with the conditions of employment we offer, we should get more of the top graduates from universities than we now attract. Our salaries are fairly competitive and the physical working conditions are attractive. The public concept of government employment, however, robs our recruitment literature of some of its effectiveness. We often attract the unsuccessful or the insecure rather than the vigorous and the confident.

In the early days, civil servants commissions were constituted to end the condemned practice of patronage appointments as a reward for those who had worked for the party. Although many good men were appointed in this way it was only a matter of good fortune, since appointment to a government position as a reward for political support is not necessarily associated with competence as a government administrator. In fact, the method of recruitment meant that the person so selected was beholden to those who appointed him as a favour and, in turn, he looked outside the organization for support and assistance whenever any difficulty developed.

The financial returns of those working for the government suffered as a consequence. The public could not be concerned about something which was in the nature of a private club. To return to the central personnel agency, if the deputy Minister or the department is to have the authority for selection, the central personnel agency at the same time can then become more insistent in urging that senior vacancies can be filled by internal competition, either within the department or within the civil service. If the position is a professional or technical one, the competition may include outside applications as well.

And I will deal with that just a little bit later. This is a note from the editor:

It is hoped that the foregoing will clarify the situation regarding Mr. Collins' address, which was unfortunately inaccurately reported by the press, and circulated far and wide. This should, we trust, close the incident to everyone's satisfaction.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister will permit me to interject, I think the Toronto Globe and Mail was so far below its normal standards of reporting that I would concede the point that the hon. Minister has made.

Hon. Mr. Allan: This was not the Toronto Globe and Mail.

Mr. MacDonald: It was a Toronto Globe and Mail report, because the Toronto branch starts out: "D. J. Collins, chairman of the Ontario Civil Service Commission is reported in the Globe and Mail of September 7, 1963"—and then they go ahead to make the quotations. And they are grossly and inaccurately out of context, as the hon. Minister has indicated.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, as it says there, the incident is closed to the satisfaction of everybody.

The hon. member for York South mentioned the manner in which positions are filled within the civil service. He referred to advertising, and he referred to what appeared to be a spotty—I do not think he said “misunderstood” but—

Mr. MacDonald: Spotty application of the principles.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Spotty application of the principles.

I would say quite frankly to the hon. member that I can understand anyone forming that conclusion, but I think, if the facts are known, that he would probably agree with the practice that is followed. It is this: If a position—and this has to do particularly with most or very few of the junior positions that are advertised, because Mr. Collins says we had 20,000 interviews—I do not know how many applications—but most junior positions are filled from those applications.

But within the department, where there is a promotion, if the promotion can be made within the department there is no advertising. If it is felt that there is no one within the department who is capable of filling the position, the position is advertised throughout the civil service and only those persons who are in the civil service have the opportunity of making application for the position. If it is still considered that a suitable person was not found for the position, it is then advertised in the public press. So you could easily feel that this was spotty, but it is a regulated and organized plan and I think one that is considered—certainly the civil service association was consulted on this, and is entirely in agreement with it.

Mr. MacDonald: It is?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes, the civil service association is.

Mr. MacDonald: It is very disruptive!

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, that is not what they tell us. The hon. member mentioned particularly—I am thinking of the overall association—an incident which happened in Travel and Publicity. Let me say, first of all, that no one was fired; no one at all. The positions for which applicants were sought were entirely new positions. There was a reorganization within the department and, as I understand it, the positions were new.

First of all, those within the civil service were asked to apply for the positions and they did. I do not know how many were filled, or how many were not, but if they were not—and even then the public advertisement was placed and, just so there can be an understanding, it has not been unusual for some of those persons who were considered in the first place to finally win the competition which was conducted as a result of the advertisement in the public press. But it is a distinct effort, and a sincere one, to obtain the best person for the position. I think that hon. members of this House would support anyone in that.

With respect to the reclassification, I can inform the hon. member that this has now been completed. Eighty-seven per cent of those affected received increases in salary, and six per cent were “red-circled”. Here again I find it difficult to do those things which will be considered satisfactory by other persons in every particular. Because I think I could—from the remarks made this morning, the comments of the hon. members with respect to these estimates—assume that there was a feeling that, years ago, persons were appointed as a result of political friendship.

Mr. Thompson: Not years ago. Years ago—and today.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I am not going into the particular years—which I think we could have quite a bit of discussion about. You see, if this is so, if what you say is correct, and there have been times in the past when persons were appointed for reasons other than their ability, those person might still be in the department. Very likely; and so, if this has been so, and you are interested only in obtaining the best persons for the positions and rewarding them adequately, you should not object to some of the persons being “red-circled”, whose ability did not indicate they could be promoted.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister, in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark, in which he claimed he made the appointment—you know, what you were talking about years ago—he made that two days ago. Could the hon. Minister explain that to us?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I think everyone knows that the hon. member for Lanark—he is not here but I think he would not mind me saying this—cannot make an appointment in The Department of Transport any more than I can make an appointment in the civil service commission.

Mr. Singer: But he is an hon. member, and he said he did it.

Mr. Bryden: He said what he meant. That is the point.

Hon. Mr. Allan: You know, I am in the same class as the hon. member for Dovercourt. If someone wants to make an application for a position in the civil service, and they do not know how to do it, I will tell them how to get an application form and send it to them and send their application in. I do not feel that because I happen to be the member for that area, that I should not help someone to make an application.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister permit an interjection here? I do exactly the same thing, and I concede it. But the real operation of the department is revealed in an exchange I had, I believe it was with the present hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) when he was the Minister of Highways.

I got a letter one day asking me if I would give my recommendation in regard to an appointment to a permanent position. In other words, the person concerned had served his probationary period. My reply was: Why should I be asked whether or not this person should be appointed or not to permanent staff? I have not been supervising this person's work for the last six months, or a year, even if I had originally recommended his appointment to the temporary staff.

This is the kind of thing that goes on at all levels. You go back and seek the view of the sitting member, and in the instances in which it rather rarely comes to us, it is in the hope that we will play ball with you so that we can then be silenced from that point forward. Clearly, to come back and ask a local member whether or not he would recommend appointment to the permanent staff, when he has had no opportunity to observe the work of the person, is out of character with the kind of system the hon. Minister claims he is implementing.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I am attempting to deal with the estimates of the civil service commission. As far as I know the recommendations come from the departments as to who should be placed in the public service. Where else could they come from?

Mr. MacDonald: But why the local member?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, as I tell you, I know nothing about this.

Mr. Bryden: You should track that system down.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I would doubt that this applies. I would doubt it very greatly.

Mr. MacDonald: Doubting it does not change the fact that it does exist.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, I—

Mr. MacDonald: I know, you are shocked. You are absolutely shocked.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, I am not shocked. I am not easily shocked. I do not think these things exist. I do not think I have been able to convince the hon. members opposite that—

Mr. Bryden: No, because we—

Hon. Mr. Allan: I want to say something to the hon. members opposite. The staff of the civil service commission, and certainly myself as its Minister, are doing everything that we can do to improve the public service of this province. The basis of what we are doing is to develop an administration that is good, that will be efficient and those are exactly—the means by which we are attempting to do it may not all be correct. Perhaps there is a better way in some instances, but whether there is or not the means we are adopting we feel are sound. When we feel they are not sound, then we will change them.

One other thing, and that had to do with the programmes and standards. This operation has been moved to the vote of the main office. It is still there and still in operation, but it comes under the main office rather than as a separate item.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the branch developing?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It is the same size as it was before, and is continuing.

Mr. MacDonald: How many people are in it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: There were only two people who were doing it, rather than have that as a separate vote it was brought into the main office.

Mr. MacDonald: I would say that it is languishing on the vine, not developing.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, last evening in the estimates of another department, I was trying to elicit some information about the racing commission. I did not get too concerned, really, about the hon. Minister's attitude. I knew what lay behind it and it was perhaps all taken in the spirit of some good humour. But today I am quite a bit more puzzled and disturbed about the attitude insofar as the liquor control board is concerned. Now it is all very well for the hon. Minister to say that we can examine—

Mr. Chairman: Order—

Mr. Singer: This is under the general office, vote 301.

Mr. Chairman: Under the civil service?

Mr. Singer: Under the civil service!

It is all very well for the hon. Minister to say that we can examine the operations of the liquor control board before the committee on commissions. But the hon. Minister knows, probably better than any hon. member of this House, that Mr. Sheppard, who is the present commissioner, not only would not, but should not and will not, express his opinion before the committee on commissions on matters of government policy.

Mr. MacDonald: In fact, he begged off three times.

Mr. Bryden: And quite properly.

Mr. Singer: And quite properly so. Before he was appointed, and the hon. Minister from St. Andrew (Mr. Grossman) was there, at least we had an opportunity to try to get some statements out of him on the floor of the House. Occasionally, we did. Not too successfully, but we did. But the present liquor commissioner is not even a member of the House.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. The present liquor commissioner is in the hon. Provincial Secretary's department, not in the hon. Provincial Treasurer's. His estimates are coming up next week so if we are going to discuss liquor, let us wait until we get to the right man, the hon. Provincial Secretary.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest respect, would the hon. member for High Park just wait for a couple of minutes. He will see that I am referring to the civil service. I am not talking about liquor policy at all. What I am objecting to, Mr. Chairman, and I think this is an important matter of principle, is that if we want to suggest, as my colleague, the hon. member for Dovercourt did, or even ask the question as to whether or not the civil service and the liquor commission should be a part of the civil service of Ontario, and not a part of the government, the government is not concerned about it. I think that is the phrase the hon. Provincial Treasurer used.

I think this is the point in these estimates when we are logically entitled to inquire about it. It is not a sufficient answer for the hon. Minister to say "pass it to the committee on commissions." We cannot ask that kind of question of the committee on commissions, nor can Mr. Sheppard reply to that kind of question. I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, that we get an answer today as to why the government does not bring the civil servants from the liquor commission into the civil service commission and deal with them in the ordinary way. There are a lot of us who are concerned about the methods of appointments of employees to the liquor control board. I think we need an answer on this, and it is not sufficient answer to say it is a separate part of government and we are not concerned about it here in the House.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, we all know—every hon. member of this House knows—that the liquor control board is a government commission, just as the civil service commission is a government commission. I am here today reporting for the civil service commission, not for the liquor control board, which is a commission.

Mr. Bryden: But that covers personnel policy in the government.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Certainly I am, but I am not reporting for the liquor control board, which is a government commission.

Mr. Singer: No, but you are reporting for thousands, or hundreds, or tens of thousands of employees.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Who are civil servants and—

Mr. Singer: And these people are civil servants, except that you keep them in another cubby-hole.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I cannot understand why the theory has been advanced here that this information could not be elicited at the committee on government commissions. The officials were there, and it would be a simple matter to ask them matters of fact and get the answers. If you disagree with what they were doing, then bring it up as a matter of policy in the proper department. But, if I might tell the hon. members, insofar as the employees of that board are concerned and their not being members of the civil service, they do not want to be. They have met on it.

Mr. Thompson: How do you know for sure?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I know because they had meetings on it. They discussed it within their own association. They have their own organization. They took a vote on it and the opinion was they did not want to come in.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): And they changed their mind.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know that they changed their mind. I can tell you honestly that this is exactly the way the majority of them feel.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, following this, does this mean then that when the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary come up as suggested by the hon. member for High Park we can ask questions regarding the employees at that particular time?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Young: Then we have the right at that time to ask questions about the employees, anything we want to know at that time regarding harmony of the two departments we can find out?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if we are still on the first vote, and since the hon. Minister has indicated to me that the programmes and standards branch is now in the main office, I want to come back to this. As I understand the phraseology, "programmes and standards," and indeed as the hon. Minister himself spelled it out—maybe I should just read what he said last year:

This is a new branch to be constituted in the coming year. The basic work of this branch is to develop standards and procedures whereby personnel administration will be improved in the coming years. This branch will engage in personnel research, studying the effective use of manpower to improve both conditions of employment and utilization of our labour sources, with the result that we will improve civil service management and meet the demands and challenges of the future.

That strikes me as being obvious and inevitable and a very necessary programme to flow from the implementation of the Stevenson and Kellogg report. Why would you announce the development of a branch with all that important work to be done, then, leave it to languish on the vine with only two people? Because if it is as big as you spelled it out there, two people are not going to be able to do the work—and have it tucked away in the main office?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I agree that this is important. We consider that it is important. We have not made the progress that we would have liked to have made in the last year. However, we still consider it is important and we intend to develop it and expand it.

Vote 301 agreed to.

Vote 302 agreed to.

On vote 303:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, last year I spoke at some length concerning the posting of vacancies in the civil service, and also the advertising of the positions in the newspapers outside the Toronto area. As a result of that, in the last year I have noticed that the Windsor paper carried quite a few advertisements, concerning vacancies in the civil service. However, walking down the corridors of the buildings here, I spotted 15 different vacancies on a bulletin board. Nowhere in my community or in other communities, I am told, can you find the postings that you find in the buildings here. I think it is time that this government used a central location in each community for the posting of these vacancies.

Last year I suggested the post office. Possibly a better place might be the national employment services offices in a large community, because an individual is coming there for employment. He would see just exactly what the government does offer in the way of employment and he would be able to be selective as to whether he wishes this type of employment or not. So I would strongly suggest that if the national employment services offices cannot be used in a community, then the post office in the community be used for the posting of vacancies in the civil service.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, under vote 303, I wanted to make a few comments with reference to what happens to an applicant who is attempting to get a job with the government and who is sent to a department by the commission. The hon. Minister has made comments that the individual is tested and then after various tests he is cleared and approved and then sent to the particular department for the head of the department to hire him or not to hire him. First of all, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I am not interested in making wanton or reckless charges, but I am particularly interested in what happens to an individual if, after he has gone to see the head of the department, for one reason or another he is not hired. The hon. Minister stopped in his comments at that point and he did not say what happens after that.

I have a case in particular that I would like to bring to the attention of the House. It is of a girl looking for a job as an ordinary clerk. She knows no one and as my hon. friend from Dovercourt has mentioned, to bring a matter like this to the attention of somebody is important. It takes courage. This young lady has no particular interest in having her name brought forward, because it may hurt her if she makes a further application to the commission.

I made some inquiries of the commission and I got a letter from Mr. Collins, the chairman. Just for the record I thought I would read a portion of this, and I want to ask the hon. Minister a question when it is completed:

You asked me yesterday about the results of the application of Miss O and repeated this request today in a written note to me. After I spoke to you yesterday I asked the recruitment branch to give whatever information it could to me concerning this applicant. You may not be aware of the recruitment practices here but the recruitment and selection procedures are based on merit and merit only.

This is stated quite clearly—merit and merit only.

In this case the report I have received this afternoon discloses that Miss O was a candidate for position of cheque examiner in the Clerk 2 general classification. She qualified and was placed on the eligible list.

This is what the hon. Minister has said has happened.

She was placed on the eligible list for this position and referred to the department concerned.

This was the Treasury branch that she was sent to.

Under The Public Service Act the department has the responsibility and authority to select persons from the civil service commission's eligible list and the department did not select Miss O feeling that she was "not adaptable to the work of this position."

The report advises the position involves a fair degree of eye strain and involves the routine checking of documents. Miss O continues on the civil service commission's eligible list, etc.

Mr. Chairman, I want to bring this to the attention of the hon. Minister because many times I personally have gone looking for a job. I have heard this phrase "not adaptable."

I realize, sir, how important it is for the hon. Minister and any one of the department heads to have a certain amount of autonomy in their own departments. But what bothers me is this. You get somebody looking for an ordinary jobs such as this—cheque examiner, Clerk 2, not a big job, just a small job—but they do not have the knowledge and they do not have the courage to make a fuss about things like this. What I am worried about in the civil service commission is this: Is there not any report made to the commission by the department heads, and does the person who has gone looking for a job not have an opportunity to go back to the commission to make a complaint so that something can be done without the person becoming involved or becoming a martyr?

I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister could give us some details on the procedure after the person is not hired. If he likes, I would be glad to give him the name of this person. I do not think it should go into the record as it might be detrimental to her.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in the first place the hon. member should not give it to me because I am a politician and I do not want to get patronage mixed up in this.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister objected last night to politics being mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, in this case, mind you, anyone is sympathetic to someone who is disappointed when he does not get a job after he applies for it, but we have to remember that probably five people applied for this same job. There may have been four; there may have been three. Two persons were going to be disappointed. Now, what do we do? Here we are. We make this a very hard and cold process, really, if you want to call it that, because there is no favouritism.

The person whom the personnel officer of a department selects is, in his judgment, the person who is best suited to do the job. If we adopt that basis for hiring, I think there are bound to be disappointments. Perhaps if the hon. member for Dovercourt and I were there, we might hire a different person, but I do not—

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, may I make a further comment? I would suggest to the hon. Minister that I began by trying to make it quite clear that this young lady was cleared. She was tested and she was cleared as to merit. The letter specifically says, "Merit and merit only". The way that this matter came to my attention was through persons who would prefer not to be made known. The point was that this young lady was there; she was qualified and there was no reason why she could not have got the job. Further it was not as if there were other applicants, as the hon. Minister states.

What I would like to know is what does "not adaptable" mean in the eyes of the hon. Minister? "Not adaptable" in quotation marks.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I doubt if anything can be gained from further discussion. As I pointed out before, there could have been four others, there could have been five others, who were likewise qualified.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, with apologies to my colleague, I think it is important that we in this House take a stand in this matter. My hon. colleague did not mention that the girl in question was coloured, and if the words "not adaptable" should ring a bell in this House in future cases to prevent recurrence of such an occasion as this—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I resent that insinuation—

Mr. Sargent: I do not care if the hon. Minister resents it or not.

Hon. Mr. Allan: If you come to the Treasury in the morning, when people are entering Treasury and going up the stairs, you will see all nationalities represented there.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether the hon. Minister resents it or not. We must take a stand—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, just as further proof of the utter nonsense of that statement, three out of the 28 persons in that branch now are coloured.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I think there is one point that to me is brought up—"not adaptable" seems to me a very vague term. The hon. Minister suggested that if he and I were examining—I think in fairness to the people when they are rejected I would say, "because of academic reasons" or some other reason, but I would not couch it in such terms as "not adaptable", because of the sensitivities of people.

I would like to come again to the recruiting area. I am thinking of a letter I received, which, unfortunately, is not in the House at the moment, but which I received from the hon. Minister—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will resume these estimates. Following these, The Department of Public Works; following these, The Department of the Provincial Secretary; following The Department of the Provincial Secretary, The Department of Reform Institutions; following The Department of Reform Institutions, The Department of Highways.

There will be night sessions on Tuesday and Wednesday nights of next week, and I would hope on Wednesday to resume the Budget debate. Providing we can work on it in with these estimates, we can go to the order paper. And I want to call the committee on consumer credit. I was hoping the hon. members would be ready to debate that.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, may I direct an inquiry to the hon. Prime Minister? In the past it has been the custom, before The Department of Public Works estimates are called, to table in the House a "Blue Book", indicating past, present and future projects as far as The Department of Public Works has them in view. As far as I know, this book has not been tabled this year, and I have been wondering when it is going to be tabled or if it is going to be tabled.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am told by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) that it is ready. We are not finished here and we can go into the Budget debate on Monday; so we will have it tabled before the estimates of The Department of Public Works are before the House.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.10 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

THE ONTARIO MUNICIPAL BOARD ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Municipal Board Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to make it clear that The Public Service Act and part one of The Public Service Superannuation Act apply to the members of the Ontario Municipal Board, except in respect of their appointments, assignments and salaries.

THE MUNICIPAL WORKS ASSISTANCE ACT, 1963

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Works Assistance Act, 1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, the present Act is amended to authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of monies required for the purposes of this Act.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond). He has been given notice of it.

Is the hon. Minister satisfied that certain Ontario hospitals are not being used to exert undue pressure against officials of the committee for the advancement of professional nurses?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I am not in a position to answer the question put by the hon. member. I am loath to believe that such conditions would obtain in hospitals in the province of Ontario, but without knowledge and without information other than what I have read in the newspapers, I am not at present in a position to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts).

What action has his department taken with regard to the Quebec government's announcement concerning the processing of timber cut on Crown lands in that province, and its effect on our province, especially my constituency, Renfrew South?

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Renfrew South, I would say, sir, that there are two plants particularly affected by the announcement of the Quebec Minister of Lands and Forests, namely, Gillies Brothers of Braeside, near Arnprior, and Consolidated Paper Company of Pembroke. I understand that Consolidated Paper Company controls the Gillies operation.

Somewhere in the neighbourhood of one half of the saw-log requirements for each of these mills has been coming from an area on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River. In 1947 the province of Quebec enacted legislation requiring that timber be worked in the province:

—through all the stages of transformation necessary to make such timber ready for the use for which it was ultimately destined.

This Act also provided that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council could, where he deemed it:

—in the interests of the country or the province or of a region of the province limit the application of the prohibiting section and issue permits under the authority of the Minister of Lands and Forests of Quebec.

I understand the permits have been issued from time to time but notices have been given that, for next season, this will not be the case in the area mentioned. Negotiations have been proceeding between officials of the companies concerned and the Quebec department. I expect to hear the result thereof shortly and I would not wish at this time to make any comment or say anything which might in any way affect those negotiations.

The deputy Minister of Lands and Forests, however, my deputy, has been in touch with his counterpart in the province of Quebec and it is our understanding that the prohibition will not come into effect, in any event, until next year. I have stated several times, and I repeat here in the House, that in my opinion this prohibition is bad business on the part of the authorities in the neighbouring province. To the extent that we can be of any assistance in correcting any balance that may require correction, in the area referred to by the hon. member we will undoubtedly use our best offices to do so.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): May I ask a supplementary question of the hon. Minister?

Should the negotiations not—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would like to hear the supplementary question before I—

Mr. Troy: Well, naturally, the hon. Minister cannot answer it until I ask it.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Let me make that clear; before I consent to answer it.

Mr. Troy: I know the hon. Minister is very good, but I am not quite that good. Seriously, should negotiations between the two governments fall out, for the Crown lands which are now under lease to the CIP in Ontario, the timber of which is used over at the Quebec mill at Temiskaming, Quebec, would you then see that those leases are withdrawn?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would not be in any position to deal with that question just at the present time. We are negotiating, and we hope for peaceful solutions.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis).

Does the hon. Minister intend to direct that Scarborough township schools receive an adequate share of the new departmental grants so as to reduce an excessive municipal tax rate?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for notice of the question. The Scarborough board of education, like all the other boards in the province, will have their grants calculated on the basis of the provisions in the regulations of 1964.

Mr. S. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question of the hon. Minister? Does he think that—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I do not think any supplementary question is required with that answer.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass).

Does the hon. Attorney General plan any action to stop the Hett Clinic in Windsor from operating as a clinic? If so, what action does the hon. Attorney General plan?

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under investigation. I have consulted with the legal officers of the department and they have advised me that they have determined there is no evidence at the present time of any criminal offence having been committed. There is, however, an investigation presently under way by the college of physicians and surgeons, from which leads or evidence may develop indicating that some criminal offence has been committed. In that event, these would be thoroughly investigated and appropriate action will be taken.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. members of the legislative assembly of Ontario to join with me in commemorating today the occasion of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Taras Shevchenko, the poet laureate and national hero of the Ukraine. As tens of thousands of men and women like themselves did for their children, my parents who immigrated to Canada from that particular part of the world, transmitted to me the life, ideals and works of Taras Shevchenko as perhaps the most significant part of the culture and heritage of their forefathers' homeland. Taras Shevchenko was born on March 9, 1814, in the district of Kiev, the son of a serf. After a short lifetime, for he died at 47, he left a legacy of artistic achievement and patriotic fervour which has enshrined him in the hearts of countless millions of Ukrainians for the past century and a half.

He was the greatest of Ukrainian poets and he was more than this, he was the first writer who was purely and thoroughly Ukrainian who dared to dream of a Ukrainian language and literature. He reached into the glorious history of the Ukrainian past and brought forth an identity of which those of his stock are justly proud. For only nine of his 47 years could he feel himself a free man to come and go as he pleased, yet he dreamed and wrote for the freedom of his people in their land as few men have. Indeed, he wrote not only on behalf of his own kin but on behalf of all men. His dream has yet been unfulfilled but his writings continue to be an inspiration. His life is still today the shining beacon in which the hopes and aspirations of a freedom-loving people centre. Men and women of his stock were to find for themselves and their children the way of free men, but they found it beyond the seas from their homeland. Remembering his words, imbued with his ideals, they have not stopped hoping for the same for those on their native soil.

Mr. Speaker, Taras Shevchenko could not have envisaged that men of his people would stand in parliaments of free men to remember him as they have and do today. And so I utter with reverence, as my closing words, part of a poem which he wrote as his testament:

Then, in the mighty family
Of all men that are free
Maybe some time very softly
You will speak of me.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of March 6 by the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), I am informed that no threat was uttered—and I shall name the persons as they were in the press—to Mrs. Bessie Brigden by Miss Jean Guest of our Kingston office. Apparently Mrs. Brigden phoned Miss Guest to inquire whether evidence given by her at an inquest would have an effect on her mother's allowance grant. Miss Guest had no concern as to whether or not Mrs. Brigden gave evidence and referred the lady to the regional welfare administrator. The circumstance of Mrs. Brigden's concern was apparently that her testimony would reveal that she had been employed as a cleaning woman, and our office had not previously had any knowledge that she was earning income.

In any event, there was no threat made, either on the part of the field worker or the administrator because they had no conversation with Mrs. Brigden other than giving a non-committal answer to her question. We are not aware at this time that the lady was employed or the amount of income or whether there will be any effect upon the mother's allowance. I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, that our field worker, Miss Guest, has served this department for many years and has an excellent reputation.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I say through you to the hon. Minister that there was a telecast suggesting the contrary. I have a transcript of it and I will submit it to the hon. Minister so he can take it into consideration.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if I may move that the House do now adjourn to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the acute and growing shortage of hospital accommodation, especially in the Metropolitan Toronto area. And very briefly, Mr. Speaker, for the following reasons:

Much new information has come to light on the Metropolitan Toronto hospital shortage since the estimates of The Department of Health and the Throne Speech debate. There has been the reported death of a child in transit from one hospital to another because of bed shortage.

Now, Dr. John Neilson, chairman of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, has described a serious bed shortage which only urgent action will relieve. Comments from chairmen of boards of governors of hospitals and hospital administrators this last Saturday indicated a crisis of major proportions. And finally, a series of news stories has appeared in Toronto newspapers culminating in the front page Star editorial today.

Mr. Speaker: I may refer the member to page 40 of Lewis's Parliamentary Procedure in Ontario, where under the section "Improper Motions," the Speaker may decline to receive a motion for adjournment under this head if in his opinion the subject proposed to be discussed is not definite, urgent or of public importance or if it is a subject which could be discussed at an early date in the debate on the address, which of course is over. The member cannot do that now, but in the debate on the Budget or on some other business which may come before the House.

In my opinion, the subject matter of the proposed motion raised by the member has, in fact, been discussed very fully in the Throne Speech debate, in the consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Health, and on the Budget debate. Also there is still ample opportunity for further discussion on the Budget debate at an early date, in fact even this week.

Moreover, I might say the subject matter does not relate to a specific incident of recent occurrence. On the contrary, it is much too general for a motion to adjourn the House under rule 38, and therefore I rule the motion out of order.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview) Mr. Speaker, before you rule on this point—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I have already ruled.

Mr. Singer: Well then, Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point or order? I find great difficulty in accepting the ruling which you have just given because—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the right at any time to rise on a point of order, and if you could recognize me without the unnecessary comments of some of the more foolish second benchers over there, I would think we would proceed in a much better manner.

Mr. Speaker, I have great difficulty in following your ruling in this regard because while this matter was debated in the estimates of the hon. Minister of Health, the problem was that we did not get satisfactory answers from the responsible hon. Minister. The other avenue that you suggest, further discussion in the Budget debate, does not bring forward any answers either. The third point which you mentioned—that there was no specific item mentioned in the motion of the hon. member for Scarborough West—I think perhaps, with great respect, sir, is not correct. The fact that people have been denied hospital accommodation and this has been proved in statements given before this House and in various newspaper stories indicates that there have been specific instances. So with the greatest respect, sir, I find myself unable to follow your reasoning in regard to this ruling and suggest that perhaps you reconsider it.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the chair has no intention of reconsidering this ruling because it is brought out quite clearly in the rules of our House that there has been ample opportunity for discussing this question in the Throne Speech debate, in the Budget debate, and in the estimates of The Department of Health, and there is still an opportunity to discuss it in the Budget debate. If the Minister does not wish to reply to any of the criticism at that time, that is his prerogative and he could have done the same even in this proposed debate, if it had been allowed. Therefore, with great respect, I still stand by the ruling which I have made.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to table the answers to questions Nos. 2, 8, 10 and 11 which are on the order paper.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

2. Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Inquiry of the Ministry: 1. How many loans have been guaranteed under The Economic Development Loans Guarantee Act, 1962-63? 2. What was the total amount of these loans? 3. What was the amount of (a) the largest; (b) the smallest loan guaranteed under the Act?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall):

- (1) Number of loans guaranteed, 34;
- (2) Total amount of these loans,
$3,570,000;
- (3) (a) Amount of largest loan, $400,000;
- (b) Amount of smallest loan, $10,000.

8. Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Inquiry of the Ministry: Does the Liquor Control Board of Ontario intend to allow any new wine manufacturing licences as a result of the increased importation and consumption of wines in Ontario?

Answer by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario:

It is not the present intention of the Liquor Control Board of Ontario to grant licences for additional wineries. It is the opinion of the board that an increase in the number of wineries would not decrease the volume of imported wines and the present number of such organizations in Ontario is adequate to meet the present and foreseeable consumption demands.

10. Mr. M. L. Belanger (Windsor-Sandwich): Inquiry of the Ministry—1. What school boards in Ontario have adult day classes where elementary subjects are taught? 2. Are all school board meetings public meetings, or are there provisions in

The Schools Administration Act to hold meetings in camera?

Answer by the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis):

1. There is no provision for free education in the regular public and separate schools for persons who are over 21 years of age. Secondary school boards do offer evening courses for adults according to the demand. The following centres have the necessary facilities to offer training at the elementary school level in English, mathematics and science to unemployed adults only, under Programme 5. Classes are conducted after 3:30 p.m. in the following centres:

Barrie, Belleville, Brantford, Concord, Cornwall, Elliot Lake, Hamilton, Kenora, Kingston, Lakeshore, London, Midland, Ottawa, North York, Niagara Falls, Oakville, Owen Sound, Peterborough, Port Arthur, Sudbury, St. Catharines, Stratford, Timmins, Toronto, Welland, Windsor.

Courses are conducted from 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. in Concord, Cornwall, Hamilton, Ottawa, Niagara Falls, Toronto and Windsor.

The department furnishes correspondence courses in elementary school subjects for adults.

2. According to subsection (1) of section 42 of The Schools Administration Act, "The meetings of a school board, except meetings of a committee of the board including a committee of the whole board, shall be open to the public and no person shall be excluded therefrom except for improper conduct."

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in connection with Bill No. 60, I think that perhaps my remarks would be better delivered before the committee if this bill is going to go to committee.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Yes. The same question was asked when I introduced the bill in the first place and I agreed that it would go to the committee.

Mr. Singer: All right. I will reserve my comments until that time.

THE ONTARIO-ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity) moves second reading of Bill No. 63, An Act to amend The Ontario-St. Lawrence Development Commission Act.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, on Bill No. 63, I wonder why this now comes within the aegis of the hon. Minister—I have trouble with the new name of his department. What is it called?

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Travel and Publicity): Because the commission now reports to the Minister of Travel and Publicity on tourism and information.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have expressed certain concern about the fragmentation of authorities dealing with various commissions. Here, substantially, is a commission which deals with parks. Granted it is close to the area represented by my hon. friend but surely that by itself is not a sufficient reason to put a commission under his authority and control?

There were a number of commissions given to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) which, to my mind, more properly belong under the control or supervision of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

I wonder if the government has any theory about how they take these commissions from department to department. What is the thinking behind putting this particular commission in the tourism branch rather than in the Lands and Forests branch, or rather in some branch which has the civil service to deal with substantially?

My understanding of the role of this Department of Tourism is that they are to promote better tourist relations for the province. They have publicity branches, they take pictures, they have guides here in the Parliament buildings and so on; but there is nothing in my recollection, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that, within the civil service of this particular department, there is machinery available to properly run a commission with as many varied aspects as this one, other than the fact that tourists like to visit parks.

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect toward my hon. friend, I would be glad to debate this point with him at the proper time; but the bill before the House is one to change the name of the commission rather than a question of debating to whom the commission should be responsible.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some observations on this bill. I would go further than the hon. member for Downsview. I am somewhat concerned about the apparent lack of uniformity in administration of provincial parks. Most of them are under the jurisdiction of The Department of Lands and Forests. We have at least one under the jurisdiction of an independent commission, the Niagara Parks Commission, and now here is another one, the St. Lawrence Parks Commission, being set up. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have set up, and apparently are again setting up, petty principalities within the general area of administration of provincial parks in the province of Ontario.

If there is any rationality in the government's policy in this matter, it has so far, I think, escaped everybody in the House. I would think that, at some appropriate time, somebody on behalf of the government should indicate why in some cases we have a little independent group running a park set-up, whereas other very large parks are directly under departmental administration and therefore more directly accountable in their activities to this House.

I think that we are extending what was originally a bad principle. I think the whole policy should be reconsidered.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister has, in effect, suggested that this is out of order, and he may be half right. I am not certain, but I think he is half wrong. On the basis of the fact that he is half wrong, I want to make a brief comment.

I think the answer to the question from the hon. member for Downsview is that this is in the nature of a political inheritance—if I may describe it as such. The hon. Minister was on the parks commission, now he is in a new department, and the pack follows him—as is a habit sometimes in this government.

In years gone by, the Niagara Parks Commission became almost the personal domain of the then Minister of Labour.

I rise to speak to this point very briefly, Mr. Speaker, because I think it well that the comments of the previous speaker should be underlined. This is clearly an issue of sufficient importance that it became one of the main items threading its way through the proceedings of that now defunct select committee on government reorganization which died an untimely death a year or two ago.

I think we had reached the point of deciding, in general terms, that we should study the infinite variety of administration in parks in the province of Ontario, in terms of their financing, and make some representations to the government. Unfortunately, that committee died. It was not even decently buried. It lay on the surface for a year or so, and now somebody has scattered some leaves over it in the passing of time and we have lost the body, so to speak. However, I hope—

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): I think the hon. member signed the last and final report.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister who is so brash as to interject, even though chairman of the committee, has forgotten what happened. We got an extended life, and then he became preoccupied in pursuing other things and it never even met.

Mr. Speaker: I think we had better stick to the principle of the bill before the House. I would ask the member to direct his remarks to that alone.

Mr. MacDonald: I have just a concluding sentence, Mr. Speaker. I think that it is time the government should make an analysis of this situation and come to some conclusion itself on regularizing and rationalizing this whole handling of parks throughout the various administrations and the various departments. What we see today is really making a bad situation worse.

I do not think, up until now, that parks have been in The Department of Tourism and Information. We had them in Highways, we had them in Lands and Forests, we had them in Municipal Affairs, where you have the conservation, in Labour, and now we have got them in still another department. If this goes on, it will not be long until every hon. Cabinet Minister has his own little park to look after.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): It seems to me that, when we are discussing this bill, it is an exceptionally good time to suggest to the government that it bring order out of what I think is the chaos that exists in parks administration in this province. It cannot have the maximum in efficiency of administration when it has parks under this department, that department, and some other department. What this legislation seeks to do is to extend that very bad principle—in my opinion at least, it is a very bad principle and, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) is allowing a further fragmentation of this whole matter. Surely the time has come in this province, if we have parks and a number of them, as we have in Ontario, for them to be under one department, not under half a dozen departments?

Now, I would like to hear my hon. friend on this because he is, after all, a reasonable man and has, in most cases, a sane approach to matters. Surely he cannot countenance the defining of responsibility, in respect to parks, among half a dozen different departments of government? Surely the day has come in this province when all parks should be under one department and under one directive authority?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will display the reasonableness to which my hon. friend refers, by discussing something that is completely out of order, because I agree with the statement made by the hon. Minister that the principle of this bill on second reading is to change the name of the department, and that is all that is involved.

However, I would not want him to think that we, as a government, have not given a good deal of consideration to the question of parks and their administration. We have a good many parks in the province and they fall in various areas.

For instance, there are parks operated by our conservation authorities; those parks will naturally follow our conservation authorities, and where we decide they might best be administered. Then we have our provincial parks, which are more in the nature of wilderness areas, if I might put it that way, and are administered by The Department of Lands and Forests. Then we have parks, if you can really call it a park, such as Upper Canada Village, which is administered by the commission. Then there are certain camping areas in the same general area as Upper Canada Village which are also administered by this commission. It is a far cry from that type of park—and I think perhaps we could include the Niagara Parks Commission and the Niagara Park, which is really a large tourist attraction—to a park in the same conception as Quetico Park or Algonquin Park; or, for instance, one park I can mention in my own area, The Pinery, which is used on weekends. In this province it is not quite as simple as it appears to put all parks under one administration, because our parks vary one from another. They vary in type.

We have legislation which, I believe, is administered by The Department of Municipal Affairs, where we make grants to parks which are created by municipalities, so that we can encourage municipalities to provide parks for their own citizens. We, in turn, assist them financially in establishing these parks and this requires some control. This is handled by The Department of Municipal Affairs. I simply point out to you that it is a little more difficult than just saying, "We are going to take all parks and put them into one department," because this might lead, and I am certain it would, to the same administrative inefficiency my hon. friends are trying to correct.

But, in order to provide some overall control of parks, we have what is called the parks integration board. This board was set up for exactly the purpose we are discussing today. It is impossible to put all of these parks into one department, but it is not impossible to have the parks integration board, which is made up of Ministers of the Crown and civil servants, Mr. Speaker. That board co-ordinates the activities of all these parks, regardless of under which particular department they may be administered. Thus, we have one integrating board which puts together the functions of parks. The hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Speaker, is chairman of the parks integration board; and the chairman of the Niagara Parks Commission sits on the parks integration board. This park is represented on the parks integration board. The conservation people are recognized there. So, therefore, sir, we do bring together into one place all the park activity of the province; but we do not do it by just crowding them all into one department whether they fit there or not.

I hope that, with this explanation, it will be understood how we are attempting to get at the problem which has been pointed out.

Motion agreed to. Second reading of the bill.

TOWNSHIP OF HERSCHEL

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves second reading of Bill No. 64, An Act to set aside a certain tax sale of land in the township of Herschel for the relief of Wallace Bullied and Norah Bullied.

Mr. Bryden: Before the motion carries, is the hon. Minister not making an explanation in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If the hon. member will give me a chance, I shall.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to set aside a tax sale of certain premises located in the county of Hastings. No notice of the sale of the premises under the tax sale procedure of The Assessment Act was actually received by the owners, partly as a result of the provisions for giving notice under the Act. And you may have noticed, under The Assessment Act amendment now before the House, that I am making what I consider to be some improvements in the method of giving notice in matters of this kind. I would ask that this bill be referred to the committee on municipal law, and we shall go into all the details of it at that point.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 58th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. Chairman: On vote 303:

Vote 303 agreed to.

On vote 304:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I wonder if I might ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) a question, Mr. Chairman, with regard to another of the new developments which emerged in the government's approach to personnel, management and training? Last year, on page 1507 of the estimates, the hon. Minister stated this:

In the coming year an internship programme will be instituted with five individual internship programmes offered to graduates of the universities who have the best qualifications for this particular programme. If this programme is successful it will be broadened in future years. The intent of this approach is to provide a course of development for professional administrators to make them available when vacancies for the demands of government require middle management personnel—and so on. As I understand it from my reading of modern personnel management and training in the public service, this is the kind of thing that has emerged and has become established in some parts of the United States, particularly in New York State. I am wondering what the experience has been in the past year and what the hon. Minister's future plans are in this connection because I presume it comes under this vote.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I may say to the hon. member for York South that this was a policy that we felt had merit. We tried it, but we found that it was too limited in its extent, it seemed to us to be too limited. As a result, we have extended the training service to a much greater extent. I am informed that at any time we would have between 30 and 40 people who would be taking lectures and getting some of the benefits that we foresaw in the internship project. That was the reason we have discontinued this and replaced it with the other.

Mr. MacDonald: I presume that the difference between what you are doing and what would have been done in the internship programme, as I understand it, is that the internship programme is a sort of probationary period at the end of which the prospective civil servant decides whether or not he wants to work in the public service or, alternatively, whether or not the public service wants him. Whereas, the training you are now doing would be after the person would come into the service. Am I correct?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think the hon. member is correct, although some of the training is still done while the persons are on the probationary staff.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, under vote 304, does the department run an apprenticeship programme at all in co-operation with the various schools in Metro, so a youngster attending a school would be on a co-op plan, and might attend school for the mornings and then come and work for some branch of the department in the afternoons?

Hon. Mr. Allan: We do that. As the hon. member understands, I am sure, various departments do this with engineers in connection particularly with the University of Waterloo. That, of course, is done by the department.

Vote 304 agreed to.

Vote 305 agreed to.

On vote 306:

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister would briefly explain just what the function of the pay research department is and what co-operation there is between the pay research department and the several departments of the government as to arriving at classifications or pay rates?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, the functions performed by the department of pay research are exactly those functions that would be indicated by the title of the section. This is one branch of the commission that has been developed and has done an excellent job. We work in co-operation with the department, that is so, but we also extend the research to employers of labour in many fields. We endeavour to extend the research particularly into those fields where the positions are comparable. As a result of the study of the salaries paid, for instance, by corporations, by banks, by the Bell Telephone Co., and by the federal government, this section of the commission then, in co-operation and in discussion with the department concerned, makes recommendations with respect to the salaries that should be paid for the positions that are under study.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I would raise a case that was brought to my attention in Hamilton and what I find makes me sort of shudder as to just what kind of application is put to the wage research programme in regard to civil servants. This chap in Hamilton works for The Department of Highways on construction and I understand his rate is $1.30 per hour. Now this grosses $126 biweekly. This would lead us to calculate that he works 48 hours a week. When we have the deductions of his hospital insurance, $4.20, his PSI of $6, unemployment insurance of $1.69, and his income tax, $4.05, this makes a deduction of $16 and then he receives as a net, $110 for two weeks' work. The question was raised by his wife, who called me and was quite upset because of the fact that she no longer could work.

This woman said that in the past she could work and make a wage that they could get by on, but because of a physical condition she has had to quit her employment and—

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to inform the hon. member that he must be referring to some person other than a public servant. We have no rates of $1.30 per hour.

Mr. Gisborn: It might be $1.50 per hour and he might be working a 40-hour week.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, we have no hourly rates.

Mr. Gisborn: If there are no hourly rates, his salary then would be $126 for two weeks. I do not think that makes any difference.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I doubt that the person he is referring to, Mr. Chairman, is a public servant.

Mr. Gisborn: Is an employee of The Department of Highways a public servant?

Hon. Mr. Allan: If he should be a casual employee he would not be a public servant and would not come under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission.

Mr. Gisborn: Regardless of whether he be a casual employee or a temporary employee or a permanent employee, he is still being paid by The Department of Highways to perform work for it.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I think the item we are discussing is pay research. This person is not a public servant and pay research has nothing to do with the salary that a casual employee may receive. A casual employee is employed by the department concerned, not through the civil service.

Mr. Gisborn: I certainly cannot understand the hon. Minister's objections. The person works for The Department of Highways.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I am not unreasonable, am I?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in vote 306, what is the department's policy concerning overtime? It must be studying overtime on this pay research, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, the pay research section is not studying overtime but the matter of overtime is receiving very careful study and is presently under consideration by the joint council.

Mr. Newman: It does not come under pay research at all, Mr. Chairman? Thank you.

Vote 306 agreed to.

Vote 307 agreed to.

On vote 308:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, I did not realize that you were passing vote 307 so quickly. May I ask the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, what is the personnel of the civil service arbitration board?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, may I inform the hon. member that nothing so far has gone to arbitration so a board has not been appointed. It will be appointed when something is referred to it. The hon. member is not thinking of the joint council, is he?

Mr. MacDonald: No, no, no. Civil service arbitration board.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it has not been appointed.

Mr. MacDonald: Does it operate on an ad hoc basis? When there is something to refer to it, it goes to it?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the chairman of the civil service arbitration board, Mr. Collins, the chairman of the commission?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, it is entirely independent. The chairman will be appointed for two years. He has not been appointed as yet and there has been no need for his services as yet. There is independence, absolute independence, in consideration of the things that come before the joint council, and especially when they go to the arbitration board.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let me deal with this frankly because there is an aspect of this which disturbs me greatly and perhaps I should go back a bit. Two or three years ago, when this new approach was launched and Mr. Collins became the chairman of the civil service commission, I stated quite frankly at that time that I thought we were moving in the right direction and we were making some progress. I will add, as I said then, because it is in the record, I felt that a good deal of it was because of the job that Mr. Collins could do. I have had the pleasure of working with him in years gone by and I felt that he could do a job here.

What disturbs me is the amount of criticism that is now arising and the amount that is being directed at the chairman of the civil service commission. Perhaps this is inevitable. The longer one is in this kind of job that deals with 40,000 individuals, one faces 40,000 different chances for criticism. But even when one discounts it, the thing that rather puzzles me is the kind of structure that is emerging.

For example, in principle, quite apart from the personalities involved, it seems to me that there is a questionable kind of basic structure. As I see it, Mr. Collins is chairman of the civil service commission. This is the policy-making body, so to speak. Mr. Collins is deputy Minister of The Department of Civil Service. This is the administrative body. This, to my mind, makes sense, so far, Mr. Chairman. As I understand it, Mr. Collins is acting chairman, or chairman of the joint council, which is the body in which these people come together—management and the employees, and they express their views and thrash out their differences.

The only qualifications I have and they are serious ones—I expressed them the other day, as did the hon. member for Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson)—is that I think that to suggest that this body has any genuine collective bargaining powers is nonsense. It has no collective bargaining powers. I think in this connection we are no further ahead than we were years ago when the Prime Minister of the day referred to the civil service association as being “the union in the civil service”. Then the very next day the provincial council of the civil service association, which was in session, put out a release and said, “Well, if we are the union, I wish they would treat us as such. Only last week a complete new statement of classifications and pay for these various classifications was announced by the government as a unilateral action. We had no chance to discuss it in advance and when we made protest we were told that any differences that you have and any criticism that you have we will consider before any possible revision a year or two years from now.”

The hon. member for Dovercourt documented two or three areas. One of them I was certainly aware of: the question of overtime pay, where, I understand, right in the middle of a discussion of the joint council a decision was made by the government, implemented by an order in council.

Let me return to the basic point I wanted to make. We have a structure in which one man is chairman of the civil service commission, is deputy Minister of the department, is chairman of the joint council, and I was even told, perhaps erroneously, who played a role in the arbitration board if and when it was established. That would be getting a bit thick, I agree. But even without that, it seems to me that we are getting into a position where the people involved think that they are talking to the same people in all various areas that they go to, whether it is policymaking, policy administration, negotiations or what will you. I submit for the hon. Minister's consideration that it seems to me that this is bad in principle and that this is going to provoke even more criticism with an element of fairness in it. I think you are going to compound your difficulties in what is already rather a difficult area for administration.

Hon. Mr. Allan: I think I can understand the hon. member's concern. Mind you, this is a new venture on the part of government and on the part of the civil service association and I would be less than frank if I did not say now that it is taking a good deal of thought and planning to endeavour to get this properly on the road. That is exactly what we are trying to do. The chairman of the civil service commission has been sitting as chairman, as an independent chairman without a vote, and if it is thought desirable that the board should sit without a chairman, Mr. Collins will retire. So far both sides have wanted to have him act as chairman.

In connection with the setting of salaries for various classifications, those classifications are considered by a civil service salary advisory committee and two of the members of the civil service association appear before the committee to discuss and comment upon the proposed salary revisions.

I do not think that it was intended that every change in salary should be negotiated and I do not think the civil service association would want that, because there are so many.

It is the responsibility of the civil service commission to provide good staff for the departments. If there is an advertisement for staff and it does not get the type of applications that it feels are satisfactory to fill the position, the commission may raise the salary classification immediately because the thought and the aim of the whole procedure is to build up an excellent civil service. We realize, just as any of the hon. members of this House would realize, the basis of an efficient government operation is a good civil service. That is what we are endeavouring to do to the best of our ability. We will make changes as we go along. The joint council is sitting at this minute and the chairman of the civil service commission is not sitting with it. Perhaps as it may mature it may not have a chairman—it may not need a chairman, I do not know.

I say to you very frankly and very sincerely—at the same time being willing to admit that some of the steps we may have taken were not as wise as they could have been if we had had the benefit of more experience—that it is an honest effort to accomplish what we say we are trying to accomplish.

Vote 308 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Civil Service.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves that the committee of supply rise, report progress, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 24th order; resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. J. M. Gould (Bracondale): Mr. Speaker, 11 days ago—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): And 10,000 words ago.

Mr. Gould: —I started to speak in the Budget debate. I am still up on my feet and I am still speaking in the Budget debate. I suspect very much that this is the way in which legends are born—the way some things originate.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): The hon. member means reputations.

Mr. Gould: Some day, someone is going to say to this House, "You know, there was once a Liberal member who spoke in this House for 11 days, from one Friday to the next Friday, and then from there on until the Monday following."

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): It is not too well tacked down.

An hon. member: He will not be through today, though.

Mr. Gould: Truly, Mr. Speaker, there are so many things yet to be done in Ontario. Any member, with a little interest, with a little reflection and a little research, could readily get up on his feet and speak about those things, not for 11 days, but for 22 days.

One day a member of this House is going to try it and he will succeed.

Mr. Speaker, changing times bring the need for reform, the need for change in attitude, and the need for change in legislation. But for the time being, Mr. Speaker—again with your kindness—may I ask the hon.

members not to lose sight of the fact that my comments in the Budget debate are protracted by reason of the fact that my submissions are part of a blueprint for Liberal action in Ontario.

And may I advise, as to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), I did not think he was so sensitive to some of the things I said in this House. Nor did I know he was such an excellent humorist, such an interesting after-dinner speaker and story-teller. Now, just which one or more things irritated my hon. friend so that he would be prompted, at a formal Speaker's dinner, in the presence of the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario and before I had completed my address in relation to the Budget, to recommend to that honourable gathering that someone ought to supply Joe Gould, the member for Bracondale, with a bottle of bitters. I laughed the loudest when this suggestion was made by the hon. Prime Minister. It was hilarious, really, and, I agree, a good suggestion, too. I tried the bitters, Mr. Speaker. But, Mr. Speaker, be assured, bitters will do no more for me than it has already done for the hon. Prime Minister and some of his government followers.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, could I just rise on a point of order, please?

I hope, Mr. Speaker, when I made that somewhat facetious remark upon that occasion, that I did not in any way offend my hon. friend. I can only assure him that was not my intent.

Mr. Gould: I accept the explanation. No, I did not at any time take it as an offence. As a matter of fact, I said it was hilarious and I joined in the laughter. But I am still puzzled as to what prompted the hon. Prime Minister to seek that occasion to make that suggestion. I go further and ask: Is it the charge that this government has failed to control expenditures? Expenditures to be increased by some $104 million for Ontario, over the last fiscal year?

The federal government has increased its spending for next year by some $100 million for the whole of Canada, but our government goes one better. It is increasing its spending over last year by $104 million, just for the province of Ontario.

In resumption of this debate, may I remind the hon. members that, when I was last up on my feet, I was saying that the New Democratic Party throughout this land is on the decline. And I would think that if Liberals were to join or coalesce with another party it would be a party which was ascending, one which was moving upwards, instead of one which was moving downwards and out of Ontario politics.

Mr. Speaker, at a recent labour conference, I believe held in Niagara Falls—in or near the riding of my hon. colleague from the riding of Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator), who is seated immediately to my left, and I do not know whether he is too happy or not that the conference was held in or near his riding—

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): We like the working people there.

Mr. Gould: But he reminds me that the political action committee of the New Democratic Party at that conference passed a resolution calling for a re-examination to find the reason why people in Ontario do not vote for the New Democratic Party. Well, I can tell them the reason, Mr. Speaker. The people of Ontario are not as mixed up as these hon. gentlemen are. It is as simple as that.

People have seen, by harsh experience, some of the fallacies of socialism—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): The hon. member should check his own party.

Mr. Gould: —when it experimented and speculated with private enterprise. Yes, Mr. Speaker, under a socialist, under an NDP government—or I should say under a government née CCF, it is not easy to swallow or pronounce—Ontario people would be free, free to do as they were told. The NDP could not, as far as I am concerned, be woven into the Liberal fabric, now or ever.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, Liberals are reformists—

Mr. Gisborn: Just this last party.

Mr. Gould: —and not socialists. As a former newsboy, I would say to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald) and his followers, Mr. Speaker: Go peddle your political papers on the other side of the street. The Liberal Party in Ontario is well able to stand on its own political feet and win Ontario without the help of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. MacDonald: I have not been peddling. Some Liberals—

Mr. Gould: Liberals standing alone won before and they can win again in Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, as a Liberal, I prefer to make further contribution to the Conservative budget debate by counselling the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Treasurer (Mr. Allan) of this province in that if they are ever short of members to form a Conservative Party in this province, as they are presently short of funds, they can have first chance at wooing the members of the New Democratic Party. They can be had for the asking. We do not want them—you, sir, can have them—they are just too socialistic for me.

I should say, however, Mr. Speaker, that outside of this House I bear these bilious individuals no animosity. Quite candidly it is not their persons to which I object, it is their policy. I wager, sir, that like this member, when they get home their wives make them dry the dinner dishes, too.

On second thought, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might recommend to the same said hon. Prime Minister and hon. Provincial Treasurer, that they now invite hon. members of the New Democratic Party to cross over to their side. They would show the government how to nationalize breweries, pipelines and banks and thereby help them obtain sufficient monies to extinguish our staggering provincial debt and our increase in the cost of education.

Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, changing conditions invite reforms and I am delighted to hear that the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) by his moving first reading of a bill, is seeking to establish in Ontario a law reforms commission. In the field of the administration of justice the hon. Attorney General has on several occasions indicated that consideration was being given to certain matters to which I shall now make brief reference.

Mr. Speaker, if I were leader of my party, I would propose the spending of some of our revenue for public defenders and for reform in our system of raising and granting bail. Something must be done to offset the distinct and unfair advantage Crown attorneys have over persons accused of crime and not represented by competent counsel, simply by reason of their inability to pay the fee of such counsel. Editorials have pointed out time and time again that violence is done to our concept of justice when innocent citizens are kept in jail—and may I say the stench of some of our local jails would offend the nostrils of most people, to put it mildly—kept in jail because they are unable to raise bail. Yes, kept in jail sometimes for weeks, sometimes for months.

Mr. Speaker, these are other matters which concern me as a reformer in the interests of the people in this province. Mr. Justice McRuer of our Supreme Court, a judge of considerable experience and a prominent Liberal before his appointment to the bench, recently stated, and many hon. members have read it in the press and I quote:

More cases were set down for trial in York county alone—and this honourable House is located in York county:

—than in all the rest of Canada and Great Britain put together.

Mr. Speaker, it is incredible. In the 15 years between 1945 to 1960, motor vehicle registration in Ontario rose from some 662,000 to some two million and at the present time, registrations are, according to our hon. Provincial Treasurer, some 2,267,000. The bulk of civil cases in our courts relate to automobiles. Increase in the number of cars on our highways and roads will bring an increase in law suits involving cars and pedestrians.

Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge that litigation in our province today is costly. Enforcement of a right in our courts today takes so long and it is so expensive. By profession I am a lawyer and candidly, I cannot afford it. I discourage my clients from litigation. Sir, I agree with His Lordship when he charges in the first place that conditions warrant a searching self-examination of the machinery by which we adjust human rights. I agree with His Lordship when he charges in the second place that there has not been a real large-scale law reform in Ontario in the last century, apart from The Workmen's Compensation Act.

The public is not getting cases tried as they should have been tried, and the present machinery for settling claims for injuries sustained in car accidents is more a guessing game than the administration of justice.

That is what His Lordship has said. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, if I were leader of the Liberal reform party in Ontario, I would at the earliest moment take steps to implement the suggestions of Mr. Justice McRuer, that a scheme along the lines of The Workmen's Compensation Act be provided to compensate persons for injuries suffered on our highways. In this fashion, Ontario litigants would get instant justice at minimum cost.

Mr. Speaker, and I believe the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) obliquely pointed to this matter some time during last week, there is evidence of a renewed effort in Ontario by persons known and unknown, to spread an old disease, the disease of vicious racial discrimination, by the publication and distribution of hate literature. We are experiencing unsolicited delivery by hand and through our mails of periodicals and brochures and pamphlets filled with untruths, with words and phrases of hate, all calculated to arouse and excite our citizens to hate—to hate each other.

It is my opinion that hate, like prostitution, can never be wholly ended. Society will have to be content with legislation which keeps hate and prostitution within tolerable limits. But the dissemination of published hate, the spreading of published hate, is something else. That can be stopped; that can be wholly stopped. Mr. Speaker, let it not be said that no one stood up in this House and warned the government of this corrosive in the fabric of our society. This is not to be ignored in the hope that it may blow over and pass away by itself. These things just do not work that way, experience has shown. Published hate must be stamped out by action; government voice and government action.

The distribution of published hate can be discouraged if there be formal disapproval by our government. The distribution of published hate can be wholly stopped if there be Ontario legislation prohibiting same. And if such legislation should be ineffective then we can seek amendment to our Criminal Code.

I prefer to believe that, in our day and age, Ontario has reached a level where no fellow man or group of fellow men should be made the subject of hate by reason of birth or tongue or complexion or worship.

Mr. Speaker, we read in the daily press that the government in Ottawa is considering action to halt the spread of hate literature. But does that mean that Ontario shall remain silent while published abuse and dirt is being heaped upon its citizens? I would ask this government, once and for all time, to outlaw the distribution of hate literature. The Ontario Human Rights Code does not cover this present situation adequately. This is an area this government should look into, and quickly. The Human Rights Code deals with "publication" but it does not deal with the "distribution."

May I say that, the other day, I noticed a news item in our daily newspaper, I think it was the Toronto Daily Star, and I now quote from this item. It bears the heading:

HATE PREACHER SEIZED

South Bend, Indiana: A self-styled American organizer, charged with preaching hatred, was released from solitary confinement on $5,000 bail, Sunday. Alexander Defields, 25, Benton Harbour, Michigan, surrendered Saturday night after a warrant was issued for his arrest under 1947 Indiana law forbidding trafficking in hate.

I repeat, "law forbidding trafficking in hate."

My curiosity resulted in a letter forwarded to the Secretary of the state of Indiana. I now have, on my desk, a copy of an Act concerning hatred by reason of race, colour or religion. And, Mr. Speaker, again with your kindness and the kindness of the hon. members who are now in this House, I now read part of such Act. This was approved February 27, 1947. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Indiana:

Section 1: It is hereby declared to be the public policy of the state of Indiana and of this Act to protect the economic welfare, health, peace, domestic tranquillity, morals, property rights and interests of the state of Indiana and the people thereof, to protect the civil rights and liberties of the people, to prevent racketeering in hatred and to prohibit persons from agreeing, combining, uniting, confederating, conspiring, organizing, associating or assembling for the purpose of creating, advocating, spreading or disseminating hatred by reason of race, colour or religion.

Section 2(a): It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to combine, unite, confederate, conspire, organize or associate with any other person or persons for the purpose of creating, advocating, spreading or disseminating malicious hatred by reason of race, colour or religion for or against any person, persons or group of persons, individually or collectively.

Section 2(b): It shall be unlawful for any person or persons acting with malice to create, advocate, spread or disseminate hatred for or against any person, persons or groups of persons.

Section 3: Any person violating any of the provisions of section 2 of this Act shall be deemed guilty of racketeering in hatred, and upon conviction shall be disfranchised and rendered incapable of holding any office of profit or trust for any determinate period not exceeding ten years, and shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, to which may be added imprisonment in a state prison for any determinate period not exceeding two years.

And in this Act hatred is defined, and I read Section 9:

The term "hatred" as used in this Act shall mean and include malevolent ill-will, animosity, odium, detestation or rancour. And the term "person" shall mean any person, firm, association or corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, "racketeering in hatred." All decent people will agree that racketeering in hatred, like any other racketeering, should be stamped out whenever and wherever it shall appear in our province.

Mr. Speaker, this province must maintain its lead in civil rights by moving quickly in dealing with this kind of nauseating propaganda. What has been done in the American state of Indiana should, can and must be done in the Canadian province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, let me go on further. I am sure the hon. Prime Minister will have to agree, and whether he was responsible for it or not is not the immediate question, but the popular impression during the last provincial election campaign was that if the Conservative government was elected the people of Ontario could expect early action on the part of the government, as to a medical care plan and as to a portable pension plan.

The election has been over for some six months. We are now moving towards the end of this session and the hon. Prime Minister of this province, for several reasons and a curious twist of political events, today stands branded and condemned in the eyes of public opinion as a man of no medical plan for Ontario right now, and as a man who would scuttle a national portable pension plan for Ontario right now.

The development of this unpleasant political situation should convince this honourable and debonair gentleman that, as the Toronto Telegram said, not too long ago, and I quote:

The honeymoon is over for Mr. Robarts. He better get down to realities and face up to the facts of life.

Yes, Mr. Robarts better face up to the facts of life, if he is to be the strong, silent man who rules Ontario. Yes, Mr. Robarts better face up to the fact that a majority government—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would like to draw to the member's attention that, when he addresses another member of the House he refers to him by his riding or by his portfolio if he is a Cabinet Minister. The hon. Prime Minister, I suggest, would be a better reference to make in the House by a member.

Mr. Gould: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Prime Minister of this province had better face up to the fact that a majority government is not necessarily a strong government. That all governments, as said the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor of this province the other night, start dying the day they are born. Once the voter believes he was misled by the government by reason of the government's delay in giving that voter what he wants and what he expected to receive from the government, the sooner will the government die.

The hon. Prime Minister of this province, attended the recent meeting, in Ottawa, of provincial premiers to discuss the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements. There the hon. Prime Minister was magnanimous in his gift to Quebec of some 20 million, more or less, of Ontario dollars—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I must really object to that. I did not agree to it. In fact, I objected to it. It was done by the hon. member's friends in Ottawa, of their own volition, and with no sanction from me.

Mr. Gould: Mr. Speaker, the conduct of the hon. Prime Minister of our province at this conference, as reported in the press, was "to save Confederation", as he put it. Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of Ontario were not too happy about that, but they then indulged our new hon. Prime Minister in his grandstand play. But Ontario people now are displeased with our hon. Prime Minister's grandstand play in attempting to impede this long-awaited Dominion pension plan for the welfare and security of our people.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: We will have a better deal than Quebec—

Mr. Gould: They are displeased with our hon. Prime Minister's attempts to stall the plan before it really gets going. It will be a pity if our hon. Prime Minister participates in the destroying of this national plan, in preventing the Dominion plan from becoming a national plan, as I suspect he is thinking now of doing. The Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. hon. Lester Pearson, in reply to objections raised by the Ontario Prime Minister, declared that the most pressing social need facing Canada is the provision of old age security for the 70 per cent of the Canadian population not covered by private pension plans, sir. Our Prime Minister indicated he was not overly impressed with the concern of the hon. Prime Minister of this province. He said, and I quote:

It would not seem reasonable to slow full implementation of the Canada plan.

Mr. Speaker, from comments reported in the press to have been recently made by our hon. Prime Minister, one would imagine many evil things about the Canadian pension plan. One, that it was ill-conceived; another, that it was hastily considered; and still another, that the federal government was bent on enacting the plan without further detailed study and without further consultation with the provincial premiers. I say that this is not the case at all.

On January 11 of this year, the Prime Minister of Canada sent a confidential memorandum to all provincial premiers, setting forth Canadian pension plan proposals which had been revised in the light of federal-provincial discussions. In the memorandum, the Prime Minister indicated that legislation to implement the Canadian pension plan would be presented to the second session of Parliament. He reiterated that it was his government's intention to refer the legislation to a parliamentary committee for detailed study for the record—I should like to document. I should like to read part of the memorandum with which the hon. Prime Minister of this province is familiar, part of the memorandum forwarded to him by the Prime Minister of Canada. I quote:

Since the federal-provincial conference of November 26-29, the federal government has re-examined its pension proposals in the light of the questions and comments which arose in discussion with the provinces. As was indicated at the conference, there are certain features which the federal government regards as essential to a satisfactory contributory pension plan. In brief these features are:

1. It should be as universal as is administratively practicable.

2. It should apply up to at least an average level of earnings.

3. In combination with existing old age security, it should provide pensions that are modestly adequate for people who cannot make other provision for their retirement.

4. It should leave scope for further provision by those who are in a position to make it, and any disturbance to private pension plans should therefore be kept to a practicable minimum.

5. Because many of the people who cannot otherwise make much provision for their retirement are now middle-aged, the plan should have a moderately short maturity period.

6. The adequate minimum pensions provided through the plan should be available from age 65.

7. The security provided should be real. In a changing economy with rising productivity and income, this cannot be achieved by relating pensions to incomes in earlier years. The plan should assure people of pensions related to general earning levels at the time they retire.

8. The plan should contain safeguards against benefits being increased without taking full account of the eventual as well as the present cost of such benefits.

I go on:

The federal government, for its part, would not wish to take the responsibility of submitting to Parliament a pension plan lacking the above features. At the same time, the federal government fully recognizes that this is a field of common jurisdiction with the provinces. It therefore is willing to make revisions which, while respecting the above essentials, will bring the federal proposals into the fullest possible harmony with the views and programmes of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, please note this is the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada speaking.

Accordingly, the federal government now suggests, in the light of the discussions with the provinces, some ways in which the proposals put forward last July might be revised. The federal government hopes that the provinces will, at their early convenience, make their comments on these suggestions.

Mr. Speaker, after briefly reviewing the main areas of discussion and indicating the government's conclusions, the memorandum goes on to say—and I now read further from the said memorandum:

The federal pension proposal is moderate in benefits and costs. Participating provinces are entitled to assurance that the plan will stay that way. While no Parliament can tie the hands of its successors, the federal government, which has general responsibility for the soundness of the national economy, is fully as anxious as the provinces that the legislation should provide every practicable safeguard against benefits under the plan being increased without taking full account of the future costs of such benefits.

He goes on:

The legislation will, therefore, make it a statutory duty of the chief actuary of The Department of Insurance to make periodic actuarial reports on both the short-term and the long-term costs of the plan. The successive reports will, of course, reflect the most recent statistical data and experience of the operation of the plan. If amendments to the legislation are proposed, the chief actuary will be required to report whether or not such amendments would call for any change in his actuarial projections. The chief actuary's reports will be published and referred to the provinces.

Their implications, and other aspects of the operation of the Canada Pension Plan, would be open to discussion at federal-provincial conferences. While advance consideration could not be made legislatively binding, it would be the government's intention that, in fact, no amending legislation would be presented to Parliament without first obtaining an actuarial report and the comments of the advisory committee.

The federal government believes that these procedures will ensure that the pension plan would not be changed without thorough consultation with the provinces and full consideration, by governments, Parliament and public, of future costs.

It is highly desirable that a national pension plan should provide pensions for contributors who become disabled, for younger widows with dependent children—widows from age 65 are now covered by the proposed plan—and for orphans. However the federal government continues to think it best to defer such provisions for the time being. After administrative experience of the operation of the basic plan has been gained, it will be the intention of the federal government to propose the addition of these benefits.

Mr. Speaker, does that sound like a plan that was half-hatched, that was hastily considered? Is that a plan which has no regard for cost, no regard for the views of our provincial premiers? Not at all! And I see by the Toronto Daily Star of the other day, that since January 11 the federal government has moved ahead and has modified its statement in the memorandum which I have just read by announcing that the Canada Pension Plan, the national plan, will provide benefits for widows. May I read:

MUST BE 65, CANADA PENSION PLAN
BENEFITS FOR WIDOWS

Ottawa—A substantial survivor's benefit for widows of contributors is being included in the Canada Pension Plan, the Commons was told last night.

Under the revised plan the federal government is preparing for submission to Parliament, a widow of a contributor will get not only her own old age pension but also 60 per cent of the contributory pension her husband would have received if he had survived.

Mr. Speaker, time will demonstrate that the province of Quebec is making a grave political mistake in proceeding to establish its own provincial pension plan, at a time when the federal government is proposing a national plan, proposing one plan aimed at benefiting all Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Family allowances is one plan, unemployment insurance is one plan, sir, the old age pension is one plan. It is deplorable that we will have one plan for Upper Canada and another plan for Lower Canada.

There should be one plan and one plan only for one Canada in my humble opinion. A Frenchman is no different from an Englishman and an Englishman is no different from a Frenchman. Both are born against their will and both die against their will. Both are able to enjoy the same rights and the same benefits. Both need the same security. National security — not different provincial security. And I hope, once the federal plan is put into effect, that the people of Quebec will clamour to be brought into our national plan.

Mr. Speaker, every provincial premier will be given the fullest opportunity to submit his views, including the hon. Prime Minister of this province. Just some ten days ago, this is what the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada said in a letter which was tabled in this House by the hon. Prime Minister, a letter dated, I believe, February 25, in reply to a letter forwarded by the hon. Prime Minister of this province on February 13. And may I quote from that letter:

It is certainly desirable to have ample public discussion of so important a subject.

This is the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada speaking to the hon. Prime Minister of this province.

It is certainly desirable to have ample public discussion of so important a subject as the Canada Pension Plan. I have no doubt that views of the kind you now indicate as yours will be put forward by witnesses appearing before the parliamentary committee on the plan.

Mr. Speaker, to be sure, there are ramifications; to be sure, there may be inequities, but these would be ironed out with the passage of time. May I say, "You do not judge a portrait by its defects." "Let us get cracking," I say, to parrot the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling). Ontario people want the plan and they will get it sooner or later, so why not now? Take my word for it, Mr. Speaker, our Liberal administration at Ottawa will do everything in its power to make certain Ontario people get the plan notwithstanding the hon. Prime Minister's stand and conduct to the contrary.

I recollect reading of the hon. Prime Minister's strategy of teasing a thing along in a situation. I suggest sincerely that the hon. Prime Minister desist from adopting such tactics at this time in connection with the portable pension plan. The people of this province are too sensitive to the need of a national portable pension plan. This tactic of "Let's delay the plan; let us discuss it at a conference of provincial heads" for whatever reason, good, bad or indifferent, has placed the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario on the wrong side of the portable pension issue. I would respectfully advise the hon. Prime Minister that this is the time for him to be magnanimous, this is the time for his grandstand play, this is the time for him to say, "Ontario goes along; I did it to save the plan." In the event that the hon. Prime Minister should reject this advice, and it is tendered to him in all sincerity, then I give him another piece of advice—

Mr. Letherby: By the wrong people.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Your sagacity and thinking are not shared by the people of Ontario. They are on the hon. Prime Minister's side.

Mr. Gould —in the Throne Speech debate, and it was this: "Quickly terminate the serving of your apprenticeship in Ontario and ask for an early call to Ottawa." But some say the question is plaguing the hon. Prime Minister. What question, you ask? Why, "to be or not to be the Prime Minister of Canada; that is the question." Let me hasten to add, Mr. Speaker, that one day the hon. Prime Minister of this province, if he wishes, may be the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Not strong enough yet.

Mr. Gould: He is not all bad, you must understand, Mr. Speaker. But some people will want to know, if this is the same man who just a few months ago publicly pledged, "Let us put the accent on our Canadianism; we shall never pursue a narrow go-it-alone policy." The people of Ontario will judge whether there is an accent on Canadianism or, in view of the development of recent events, it is a narrow go-it-alone policy.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Maybe that was last September.

Mr. Gould: Just how anxious was this government to discuss a medical care plan or a portable pension plan in this House this session? Let us quickly examine the record of our proceedings. The first important piece of business of this government this session was—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Slot machines!

Mr. Gould: Indeed, three readings of a bill to repeal The Slot Machines Act. And three readings of a bill to repeal The Female Refuges Act. The Slot Machines Act, and it is not found in the 1960 Consolidation of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, was enacted in the days of the Drew government. Our hon. Attorney General, sir, explained to this House that The Slot Machines Act has not been used in years; since there is no slot machine problem in Ontario, let us enact a piece of legislation to repeal a piece of legislation, says he. When the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) was asked, "What is a female refuge?" he replied, "I do not know, but what I do know is that there has not been a female refugee in Ontario for some 40 years." So, says he, let us enact a piece of legislation to repeal a piece of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, instead of enacting legislation dealing with problems which exist, some of which I touched upon the other day and some of which I have touched upon today, this government deals with legislation unused—obsolete in relation to problems which no longer exist in Ontario—in relation to problems which no longer affect the welfare or the social security of our people. Again, I say, this government is still not facing up to the facts of life.

While I am still up on my feet, I want to face up to the fact that I am delighted to be able to extend greetings to the hon. member for High Park, the hon. member for Humber (Mr. W. B. Lewis), and I do not see him in his seat at the moment, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly), and the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, all Conservatives, all Tories, all aldermen and councillors with whom I had the pleasure of serving for some years both on the Toronto and Metro councils before coming to this honourable House. I too add my congratulations to old and new hon. members and in particular may I pay tribute to the hon. member for Hamilton Centre (Mrs. Pritchard) the lady in red. At last, doctor, we have a lady in the House.

An hon. member: It's blue today. You are colour blind.

Mr. Gould: And red on top, no, she has a touch of red. I think you had better change your glasses.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: What about the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer)? You have forgotten one of your own buddies.

Mr. Gould: May I, too, tell of my warm and genuine admiration for the stirring and inspiring contribution made to the Throne Speech debate by the hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop). I would like to remind the hon. member, although he is not in his seat at the moment, that I am happy to be one of his constituents. And my compliments to the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) upon his entry into the big league. Mr. Speaker and hon. members of this House may be interested in knowing that his father and I engaged in public debate some years ago when he represented McGill University and I represented the University of Toronto.

You know, sir, and I wish the hon. member were present to hear these words, from what I have heard in this House I believe as a debater the son is better than the father.

You, honourable sir, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will have to accept these wishes for the Speaker when I say I do wish you well. What a transformation has taken place from the once free-smiling hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Morrow) to the present sombre, restrained Speaker of this House. I am sure the ritual of your enforced neutrality in the presence of an over-population of Tory politicians at times must be insufferable. I trust, however, that you did not make too great a sacrifice in assuming the Speakership. The last Speaker, the hon. William Murdoch—and we think well of him—he too won the Speaker's chair but in so doing he lost his member's seat. For all I know today, he may be that man in the gallery I referred to once or twice in my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it is your sworn duty to rule, as it is said, with even hand and to defend, and may I say that is a strong word, to defend the rights of the Opposition. Your conduct in this first session of our twenty-seventh Parliament indicates that you, sir, intend so to do. But I warn that you may expect that while this government lasts, the Liberals, my colleagues and I, in the official Opposition, shall not hesitate to criticize this government every time it is at fault; every time it neglects to protect the interests of the taxpayer; every time any head of this most important English-speaking province fails to have the same regard for every citizen, no matter what language he speaks or prefers to speak in, and every time it is blind to the desires and needs of Ontario people.

I want it known, Mr. Speaker, that my assaults are at all times upon the political and not upon the personal integrity of the hon. Prime Minister or upon the hon. members of this House. I want it known, as you should know, Mr. Speaker, that I am not accustomed to criticizing just for the sake of criticizing. Some hon. members may think that that is the political thing to do. Not so with me, sir. My criticisms were made for the sake and in the hope of making some contribution to the debates and deliberations of the sessions of this twenty-seventh Parliament; some contribution to the many things which this government, and the government succeeding it, should do in the interests of the people of Ontario. I am informed that hon. Ministers of the Crown have already started to reflect upon the introducing of several of the proposals which, as a Liberal, I have made. Banks, beer and early closing throughout Ontario now have the attention of responsible government followers.

Sincerely, Mr. Speaker, Canada still, with all its growing problems, economic and otherwise—and what growing family has no problems?—is a wonderful country. And Ontario, as part of Canada, is destined to become a great province where, as our former Lieutenant-Governor, the Honourable J. Keiller Mackay, said to the members of the twenty-sixth Legislature, and I heard him, and it was reassuring and, Mr. Speaker, I quote:

Ours is a place where there can be a majority without tyranny and ours is a place where there can be a minority without fear.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take a small part in the Budget debate, I would like to first of all compliment the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) for his Budget statement and the most painless effect I am sure it has had on the hon. members of this House. One can imagine the pressures to which the hon. Provincial Treasurer has been subject to during the past few months—with various department heads asking approval of their estimates without possibly realizing what the overall total expenditure would be if all their demands were granted.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the estimated increase for the coming fiscal year of over $93 million would be much greater but for the determination of the hon. Provincial Treasurer and the co-operation of the other hon. members, and hon. Ministers, particularly.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer's is not a popular post; he cannot possibly please everybody. Instead of turning out to be a villain or a "Scrooge", I think he has made people realize that running Ontario is big business, affecting more and more people and demanding the foresight, frankness and courage that is embodied in the hon. Minister's budget statement.

Mr. Speaker, education as the hon. members know, continues to require an increasing share of revenue. This will be one of the greatest challenges of the 60's. Requirement for university education alone will increase by over $30 million during the next fiscal year. We have heard of new universities in Peterborough, and in the Niagara peninsula; new colleges in Scarborough and Erindale; new facilities in Guelph; more funds for Laurentian University in Sudbury; a new Department of University Affairs; a new Crown corporation to be established for the purpose of assisting universities with their capital construction programme.

In view of these announcements, Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised at the statement of the Council of University Faculty Associations, which criticized the provincial government prior to the hon. Provincial Treasurer's Budget statement. This association claimed that the government was only giving universities in this province about 60 per cent of what they asked for. Nowhere do I recall seeing the actual amount requested; as a result of the Budget we now know why. I would suggest that this association submit concrete proposals of how the province is to continue to meet the cost of the tremendous expanding needs for institutions of higher learning.

How refreshing it would be if members of the faculty association made the logical suggestion that universities prepare for the day when classes will be held 11 or 12 months of the year. The extra term this would provide would mean tremendous savings to the already overburdened taxpayers of this province, many of whom did not have the advantages now available to Ontario's young people.

Granted the trimester scheme, for example, poses many problems and is complex from an administrative point of view. It will take time and study to adopt this programme, in a going institution particularly, but it is a start.

I predict, Mr. Speaker, that university education will be free, in Ontario by 1970, for many students. Imagine the cost! Some sacrifices therefore will have to be made. I do not think anyone in this House considers universities as factories. We realize that to change long-time accepted methods will take consideration.

We are told that Ontario is suffering a "brain drain" to the United States of America because of higher salaries and better research facilities. It is not uncommon for engineers, doctors, particularly specialists, dentists and even lawyers, to be paid more for their services south of the border. If, however, the spread is out of line as far as teachers and professors are concerned, the situation should be corrected. We must remember that the United States is a wealthier country than ours, with many more people and sources of revenue. More American universities, for example, have been heavily endowed by industries in the United States, making possible elaborate research facilities at many colleges. Possibly there should be more encouragement and incentive to induce industry in Ontario and Canada to play a more important role in helping to provide these facilities.

I would like to quote from a recent issue of a Toronto daily newspaper, a statement by Dr. Hagey, president of Waterloo University:

"Present government-university relations are such that one might expect mistrust and misunderstanding because of lack of adequate communications and adequate knowledge of the total financial university problem. It is not entirely the government's fault," Dr. Hagey said.

He claimed universities had failed to work together adequately. There was no organization qualified to speak for all of them.

When he left industry to go into university a decade ago, Dr. Hagey said he was surprised to find "there was just as great a tendency on the part of the big toads in the puddle to look down their academic noses at the small ones, as there was on the part of big companies in industry."

The faculty association, Mr. Speaker, would be a definite asset, co-operating with The Department of Education and suggesting ways and means to meet this challenge, as well as the requirements for research, additional courses and post-graduate studies.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members of this assembly who have criticized the Budget, up until now for the most part, have not been sincere in their remarks. I would like to quote from Hansard, page 661 of the issue of February 17 last, quoting the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher):

What are the general responsibilities of this or any other government, insofar as taxation and expenditures are concerned? I would say that they would be roughly as follows:

To provide the services of government required by the people in a businesslike fashion, as economically as possible, always remembering the financial limitation of the taxpayers involved and remembering, too, that we are in competition with other provinces, neighbouring states and indeed other countries, not only in matters of costs but in matters of government services.

I find myself, Mr. Speaker, in total agreement with that statement, yet the hon. member for Bruce, like the other hon. members of his group sitting at desks coloured red, voted with those hon. members sitting at desks coloured green, for a Medicare programme that would, among other things, add a two per cent corporation tax to industry in this province, a surcharge on income tax as well, and I predict at least two per cent to the existing sales tax.

Quoting again from the hon. member for Bruce at page 662:

More and more of our citizens and more and more of our corporations are going to ask the question: "Why live in Ontario and be taxed more, when in the states of Michigan or California we can make more and be taxed less?" It is as simple as that.

Nowhere really, Mr. Speaker, as the financial critic of the Liberal Party, does he offer constructive suggestions as to how the government can avoid some increase in taxes without detrimentally affecting the progressive programme that is planned and needed for the people of the province.

Turning now to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) in his criticism of the Budget, I must say indeed, as he has said, that there is no similarity, Mr. Speaker, between his words and the words of the hon. member for Bruce, or the words of the prospective leader of the Liberal Party, the hon. member for Bracondale (Mr. Gould).

The NDP financial critic's philosophy is that the only road to economic expansion and prosperity is via bigger deficits. The hon. member for Woodbine says—and I am quoting from Hansard:

We must spend, and only in this way will industry and business prosper. Debt, both private and public, is the life blood of our economy. The real problem is not the size of the debt but the degree of growth that we can expect in the future. Bold leadership, not conservative caution, is what is needed.

I would like to quote, Mr. Speaker, from the Rural Co-operator, a copy of which we all received in our mail last week. Under the heading, "We agree we must pay for what we get," it deals with the remarks of various hon. members of the House, particularly the hon. member for Woodbine in his criticism of the Budget.

Rather than being sacrificed on the altar of 19th century balanced budget orthodoxy, we are afraid NDP spokesman would sacrifice us on the altar of 20th century orthodoxy—buy now, pay later.

I am also quoting from an editorial which I think is timely. The editor, Mr. Musgrove, of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, said:

Democracy cannot exist as a permanent form of government. It only can exist until the voters discover they can vote themselves largesse out of the public Treasury. From that moment on, the majority always votes for the candidate promising the most benefits from the public Treasury, with the result that democracy always collapses over a loose fiscal policy, always to be followed by a dictatorship and then a monarch.

I do not necessarily agree with the last phrase, but I think in whole this certainly applies and is quite valid and true today.

Mr. Speaker, we can picture Pogo saying to Albert:

Albert, my man-eating friend, it says here that the independent Presbyterian member from Mariposa submits that largesse is getting less and less. Sir Albert, that reminds me of the very valid and time-worn political adage said by people like Sir Winston and even FDR: "Them that hollers, gets."

Maybe I am old-fashioned, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot accept the theory that great government spending in itself, requiring high taxes and big deficits indicate leadership, bold or otherwise. The hon. member for Woodbine quoted the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which he suggested supported big deficits, as admitting that deficits of recent years have not contributed to economic growth, that an important reason for growing deficits has been the slack demand conditions, and that faster growth should serve to reduce the deficit.

Last week, in dealing with his criticism of The Treasury Department estimates, the hon.

member for Woodbine again reiterated his stand that borrowing and big deficits were the way to progress. Propounding this economic doubletalk and confusion further, our celestial economist, the hon. member for Woodbine, said before the TV cameras that evening of Budget day that the increased taxes announced by the provincial government would detrimentally affect the economic expansion of the province. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to be an economist, but I was always under the impression that the modernized Keynesian theory of budgeting and investment was for the most part acceptable to most politicians and economists: The idea that governments should spend heavily during periods of recession and try to balance the budget when the economy was buoyant. In the United States, the federal government is in fact proposing a reduction in taxes to stimulate the economy. I hope the move is a success. Certainly the correct theory is that business expansion and investment, the development of our resources and trade, and the increase in consumer buying, are not encouraged by burdensome taxation.

We must remember that politicians do not create wealth. Our expanding economy and prosperity depends mainly on those hundreds and hundreds of people making hundreds and hundreds of decisions every day—planning, manufacturing, distributing and selling products both at home and abroad. Certainly we must provide the educational facilities, the social services and the administration which will encourage and assist this expansion and new techniques to provide thousands of new jobs every year.

We must convince Canadians, Mr. Speaker, to invest in Canada. For example, sons should be encouraged to develop the same pride and initiative of their fathers in retaining, establishing, operating and developing their own businesses, instead of selling to foreign companies. Women, who control nearly 70 per cent of the wealth in this country, should be convinced that it might be just as lucrative to invest in a mine in northern Ontario as in Bell Telephone or CPR. I might add that some of our trust company counsellors are a little too conservative in much of their advice to their female clients. I use a small "c" there, Mr. Speaker. We must remember that we do not have a monetary printing press at Queen's Park.

The sinews of this province will not be strengthened and developed by a period of high taxes and big deficits. I think and I hope that we can administer the affairs of this province so that our democratic system of free, competitive enterprise will still flourish. Then, for example, we can implement a medical health programme without still heavier taxation. Also, in this way we can meet still another challenge of this decade, automation.

I find myself, Mr. Speaker, in agreement with many of the things said about automation by the hon. members of this assembly from all political parties. I think that those of us who attended that committee meeting a week or so ago on labour bills, have done a great deal of thinking ever since. Here was a packed committee room, an overflow crowd, standing in the aisles and in the hallway. These men were operating engineers, objecting to certain provisions in an Act which could result in loss of jobs for many of them.

At first these gentlemen appeared slightly hostile, but I felt in the end more signs of worry and apprehension. Was this the first of modern legislation required in the age of automation? As one gentleman said to me, a man from my own bailiwick who is an operating engineer, "Although certain changes and amendments may be necessary in this bill, basically the proposed legislation is good. It is bound to come. We cannot stop it, but if many of us lose our jobs you know who will be blamed."

I think this illustrates the necessity of immediate planning between government, management and labour to meet this challenge. I feel that our Departments of Labour, Economics and Development are aware of this challenge and are doing something about it. The symposium held last fall and the publication resulting from this meeting are a good start and the departments are to be commended.

Certainly, management must realize that its status in our society will change drastically if automation means large-scale layoffs in our working force. Remember that an operating engineer is a skilled man. What about the thousands and thousands of unskilled workers who will be affected by technological changes? I think labour's attitude, for the most part, regarding automation has been reasonable. We must both accept and welcome it. We must woo it, and the inevitable marriage must be more than one of convenience.

Mr. Speaker, we know that we must succeed in our common objective of encouraging and stimulating economic growth and high employment. Business and industry realizes its stake in the future. If the challenge is not met, if hard work and initiative and a healthy business climate are not the criterion, we will fail. The result will be a rigidly planned economy with more government spending and control.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this Budget debate, it had been my original intention merely to confine myself to one topic, but a few new thoughts have occurred to me since planning my remarks in this debate. Very briefly, by way of introduction, I want to deal with one or two additional matters which have come to my attention.

For instance, this morning, Mr. Speaker, I received through the good offices of the hon. Minister of Travel and Publicity (Mr. Auld) a great propaganda sheet called Ontario Government Services. It has the label of his department down at the bottom of it, the coat-of-arms of the province, and he claims credit for it.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): A picture of him?

Mr. Singer: No, it has not got a picture, but it has propaganda.

Mr. Sopha: Unusual.

Mr. Singer: It tells us, for instance, that we have a small interim surplus in our budgeting. Then it goes on to great detail, Mr. Speaker, to deal only with the current Budget, through the better part of the propaganda sheet. I do not know why the hon. Minister does not believe that the daily newspapers can do an adequate job of reporting what was in the Budget; why he feels it is necessary to put out only part of the story in an effort, I suppose, to delude those people who might not have read the news coverage of the Budget.

One of the most interesting things dealt with in this particular propaganda sheet is the effort of the cartographer who drew the map on page four. He somehow has not been able to clear up the respective positions of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, and has moved Lake Ontario substantially to the west of its actual position and shows it immediately south of Tilbury.

I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, since we are spending valuable Ontario dollars, apparently, for the better propaganda efforts of this government, that at least they would be somewhat accurate when they prepare this sort of nonsense to send out to the voters of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to comment somewhat briefly, too, on this whole question of hate literature. Several hon. members have already spoken about it. I have, in my possession, some of the more horrible examples of this literature. I am not going to give it dignity and importance that it does not deserve by reading it into the record. Suffice to say that those hon. members who have had an opportunity to examine this literature, I am certain, share with me the real abhorrence that can only be directed to this type of insidious, dangerous, and vile propaganda that has been hurled at us from sources which apparently are not too well known at the moment.

My suggestion in this regard, Mr. Speaker, is a very simple one. I believe that, in a province where we have evolved the intelligence to remove from the book shelves a book such as Fanny Hill, surely there must be sufficient intelligence in the minds of our law enforcement officials and the people who write the laws, to work out a system whereby this literature can be removed from public circulation?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in a province which prides itself, and rightly prides itself, on having the first code of human rights—the province which led the way in establishing statutes which prohibit discrimination in employment practices and which prohibits discrimination in accommodation—surely such a province, through the good offices of its chief law enforcement officer, the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass), and through his advisers, and through all of the rest of the talent that is available, should be able to evolve some system of removing this poison from our mails, an elementary method by which it is being distributed.

I recognize, immediately, Mr. Speaker, that we get into a very serious problem of jurisdiction, the provisions of The British North America Act, which assigned to the Parliament of Canada the responsibility of enacting criminal laws. But I recognize as well that we have, within the jurisdiction of this Legislature, the hon. Attorney General and his law enforcement officers, who have the responsibility of enforcing law. I recognize that, within the jurisdiction of this Legislature, we have very able people who have been charged with the responsibilities of enforcing these laws. It would be my urgent suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Attorney General put the best intelligence, the best brains available within his department, or if necessary to move outside of it, to evolve a system whereby this poison will no longer infest us—and, if necessary, to take off to Ottawa and, in consultation with such persons as the Minister of Justice in Ottawa and the Postmaster General, or whatever other federal officials there are, to work out either a system of laws or a system of enforcement of the present laws which will once and for all indicate to those maniacs in our society, that the people of Ontario will not tolerate this poison for any longer period of time.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to speak very briefly, too, about this whole question of hospital shortage. There was a point raised earlier today by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis), in connection with a motion put before the House, which you, sir, ruled out of order. I expressed my opinion on that ruling, but the point is, at the moment, I now have the opportunity to comment on this.

This matter was dealt with at some substantial length during the course of the estimates of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond); and I would say, sir, that the hon. Minister of Health did not answer the problem. It was proven beyond any doubt that there is a serious hospital shortage in Metropolitan Toronto. No amount of juggling with figures, or adjusting percentages backwards and forwards, is going to prove that there is not a hospital shortage in Metropolitan Toronto. And no amount, Mr. Speaker, of putting blame onto other shoulders is going to avoid the fact that the hon. Minister of Health is the responsible Minister in this case—and through him, his government has had the substantial responsibility for this shortage.

No amount of explanations from government sources is going to change the fact that hospital beds cost $20,000 each to build, and that the donations given by the various levels of government fall far short of providing the necessary dollars to build the number of hospital beds the people of Metropolitan Toronto require. Surely there cannot be any better witness to this case, Mr. Speaker, than Dr. Neilson, the chairman of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission? He has said clearly, unmistakably, and has been quoted this way in the press, that there is a tragic shortage of hospital beds in Metropolitan Toronto.

I have been waiting anxiously to hear the hon. Minister of Health rise in his place before the orders of the day and say, "At long last I have seen the light. At long last I believe these things that I read in the paper, and that I have heard in the House, that there is a shortage of hospital beds!" Such facts as because a hospital lacks beds, a child died going from one to the other; the editorial suggestions in some of our papers that there are systems of financing hospital beds and doing away with this shortage; the suggestion made by Leonard Bertin, in an article in one of the daily papers, about the critical shortages of hospital beds; or the front page editorial which was referred to earlier today in the Toronto Daily Star, that this province is taking money under false pretences when it is now raising the premiums on hospital insurance because people who are paying those premiums are not going to be guaranteed the hospital beds that they are now being asked to pay for.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is rather tragic that in this province of ours with this case so well built, with the criticism so firmly established, all we have had during this session of the Legislature from the hon. Minister of Health is a childish juggling of figures in an effort to prove by statistics and percentages something that just is not the case. The fact remains that there is a hospital shortage. The fact remains that this is likely to continue for an indefinite period of time unless the hon. Minister of Health and his colleagues do something about it. The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Health and his colleagues have not done anything about it at all. And the fact remains that this tragedy needs immediate attention, and the people of Ontario are entitled to this attention, and the government has very dismally failed in giving this matter this sort of attention. Enough for the hospital shortage.

Mr. Speaker, the matter to which I want to turn my attention at some length deals with the control of securities and the stock market in the province. Anyone who follows the debates of this House must realize that the province of Ontario occupies a dominant place in the economic and financial life of Canada. Even the hon. members on this side of the House will agree that this province has achieved and maintained first rank among its competitors, and that a substantial part of the gross national product is generated and consumed right in this province. This success is, in no small measure, attributable to the fact that down through the years the province has offered a stable, yet vital and vigorous market place for the manufacturer and a secure financial climate for the investor. What stability and security can guarantee, opportunity can enhance, and this province is blessed with a generous measure of both. But to say all this, to admit quite candidly the economic climate is healthy, is not to suggest that we have by any stretch of the imagination achieved the Utopia, in which further perfection, further achievement, further growth is not possible. No, Mr. Speaker, as proud as we may be of this province—a province of opportunity, as this government is so fond of saying—we must yet contend that there still remain problems to solve, answers to find and disagreements to resolve.

Today, I would like to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to but one area in which I believe the government has an obligation to act to safeguard the rights of the average citizens and improve the economic outlook. I refer specifically to that branch of the hon. Attorney General's department which is charged with the responsibility of administering legislation dealing with the buying and selling of securities, the Ontario Securities Commission.

I disclose no secrets, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, when I say that we on this side of the House are less than happy with the operation of this commission, and more particularly less than happy with the legislation from which the commission derives its power. There are those on both sides of this House who must surely agree with the judgment of the Toronto Daily Star editorial writer who remarked on December 22 of last year, and I quote in part:

Creating the impression that the stock market is just a happy hunting ground for sharpies and that only suckers risk their money there, helps to dry up the flow of domestic capital which this country so badly needs.

Let me make it perfectly clear that my colleagues and I on this side of the House are deeply concerned that this very calamity will surely come to pass unless the government takes early and effective action to forestall it. There is a distinct feeling that Shakespeare, speaking in King Lear, spoke for the small investor when he said this:

As flies to wanton boys, are we to gods,
They kill us for their sport.

The small investor feels that in the operation of the market place he is entirely at the mercy of forces he cannot control—that a great grey "they" manipulates everything to their own advantage. As long as that feeling of uncertainty, doubt and confusion persists, the average investor will be uneasy and an unwilling participant in the potential growth of this province.

When the small investor reads through the financial pages of the daily newspapers or the business papers, what does he find? Reports of mysterious and incomprehensible mergers in which the people with inside information reap enormous profits at the expense of uninformed shareholders; high-ranking corporate executives making pious and vociferous declarations of their opposition to takeover bids, and then quietly disappearing for a convenient vacation while their company is taken over; again with huge profits for those in the know, alarming reports of security commission probes that look suspiciously inadequate when more and more damaging information is dug up by the press or the politicians—

An hon. member: The hon. Attorney General does not believe it.

Mr. Singer: —and finally, a deep feeling of frustration as he tries to secure the information about his company's operations, information that the shareholder believes his position as a shareholder, no matter how small, should entitle him to. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that he has become disillusioned? Is it any wonder that he funnels his money into channels which do not feed the main stream of the country's economy? Is it any wonder that he ends up encouraging by his own default the gradual acquisition of voting control of great Canadian companies by foreigners?

Mr. Sopha: Schlitz!

Mr. Singer: That is a good example. The hon. member for Sudbury, sir, mentioned Schlitz; that is an excellent example of the sort of thing we see happening. What are the causes of this discontent, what are the safeguards that a shareholder needs? I believe that Mr. McArthur, the financial editor of the Star stated the case most succinctly in a pre-Christmas column. He said in part of the discussion of the Ontario Securities Commission and the need for new securities and company law, as well as stronger enforcement legislation:

Some gaping holes exist in the present law. There is no coherent law to govern profit and trading in stock by insiders. There is nothing on how shareholders should be treated in takeover offers. There is nothing to ensure complete investigations by the securities commission.

And that, Mr. Speaker, is our condemnation against this government. Each of these three points represents an indictment of this government for inaction and irresponsibility.

Let us look at them one by one. When you try to discover what protection the average Canadian shareholder has against insiders profiting unduly from stock transactions, you quickly realize he is as defenceless as a newborn lamb in a jungle full of ravenous wolves. There have been several such transactions in recent months in which company officials or their brokers have apparently gained enormous profits. Every such story has an immediate tangible reaction among small investors. Every repetition undermines, perhaps even to the point of destruction, confidence in the operation of the market place. It is easy to say, as the hon. Attorney General has on previous occasions, that maligned shareholders have recourse to action in law. This may be true in theory, Mr. Speaker, certainly it is not true in practice.

The small investor can scarcely be blamed for taking the attitude, "What's the use of trying to fight city hall?" His resources in terms of money and information are pygmies compared to those of the people he would be trying to fight. Can you imagine a man, say, with 200 shares in a company trying to fight a takeover bid? In the first place he frequently does not know he has been short-changed until it is too late, until it is all over. Then, when he does smell a rat, he cannot afford the price of a cat to chase that rat. He is helpless.

No, Mr. Speaker, it is to government and its agencies he looks to, and rightfully so, for help and protection must be coming from that source if it is coming at all.

Only the government has the resources and the power to pursue investigations to the limit, and then to effectively prosecute. It may be true that no government has the power to legislate for manners or morals, but we on this side of the House are concerned with making sure that people, in what amounts to positions of public trust, are held accountable for their deeds, and that the people who place trust in them are protected against their wandering too far from the path of rectitude.

In the matter of enforcing the disclosure of share transactions by interested parties, the United States has long taken the lead. As most of us know, Mr. Speaker, the officers, directors and shareholders with more than 10 per cent equity interest are required by the Federal Securities Exchange Commission to divulge all their transactions in the stock of their companies. The Financial Post frequently publishes such information, gathered from reports of the securities exchange commission and the New York and American stock exchanges, with respect to transactions in the shares of Canadian companies traded in the United States.

This kind of legislation would, I am sure, go a long way to help Ontario investors have greater confidence in the operation of our exchanges.

Mr. McArthur's second point, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, was that no existing legislation says anything about how minority shareholders should be treated in takeover offers. They are completely at the mercy of the officers, directors and major shareholders.

Nevertheless, it is obvious that, in a great majority of cases, the recommendations of these people do take into consideration the position of the small investor, on the theory that what is good for one group must also be good for the other.

However, there is ample evidence that this is not always the case. There is ample evidence that people in the know benefit disproportionately in these transactions. There is ample evidence that the small investor is regarded and treated as the poor relative who is handy to have around when you need more help in financing, but becomes a burden when you move into fancier circles.

We believe, sir, that minority shareholders deserve protection against the avarice of those who control the companies which these little people are supposed to own. We believe, sir, that this government has a duty to enact legislation ensuring the full, truthful disclosure of facts pertaining to these transactions and, moreover, that adequate disciplinary legislation be written into the Act.

The third problem to which we direct your attention is the area of investigation. This, Mr. Speaker, is a word which has nasty connotations; but, nevertheless, it is a word which symbolizes the rights of the community to inquire into an individual's conduct where it impinges on the public realm.

Our system is a delicate balance between protecting the individual against frivolous or malicious persecution and ensuring that his public actions may be held up to public scrutiny.

People are fond of quoting the scriptural injunction, "Judge not, that ye be judged".

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health):
"—that ye be not judged."

Mr. Singer: "—that ye be not judged." They leave out, however, the continuation of that sentence, which reads: "Judge not, that ye be not judged, for with that judgment ye judge therewith shall ye be judged." Have I got it right now?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: What judgment do you judge. Amen.

Mr. Singer: This, Mr. Speaker, turns the statement from a condemnation of the principle of individual accountability to a warning, a caution, if you like. We are warned to look to the principles and techniques of our judging to make sure that we would be prepared to stand or fall on those same principles and techniques.

How relevant this is, Mr. Speaker, for our present dilemma. It is not judging that we need fear; it is not investigation that makes us anxious. What should concern us is that the philosophy and machinery of investigation be consonant with our highest principles.

There is already concern in many quarters about the proliferation of government agencies with semi- or quasi-judicial functions. That concern is justified, but it should express itself in making sure that these commissions, boards and hearings adhere to the fundamental principles of common law and jurisprudence.

Many of us feel, Mr. Speaker, and I am one of those, that the great threat to our country will come, not from the pressure of outside ideologies, but rather from the slow erosion of our own principles. What will kill us, destroy every vestige of what we have achieved in centuries of agonizing struggle, is not the A-bomb or the H-bomb or any other fiendish device, but rather the abandonment of our belief that the common man deserves the right to conduct his affairs in his own way—subject to one provision, that he do nothing to abridge the right of others. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the honourable assembly, that, in this area of securities and company law, we have a duty to provide legislation, to protect the average minority shareholder, and to provide investigatory and disciplinary machinery necessary to do an adequate job. We have not done it to date. In fact, we have fallen a long, long way short.

The burden of my message was best summed up by Dean Robert Dockson of the Southern California Business School, who is quoted in a recent issue of the Financial Post as saying:

If you are willing to disclose what you have done then probably it is ethical.

That principle, Mr. Speaker, turned into legislation, is what we seek. While we admire and respect the jobs which organizations like the Toronto stock exchange and the investment dealers association and others are doing in disciplining their member firms, we feel that a situation so closely related to the public realm, so influential in the economic life of this province and, subsequently, this country, demands firm, effective and above all, prompt government action.

I am recommending, Mr. Speaker, a four-point programme to achieve these goals. First of all, all public companies whose securities are qualified for sale in this province should be required to maintain adequate standards of disclosure. We want to see legislation requiring all such companies to make public their actions and transactions; and furthermore, we would like to see effective disciplinary measures for their failure to do so.

We believe, too, Mr. Speaker, that all officers, directors and majority shareholders of companies whose stock is qualified for sale in this province should be required to report any trading they do in their own company stock to the company secretary—

Mr. Sopha: They have done that in the United States for about 25 years.

Mr. Singer: —and that information should be available to any registered shareholder on request.

Mr. Sopha: Hear, hear.

Mr. Singer: Surely this is basic, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): No excuse for not doing it.

Mr. Sopha: Even the hon. Attorney General ought to be able to see it.

Mr. Singer: In case of failure to comply with such a provision, we believe the shareholders should have recourse to the courts to recover, for the benefit of the company, any profits. This is the purpose for non-disclosure; because there is profit in it. There has to be teeth put into the law to do something about it. There should be an ability to recover, for the benefit of the company, any profits gained by such insiders as a result of having access to information not available to other shareholders.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we believe that, subject to proper controls to eliminate frivolous or malicious attacks, shareholders having a cause of action against a company, its officers, directors and/or controlling shareholders, should be relieved of the cost of such action. In other words, there is no point in creating a remedy unless that remedy can be used. There is no point, Mr. Speaker, in saying, as the hon. Attorney General has done so often, and his predecessors did as well, that anybody who wants can go to the court, because it is like pitting the mouse against the lion. Unless there are the dollars available, it just will not be done, and it cannot be done.

We believe that there should be a method to allow for the payment of such costs, and that this last measure will help ensure that needed action does not go by default because of the poor financial position of an aggrieved shareholder.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that these are merely pious and idealistic hopes. They are realistic possibilities, which a government concerned about these very important matters could and should translate into action, could and should translate into legislation, without any further delay. With the exception of the last provision enabling the wronged minority shareholder to recover his costs, none of these are too original ideas. They have been put forward many times on the floor of this House, many times by the financial editors of the various newspapers in this province and many times by the members of the stock exchange, the governing members, and so on. But we do not see any action in this regard at all. And finally, Mr. Speaker, these measures are in force in other jurisdictions and they work successfully.

These suggestions are designed to restore to a high level of trust and confidence the faith of the citizens of Ontario in the operation of this important and, I may say, crucial segment of our society. It is the nature of things that we should propose and the government should dispose. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of greatest urgency and that legislation along these lines should be brought forward as soon as possible. No one regrets more than I, Mr. Speaker, that the onus for such action must lie on the present government. Had there been a different decision on September 25, such legislation would have been before the House before now.

Mr. R. J. Harris (Beaches) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Public Works, to be followed by the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko). There is a night session tomorrow night and one on Wednesday night.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always glad to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the east gallery, students from Bruce Street public school, Milton.

Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE MILK INDUSTRY ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Milk Industry Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): By way of explanation I might say, Mr. Speaker, that these amendments so introduced today are intended to tidy up certain things in The Milk Industry Act; for instance, providing uniformity of agreements between markets—that is for prescribing the form of the agreements—providing proof of financial responsibility in all dairy and processing plants, handling milk from producers, the opening up of agreements which may be called before the milk industry board for points of arbitration, and certain other amendments of a lesser significance.

THE FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Farm Products Marketing Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I thought I should like to advise the hon. members that I have today directed an inquest into the circumstances surrounding the death of Mrs. Ena Noer which occurred in the Palmerston General Hospital on March 7 last. Mrs. Noer had undergone surgery at this hospital some eight days prior to her death. An autopsy has revealed that a surgical clamp was found floating in the peritoneal cavity of the deceased.

As this is a time-consuming investigation, Dr. H. B. Cotnam, supervising coroner for Ontario, will preside at this inquest. The preliminary investigation into this matter was conducted by Dr. Frank H. Farmer, coroner in and for the county of Wellington.

Mr. John A. Hoolihan of Toronto, who was counsel at the recent similar inquest in Toronto, will act as counsel at this inquest and Inspector H. M. Purdy of the criminal investigation branch of the Ontario Provincial Police will assist Dr. Cotnam and Mr. Hoolihan in obtaining the facts to be presented to the coroner's jury.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 47th order: House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Hon. T. R. Connell (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, this is the sixth set of estimates that I have had the privilege of giving for Public Works. If I might be excused, to start off with, I congratulate you, sir, on the way you have been carrying on the chairman's job this year. Although you have been a bit quiet, and some of the hon. members have not heard you on occasion, you have nevertheless been very fair with them. I would appreciate it too, since I do not get too many opportunities on my feet, to congratulate the Speaker of this House, and I wish you might convey that to him.

With reservations to an ex-Speaker, who sits behind me in the House, I certainly think the present Speaker is the best I have known in the 13 years that I have been around here.

I might also mention, too, about the new hon. members in the House this year, on both sides of the House. I think the government of the province of Ontario and its people are to be congratulated, not only on whom they sent back, but the quality of the hon. members they sent back to this House.

I might say, in addition, to the Speaker, that—again in the few years I have been in this House—the decorum and the dignity of this House is at its highest point since I came to this House in 1951. I think there are three reasons for that: First of all, our hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) who is leading the House; secondly, our Speaker, who commands the respect of all sides of the House; and also the quality of the new hon. members.

I have not taken too much of the time of this House and I propose to be very brief today. First of all, I would like to thank my staff in The Department of Public Works for the excellent work they have been doing while I have been their Minister and, of course, many of them before that. The staff in Public Works is not nearly as large as it was in 1958, but I firmly believe that, with the quality of staff I have, they are doing a most effective job.

When I became Minister of Public Works I dedicated myself to a number of things, three of which I would like to mention to you at this time. First, I dedicated myself to attempting to bring Queen's Park back to Queen's Park. The second point was: I hope to renovate and recondition this old building to a point where it might be the show place of this province. And thirdly, to improve the working conditions of the hon. members of this House.

On the number one point, about bringing Queen's Park back to Queen's Park; particularly for the benefit of the new hon. members, I would like to explain to you that four or five years ago we did purchase between five and six acres of property to the east of the east block so that we might expand. The records showed at that time that in about five years we would need one million square feet of extra space. So then architects were appointed. We appointed four separate firms which formed one group. Since that time planning has progressed very well and to the point that this year, possibly around September 1, we hope to call for tenders on this new complex to the east.

This building will cover a great portion of the five-acre block. There will be parking for about 800 cars below ground. The first two floors will be devoted primarily to public space and the remaining four towers will be devoted to general office space for the civil servants.

On the second point, as far as the continual improvements to this building are concerned, there have been many improvements made in this building over the last few years. It had been neglected for some time. I think these improvements have been quite evident to you as far as decorating is concerned, and new flooring and this type of thing. This assembly here was decorated this summer, and I think the results have shown themselves, particularly to those hon. members who have been used to it in the old way. By the time the next government comes in here there will possibly be a few new seats added and at that time this legislative assembly will have to be completely done over, with a redivision of the seats, and possibly a different design altogether.

The third point, about providing space for the new hon. members: We are now in a position where we are starting to move on that. We have changed our plans a bit since last year. I think I told hon. members at that time that possibly members would go in the north wing. We found this was not too practical and so we are putting the major portion of the department of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) in that part. New space has already been allocated to the NDP and the Liberal party, and before the next session rolls around, we will have additional space on the main floor for the government members.

There also will be offices provided for those hon. Ministers whose regular offices are outside of this building. These offices will not be full Ministers' offices, but certainly a place where they may do some of their work while in this building. All of the hon. Ministers from outside do spend a great deal of their time in this building.

As far as the programme for this next year is concerned, it is pretty well in the blue book that was placed on your desks yesterday. I might say there have been a few changes in that blue book. It is divided into three sections. Prior to this year, in the work completed we had five years listed. We have reduced this to two years' completed work. There is another section of works planned and works under way. And then, of course, there is a third section of works requested by the various departments, and we have eliminated a lot of the minor work from this section. But I point out that the works-requested section simply means that it is something which has been requested. It is no indication that it is going to proceed at an early date.

I might say that I can report excellent progress on our trade and technological school programme with construction in full progress at London, the two schools in Ottawa and the Sault Ste. Marie school. Also, under education, we have the first stage of the Milton School for the Deaf completed. We have had a most active hospital programme and after many years—I hesitate to say how many years it has been announced around here and has been mentioned to us before—we are in the ground with the Toronto Psychiatric Hospital, we are working at the foundation and this building, after many years, is going ahead.

We are also into construction on a new health laboratory up on Highway 401 and well along with the Palmerston Hospital. We are also very active in planning, with tenders to be called this summer, on a new 600-bed hospital at London and a new hospital in the Timmins-Porcupine district.

Actually, we are very active in all departments and I would not want to burden you with those details because most of it is in the blue book. I might say that tenders are out now for the college of education at London, the dormitory of the school for the blind at Brantford, the abattoir at Guelph and a new Treasury building that is to be built on Queen's Park Crescent here in Toronto.

I think I should mention to you that I think this government has been doing a good job as far as hospital and education work is concerned. During this past year, we have opened stage 3 of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. We opened a new teachers' college at Windsor, a school of technology in Kirkland Lake, a new vocational building for the school for the deaf at Belleville, and the first stage of the Milton School for the Deaf at Milton, which I mentioned earlier.

Under health, we have opened during this past year, the Goderich Ontario Hospital. About a year ago we opened the Owen Sound hospital. We have opened at the Orillia Ontario Hospital School, a new 300-bed pavilion. We have completed the first stage of the Palmerston hospital and the Whitby Ontario Hospital Nursing School.

There are many other things that I could mention but, as I say, they are in the blue book and stating at the outset that I was going to be very brief, I hope I have set the stage for the rest of you this afternoon. I would now ask your concurrence in accepting the estimates of The Department of Public Works for this year.

On vote 1901:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville):
Mr. Chairman—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, we have had a regular routine that we followed in these estimates and I see no reason why we should depart from it at this time.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): We have no cut-and-dried system.

Mr. Oliver: This is a matter of great urgency—

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member for Windsor-Walkerville has the floor.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, thank you. May I at the outset congratulate the hon. Minister of Public Works on his presentation this afternoon. It was very brief as he had suggested it was going to be and we appreciate that on this side of the House.

The hon. Minister brought up three points for which he is to be commended. One is that he is going to bring Queen's Park back to Queen's Park. I wonder if it is Queen's Park back to Queen's Park in Toronto or in London?

Mr. Letherby: London.

Mr. Newman: He has also mentioned the renovation of the building. As we walk about the building we can see that a good job has been done, and when it is complete this building certainly will be a pride and joy to visitors coming into the area.

The third point is the working conditions for members. The working conditions have improved and we can foresee a considerable improvement in them. For this we thank the hon. Minister.

However, he has presented his estimates for the department for six years now, and for five of these six years I have been privileged to hear them. I can only say that when the hon. Minister played football he certainly learned the game well, because once again he sidestepped the main issues in public works and left us with very little information as to the real concrete, definite plan for future construction.

I will have to understand that he is really the "do it" department of the government, that it is up to the various other departments to give the priority to their projects. However, there seems to be no definite plan whatsoever. Other than the development of the Queen's Park complex, there is not today and never has been any real Department of Public Works long-range plan for government construction.

Sure there is a plan for the immediate year, but this is only a hit-and-miss method of planning, this is only political expediency, not planning. This takes care generally of what should have been done long ago but was neglected for obvious reasons.

Mr. Chairman, for the year ending 1959, this department did not spend, or unexpended, a total of $17.4 million worth of its budget. In 1960 it went up to an enormous $27.5 million. In 1961, it was $13.1 million. In 1962, it was $15.2 million and in 1963, $11.9 million. This totals, Mr. Chairman, $85 million. Surely such astronomical figures must indicate a lack of some real planning.

Mr. Chairman, all one has to do is to look into the works programme blue book—and it certainly does make one blue to look into it—for the last four years and count the pages to see that there does not seem to be any real plan for the future. The number of pages, excluding this year's, have dwindled from 66 to 64 to 57; not counting this year's, which is 44, because the programme this year lists only projects that have been completed within the last two years, or lists projects which the hon. Minister thinks have only been completed in the last two years.

Yet we all know the great need for public works projects. We know their value when it comes to alleviating unemployment conditions.

Mr. Chairman, in a random check of The Department of Public Works programme for the last three fiscal years under New Building Provided for The Department of Highways, one finds little or no change in the contents of the page. To be explicit, Mr. Chairman, page 11 of the department works programme for 1961-62 is almost identical with page 12 of 1962-63 and with page 12 of the 1963-64 programme. In other words, Mr. Chairman, once a building is in any stage of thought or consideration, even if it is included somewhere, even if a glimpse in the eye of the hon. Minister, it is included in the programme.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: The project generally, or up until today this year has not been removed up until five years have elapsed. We would like to commend the hon. Minister today because this is the first time in the five years that I have been in this House that we have been presented with the works programme as much as 24 hours in advance.

Mr. Chairman, the way it has been in the past a project may be included in this blue book for as long as 10 years. If the hon. Minister insists on including accomplishments of the department during the past years, then he should also include projects in this blue book, under New Projects Requested, a priority for the various projects as well as a construction timetable.

In the hon. Minister's "projects under way, or being planned," those that are being planned should be identified from those that are actually under way. Why is the hon. Minister not much more specific in his report?

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister's report should include, under New Buildings Provided During the Past year, the following:

1. The name of the successful bidder;
2. the date the tender was assigned;
3. the tender price;
4. the date of the completion of the project; and,
5. the final total cost.

I make the above suggestions because as one reads the annual report of The Department of Public Works for 1963 under The Department of Highways—pages 28, 29 and 30—one finds such contrasts in the time it has taken various contractors to complete projects that one wonders why such foot-dragging is tolerated.

Mr. Letherby: I would like to know who wrote your speech.

Mr. Newman: I certainly would not ask you to write it.

An hon. member: That will keep you quiet.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Simcoe East had understood anything he would have known in the first place that he had no right to be getting on his feet as he did earlier this afternoon.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I am going to read pages 28, 29 and 30 of the hon. Minister's report just to show the construction time of some contractors as opposed to others:

Welcon Construction Limited in Guelph received a $39,895 contract in October, 1962, for a garage. It is 30 per cent completed.

Number two, Shelburne. The Burlington Construction of Burlington received a $36,297 contract on January 29; the job has not even started.

Number three, Goshen. The construction of this garage began in September, 1961. Welcon Construction Limited of Guelph were builders at a contract price of $37,356. The project was completed and an inspection made in May, 1963, almost two years after the original date of assignment of tender. Surely it does not take two years to complete a $37,000 project?

Number four, the construction of a garage. This garage began in October 1962. It is being built for a contract price of $40,000 by Daly Construction in Guelph. It is only 60 per cent done.

Les Bertram and Sons, Barrie contractors, received a $37,956 contract in November 1962, to build a garage. The construction is only 37 per cent completed.

In Courtland. The Thomas Construction Company of Galt was awarded a $37,695 contract early in February, 1963. Construction has not yet started.

Now the hon. Minister will say this report ends March 31, 1963. Well, if it does, then we notice in the third item that inspection had been completed in May, 1963, so surely there must be some cross-up in the relaying of information.

Now there is a contract, Mr. Chairman, in Crystal Beach near Brockville, for construction of a garage which was started in the latter part of 1961 and was fully completed in June of 1962. Dodge Construction Company Limited, Cardinal, received $44,000 for this contract. There you can see the difference in time required to complete a job.

In Brampton in March, 1962, the Ramsay Contracting Company Limited of Toronto was given a $62,000 contract to build a garage on the northeast corner of the intersection of Highway 401 and 10. This is a one storey, 163 by 42 foot building of brick, concrete block and steel joists, with a flat roof. It was finished in September, 1962. Only six months to complete a $62,000 contract.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is time that this department took things in hand and had a completion date written into all contracts. It is too bad that elections do not take place more often than every four years, because one never sees such activity and such scurry and hurry to get projects completed, as one does just before an election. Once the election is over, projects seem to go back to their old snail's pace.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring up a topic which has been discussed time and time again in this House. It is the question of wages—a fair wage clause in government contracts.

I know it will be said that existing legislation covers hours and wages. However, I must say that the mere inclusion of hours and wages, without a wage schedule for a particular area, is not fair or acceptable to the contractor who pays premium wages. He is at once barred or, should I say, handicapped, when it comes to bidding on government projects. He is interested in paying wages high enough to provide his employees with an income which will meet the cost of living and other conditions in the community. His competitor may take advantage of such a surplus of labour in a given area and exploit the unemployed.

To make it fair to all, I would suggest that the fair wage clause be supported by a schedule of wages written in, so that bidders and sub-contractors know just how much they can be expected to pay for labour in any given community. The absence of such a provision is unfair to labour and equally unfair to bona-fide good employers.

Tenders for these government contracts are public. Unless the terms of the labour—which is the integral part of most contracts—are specifically laid down then it is quite reasonable to suggest that a contractor who employs cheaper labour, or one who employs scant labour, if I may use the term, would be in a position to tender a lower price—not because he is able to provide the service cheaper, not because of his organizational ability, but rather because he made a practice of hiring labour which is willing to work for less than the standard recognized rate.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister says that in his department they insist on good planning; good planning architecturally, I presume. Here he is to be commended for such comments. But, Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that it is not always the case. The pathogen-free swine building at the federated colleges in Guelph—I had an opportunity to visit the area on one of the tours conducted recently, and I was most impressed with the facilities there—I am told, was planned with a radiant heating unit in the concrete floor. This unit was installed but never put into operation, because certain atmospheric conditions were not taken into consideration in the planning stage.

The teachers' college in Sandwich West has a gymnasium right next to the library—the noisiest room in the school next to the one which should command absolute silence.

This same teachers' college has a three-tiered gallery, so set that a person sitting in the second or third set of seats cannot see one third of the gymnasium floor.

Then, there is the Ryerson Institute of Technology, right here in Toronto. I do not know of any school I have visited which has such wide corridors. You can practically play basketball down the corridors.

Mr. Letherby: Do you like the nice narrow ones?

Mr. Newman: I would like to be reasonable in the width of the corridors. This is taxpayers' money we are putting down the drain, and it is time such practices stopped.

Mr. Letherby: Shove a wagon load of food down them!

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): You are not being very helpful.

Mr. Newman: I wish the hon. member for Simcoe East would get up immediately after I complete my remarks and give us some really good constructive comments. It is too bad it did have to snow, because he could be home instead.

Mr. Letherby: Imagine complaining about the corridors!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, is this good planning? I have mentioned only three instances of poor planning of which I know personally. How many more could one find throughout this province?

The study prepared by the committee of presidents of provincially assisted universities, commonly referred to as the Deutsch report, made in 1962 and revised in January, 1963, made certain comments concerning post-secondary education. I know the hon. Minister does what is recommended by other departments. However, I would like to read this into the record, because this shows, if not poor planning on his part, extremely poor planning on the part of the government.

Where the present enrolment in technological institutes in Ontario is 3,800, and unless the enrolment of 6,000 is to be reached in a few years and a further expansion is to take place before 1970, this proposal, in the committee's opinion, will be inadequate for the needs of the province.

We found that out last September when students attempted to enrol at Ryerson that there were well over 400 who could not get in because of lack of space.

It is not too much to say that the progress of industrial development in Ontario, in a few years' time, will be hamstrung if we fail to raise our sights in technological education. Yet the institutes in Hamilton and Toronto may be turning away well-qualified applicants in the near future for the want of space.

We recommend strongly that a capacity of the order of 18,000, rather than 6,000, be the goal for the expansion of technological institutes by 1970. Mr. Chairman, with the large numbers of composite schools and new technical schools, a crash programme is needed today if we intend to achieve that 18,000 objective by 1970.

Mr. Chairman, two years ago the hon. Minister mentioned that his department had saved the taxpayers of this province at least 30 per cent by having work that was normally done by his department done by a general contractor. For two years this policy has been in operation. Would he now care to expand on his original statement and assure the House that what he said at that time is still as true today? Or has he found, in the meantime, that costs estimated by his department are just as high or as low as those of general contractors? We will anxiously await a reply from the hon. Minister later.

Apparently the department is another governmental department which has staff problems. Only 69 of the 99 survey requests submitted to the surveys division were completed in the year ending March 31, 1963. The master plans, to be used in conjunction with the new property directory, have been delayed through lack or loss of staff. May I ask the hon. Minister if such delays will not prejudice the development of the Queen's Park area? What is being done to recruit a competent staff to see that the backlog of work is carried out?

Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that it is not unreasonable to install air-conditioning, certainly in all new public buildings where people are required to work steadily throughout the day. I think the time has come when it should be a matter of policy. Exhaustive tests conducted into the effects of air-conditioning on working efficiency speak for themselves. It is good business to air-condition public buildings. I was most pleased to see that air-conditioning equipment was installed for The Department of Highways at Downsview. Let us make air-conditioning an integral part of all future construction where people must work.

Mr. Chairman, I was just wondering if the department maintains a research division—research into new construction materials, new processes, research into types of construction, to facilitate maintenance, and research into maintenance materials. Since this department is responsible for the maintenance of many buildings throughout the province and as it hires its own staff, it must purchase large quantities of maintenance supplies, cleaners, brooms, brushes, portable cleaners, electric light bulbs and so forth. Does this department ask for public tenders for these various supplies? Does it write specifications for many of its requirements? Does it require that supplies, equipment and furniture purchased be made in Canada?

Mr. Chairman, on April 5, 1962, the hon. Minister, speaking on the occasion of his estimates, commented: "We shall reach a point in the not-too-distant future when further decentralization of government will be compulsory." Mr. Chairman, that not-too-distant future is right now. It is now that this government should seriously consider the further decentralization of its activities. It is all well and good to build a large complex, to house the numerous offices of the many departments in the government in one central location. But try as you may, it is impractical and impossible to accommodate them all in the Queen's Park area. "It is much too costly a programme to house the many departments—"

Mr. Letherby: That is why I want it brought up to Orillia.

Mr. Newman: If the hon. member would please wait until I completed my remarks, he would find out that I am making that suggestion.

Mr. Letherby: Thanks a lot.

Mr. Newman: "It is much too costly a programme to house the many departments in this vicinity; with the price of real estate in this immediate area as high as it is, it is not too realistic to think of buying or building sufficient office space here in Queen's Park."

This last sentence was a quotation from the very mouth of the hon. Minister. Mr. Chairman, it is very good to hear such remarks. Does this not all point out the need for more serious consideration to the idea of decentralizing government? The Department of Highways' 2,000-odd personnel are not housed in the Queen's Park vicinity. The Department of Education is now elsewhere. The Ontario Hospital Services Commission is in a third location, the Ontario Water Resources Commission in a fourth, The Department of Labour, a fifth, and the Workmen's Compensation Board in a sixth.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on and on to show that decentralization is a fact, a reality. Most of the departments that I have mentioned above are now in permanent quarters and some more than likely will not be brought back into the Queen's Park complex.

The government has seen in its wisdom, or lack of it, the fact that it is good to scatter some of the departments to other areas of Metropolitan Toronto. May I ask that it consider not just the decentralization into the Metro area, but a real decentralization into all areas of Ontario?

Small towns and villages asked for a decentralization of industry, have asked to be allowed to take part in the industrial and economic growth of Ontario. Here is one way that this government can give transfusions to the economic life of many areas of this province. Is there any reason why the Ontario Hospital Services Commission could not have been located in Orillia? Or Coldwater, to please the hon. member. Is there any reason why the Ontario Water Resources Commission headquarters could not have been located in some other community? Is there any reason why The Department of Highways headquarters could not have been located in a different community? I have just mentioned three different departmental headquarters. Others could be added to this list.

I know it will be said that when people come out from the various towns, they would like to have everything to do with government centrally located, and that they would prefer to come to one central area, the Queen's Park complex, to do all of their business. It is not that way today. It will not be any more so when the Queen's Park complex is completed. Mayors, reeves, councillors and so forth, when they have business with the government, Mr. Chairman, usually wish to do it through the office of the Minister or with the Minister himself. All Ministers' offices will be centrally located anyway. It would not be difficult for the head office to get in touch with any department, or get in touch with any departmental official by telephone. Think of the future when telephonic television will be a reality. Conversation and discussion will be face to face whether the call originates from the Minister's office at Queen's Park or in The Department of Highways at Downsview. Or another department in Orillia.

Mr. Chairman, the decentralization of government should be given most serious consideration for any number of reasons. Allow me to list several. First, the cost of real estate in the Queen's Park area is reaching an unrealistic figure. These are the words of the hon. Minister. Second, decentralization would be a real transfusion to the many now industry-starved areas throughout Ontario. Three, modern means of communication, modern highways and air transport make every area of this province reachable in a matter of minutes or hours. Four, for the sake of more uniform development of the whole province, it should be considered very desirable. Five, in the case of nuclear warfare, it would be a distinct advantage to have the various offices which comprise government scattered throughout the province. Six, it would be substantially cheaper to buy properties and to build facilities in smaller areas.

Mr. Chairman, Ontario prospers best when all parts of Ontario prosper. I have listed six good reasons for the cause of decentralization. Many more could be given.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister why his department and not The Department of Labour is involved with boiler inspection work? Is it good policy to have work that is under the supervision of one department inspected by the same department? Mr. Chairman, are fallout shelters included in all of the plans of public works buildings? If not, why not?

Mr. Chairman, apparently the new procedures have been approved by the Cabinet committee, concerning fire insurance and the need for public liability coverage. I thought the hon. Minister would enlarge on this procedure.

Mr. Chairman, what is the government's policy concerning leasing and building? Is there any move on its part to consolidate government offices in major centres in which government-owned properties are located? At what point does it consider it proper to lease or to build?

Mr. Chairman, I cannot be critical of everything done by this department. I must commend the department for its safe driving programme, instituted in 1957, when the department, having 118 units driven for about 1.5 million miles, had only $153 in accident damage for one year's operation. Such a record is commendable and worthy of emulation by other departments. The hon. Minister's secret should be passed on to the other departments.

Mr. Chairman, I have made a few remarks concerning The Department of Public Works and I know my colleagues, as the estimates are called, will have others in which to complete our comments.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I heard the hon. Minister's plea that we be brief, and I think I can assure him in advance that I shall. I have a collection of assorted comments on various aspects of the estimates. They will be brief in themselves, and certainly in toto.

I would like to say, particularly after the comments of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, in which, Mr. Chairman, with respect, I think he has confused a bit of the picture, that I personally, and I am certain our group, supports the general proposition of bringing Queen's Park back to Queen's Park.

Where, I should think, some confusion has been introduced into the picture by the last speaker, is that the question of whether or not, and to what extent, one should decentralize government within the province of Ontario is one issue. Within departments like Lands and Forests, Highways, Attorney General—since the courts come under this hon. Minister's jurisdiction and so on—this has taken place. I am not going to pursue that at the moment. It is too complex and detailed a question to speak on, off the cuff.

Obviously, there may be merit in decentralizing to the extent that it can be done without reducing efficiency and co-ordination of policy. But I think to apply the term "decentralization" to the process which has gone on in the city of Toronto is another kind of decentralization. I have had the feeling that it was perhaps avoiding a little in terms of costs, because of the high price of land in the immediate area of Queen's Park, but that it was adding incalculable number of dollars in terms of inefficiency and waste time—not only on the part of public servants here, but of delegations and individuals who come from all over the province with business to do in a number of departments and find themselves running all around this metropolitan complex.

We certainly cannot bring all of Queen's Park back to Queen's Park. I do not know where you would put the Highways building on Highway 401 if you brought it down here, unless you put it out in the park itself here. But any reversal of the tendency to scatter physical structures all over the Metropolitan area, in the fashion we were tending to do in recent years, in my view is a good move.

I shall not dwell at any length on the comments which were made with regard to the hon. Minister's dedicated effort to provide more working facilities in this Legislature. I think he has a sure-fire item to make himself one of the most popular Ministers in the Cabinet. I hope he pursues this with all the dedication he can. I would say at this point, as things now stand at the moment, quite frankly, it is the government members who are in most need of some assistance. I think that point, in itself, should be a bit impelling for the hon. Minister.

There is one problem, Mr. Chairman, which I want to mention with regard to dealing with the estimates of The Department of Public Works and, to some extent, with Highways. I do not profess to know what the answer to this is. I must say that every time I sit on this side of the House and find these estimates placed before me, I find myself rather incapable of doing the normal job of an Opposition. Here we have a department which is coming before us today with the proposal of an expenditure of some $12.5 million or better in ordinary expenditures, and some $35 million—$36 million to be closer—of capital expenditures. Next year, the hon. Minister will come back with a statement of what has been accomplished.

It is virtually impossible to submit the expenditure of this very sizeable amount of money to the normal kind of scrutiny that I think is a function of the Opposition. I repeat I do not know what the whole answer to it is. I think the proposal of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville—that each project completed in the year should be listed when the tender was let, when it was granted, to whom it was granted, what the tender price was, when it was completed, and what the final price was—I think these are basic statistics with regard to each project, and would be a legitimate addition to public information, and to the information of this House and its hon. members as they attempt to do their job as members of the Legislature.

But certainly, and even more so when Highways comes before us with $300 million of expenditure—it is all on about two pages of estimates—it is impossible to submit that to the necessary scrutiny. Perhaps here is where the committee on public accounts, now getting into operation, can play some role. But, without having the full answer, I submit we should do more here. I present it to the hon. Minister as a suggestion that he might consider, along with the specific proposals of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

I want to make one further comment with regard to the hon. Minister's observations on the completion of the Queen's Park complex here and the building over to the east. Among the encouraging things about construction in general in recent years have been the new horizons and the new developments in architecture. When one takes a look, I suppose, the city hall is really leading the way in getting away from old patterns in architecture; and in industry, in motels, in hotels, in many kinds of structures, indeed in schools, there has been a welcome break from the rather stereotyped patterns of the past.

That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that I think it would be impossible for the hon. Minister or this government to have remained stuck in the rut more completely than they are now, in their proposals for completing the Queen's Park complex. If one takes a look, for example, at this cover for the annual report; here you have old Queen's Park with all its Victorian splendour. You may disagree with it, you may think it a bit stodgy, but at least it has some atmosphere.

But when you see those three, unrelieved, rectangular boxes which the government proposes—faceless, without any character, there are not even eaves or gargoyles, or anything there, to relieve the austere lines. I will tell you what it reminds me of, if I may tell the hon. Minister. It reminds me of nothing more than the Reich Chancellery in Berlin.

I remember, in 1945, when I spent a little time in Berlin wandering around in the rubble heap which was the interior of the Reich Chancellery and coming back—incidentally, with some very interesting souvenirs which were lying around—loot, if you wish to describe it as such—but the buildings were the most incredibly austere buildings. Outside you looked at them and they seemed to go for blocks of unrelieved repetition, all the same kind of lines; and if you take a look at this building, it is tragically in the same kind of pattern of unrelieved lines. However, if you are about to call tenders—I suppose you spent a lot of money already on the architecture which you are stuck with, but unfortunately, future generations will be stuck with it also.

I cannot help but conclude, finally, on this point, that it will not be any different from the general austerity of the whole of University Avenue; because, in spite of the centre flower beds—on which I understand they are spending $500,000; where, I do not know—I would say that University Avenue has about as unrelieved architecture, as dull and unimaginative architecture, as there is, practically anywhere in the city of Toronto. I suppose you felt you were in the same pattern and had to stick with it.

One other small point, Mr. Chairman. I am wondering what rule, if any, The Department of Public Works plays in assessing the adequacy of buildings they have been given the responsibility to construct. It may well be that this is completely beyond your jurisdiction.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, for example, referred to building for the needs of technological institutes in the province of Ontario, and the fact that it has been suggested to us by responsible people that we need 18,000 capacity, instead of the 6,000 which is now in existence, or anticipated. I want to deal with a specific case.

The hon. Minister's department is just now completing—perhaps it has completed at very recent date—the Eastern Ontario Institute of Technology in Ottawa. My information is that this building is just bulging at the seams before they have even moved into it; that the inadequacy in terms of space for staff, general inadequacy in terms of meeting the student enrolment they have at the moment, and the inevitable increase in numbers which is going to come in the next years that lie ahead, is just pathetic.

Mr. Chairman, I am puzzled as to why—and we will get to this when we get to The Department of Education—the responsible department would become involved in constructing a building the inadequacies of which are obvious even before it is completed. I mean the physical inadequacies, quite apart from anything else—

An hon. member: Before it is conceived!

Mr. MacDonald: Before it is conceived, perhaps is a more appropriate term, my hon. colleague interjects.

But I ask the hon. Minister—so that we will know where we should direct our fire henceforth—does his department in any sense at all have a review of new construction of this nature, with a view to whether or not it is going to be inadequate in terms of meeting the needs almost before you can send the workmen away and call it completed?

The final point, Mr. Chairman, that I wanted to request the hon. Minister's comment on is one which once again the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville talked about. The hon. Minister has not only dedicated himself to bringing Queen's Park back to Queen's Park and providing working facilities for the ministries, but he also, I believe it can be said accurately, dedicated himself to rearranging procedures in terms of tendering as much work as possible rather than having it done by government departments.

As we pointed out in previous years, this created some rather anomalous situations, with the government releasing people who had had employment for years, and sometimes doing it in the middle of the winter, so that they could go home and turn on the TV and hear both federal and provincial agencies pleading for other employers not to release employees in the middle of the winter.

But quite apart from that anomaly, the hon. Minister contended that he was saving a great deal of money; I have just forgotten what percentage he contended he was saving by letting tenders out. Has he got enough of a backlog of work and experience in this field to give us a more accurate assessment as to what, if any, savings he feels he is making?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I was not able to keep track of all of the 25 questions the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville asked me, and I see he has apparently left anyway. However, I will discuss the questions asked by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald), particularly the question of decentralization.

I know whoever is arguing this point could take either side and make quite a good case out of it. Certainly, as far as we are concerned here, I think when we get the Queen's Park annex built there will not be much thought of trying to bring any more government back to this area. I think that it will be pretty well filled to its capacity, and I think we are concerned not only about traffic conditions but the physical possibility of getting all these people in and out of here. I do not know what the future holds for that, none of us knows just how government growth is going to expand. We estimated five or six years ago when the study was made that we were going to need a million square feet within five or six years and it is remarkable how close this has been borne out.

There has also been criticism of the architecture of the new complex. Certainly I do not attempt to argue with architects, they are in a world of their own. I have tried to get into that world on occasion, but it is very difficult, and so I leave them pretty much on their own as far as planning and architecture is concerned. We do have four of, not necessarily the best firms in the province of Ontario, but they are four of the top firms that are designing this building.

You point out quite clearly that these look like box-type buildings, and they do, from the evidence you can see on that pamphlet. We are building a new model of this set-up and I had hoped to have it in the House but it is not completed; but I think you will find on the first two floors that there is some design there that will be quite eye-catching. We are hoping—I announced it a year ago—that we will shortly have a design competition for murals and this type of thing. We have tried—as far as I am concerned anyway —to adopt a conservative attitude toward the design of these new buildings. This is still the heart of the government in this area and these are the buildings the people will come to see. We could double up the amount of money these buildings will cost and I suppose we could have something quite elaborate, but we have tried to be practical in this set-up over here. The policy that we have been following, I think you will find out, has been quite adequate.

You also mentioned the planning of space as far as any new buildings are concerned. You mentioned the school of technology, which is not finished, in Ottawa. I cannot speak for the other departments, but as far as we are concerned The Department of Education has asked us to provide space for so many bodies and this is what we have attempted to do. Now whether you are going to build one school in, say, Ottawa to house all their needs and possibly neglect Windsor and Hamilton and some other areas—certainly we get the impression that we are limited at Budget time—so I have always been of the opinion that it is better to have a number of smaller units rather than trying to crowd them all in as we have in the school of technology here at Ryerson. On other buildings we have a yardstick that we gauge ourselves by, but we are usually guided by the requests of the department for which we are building.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has not returned. I have already answered some of his questions in these first three points.

He was discussing putting a time limit on contracts. Actually, we are not too worried how long a contractor takes to complete a project. He is pretty much on his own, outside of inspection, as far as we are concerned once he accepts that contract. I think you will find most contractors like to get a job started, they like to get on with it, and to make a profit they usually like to get through with it in good time.

If we were to put a time limit on contracts I suppose maybe they would have to pay a penalty for taking longer than what we had agreed to. We would also have to bonus them if they finished sooner than what they expected. So there are the two problems there. Most of the contractors get in and get on with the job.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville indicated three or four cases, but he did not mention the Windsor Teachers' College that was built in about 12 to 13 months under great handicaps in order to get the classes open for the school, a year ago last September, I believe it was. He failed to mention how contractors got in there and speeded the job up, by about 25 per cent I would estimate.

You bring up again about the 30 per cent saving. If you want me to, I can go into great detail on this. I have not changed my opinion one iota since I mentioned it about three or four years ago. We have a number of other cases that I could indicate to you, but we have not changed our minds a bit on that.

Mr. MacDonald: Where does the saving come from?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Well, it is usually on the amount of time, I believe. I just do not understand the difference. I would hope that our people, when they are on the job, would keep everyone working properly, but it is the same story and I do not say this critically of public works officials, but if you are going to work too hard today and by working too hard today you are going to be laid off tomorrow, I think if I was there myself I would maybe prolong the job a little bit. Now, whether this is the basis or not, I am suspicious that this happens. If a contractor is in there, he has great ability to keep his work organized and get in there and get on with the job and get out of there.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Simcoe East.

Mr. Letherby: Mr. Chairman, when I rose some time ago and was out of order, I merely rose to pay a compliment to one of the most popular and best liked Cabinet Ministers of this government.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Letherby: Just a minute. I am giving him a little build-up. I do not want you to tear it down. We have many good Cabinet Ministers, but in my opinion, Ray Connell does a terrific job. Now, outside of the hon. Prime Minister there has not been one hon. member to my recollection who has spoken in the Throne speech or the Budget debates who has had the thoughtfulness or the kindness or the thinking to congratulate him about the marvellous job his department did in this Chamber. They take it for granted. For weeks and months men were suspended on scaffolds and they hung by ropes around their necks and everything else, to do this magnificent job, but nobody has had the thoughtfulness to thank him. I would just like to say this, that I have had a lot of dealings, as undoubtedly other hon. members have had, with the hon. Minister of Public Works. He does a very efficient job. He does it quietly, Mr. Chairman, and I want to pay him a very fine compliment as he introduces his estimates this afternoon.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I want to bring up something. I know that the hon. Minister is familiar with this problem around the buildings, because not only has he spoken to me privately about it and to other hon. members, but he also has done something about it. I am referring to the cost of telephone calls, sir, for private members of this Legislature. I know that in the telephone directory he issued the other day, there is a list of places in the province of Ontario where a person may telephone on government business, and where the government accepts the charge. I know that it is most difficult for the hon. Minister to have all the members of this Legislature have the same benefits. At the same time, I think it is decidedly unfair that those of us who live in certain areas of the province where there is not a direct line, have to pay for our calls on government business, which I know, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister will agree are substantial in nature.

Therefore I am wondering if there is any opportunity, or if he feels that in the near future, those of us who are not on the long distance lines that are rented by this government, could get our calls charged to the various departments on government business too.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): No increase in allowance—

Mr. Sopha: My hon. friend wants a fringe benefit.

Mr. Whicher: I only want a fringe benefit that is given to many others in this Legislature. Equal rights.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell the hon. member for Bruce that it took a good deal of planning to go as far as we have on this, extending telephone usage to the private members, sir. I would have liked to have gone further, but we thought we would creep before we tried to walk on this particular thing. I would like you to give us a year's try-out on this to find out just how we make out on the privileges we extended a week ago, and if, as I indicated at that time, this is used wisely, possibly we can convince the Treasury board to go a little further next year. Actually, we are quite frightened of what we have done. If these numbers are handed around indiscriminately, the whole thing could bog down and we might have to make a complete change, in the reverse of what I have done. But would you give us a year's try-out on this? It just so happened that the hon. members in western Ontario and the Bruce-Grey area are not getting too much advantage out of this as we do not have rented lines into that area.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister is being quite fair, but the only thing is that when he says we are not getting very much advantage, the fact is we are not getting any advantage at all. The fact is that we have to pay and other hon. members do not have to pay. I am not going to say any more about it, but I hope the hon. Minister will take this into consideration and that in another year all the members will be treated similarly as far as telephone calls are concerned.

Mr. Troy: I have a question in that regard concerning those of us who have open lines, for example, there is an open line to North Bay. Supposing someone wanted to phone somebody, say, in Sturgeon Falls, Mattawa, or some place in a member's riding. Can you phone on that special code number and then—

Hon. Mr. Connell: No, if you were calling from here, you mean?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connell: If you were calling from here, you would call to North Bay on our line and ask for that number, but have it charged up to your own private number at your own local address. Unless you want to reverse the charge. If you do not care to do that, just charge it to your own local number in North Bay.

Mr. Troy: That would be the extension, say, from North Bay to Sturgeon Falls, is that what you mean, or the whole thing?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Oh, no, there is no charge from here to North Bay.

Mr. Troy: Right-o.

Vote 1901 agreed to.

On vote 1902:

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I think it would be under this vote that I might ask the hon. Minister a question as to what the government's view is in keeping the home that was given to it by the Sigmund Samuel estate to be used for, I believe, a home for the Lieutenant-Governor. I mentioned this before. I think my view is that it is an awful waste of public money to have a home for the Lieutenant-Governor and I thought that Mitchell Hepburn had settled that once and for all when he closed Chorley Park. Usually the Lieutenant-Governor is a man of means and there is no point of having an expensive home for him. For the small number of times it is used for public entertaining, such a home is not worthwhile. Today, the Lieutenant-Governors, if they do entertaining on a broad scale, can do it much better at the Royal York Hotel. It is much cheaper in the long run.

My understanding of the present house that was received from the Samuel estate is that it is going to cost thousands and thousands of dollars to put it into repair so that it can be used as a modern home. I just make these few brief remarks, Mr. Chairman, to point out as I have done before, to emphasize once again, that I am hoping that the government will once and for all put a stop to the use of the home, and sell it, and let us put the money to pay for public housing or something worthwhile. What is the view of the hon. Minister in regard to this home?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to mention to the hon. member for Parkdale that I do recall him bringing this up last year. Actually, the hon. member is quite right. I promised at that time I would wait until the new Lieutenant-Governor was sworn in, to find out what his wishes might be, and we have come to the decision that it is going to be too expensive to renovate. There is not enough parking there, and it does not suit the needs of the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor too well. We were most appreciative of the late Sigmund Samuel, he certainly was a public-spirited man, and it is a fine old home that he had there that he willed to the government. But we have found that it is not fitting in too well with our plans. To make it adequate for the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor and the type of entertaining that he would do, we have found it is not suitable so we are putting in motion the idea of either selling it or—we have not made up our minds what we are going to do with it, but I expect we will be selling it.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Chairman, I assume that vote 1902, is the one under which matters pertaining to this building and the plans for renovation here come up. I am sure that most of the hon. members are happy with the redecoration which has taken place in this Chamber, and other areas in the building. I was happy to hear what the hon. Minister had to say about the plans for the future, but he did not specifically mention one area I would like to bring to the attention of the House and ask the comments of the hon. Minister on.

First, I would like to give you the background for bringing this up. As a new member coming into this House, I, of course, like all the other new members, have to learn many things. It is my privilege to be a member of the committee on private bills. After I sat on this committee for several meetings, I found that this was a committee which was different from the usual committees of the House; this committee had extraordinary powers. It could veto, to a great extent, bills which were brought in and which were not government bills. This meant that this was an important committee of this House.

Mr. Chairman, it disturbed me to see the type of facilities in which this important committee had to meet. It further disturbed me to read the article in the Toronto Telegram of Friday, February 28, by Peter Bruton, entitled: "Private Bills Committee: Mob Rule." While I think that Mr. Bruton has very gravely overstated the case, I think that the whole set-up, the physical set-up in which the private bills committee meets, does not augur well for the way it does its business. I think that the room is too small for the number of members on this committee. Those who sit towards the door side are usually too hot and they want the fellows by the window to open the window; then you freeze to death if you are sitting over on the window side of the room.

I think there are very poor facilities for the press. They sit at the very back of the room behind everyone who is speaking, sir, except the chairman and the Minister and his assistants. Everyone who speaks has their back to the press. The members of the press cannot see who is speaking; they have to ask, they cannot in all cases hear what is said in this committee. I think perhaps Mr. Bruton found himself jammed in, or perhaps could not even get a place at the table; and this perhaps disturbed him as much as anything in the meeting of the committee on private bills.

We sit on chairs which, I think, are something like bridge chairs. And there is no provision for any member who wants to bring along any minutes or statute books or anything, for him to put them down. This does not lend itself to bringing in material in preparation for debate in this committee.

My only observation here would be, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) particularly, and probably the hon. member for Sudbury, have learned the ropes of this committee. They always get the seats in the front row so they can use the great, big table as the resting place for documents and books. They can also turn around and address the committee, which many of us who sit in the other rows do not have room to do.

I think this type of facility should be open to all hon. members of the private bills committee.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. member can come and sit with us; he is welcome.

Mr. Wells: I think, in order to have reasonable and incisive debate, that proper facilities should be provided. And I would like to suggest there should definitely be, in the replanning of this building, provisions for a larger room for the meetings of this committee. There should be marked seats for all the members, at tables where they can properly carry on their business. Adequate press facilities should be provided, from which the press can accurately, and in comfort, observe the debates. I think, if many of these changes were made, much of the uneasiness and impatience to get through the work of the private bills committee would be eliminated, and it would be beneficial to all the hon. members of this House.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Mr. Chairman, I might mention to the hon. member that we do have plans—not only in the new complex—for more committee room meetings, if necessary. Certainly a majority of them would not be held there. I do not know whether this is the time or the place to mention it, but eventually we are hoping to replace the post office on the main floor. That could be made into a very large committee room with very little change there. I think it would hold about 250 people.

Whether we can go so far as to provide the type of chairs the hon. member was indicating or not, I do not know. I got into a lot of criticism here about three years ago because of the name plate on the bottom of those chairs down there. I would hate to take another chance of replacing the chairs in the committee rooms.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, just following up the question that was asked, there is another problem which may have been raised in this House before. Likely the hon. Minister is conscious of it; it is the matter of parking, and what thought has been given to this. As a visitor here, before I came as a member of this House, I often found a great deal of difficulty in finding a parking place, even when the House was not in session. During the session, of course, the situation is aggravated. I do not know whether the hon. Minister is thinking in terms, perhaps, of bringing the parking into the basement of this building when the new facilities are available, or whether he is going to do something else. It might have been a good idea, when the subway was constructed, to have incorporated some parking below ground at that time, sir. It may be too late for that. But I wonder if the hon. Minister has some advice to offer us in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, parking is a problem and I suppose it will always be to some extent. But in the new complex, there will be parking for 400 visitors' cars—next to the east block, as you know it now. We do have a great deal of difficulty out in the front here. We try to control it but there are people who like to park there each day who are not visiting these buildings; it is a continual battle and certainly, with these extra 400 car spots which will be made available, it will be quite a help.

We did lease out some space across the way, which I see has been used very heavily throughout this past year. I have heard mentioned before this idea of parking underground in connection with the subway; but I think this is not a very practical suggestion.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. We know that the hon. Minister has called tenders for the new museum in Rondeau provincial park. To clear matters up, could the hon. Minister tell me if the lowest tender was accepted on that project, and how much was the price of the tender?

Hon. Mr. Connell: The low bidder on the recall was Ben Bruce and Sons Limited from Chatham, at $62,600. As far as I know, he was the low bidder.

Vote 1902 agreed to.

On vote 1903:

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. Minister: How many premises have been leased in the city of North Bay?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It might take a few minutes here.

Mr. Troy: I notice two anyway—Justine and Kizell, and, I believe, the other is the Masonic holdings with The Department of Highways.

Hon. Mr. Connell: What is the name?

Mr. Troy: Masonic holdings. The Masonic holdings.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, I do believe we have space.

Mr. Troy: There are other areas where there are highway offices and other buildings. Are these leased, or do you own them?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I cannot give that to you accurately. I think it is about half and half. Some of the buildings we own, and some of them we lease. If you could be specific on the ones you are mentioning, I could tell you.

Mr. Troy: Do you own the building in which you have the regional offices of The Department of Highways, on Algonquin Avenue?

Hon. Mr. Connell: We have 1272 Algonquin Avenue, North Bay, for The Department of Highways.

Mr. Troy: Is it government-owned?

Hon. Mr. Connell: No, that is a leased premises. The premises at 183 First Avenue is leased; 1301 Hammond Street is leased; 181 Main Street East is leased and 179 Main Street is leased, the last two on a month-to-month basis.

Mr. Troy: I suppose they are not shown by name here.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I understand there are 12 leases.

Mr. Troy: I see.

Vote 1903 agreed to.

Vote 1904 agreed to.

On vote 1905:

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the cost of the exhibit at the CNE last year would be under item one, the government building there?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes.

Mr. Trotter: There is one item there that I would like to protest about, and that is the use of having large photographs of public men. They have a huge picture of the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario, sir. It was quite obvious that an election campaign was brewing and it was just as obvious that public money was being used to help the government in power keep itself in power. Now, one of the advantages of having a monarchy for the government is that the Queen is the head of the government. But that exhibit seems an attempt to glorify individual people—I mentioned this on various occasions—by the use of the trade crusade and other things, under this item of $70,000. I realize the portrait of the hon. Prime Minister may not have cost that much, but it is a principle that we should keep in mind, that individuals, regardless of their political position or their party's politics, should not be built up as the great "I am". This department, under this very item, is doing that. I hope that in the future it insists—it may not do it this year because there is no campaign in the offing—but when the election comes close I hope they will also desist in trying to have these expenditures used to glorify the leader of any political party. I hope the hon. Minister keeps that in mind.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Actually, regarding the money that was spent down there, this is the first word of criticism I have heard about the exhibit at the Ontario government buildings last year.

Mr. Trotter: Well, you are hearing it now.

An hon. member: It will be the last, too.

Hon. Mr. Connell: There was a complete redesign of the building and of the government exhibits down there last year and most people were quite impressed. Actually I was quite impressed with the picture that was there. I do not think we have gone out of the way on anything along that line and I do not see too much reason for changing our programme at the government buildings for this coming year.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I am not arguing so much as to what is shown with respect to what the government does. But again, it is emphasizing a particular individual and they can do without the portraits.

One question more, it would be under item two of this vote. We heard from the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Crossman) as to the bad state of repair of the jails in the province of Ontario. This was obvious to many of us years ago and it is finally dawning on the government over here, but the $25,000 seems a very small amount of money for needed repairs. All the hon. Minister has to do is refer to the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions to find out how bad the jails are. Are there any plans in the immediate future, I do not mean in the great far beyond but in this coming year and, let us say, the year after that, will the jails be improved in the province of Ontario? It certainly does not look like it by this estimate. Has the hon. Minister any statement to make with regard to this?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Actually as far as this amount here is concerned, it does not concern the building of reform institutions. It has to do with any municipalities that ask for a grant on their jails. This fund is set up for that purpose. Actually, I do not believe there are any requests in for this year. It is more or less set in there as a token amount. I think I am correct in that.

This appropriation provides for grants toward the cost of construction for new jail accommodation as may be directed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The grants that have been paid in the past were to municipalities in southern Ontario where no district jail is provided. Provision has been made in our estimates since 1957 for this purpose.

Vote 1905 agreed to.

On vote 1906:

Mr. Troy: Sir, when the Department of Health estimates were before the House I asked the hon. Minister (Mr. Dymond) about the clinical services building and I notice it is still on here. The hon. Minister of Health told me that it was not going to be built because the North Bay hospitals were going to be used instead. Has the message not gotten through to the hon. Minister of Public Works yet that that is off the books?

Hon. Mr. Connell: Just getting through.

Mr. Troy: I notice we have not made any progress, sir, since I have come to this House in the construction of The Department of Highways district building. It was requested in 1959; in fact, in 1959, during the election campaign, it was stated it would be built in 1960. I still think it is in the requested stage and that means it will probably get to the planning stage in a couple of years and then, in possibly two or three years more, maybe it will be built.

I am not criticizing the hon. Minister, but I notice it is—as somebody has said—a snail's pace, at which these things move. Some years ago, when the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) was the Attorney General, I spoke about the district headquarters for the provincial police in the North Bay inspectorate.

As you very well know, Mr. Chairman, that particular inspectorate covers all the area from Parry Sound up to Kirkland Lake and the building there for the inspector is—when you compare it with little detachment buildings for two or three policemen and then the number on the staff of that inspectorate, sir—I think it is high time; in fact, it is away beyond the time, that there should be a new headquarters for the inspectorate at North Bay. There are acres and acres of property along the bypass, an ideal place for the building of headquarters for the police in that area.

I still do not see any reference to the teachers' college in North Bay when, as you know, it was built at the same time the Stratford college was built—Stratford, Peterborough, Hamilton—in 1908 I think it was. That is 55 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Connell: A very well kept building, too.

Mr. Troy: I know it is a very well kept building. But the unfortunate part about it, sir, is that there are no facilities for physical fitness at all in that building. You have property there with room enough for an addition, a gymnasium and a suitable auditorium. It is certainly a well kept building and a sturdily built building, and a credit to the architectural thought in those days, but certainly I do not think it fits in with the new philosophy. I hope, at least if we cannot have a new building, at least we can have the facilities for the recreation of the students there.

Again I make a plea for a new headquarters building for the OPP. I hope it will get beyond just being asked for, because it is years since I have asked the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) about it.

Finally, about the dams, particularly the dams in the district of Nipissing under page 39 of your report, the dams that are asked for. The word is "Requested—Nipissing". There is Marten River, Nosbonsing Lake and Tee Lake. I know they are all important projects, but particularly the one at Nosbonsing because of conditions of the dam—it used to be, I think, under the control of the CPR but now it is under your branch. I hope, sir, that you will be able to do something about that this year because the hydraulic engineer from The Department of Lands and Forests made a survey of that area last summer and I think it is a very urgent matter because the water level in the lake is getting very low. I hope, at least, you can do something about that this summer.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Yes, it will be started and built this year.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to page eight of the blue book, the bottom of the page. This is under the general heading of Public Works Completed, I believe, and down at the bottom of the page there is a reference to the city of Lindsay. The item specified there is described as follows: Street lighting installed. I would like to ask the hon. Minister what his department has to do with street lighting in Lindsay?

Hon. Mr. Connell: It is out of the provincial building. There is a provincial building in Lindsay and it is the roadway leading to it. It is not down the main street of Lindsay, I can assure you of that.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): I thought the new liquor store lit Lindsay up.

Mr. Bryden: We have some streets in Woodbine where we could use some more lights.

Mr. Troy: Just one question, sir: With regard to buildings that are requested, you have nothing to do with the location—what town, what city or what area that building will be constructed in? That is up to the department requesting it? It is the one that asks for it?

Hon. Mr. Connell: The department asks us to locate a site.

Mr. Troy: Oh, no, I do not mean to locate a site in a city but locate a certain city or certain town; you do not do that?

Hon. Mr. Connell: No, we usually leave that up to the various departments.

Mr. Troy: Thank you.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Minister if he could give me an approximate completion date of the second stage of the Milton School for the Deaf, and the trade school for Hamilton?

Hon. Mr. Connell: The tenders will be ready in the early part of this summer for the school for the deaf at Milton, but it has not been decided whether it will be gone ahead with this summer or not. The trade school and technological school programme is proceeding in Hamilton. The requests were much greater than we had anticipated and we have had more to do. It has not gone ahead quite as quickly as I had hoped, but certainly the trades end is proceeding rapidly.

Mr. Gisborn: Will it get started in 1964?

Hon. Mr. Connell: In 1964? No, not actually in the ground, but certainly planning is going ahead.

Mr. Troy: Just one final question: the hon. Minister knows the area in which the courthouse, the registry building and the district headquarters are in the city of North Bay. These are on a gravel street and I understood that it was to be paved this year, if the city department had some assistance, is that correct, sir? Will you give any assistance to the city financially?

Hon. Mr. Connell: I think we might possibly make some contribution but I think we had been asked to assume the whole thing. I think a commitment was made that we might help out there to a certain extent but I think we were asked to pave the whole street, or something along that line.

Mr. Troy: The district judge told me that he had spoken to you and made a plea.

Hon. Mr. Connell: Quite strongly, I might say.

Mr. Troy: Thank you.

Vote 1906 agreed to.

On vote 1907:

Mr. Gisborn: On vote 1906—

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1906 has been passed.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, on vote 1906, I am a little disappointed in the hon. Minister's answer to the effect that the government is not going to start the construction of the trade school this year. I wonder to what extent The Department of Education and The Department of Labour and the government itself are concerned about this in relation to the whole programme of training. One of the biggest problems we find we are facing is the impact of automation and technological changes, and need for training schools. Here we had one put on the board a long time before the last election, and now we understand it is not going to start in 1964. Certainly there is a great need for this type of school; is there any particular reason why we are not going to get a start in 1964?

Hon. Mr. Connell: As I think the hon. member for Wentworth East possibly knows, a greater study has been made of the Hamilton problems than possibly those of any other area. It was found that although we had anticipated it would be a building somewhat the same size as the technological and trade school in Ottawa, actually when all the requests were in we found out that it was much larger than that. This made a great deal of extra work so far as the architects are concerned in getting ahead with their design. I never like to blame anyone else for anything but it did take quite a time to have this study made and it is just getting to the point now where the architects are starting to assimilate some of these requests. But with a building of this size, you do not plan it in four months.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Kenora.

Mr. R. W. Gibson (Kenora): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few brief words, if I may, about the subject of the problems of the courthouse in Kenora. I am sure the hon. Minister is reasonably familiar with the problems there, but just to acquaint him with the situation as seen objectively I should like to read into the records the last grand jury report. This report, of course, was prepared by the grand jurors, who had toured the courthouse and inspected it thoroughly. And I quote:

A thorough inspection of the building was made. The unanimous feeling of the grand jury was the lack of accommodation and facilities was deplorable. We found one common washroom on the second floor used by both sexes. We also found the same condition in the basement. This condition is inexcusable. The judge's secretary has a makeshift office situated at one end of the hallway; screens act as a movable partition forming this office. We were informed that the judge's office is very draughty and on certain days in the winter it is too cold for him to use.

There is not a room in the building for the following uses: juries' and lawyers' consultant rooms; lawyers' lounges and witness rooms. At the present time Crown and defence witnesses mingle together in the hall with no place else to go. This is detrimental to efficient law and court procedure.

All of the above items we find to be of the utmost importance requiring immediate attention.

The probation officer and his secretary were forced to leave the courthouse and are located in a separate building, which leads to inefficiency in his department.

The northern detachment and district headquarters of the Ontario Provincial Police are crammed into the basement. There is only one cell. When a man and a woman are arrested the woman must be transferred to the district jail. There are 18 men in the Kenora detachment alone using two small offices. This is a terrible situation.

We strongly recommend that the Ontario Provincial Police be supplied with new quarters so that the basement in the courthouse may be made use of for other purpose. One such purpose could be a magistrate's court, which is now held on the second floor and it interferes greatly with the judge's duties.

We feel that coal should be discontinued as a source of fuel and that oil or natural gas be substituted. We found the condition of the grounds unattractive and unattended. The grounds need landscaping and attention. Also, the wooden stairway to the lake is in a very dangerous condition. This is not a reflection on the caretaker. His time is used to the fullest now.

We demand that room be acquired immediately to rectify the conditions we have outlined. We feel that officials responsible for these conditions have been grossly negligent in not carrying out recommendations of previous grand juries.

We trust that this report will not go unheeded as previous reports appear to have gone.

This report, Mr. Chairman, was prepared by, as I say, an objective, non-political group, who have no axe to grind with this government and certainly they were not speaking to gain any political favour.

I do not think I can add anything to what has been said in this report, but I would be grateful if the hon. Minister could say what plans he has and what action will be taken this year, that is to say 1964, with respect to these problems that have been outlined in this grand jury report.

Hon. Mr. Connell: I would like to say to the hon. member for Kenora that we are quite aware of many of the problems dealing with the courthouse there. We have spent a considerable amount of money in renovations, I guess particularly along the electrical line, during the last few years. But until the provincial police vacate that building, it is going to be rather difficult to do any real permanent-type programme. Actually, we are not anticipating being able to do much in that courthouse this year, although we are quite aware of the problem.

Vote 1907 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Public Works.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE PROVINCIAL SECRETARY AND CITIZENSHIP

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) has established somewhat of a record for the dispatch of business in this House, one that I hope I shall be able to emulate, with the assistance of the hon. members.

In presenting the estimates of a department, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to know sometimes how much detail to present to the hon. members of the Legislature as to the activities of the department. All departments are very active, and a tremendous amount of work is involved.

I, this afternoon, have decided that I will, because of the fact that this is the first session of the new Parliament with many new hon. members in the House, review in brief the functions of the department, set out some of the current highlights, and then pay some particular attention to bringing to the hon. members' knowledge some of the ways in which this department, which is a service department, can be of service to the hon. members, and who in turn can render a service to their constituents.

This afternoon, I shall be introducing to the hon. members of the House as a body, a gentleman whom I have had the privilege of introducing in a private way at gatherings. He is the new deputy Provincial Secretary, Mr. J. S. Yoerger, QC. Mr. Yoerger has come to the department from The Department of Lands and Forests with years of administrative experience, which is beginning to show itself within the department. The Department of Lands and Forests has set for itself an enviable record of producing men and women whom it has sent to other departments in responsible positions.

The estimates set out pretty well the various divisions of the department. I shall deal with them one by one, as I have outlined.

In respect to the administration division, under the main office vote—that is for the whole of the department and involves the administration concerned in the other votes. It includes the accounts department, the personnel, records, commissions of appointments, and special services division.

I sent a query to the division heads, through the deputy, asking them to set out the highlights of their particular division, and I received a reply from the accounts office as follows. I quote:

The accounts office has no real highlights or special services to report upon, and statistics like the handling and processing of more than 300,000 pieces of mail annually would make very dull reading if one did not stop and consider the fact that this is done with a very negligible percentage of error.

This result is due to a loyal staff, who perform this monotonous task year after year with the care and respect which all good civil servants should give to the taxpayers of Ontario who support and employ them.

I think this reply, which really applies to all of the department and to all of the civil service of Ontario, will commend itself to the hon. members.

The Provincial Secretary's department carries on all the formal secretarial duties of the government, which involves the official recording of many documents and all the commissions of appointment and similar documents. The "state" documents at our level are kept, and are available for examination by members of the public, for a very nominal fee, and duplicate copies can be obtained. There have been somewhat in the neighbourhood of 15,000 such official state documents, if I may use that term, recorded during the past year.

In respect of the marriage office which comes under the department, it is the division which issues the marriage licences to all the licence issuers throughout the province, which issues the special authorization, issues the certificates for the publication of banns, and generally supervises the marriage laws of Ontario under the administration of The Marriage Act.

One of the provisions which I want to bring to the attention of the hon. members of the House is the three-day waiting period. A licence, which is issued by a licence issuer, cannot be used under the terms of the Act except after a three-day period. However, the Legislature in its wisdom has empowered the Provincial Secretary, who in turn may empower the deputy, to waive this period. Situations have occurred in the province—and there was one in Windsor just several weeks ago—where all of the wedding party showed up at the church—the bride, the groom, the guests, the in-laws-to-be—and the minister, in a very casual way, said to the groom, “You have the licence, I assume.” That assumption was incorrect; the groom had slipped up and there was no marriage licence. Fortunately, they were able to pacify the guests for a moment—I think the reception began there and then. Telephone calls were put through to Toronto and, ultimately, I was reached and was able to waive the three-day period.

I received a very warm letter from the bride on the second day of the honeymoon. It forms a very interesting part of the records of my department. I bring this to the attention of the hon. members because this does occur, not too often, but with some regularity. Either they have no licence or the licence is only a day or two old. So, if you ever receive a frantic call from any such constituent, please get through to me or to the deputy, or to Mr. T. D. Thomson, QC.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): What is the telephone number?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is listed in the Toronto telephone book. Mrs. Yaremko, my wife, seems to always know where I am. I try to keep her informed or she finds out on her own anyway, so that I can usually be reached. If not, the deputy is always available, or Mr. T. D. Thomson, QC; and we will be in touch with the official officiating and will be able to waive this period. I can assure hon. members that, if you are ever called to render this kind of service, you will have warm friends for many years—so long as they live happily afterwards, as the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) says.

It is difficult to grade divisions but the companies branch is a most important division of the department. The corporate activity within the province of Ontario is exceedingly great. In recent years, the corporate method of carrying on business, as opposed to partnerships or sole proprietorship, has increased tremendously. This past year we have had the largest number of incorporations—some 6,000 new companies formed. That compares, Mr. Chairman, with a figure of 2,100 of ten years ago—that is an annual figure—600 in 1943. We have incorporated more companies in the past ten years than in the prior 160 years.

The division processes all applications for letters patent, which is the procedure on incorporation; supplementary letters patent; applications for extraprovincial licences; licences in mortmain; everything that has to deal with the corporate activity of the department under the provisions of The Corporations Act of Ontario.

In relation to The Corporations Act, we had here yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) making some comment on certain of the provisions. I do not intend to go into them at the present time. I will say this, that The Corporations Act of Ontario is the most up-to-date companies Act of all the jurisdictions in Canada, because there is a federal companies Act. Most of them are 25, 35 and 40 years old. The Corporations Act of Ontario was the basis for The Uniform Companies Act.

Now at present the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) has a committee which I think is known to all hon. members of the House, Mr. Chairman, which is studying certain aspects which come within the jurisdiction of The Securities Act and The Companies Act and when that committee makes its report I have no doubt but that action will follow.

The other aspect which I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. members of the House is that the draft Uniform Companies Act has been distributed to interested parties throughout the province and other jurisdictions and in the coming year we propose as a department to re-examine it and to see what changes, if necessary, will be made in our own Companies Act in respect of the uniformity which is desirable across the country.

In respect to the hon. members' roles within this department, in the event that constituents of theirs have some inquiries or problems relating to corporate activity, although we invariably deal with solicitors, the officials and solicitors in the department are prepared to discuss with parties, as they discuss with solicitors, some of their problems and see how they can be ironed out under the provisions of The Corporations Act.

We have tried and are trying to process the applications for letters patent as quickly as possible. Sometimes there are circumstances in which there is additional speed necessary. Should any constituent bring that to an hon. member's attention, bring it to my attention or that of the deputy Minister or to the director, and we will put an “expedite order” on the matter, although we hope to reach that stage of efficiency whereby all of the applications will be processed without delay, undue or otherwise.

A comparatively new division to the department, of course, is the citizenship division. Again for the new hon. members of the House, this came into being only in 1961 as part of the name of the department. It has to deal with citizenship in its very broadest sense but we do, because of circumstances, devote the bulk of our time to assisting newcomers to Canada, within the province of Ontario in integrating themselves into the life of the province. Some 52 per cent of all newcomers who settle into Canada settle in Ontario and they now form in Ontario a substantial part of our population as a result of the post-war immigration.

One, and perhaps the largest, component part of this division is the provision of language training for newcomers. That training is given through three vehicles: one, in co-operation with the local departments of education, and last year we had some 500 such classes with some 10,000 students. Then there are the special classes provided directly by the division. There were, I believe, 50 classes with some 800 students. Finally there are those classes which are operated with our assistance through voluntary agencies, and last year there were 165 of these with 1,800 students. In the post-war period, there has been well over 300,000 students participating in classes of this kind.

One of the highlights in this past year was the success and the increasing growth of our summer schools. We had 1,800 students, which is the largest number we have had and something with which we are pleased, because it provides not only the auspices under which the students can learn, but it is also the vehicle through which we provide training for teachers who wish to learn how to teach English as a second language. We are the only jurisdiction in Canada which does this, perhaps the only jurisdiction on the continent that has such a scheme.

We had last year some 75 Ontario teachers taking this training, five from other provinces, which is the result of representations to us from the federal Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I think there were ten from outside Canada who received their training as a result of the representations made to us from The Department of External Affairs for people who come from other parts of the Commonwealth.

This past year has also seen two new developments. One is that we have entered into a unique, and the first, agreement with the federal authorities respecting the use of teaching materials.

Heretofore, the federal government provided us with the text and this, of course, was very limited. At the beginning of 1963 we entered into an agreement whereby we would now select our own texts and the federal government will repay to us under the cost-sharing agreement, which is involved in this plan because citizenship and the teaching of English is an overlapping jurisdiction. We now are able to provide the teachers of the schools with almost a dozen texts from which they can choose to suit their own environment.

However, none of those texts were produced for Canadian purposes. As a result, a little over a year ago the department engaged the services of the linguist, Mr. Carson W. Martin and he has produced—again the first of its kind in the field—materials for the teaching of English. It consists of three parts: An Introduction to Canadian English, the Students' Workbook and the Teachers' Handbook and Charts. The three are tied into one unit.

It has, of course, been developed to have a Canadian content. The other books are good from the point of view of teaching English, but being produced outside Canada they do not have the Canadian content, if I may use that expression, which is deemed proper when one is dealing with the integration and the acclimatizing of people within our own environment.

The seminars which were instituted a couple of years ago were continued last year and hon. members who were in the Legislature a year ago will recall that I produced samples of the pamphlets which evolved from those seminars. The new hon. members will find it interesting to note that we have published, in 13 different languages, pamphlets dealing in a general way with the services of various departments. I have here a set of five, in Italian, which deals with The Departments of Public Welfare, Health, Education, workmen's compensation and Labour. At this very moment—and I hoped that I would have had them for the House today—are being bound, pamphlets which will deal with The Departments of Transport, Highways, the Attorney General, and Reforms. They should be available before the end of the month.

This again is a unique project. As I stated before, I doubt whether any place else in the world a project of this kind could be undertaken and executed. We have pamphlets of this kind produced, in what to me is first-class quality, in 11 languages in addition to English and French.

Here I would enlist the hon. members of the House in distributing these to newcomers to the province who may be in their ridings. Until now we have kept a fairly tight rein on the distribution because I have found, from personal experience, that where material such as this is free there is apt to be not a valued use of them.

However, we feel now that they are sufficiently well known that they can be distributed; and I can think of no better way or more responsible way, of distributing them than through responsible hon. members of the House. If there is occasion to do this, get in touch with the citizenship division and they will be made available. I will read the languages which are available: English, French, Italian, German, Polish, Hungarian, Ukrainian, Dutch, Serbo-Croatian, Greek, Finnish, Portuguese and Slovak.

During the past year we have continued, and will continue, our work in co-operation with other interested agencies. I think that the department has a very significant role to play in sparking the activities of other agencies to take their part in this activity within the community, because in the task of integration of newcomers a government department is apt to be removed as an impersonal agency, whereas these recognized agencies can play a close personal role. We have continued, and will continue, to work with the Ontario Welfare Council, the Canadian Citizenship Council, the Social Planning Council of Hamilton—in conjunction with the sociology department of McMaster University—the Travellers' Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto and, in particular, the International Institute of Metropolitan Toronto.

A year ago we concluded two projects—one with the social planning council of Metropolitan Toronto and the University of Toronto. One a study of the bringing of community services to newcomers, the use of community health, welfare and education services, the obstacles to the use of such services by the newcomers, and an examination of alternative welfare agencies. We are awaiting a report.

Then there was a project under the aegis of the Metropolitan Toronto Institute to discover the conditions of life of our most recent immigrants, with relation to jobs, food, community services and other types of immediate problems. We are also awaiting reports in that regard.

One of the major projects this year is called the educational guidance project worked out in conjunction with the International Institute of Metropolitan Toronto. The object of the project is to provide a skilled vocational guidance service in the language of the immigrant, to do promotional work among immigrants regarding the benefits of additional education, and to bring to the attention of all educational authorities the special needs of the immigrant in this field. This project will be done in conjunction with the communities within which there are substantial numbers of Italian, Greek and Portuguese newcomers.

In these programmes we like to consider the money which is put in by the department as "seed" money. We spark the project. The project, in other words, is done on our behalf, but we are not in a position to provide all the monies. Invariably the federal department comes in with its share and then other agencies, especially the charitable foundations.

In conjunction with this educational guidance project, the foundations which are involved are the Atkinson, the MacLean, the Bickle, and the E. P. Taylor foundations; so there are a number of agencies involved in this field.

In relation to the roles which hon. members can play in addition to distribution of pamphlets, if any newcomer turns to an hon. member for assistance or advice in relationship to matters within our scope, please contact the citizenship division. We do not have all the answers, but we may have the particular answer and may be of assistance in directing hon. members, or the constituent, to where he may have some assistance in the solution of his problems.

If there are classes to be set up, if it is found that there is a need for a special class or a general class, please contact the department and we will do whatever we can in that regard.

It may be that, from time to time, hon. members would still receive correspondence in a language unfamiliar to them. It may come from some constituent. I know that hon. members have received such letters. If these letters are sent on to us we will have them translated and returned to the members.

Within the main office we have set up a special services division. It is a division which brought together unrelated functions which were scattered throughout unrelated divisions in order to again provide efficiency. It deals with a lot of the inquiries directed to the Provincial Secretary's office. My experience has been that, if anybody knows not where else to go, they come to the Provincial Secretary's office; then, of course, we direct them on.

Within that special services division there are certain personal functions of which I would like to remind the hon. members; some are familiar with them. One is our scrolls, our sending out of congratulatory scrolls on wedding anniversaries, birthdays, 50th and 60th wedding anniversaries, birthdays such as 90, 100 and the like. No activity, with which I have ever come into contact within the government, has provided me with such pleasure as to read the letters that come back after the recipients have been presented with these scrolls.

I guess, after a person has lived a married life for 50 or 60 years, or lived to be 90 or 100, there is little they look forward to in the way of material things, and these scrolls play a very significant part in their lives. I can assure any hon. member of this House, who has not availed himself of the opportunity of attending and personally handing over a certificate to a recipient, he is missing one of the real pleasures of being a member of the Legislature.

I should like to take a moment of the hon. members' time to tell my favourite story in conjunction with this. I have no copyright, and you can repeat it.

I presented my first one to a couple on Burnside Drive. The hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) knows the area. That was some seven years ago. I was a private member at that time, sir, and it was a 60th wedding anniversary. There had been a recent neighbour who had been invited but who was unaware of the nature of the occasion until the presentation of the sixtieth wedding anniversary scroll had taken place.

After the ceremonies had been concluded, I heard this neighbour, whom I will call Mrs. Smith, come up to Mrs. Jones, the celebrant, and say to Mrs. Jones in a voice of utter disbelief, "Sixty years; 60 years to the same man?" Mrs. Jones turned around and said, "Not to the same man, I have made him over three times since then." You will be surprised, hon. members of the House, how well that goes over with the ladies at these presentations.

We are trying to evolve a procedure whereby we will be able to bring these occasions to the attention of hon. members. However, the important part is for the hon. members who are "on the ground" to bring to our attention these occasions and we will meet with all reasonable requests in this regard.

It is to this division that presently the work of the distribution of memorial wreaths has been assigned. Last year we distributed some 600 memorial wreaths, which means that throughout the province of Ontario there were 600 gatherings of commemoration of Remembrance Day on November 11. This, although only a two-month activity, is a very important one and things become pretty hectic when we try to pinpoint where these services are being held.

We keep records from year to year but we have to send the wreath to an individual, and people move, or die. Here the hon. members again can play a very important role in finding out where these services are going to be held, and communicating with the department, well in advance. Last year, the circumstances were such—because of September 25—that we did not get into gear until pretty late and things became hectic right up until the last day. I would suggest that immediately after Labour Day, the hon. members contact the department. We will give you the information which we have and then arrange with you how you wish the matter to be handled, either through personal delivery or delivery direct to named persons.

That, Mr. Chairman, pretty well deals with the main office. I should like very quickly to go through the other activities of the department.

I come to the office of the Speaker. The office of the Speaker is more than the Speaker occupying the chair, which the present Mr. Speaker does with distinction, and I re-echo the remarks of the hon. members of this House in paying tribute to the Speaker for the way in which he carries out his duties when he is in the chair. Mr. Speaker carries his duties outside of this assembly with the same type of dispatch, courtesy and fairness.

It is under the Speaker's office that all of the things which go on in this assembly come, outside of those functions which are dealt with by the Clerk. It is through the Speaker's office that the offices of the Opposition are maintained. The hon. Minister of Public Works has outlined what he is hoping to do for all hon. members of the House, including hon. members of the Opposition, in the way of physical services. The services which have been arranged through the Speaker's office, in other than physical ways, are, I trust, satisfactory. I believe that there has been a decided improvement. I think that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Oliver) will have discovered that things have changed a good deal from the last time when he was leader of the Opposition, to what the circumstances are presently, when he is leader of the Opposition today.

With respect to the Clerk of the legislative assembly, too, I should like to make a comment. To me, it is remarkable the efficiency with which the affairs of this House are run. One only has to look at the way in which the orders of the day and the proceedings and the bills are printed. The system which has been set up to get all these things in and out, to me, must show a very high degree of efficiency. I should like to pay tribute to the Clerk of the House on behalf of the hon. members. I speak now, sir, not as the Minister responsible for the administrative end of that, but as a member of the House.

Between the Speaker and the Clerk of the House, I think that not only do we have the physical facilities; but we, sir, as the members of the House are exceedingly well served, both while the House is in session and when the House is not in session.

I mentioned the fact that very often hon. members come to the Provincial Secretary's office when they do not know where else to go. I know, as a matter of fact, that when the House is not in session, many of the hon. members end up by getting services rendered to them either through the Speaker or the Clerk of the House when they come to visit this building in between sessions.

This year, the legislative library has been brought under the aegis of the Provincial Secretary. The Department of Education having moved out of the north wing, the time was appropriate for bringing the legislative library under the Provincial Secretary, which I believe was one of the recommendations of a certain committee on organization of government.

I checked into a matter which was raised a number of years ago, and in fairly recent times, about the hours of the library. I have discovered that there now is a system of rotation and with no hardship on those in charge of the library. Indeed, I had a feeling, in talking to the librarian, that we would be depriving them of what they felt was their inherent right to render services to the hon. members if we were to change radically the present system.

The library again is very anxious to render services to the hon. members. The hon. members should know that in that library we have one of the finest legislative libraries on the continent, both as to content and the availability for hon. members. And the librarian and her staff will go out of their way to assist the hon. members in the obtaining of reference material and material of any kind.

They have all the books, all the statutes from Ontario and across the country, and this is the only library of its kind with United States reference material available. They have not only the printed Hansards which are known to us, but they have what they call the scrapbook Hansards which go back to 1867/1868, sir. Even if you do not need to look at them from a research point of view, it is most interesting to flip over the pages of these scrapbooks.

I notice that the hon. Minister of Energy Resources (Mr. Simonett) has in the House a personal scrapbook of a former member of the Legislature back in 1914. This is somewhat the type of thing that the library has, except in larger format, and they are very interesting indeed if you want to find out what somebody said 20 years ago. The newspapers are not as accurate perhaps, at least I have heard, as the Hansard, but they are the only record and it is assumed that if something is in an ancient publication there is perhaps more than just an ordinary amount of reporting truth in it.

Information is available from the past just as the clipping service, which is under the Speaker's office, is available to all hon. members of the House. There is a clipping service under which tens of thousands of clippings are clipped out of some five dozen newspapers throughout the province and this clipping service is available for all hon. members of the Legislature when they want to see what was reported on some occasion.

I mention the Queen's Printer to say that the Queen's Printer has in the last three years been distributing the business which comes through his department to a broader section of the province. He advises me that every constituency receives business and that last year there were some 27,000 orders placed for stationery and printing on behalf of all the departments of the government.

It is a very efficient operation, indeed. They have moved to Breadalbane and carry on from there in a very compact way.

Then, of course, the Queen's Printer has charge of the reports and statutes and relevant documents of the province and if any constituent of the hon. members needs such a document, get in touch with the Queen's Printer and if he has not the document he will be able to direct you to the department that has the necessary publication.

The Registrar General's branch has been as busy and as efficient as ever. It is still down at 70 Lombard Street, awaiting the time when the complex referred to by the hon. Minister of Public Works will be completed and they will be able to join the rest of the family up here at Queen's Park. They, of course, are charged with the keeping of statistics and the administration of The Vital Statistics Act, of births, deaths and marriages.

Here again, if any hon. member has an inquiry from a constituent respecting registration or proof of age, the deputy Registrar General—Registrar General is another title which the Minister carries, sir—the deputy Registrar General will render whatever assistance or advice that he can in that way.

As to the post office, I only say this, that they carry on in a very efficient way and I am advised that six tons of mail is handled by the post office daily. That gives some idea of the volume of work that is done, both by hon. members and by the government departments.

I only mention, because all hon. members are familiar with vote 1707, sessional requirements, that is where the pay cheques come from for all the hon. members of this House, as private members and as members of committees. I think you will know that when the department does decide to get out the cheques that everybody gets their cheque in a very expeditious way and I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. members of the House will get to vote 1707 fairly quickly and that means the cheques might be here that much sooner. Thank you.

On vote 1701:

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Provincial Secretary not only knows how to appeal to the ladies, sir, when he hands over a scroll, but he also dangles something to the hon. members to get on to vote 1707.

However, we are pure of heart, sir, and the material things, as he said about those ladies, they also do not affect us, although I do not want to develop that point too extensively.

One of the things that has always charmed me about the hon. Provincial Secretary is the repertoire of approaches he takes. I recall a couple of years ago he expounded to us with poetry and this time he expounds to us with his stories that he and his charming wife tell. Another thing I think is very courageous about him is that he was going to, I thought, give us his telephone number openly in Parliament and invite every constituent from every constituency to call him if they run into trouble with their marriages. However, it was only if you were going to get married.

Sir, I shall try to follow in as logical a fashion as the hon. Minister's presentation. The first point that I have marked down is commissioners' appointments. From what I gathered, you started with the appointment of commissioner of oaths. There do not seem to be any particular ground rules. I think there must be many hon. members such as I who have sent letters about someone they knew very well, asking if he could become—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, if I may make the suggestion to the hon. member, on a commissioner for affidavits the processing of the appointment is done by The Department of the Attorney General. Then after they have processed them, the Provincial Secretary carries out the secretarial portion of completing them. We issue the authority after they have been processed.

Mr. Thompson: As I understand the hon. Provincial Secretary, he makes the actual appointment all the same, does he not?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We issue the appointment on the recommendation of the hon. Attorney General.

Mr. Thompson: Well, could I follow this up? As far as the ground rules for a commissioner are concerned all the hon. Provincial Secretary does is just mail what is directed by the hon. Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The hon. Attorney General lays down the policy in the ordinary way that government policy is accepted in all departments. The hon. Minister proposes a policy and then it is adopted by the council as a whole. I play my part in the adoption of the policy of the hon. Attorney General.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I appreciate that, sir, I thought the part of the hon. Provincial Secretary was a larger one and more important, but I see the hon. Attorney General is the significant person in this situation.

On somewhat the same principle—and I am following through, really, on my notes made here—this is with respect to the scrolls that are given to people who have been married for 50 or 60 years, or those who have reached the age of 90 to 100. I have felt that there should be a better way to publicize this. I appreciate, as the hon. Provincial Secretary does, that the recognition which these people receive but I also feel that in some ways it may have been used, with all respect, it may have been used—you notice I put it in the subjunctive—it may have been used as a means to enhance oneself politically. I would think, in a way, it might be enlarged to include other than the member. It is a very nice thing and I felt that same warmth as you have felt, in sending one of these scrolls.

But I would like to feel that there were others who knew about it. I am not sure if the availability of scrolls is circulated to every clergyman, for example, throughout Ontario, and I would feel that if it is not, it should be, rather than just circulated to members of Parliament.

Under The Companies Act, sir, my impression is that you have mentioned that this is one of the most advanced departments. I am never quite clear when the hon. Ministers are speaking. Some of them say it is the most advanced department in the world, others are a little more modest and just say America, and some others say, Canada, but whatever you say—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The most advanced in America.

Mr. Thompson: You said in America. Well, you are unduly modest for a Minister. But I would suggest that if it is the most advanced in America, there must some times be quite a bit of annoyance throughout America at the delay that takes place in getting a charter. I am not personally experienced in forming too many companies, although I have had some experience in it, but it seems to me that the delay is of from six weeks to two months. Sir, if it was simply that one were coming as petitioners to get a charter for a company, and there was not the other obligation that we were paying $100 at least, one might accept keeping the head bowed and waiting until such time as the department would issue the charter. But in view of the fact that not only are civil servants paid by the taxpayers but also that the person applying for a charter is having to give $100 as a minimum, I would suggest that if it is an increase of staff that is needed to get this function acting more efficiently then you should get an increase of staff. And if it is some other reason, then as the hon. Minister of this department you should check into it. But I would say that to wait up to two months for a charter may mean that you will not always talk with such pride about the number of companies that are developing in Ontario. Some of them may wither while they are waiting and move on to Quebec or some other province.

The hon. member for Sudbury suggests that if there should be a delay of this nature, could the applicant phone you?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They do.

Mr. Thompson: They do? Fine. The next point I would like to come to is The Department of Citizenship. I think you and I, over the estimates, have tangled about this department. You have accused me and I have accused you, but I would like before I start in on this department to say that it is advancing along some very progressive ideas which I, in my humble way, would suggest that I provided for you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

An hon. member: Not in detail though. Got the ideas but no—

Mr. Thompson: That is a point. I would say, sir, that one of the questions—you did not dwell on this point but you did on previous estimates—was the course on the TV network. I am wondering if they have faded away or whether they are continuing because I have heard that they were of great use. I think they are of use because it still seems to me that it is an enormous task for a newcomer, who has been working at a job that requires manual labour, in the evening to have to get on a street car and go down to a school, attend it and then go home again. I think it is an enormous task for a wife, who by cultural background is shy and retiring, it is an enormous test for her to move out into a strange school in order to take classes.

I think also it is a test on the finances to try to get a babysitter if they both would want to go out, and so on.

Therefore, use the approach of TV. I admit some people will say that perhaps they do not have a TV, but I think you will find in most of the boarding houses where people live there would be a TV.

I am hoping, sir, that you will elucidate on several things. One is that the TV programme is well publicized, that it is still continuing and it is on at a good hour, an hour that does not conflict with the very deep spiritual aspirations of many of the newcomers. In other words, that it is not conflicting with an hour when there is mass or when people would be attending church.

In connection with your 13 brochures in various languages, I presume that you have done an analysis in the choice of languages, that is on the proportion of how many people there are and the needs of these people. I am thinking, for example, if it is in Ukrainian, with all respect, because of the unfortunate international political situation, I would suggest that Canada has not been able for a number of years to provide an opportunity for a great number of people from the Ukraine to come to Canada. They are not able to get from behind the Iron Curtain and therefore I would hope that it is in the languages of people who are coming, rather than in languages of people who have already been here for a period and who would not need to have it in their language.

I am interested in the distribution. I am wondering, in the plea that you make for the hon. members to distribute this, whether this is because you have not found any other central way to distribute it?

I agree with you thoroughly. I have seen this myself in connection with government distribution of pamphlets where they had been piled up in warehouses and never been distributed, or else they have been distributed to ethnic halls and to other halls and they are treated with disdain because of the fact they really were not wanted, no one had tested to see if they would be useful.

I have seen some of those publications and I commend you for having them, but I think the main test of them is whether they are getting into the hands of the people who need them, and therefore the test is your method of distribution. I appreciate that you have noted that point down as it is in the form of a question to you.

I congratulate you, sir, on the fact of your starting a text to be used in language classes which is about Canada. I agree that for many years they had this Richardson text—Learning the English Language in ETP, I think it was—and to me it was a sad commentary on every province that took this and did not object, and used this thing which was talking about the United States or about England, I think, in one case; I could be corrected on that. I congratulate you that finally, after great flows of immigration finally, although it is late, I still congratulate you that we now have a text.

One question which I raise is about these language classes. It is difficult to assess this perhaps, and I ask it each year. I notice that in the figure of language classes there were three breakdowns, three methods of having language classes. One of them was by the local departments of education, there were 500 classes, I think you said, and 10,000 students. The question I ask again, is with respect to the 10,000 students: Did all those 10,000 attend regularly over a period, or did they just come the first day and register? Did 10,000 complete the course or 10,000 start?

I wonder if there has been any study done on the fall-out of students who did not complete the course. I remember hearing that the hon. Minister's director at that time was contemplating doing a study of the fall-out of students, sir—those who would start a course and then would not continue. I would appreciate knowing if such a study had been done. That is my first question.

My second is, if such a study was done and causes were found why a student falls out or leaves the classes, what was done about this in order to rectify it?

I am looking at the studies that have been done and my notes as I listened to the hon. Minister. There was a study on bringing service to the newcomer and having an examination of these services. These, I presume, are welfare services and community services. I, sir, would congratulate the hon. Minister on having helped to have that study done by the social planning council, but I would say this, that speaking from my own experience in my constituency, I would hope that there is the urgency to getting the facts of that study known to us, and that these facts would be acted upon.

I have certain suppositions about the difficulties of groups of newcomers who are paying taxes to have services provided. Because of difficulties they have been unable to go and to get these services. Because I respect research I will not go into what my suppositions are. I realize that the hon. Minister has spent over a year waiting for this research. Research to be thorough takes some time but I would hope that the research findings will be soon and will be published, and similarly the other research in connection with the relation of jobs and schools.

The further research project that the hon. Minister has is an educational guidance project which, I presume, is the idea of examining the methods of learning about and assessing the skills of newcomers, and also either referring them or informing them on how best to be retrained and fitted into our society.

One of my concerns about these, sir, is that I notice they are all centred in Metropolitan Toronto. I would say that the talk of a social planning council in Metropolitan Toronto—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: And Hamilton.

Mr. Thompson: And Hamilton. I can appreciate reasons why they would be in Toronto and why they also would be in Hamilton. I can see where, to a large extent, they would be in centres where there are newcomers in large numbers. But I hope that the hon. Minister will keep in mind moving out to other areas such as Sudbury and so on, with respect to studies.

I, frankly, sir, have felt that a more significant project might arise from the office of the hon. Minister's citizenship branch which is now the central office where translations are done and is the place where people from other countries are directed in order to be helped in finding answers about their new community—and I am not going to enlarge upon this project at this time. This project is the Ombudsman and I say this with reservations because I want to talk on this later. I say it for the reason that in my office, as the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) and many other members here do, I have a clinic every Tuesday night. I have about 30 or 40 people who come to me with problems and with grievances, principally difficulties about appeals that they want to make with the 90-odd commissions that are part of the government today. The government extends its tentacles into every part of the lives of our people. When these tentacles get a grip on the people, the people righteously often try to struggle against decisions that the tentacles have imposed on them. But they are powerless because there is no process of appeal. Yet in this situation I see that a branch has been established to which people can go. I am sure that they not only ask questions but they bring grievances and I would suggest that the office of the hon. Minister could be expanded into something further, not again with respect to newcomers but also for all citizens.

I think in some ways that, probably at the seminars, some of the questions were taken quite seriously. I do not know what topics you discussed in the last seminar or what is going to be discussed this year. I know what you discussed a couple of years ago and that was minimum wages, when there was no minimum wage Act. In a sense I am not sure that this is not a sort of a progressive group and I think the hon. Minister should listen personally to it. Keep those seminars going and listen to them because they will agitate to have a new look for the Ministers of the Cabinet, in the ideas which they may bring to the hon. Ministers.

Having brought up minimum wages it might be an idea at the next seminar to bring up the lack of hospitals, or why we do not have sufficient nurses and have that discussed. Perhaps from that we shall get some advanced, aggressive legislation to fill the gap.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: Well, I am staying within the area of my own vote. Having made that remark, I shall move on, in my logical fashion, to fill in the other points you have made.

I have gone over the item on special services, and your delight in presenting the scrolls. I shall remember your message to the ladies. I shall tell them that I originated this—as you expect that every member will—but, however, I am sure it will be used to good advantage.

I would like to come to the office of the Speaker. I think it may even be apparent at this time, the need for what I am going to talk about. In fact, the more I talk, the more apparent the need will be. And that is, to have an effective Parliament, an effective Opposition is needed. And in having an effective Opposition the opportunity for research is needed. I would suggest to you, sir, you are a man who thinks in terms of the future; a man, I am sure, who is provided well with life insurance and the other necessities to guard against some calamity that might happen to you. Think of an Opposition, and I say this to you for other reasons, because I think you are more than just a partisan Cabinet Minister, I think you are a man who believes in the democratic system—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: —and are being influenced by the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Ward-robe), who obviously wants to be included in that category, so I will include him. I will say this, that you will not have an effective Parliament unless you are providing the facilities of research. I say this most sincerely.

You look to the United States and you see there the facilities which are given to members of Parliament—Congressmen—each of whom has a staff of sometimes up to seven provided for them. I feel so strongly about this paltry amount which is handed in a modern province to the Opposition, in order that they can question intelligently the many bills which come before this House, in order that they can diagnose the issues and the principles at stake, to draw these principles out from all the complexities in bills of a progressive, positive state, in order to be able to analyze these and to make an effective government work—and you have handed some measly amount in order that we can act effectively.

I remember the former Prime Minister talking about the need for the role of the Opposition and I say, sir, that this should be given the deepest consideration. I say it for another reason. Going back again to the Ombudsman—I say to you there is need of something in Ontario with the wide range of orders-in-council that are out across this province, with the 90 commissions, with the more and more advancing intrusion on the lives of people by legislation, far more than there is need for—a close examination within Parliament before these regulations and orders-in-council get out to affect the lives of the people. I say, for example, that—and I have sat here listening to bills come before this House, bills from the hon. Minister of—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): The Female Refuges Act.

Mr. Thompson: The Female Refuges Act?

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Just "Refuges".

Mr. Thompson: This is the point I am making. I could pick up this book right here and ask every hon. member in this House, and I think they would answer truthfully, that as you look at these you need to be a specialist in order to analyze the content of these bills. And yet what do you do to the Opposition? I will tell you several things you do.

First of all, you keep us up until all hours of the night. You do not send us the reports of your departments. Then, the next day, we have to analyze—not for us, I am not asking this from the point of view of myself, I am asking it from the point of view of good government. You sit there dissipating the rights of this House and, almost with swollen arrogance—

An hon. member: Bloated arrogance!

Mr. Thompson: Bloated arrogance! I leave off the word "almost". Bloated arrogance! We see these bills thrown at us, and you should be as concerned as we are.

I do not refer to anyone by name but there is a very knowledgeable man in this House—when I say a knowledgeable man in the House, immediately everyone thinks of himself, but I am not referring to all of them—who told me his concern about these orders-in-council. He told me that there was a period when many of these orders-in-council going out were ultra vires, and there was a mishmash of confusion of legislation all across the province.

An hon. member: That was Mitch Hepburn.

Mr. Thompson: That was several years ago. I do not know if the Prime Minister at that time was Mitch Hepburn—I am not too good in my history but I do not think it was—when there was this confusion.

Therefore, I come back again to the plea that you should provide, as other modern states are doing, far more opportunity for an Opposition to have effective research.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to refer to, and concur with you in, your remarks about the Clerk of the legislative assembly. I am sure every hon. member here has appreciated his graciousness, his very intimate knowledge of this Legislature, and his very obvious love and respect for this House.

While I am saying that, I would also like to refer to the library. I, sir, have asked the library on a number of occasions if they could find certain material for me, and the librarians are outstanding in the effort they go to to find the material. I would also say that they are most tolerant if you do not return the material on time. In fact, I have a note on my desk to return a certain book and I appreciate very much the help they give.

Coming back to the Queen's Printer: I would like to be able to say similar remarks about him but I do not know the gentleman. Another thing I do not know is the ground rule for the Queen's Printer. You now say that the basis for providing printing is going to be broader, and that every constituency will be allowed to have an opportunity to do some printing for the government. Well, sir, I will be blunt about it: It smells to me—this Queen's Printer—frankly, like political largesse.

Mr. Bryden: Pork barrel!

Mr. Thompson: A pork barrel, it is said, and I will agree. I say this because of this fact: Your lack of getting any ground rules, any basis, on which printing is done. I would ask the hon. Provincial Secretary, in his further remarks which I hope he will make, if he will elucidate for us what the basis is on which the Queen's Printer hands out printing assignments.

I think, at this point, sir, I have covered in the most logical fashion the remarks made by the hon. Provincial Secretary. Therefore, in case I get illogical, I will sit down.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before dealing in detail with some matters which arise in connection with these estimates, I would like to direct to the hon. Provincial Secretary comments of a type I have directed to some other hon. Ministers, relating to the method of presentation of his estimates. Criticisms I have made in some other cases do not apply quite as fully in his case but they still apply.

We have vote No. 1701, which is headed "main office and general departmental expenditures." Within that one vote there are four sub-items, which I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Secretary are clearly, or should be, separate votes. I believe that the Treasury board secretariat has under active consideration the whole question of the method of presentation of estimates to the House. I have noticed that some changes have been made that are, in my opinion, an improvement—over the past two or three years.

I would suggest that the process should be continued and accelerated. One basic principle which should be established is that each branch or division within a department should have a separate vote. I will not go into the reasons why I consider that to be important; I have already done that in connection with other estimates. But I would call that to the attention of the hon. Provincial Secretary and of the appropriate Treasury board officials.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make just one comment with regard to the companies division under the first vote. A year or two ago—I am not quite sure when it was; well, it could only have been a year ago because the item I am referring to is dated December 21, 1962—I had occasion to read into the record of this House a letter by Professor C. A. Ashley of the University of Toronto. I believe he is now a professor emeritus; but whether he is still actively engaged in teaching or not does not matter. He certainly is one of the leading authorities on corporations in Canada.

This letter was a very brief, pointed letter. It had about as much effect on the hon. Provincial Secretary as many other sensible suggestions have had—namely, no effect at all. But it is important enough that I would like to call it to his attention again. Since it is a short letter, I am going to read it in its entirety. It appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 21, 1962:

As a shareholder in a mining company I am informed that the management proposes to amalgamate with a construction company. I gather that only the intervention of the Toronto Stock Exchange prevented this from taking place without the presentation of information to shareholders.

The Companies Act is too accommodat- ing in its sections dealing with the objects of companies but perhaps the time has come to test them in the courts or to revise them.

I make the shocking suggestion that if directors have on hand funds in excess of those required to carry out the objects for which the company was formed these funds should be paid out to the shareholders, and that directors should not look around anxiously to find ways of keeping these funds under their control.

Mr. Chairman, as most of us no doubt noticed, we have seen recently what appears to be another instance of the same sort of practice as Professor Ashley was complaining of.

This related to a company to which passing reference has been made in this House from time to time, namely, Northern Ontario Natural Gas.

We heard from Mr. Farris, the president or chairman, I am not sure which, of that company, that certain mining companies were moving in to try to take over control of NONG. It was a rather curious coincidence that the funds that they were using for this purpose were just about exactly equal to the subsidies they had got from the federal government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think everyone in this House recognizes that this group holds no particular brief for NONG, but we do consider it a bad and dangerous practice for a bunch of mining companies to move in and try to grab control of a utility company.

Many people in this province are concerned about increasing American control of our economy and I may say that I am one of that number. I think it is a matter we should be concerned about. But there is really a broader problem of which American control or any foreign control is a sub-issue. That is the problem of the extending power of corporations, the increase in the size of corporations and their ability to take over more and more companies so that more and more of our economic life falls under the control of fewer and fewer people. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I think that is a dangerous tendency, whether or not the owners of these corporations are foreigners. I am against monopoly control under any circumstances, and yet our companies legislation, if it does not actively encourage it, at least does absolutely nothing to prevent it.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): You were in favour of it a year ago.

Mr. Bryden: I was in favour of no such thing. The only trouble with the hon. member for London South is that, while he is a very intelligent man, he is so rarely in this House that the little bit he hears, he only half hears. If he would listen to the whole story, he would not make fatuous comments like he is now making.

Mr. Chairman, to get back to my point, I think we should be concerned about increasing and rapidly increasing monopoly control of our economy by fewer and fewer corporations moving out into areas for which they were not incorporated at all.

We all know about the Argus Corporation. It started 20 years ago, with a capitalization of something like $30,000—I do not know what the exact figure was, but it was not very much—and now it controls a veritable empire of companies in a tremendous range of endeavour. Food industries, beverage industries, printing, horses, agricultural implements; almost anything you want to name, there you find the fine Italian hand of Colonel Phillips and the Argus Corporation. Yet it is actually a relatively small company as these holding companies go in this present day and age.

Professor Ashley makes a valid point that if a company has a surplus, the surplus belongs to the shareholders. Why do not the shareholders get it? If the shareholders in, shall we say, a mining company want to invest in Northern Ontario Natural Gas, let them make the decision. But they cannot make the decision unless the money is put in their hands. If the directors and managers of the corporation have nothing better to do with the money, they should distribute it to the shareholders so the shareholders can make their own decisions. But no, they would rather keep the money under their own control, so that they can increase their own personal power and build huge personal empires with other people's money. That is the sort of thing that is going on.

I have mentioned only two relatively small examples of the process; and that is possible, apparently, under our Companies Act.

I am suggesting to the hon. Provincial Secretary that we should have far greater revisions of The Companies Act, far more radical revisions, than apparently he is contemplating. One of our major revisions should be to make sure that companies are limited to the purposes for which they were originally set up and that those purposes are set forth clearly and specifically and not so broadly that they can cover everything under the sun, which is the present practice.

However, I will leave that matter for the present, Mr. Chairman. There are several items I would like to comment on under these estimates, but I am going to forego the opportunity of doing so, because there is one subject in particular that I consider of more pressing importance than any others I have in mind. That subject relates to a number of the votes there are before us, to votes 1702, 1704, 1707 and also to the liquor control board, which is by custom covered by these estimates.

As a background to what I have to say, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some comments on the increase in liquor prices that took effect at the beginning of February of this year. As I stated at the time, I take no exception to these increases, to the extent that they represent a revenue measure on the part of the government. If the government considers it needs increased revenues, a reasonable increase in liquor prices is a good method of obtaining them.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to you that the subject matter which the hon. member for Woodbine has embarked upon does not really come under the scope of these estimates I have presented today. I think that the matters with which he is dealing, the increase in prices as a matter of revenue, should have properly been brought up under the estimates of the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan). In that respect, if it goes beyond revenues, it should have been brought up at the committee on commissions before which the—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, when can we get it clear once and for all where we discuss policy issues with regard to the licensing commission and with the LCBO?

The other day I thought we got it very clear that this is the department where we discuss the issue because it comes under the direction of the hon. Provincial Secretary. Now, the hon. Provincial Secretary intervenes and suggests otherwise. As far as I am concerned, we were told the other day that this is the department where it is to be considered and I just cannot understand why he is now seeking to frustrate an opportunity to—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to frustrate anybody on the point; but there are rules and the hon. member is one of the very first to bring up the question of rules of this House.

Mr. MacDonald: I thought you set the rules down a few days ago.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The hon. member for Woodbine has not embarked on what came up the other day. He is embarking on either revenues, which properly come under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Treasurer, sir; or on a detailed examination, which properly should be before the committee on government commissions. That is where these matters—

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could set the hon. Minister's fears at rest. I am going to make only brief reference to the increase in liquor prices and I am doing it only by way of background.

I would suggest to him, however, that the question of the price increases could not properly have been dealt with at the committee on government commissions. The chief liquor commissioner made it quite clear and I agreed with him that the price increase was a policy decision by the government. He advised the government as to what sort of revenues they could expect from increases at different levels, but it was not a regulatory function of the commission that was being embarked upon, it was the policy of the government that was being implemented in the price increases.

However, I only have a very short background review as far as the prices are concerned, but there are matters relating to them and emanating from them with which I want to deal. I submit that this is the proper place to deal with that.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Woodbine, but the other day when we were discussing the estimates coming under the hon. Provincial Treasurer in relation to the civil service and I was trying to make a point concerning the advisability of bringing the civil servants attached to the liquor control board within the general government civil service, I think it was the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) who rose on a point of order and suggested that I was not in order.

At that time, sir, as I recall, and I think my memory on this is pretty clear, the question was asked: When can this be discussed? It was my very definite recollection that your ruling, sir, was that this commission could be discussed under the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary—

Mr. MacDonald: It is in the book.

Mr. Chairman: In relation to the civil service commission.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I would just say that the whole question of where we would discuss liquor has caused difficulty. I can recall one year, in order to satisfy the hon. members, I tabled the report of—it was either the liquor licence board or the liquor control board. I might say that order was never called because no one wanted to speak on it; but at least it was put on the order paper so it could be there after one of these discussions.

An hon. member: Will you call it?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will call it if I can find out from your Whip, if there is somebody who has something to say on the order.

Mr. Singer: No, we did discuss it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps I caught a sore spot with that little comment. But in any event we do not want to eliminate the possibility of discussing these things.

An hon. member: Talk about it now.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Sir, I have read the statement that the hon. member for Woodbine has given to the press and which he is about to deliver now. I think his facts are wrong, and as he proceeds I might ask for the privilege of commenting to correct his facts. But I have no objection to him dealing with it now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bryden: You cannot say that I have not given you lots of warning.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The hon. member should have sent me a copy and I would know whether it was—

Mr. Bryden: I thought the hon. Minister had as much ingenuity as the hon. Prime Minister and when something went up to the press gallery you could grab a copy of it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: The rest of us have friends who pick things up for us even when we are staying here; maybe he has no friends, I do not know.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Sure this is fair!

Mr. Troy: To what paper, the London Bugle?

Mr. Bryden: I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I consider that if the government considers it needs increased revenues, an increase in liquor prices is a good method of obtaining them since it is essentially a liquor tax. However, Mr. Chairman, I take strong exception to the handout given to domestic distillers when prices were increased. These distillers will receive ten cents of the 35-cent increase made in the line of whisky that previously sold for $4.15 and now sells for $4.50 per 26-ounce bottle. Since this is the most popular line, the ten-cent handout to the distilleries represents a significant amount of money. In addition, they get five cents per 26-ounce bottle on all other domestic lines of whisky and gin.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, if I may, and if the hon. member will permit me. As soon as I received this statement I tried to check my own understanding. The price increase was five cents per bottle; and I think this is made very clear, there is no ten-cent increase as indicated here. There are no 26-ounce bottles of other domestic lines, they are all 25-ounce bottles. The only 26-ounce bottles sold in the province are of scotch that is imported in the bottle, so your facts are at fault there.

Mr. Bryden: Well, if you are quibbling about my reference to a 26-ounce bottle—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: And you are at fault on the ten-cent increase. It was a straight five-cent increase across the board as far as the distilleries are concerned. Now I am attempting to check this to ensure that I am correct.

Mr. Bryden: Well, that is not.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I have checked Mr. Sheppard's press release at the time this increase was made and he says that the new price schedule on Canadian ryes and gins will provide an increase of 30 cents per bottle of which the distillers will receive five cents. You refer to one line but I am quite certain that the distillers received no more than five cents on each bottle, and this is quite an important fact as you develop your argument. However, I will check it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the obvious thing is to wait for the final results. I do not have Mr. Sheppard's release here but I have the Globe and Mail account of it and my recollection of it is that it was accurate. It says:

On all domestic whiskies and gins there was a 30-cent increase, of which the distillers got five cents with the exception of the $4.15 brand, which was increased from $4.15 to $4.50, namely, by 35 cents, and ten cents of that went to the distillers.

As I say, that is the information I am relying on, and if I am wrong, I will be quite glad to retract it but I do not think—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member except to point out the fact that this is exactly the type of thing which highlights the fact that these questions should be brought up when the liquor control commissioner is before the committee on commissions. He would be able to delineate in pennies, if necessary, the figures.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, now. The hon. Prime Minister intervened a moment ago and said he had no objection—I want to suggest—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have no objection either.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay. If you have no objection, may I suggest that it be regularized in this way: When a department comes forward with its estimates, and some agency operates through that department, so that we may know clearly that it is going to be under consideration, the chairman of the board of that agency should be here, just as the deputy Minister of the department is here, so that if any questions are raised the hon. Minister will have an opportunity to check with him. It seems to me that this is a simple answer to ending this argument for future years. Any time a government agency is answerable to a particular Minister, then, when that Minister's estimates come up and there are policy issues involved in that agency, or under discussion, I submit for the hon. Minister's consideration that at least the officials of the commission should be here.

Mr. Sopha: On a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The only trouble, Mr. Chairman, is, that if you are talking about policy, you are talking about one thing; if you are talking about liquor and the increase in price—and this is the purpose of the legislative committee on government commissions, so that you can take these questions which are difficult to answer in the House—you have all the time and freedom of a committee to go into the most minute detail that you may require. If you want to deal with the policy matters that is one thing, if you want to deal with these things that is another. However, I will check this.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I suggest—

Mr. Sopha: I want to say a word on this point of order. When we are dealing with the various commissions that appear in the estimates, such as the racing commission or the securities commission, we do not run into this problem at all. We run into this problem with these two commissions, I suppose, because they do not require the votes of any public funds, therefore, they do not appear in the estimates. I was under the impression that it had become custom and usage in this House that we discuss liquor under the estimates of the Provincial Secretary.

I recall the occasion last year when the hon. Prime Minister put the report on the order paper. I do recall March 17, 1960, when I am quite sure it was under the estimates of this department that the former Prime Minister designated the date of the debate on liquor. I recall him saying that March 17 seemed to be particularly suitable for the discussion of it.

The other thing I wanted to say—and here I stand to be corrected if my impression is wrong—is that the chairmen of both these commissions, indeed, look to the Provincial Secretary when they are determining matters or want to ascertain matters of government policy, sir. It is the Provincial Secretary that they inquire of. I am fortified in making that statement by the fact that when the liquor licensing board, you will recall, extended the hours on Christmas Eve, it was said that the chairman had cleared it with the hon. Provincial Secretary.

That is what gives rise to my impression that he ought to have cleared it with one level above the hon. Provincial Secretary, but I do not want to get into a discussion on that. But I support my hon. friend's plea that we should now accord with custom, and we will see to it that in future years when this department's estimates are presented, any hon. member may say at any length anything he wants to say on the subject of liquor.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I think in terms of the broad issue, we will seek a regular fashion in dealing with these matters. All the difficulties the hon. member mentioned in the changes we have had over the years, have come about because it is rather difficult to find a place to debate the policy, and we have used various means of doing this in the past. The point really being that there has always been some place. If it is to be debated here tonight, the only thing I can say is, that in the future we will devise some method of doing this. But I do not want to take the functions away from the committee on government commissions because I consider it to be one of the more important standing committees that we have.

So I would not like to see its function transferred in here or in any way limited as a result of this. If we separate the two things, into policy and operation, it might be a little cumbersome, but I think we can do it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, just one brief additional point on this point of order. The racing commission, the water resources commission and others have representatives in this House. Presently neither of the liquor commissions has and I think it would be helpful to the proceedings of this House when these estimates come forward if there was an hon. member of the Legislature who sat on that commission. If the hon. Provincial Secretary feels this is not his job, perhaps the gentleman who has been appointed by the hon. Prime Minister to sit on that commission could take over the responsibility.

The hon. Provincial Treasurer did some wonderful field work the other night to protect the representative of this House on the racing commission and there was not much excitement about it. But if the hon. Prime Minister is going to make a habit of appointing representatives of this House under these various commissions and in the course of their duties they are paid extra amounts because they have extra work, surely we can expect that these hon. gentlemen, perhaps if the appropriate Minister does not want to do it, should get up and report on the various commissions on which they serve.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would not blame you if you had forgotten, but perhaps I may remind you that I had the floor.

Mr. Sopha: We were painfully aware.

Mr. Bryden: Before I proceed, a certain matter has been brought to my attention with regard to the comment I made a moment ago that might have been subject to misinterpretation. Apparently it has been misinterpreted. I said that some of us have friends who can pick up releases that are delivered to the press gallery. I want to make it clear I was not talking about any of the members of the press gallery, but I have myself taken releases out of the basket up there on the second floor, and as far as I am concerned, the fact—

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Bryden: Well as far as I am concerned, they are public documents when they are sitting in a basket in the press gallery. They are open to the public and apparently, Mr. Chairman, the release I sent up there a few minutes ago fell into the hands of the hon. Prime Minister before the release time mentioned on it. I see nothing wrong with that. As far as I am concerned, once it goes up there then I am running the risk that a great many people will see it, including the gentlemen of the press to whom it is directed. But I am certainly not suggesting that they give documents put into their hands to anybody—that they give them to any outside party, but—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I had better speak to this point too, Mr. Chairman, because it is an accepted procedure that we do this. I think it is done on all sides of the House. Certain material is delivered to the press with a note on it not to be released until actually delivered in the Legislature. I do not know whether this has always been the practice but it has been for as long as I have been here. I find nothing wrong with it.

I am quite aware, sir, that some things on the government side fall into the hands of other hon. members of this House. Frankly, I could not care less. We will distribute them to the other parties at the same time as I give them to the press gallery if this is the procedure the hon. member wants. It really is simply a method of doing business efficiently, that is all. Perhaps we are getting too efficient for our own good, but it is a practice to which I take no objection.

As long as the release time is honoured by the person into whose hands it falls; that is, if you give a press man something and say: "Please do not use this until it is delivered in the House," he will not. As long as that is honoured, I would be happy to give copies, when these occasions occur, to anybody in the House. But I would not want it used if, for instance, through the business of the House I did not happen to say it for another three days, which could happen.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think that as far as this point is concerned, which is a side issue, the hon. Prime Minister has put the matter very well and it is not necessary to add anything to what he has said. I agree entirely. If I send something up there and another hon. member sees it, I have no objection to him seeing it, but I would appreciate it if he would respect the release time I have put on it.

Now then, let us get back to the point at issue, if I can remember where I was.

I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that the argument I am now going to develop does not really depend on whether or not there was one line on which there was a ten-cent increase. I am quite prepared to wait for the facts on that. Since it has come up, I think it is important that the record should be made straight on it. But whether it was five cents across the board for domestic whiskies and gins, or five cents for all but one and ten cents on that one, I do not think it matters a great deal.

What I do think matters is that the distilleries have no need for this handout. Net profits of Distillers Corporation-Seagrams Limited increased from $31.6 million to $34.3 million in the last year for which figures are available. And those for Hiram Walker-Gooderham and Worts increased from $27.7 million to $29.6 million. Smaller distilleries had similarly satisfactory increases in profits.

Why then, did the government permit the distilleries to share in its own revenue measure? If we are to find the answer to this question, we must bear in mind that a provincial election took place on September 25, 1963.

Chief Liquor Commissioner G. H. Sheppard recently informed the committee on government commissions that the distilleries began pressing for a price increase about two years ago and that discussions of price increases were already well advanced when he took office on September 1, 1963.

I might just say at this point, Mr. Chairman, that anything I say here is no way intended as a criticism of the chief commissioner. What I am dealing with are policy matters. It is not his function to determine matters of policy. He was good enough to answer certain questions I asked him in the committee on commissions and I will use certain of the information he gave me. Naturally I take responsibility myself for the way in which I use it. I do not wish to criticize him in any way, although I have some criticisms to make of the government.

Mr. Sheppard was quoted in the Globe and Mail of January 30, 1964, as saying that—and these are the words of the Globe and Mail: "Original plans called for a ten-cent increase, five cents for distillers and five cents for the LCBO. Then the requirement for more money came along."

He was less definite before the committee on commissions, stating simply that various formulas had been considered at various times, without giving any information about chronology. It is self-evident, however, that when the ten-cent formula was under consideration the government was not thinking primarily of increased revenues for itself. A five-cent increase for distilleries is a real bonanza for them, but for the government, with its much greater budget requirements, it would not produce enough revenue to make it worth the trouble.

One does not have to have unusual powers of deduction to figure out what happened. The distilleries, not satisfied with their already opulent profits, had been pressing for some time for an increase in prices. In the period before the election of September 25, 1963, the war chest of the Progressive-Conservative Party of Ontario was being replenished and we all know how well replenished it was.

The distilleries could hardly fail to get the message, even if it was not put squarely to them as it may very well have been, that if they wanted a price increase they had better get into line with their contributions to the Tory war chest.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: We may well have proof of that, so do not get too—

Mr. Bryden: It would appear that the first idea was to give a nickel to the distilleries and then, to make things look good, to take a nickel for the public Treasury as well. After the Dominion-provincial conference of last fall, however, it became apparent that the province could not expect any significant amount of additional money from the federal government, so the government looked for new sources of revenue.

Liquor prices provided one of these sources and the original idea of a ten-cent increase was revised upward substantially. The distilleries, however, still got their five cents. While I say they got ten cents on the most popular line of whisky as a sweetener, I make that statement subject to verification when the exact figures are given.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the price increase given to the distilleries was nothing but a pay-off for favours given by them to the Tory party for the last election campaign.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: I notice that some of them are more silent than usual, to see the naked truth—

Mr. Bryden: These more innocent types over here that do not know what is going on are shocked.

I do not have precise information as to the amount of the contributions made by the distilleries to the Tory party. I think it is a fair assumption, however, that the increased prices they are now getting will enable them to recoup all of those contributions in less than a year.

A nickel a bottle, I think, would figure out to perhaps $2 million, or $1.5 million, and I would doubt if they gave any more than that. I admit that I do not know for sure and I will be happy if the hon. Prime Minister, when filing detailed figures on various items, would give us some detailed figures on this one after I am through. However, I am suggesting that the distilleries will be able to recoup themselves in less than a year.

Mr. Sopha: He does not get up to interrupt you on this one.

Mr. Bryden: It follows, Mr. Chairman, that the consumers of domestic whisky and gin in Ontario have been indirectly assessed without their knowledge or consent for contributions to the campaign funds of the Tory party. The distilleries are the agencies through which these contributions have been made, but the liquor consumers are the people who are paying. To add insult to injury, they will have to continue to pay long after all of last year's contributions have been recovered. I should think, in fairness, that the government should take that nickel out after the distilleries have recouped their alleged contributions to the Tory party; but no, the consumer is going to have to pay, probably forever.

Mr. L. C. Henderson (Lambton East): You do not believe that.

Mr. Bryden: In the public interest the Tory party should be prepared to publish, as this party is, an itemized, audited account of the contributions—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would suggest to the member for Woodbine that this has no relation to the estimates before the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Could we consider it under chief electoral officer then?

Mr. Singer: You have gone too far, now.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before I embarked on these comments, I attempted to call to your attention the various items to which my remarks are related and one of them, of course, was the LCBO. We had a little flurry over that. But there are other items here such as the office of the Speaker and Clerk of the legislative assembly and chief election officer; and this, I would suggest to you, is an appropriate spot for us to comment on the conduct of last year's election campaign. In fact, it is the only spot of which I know where we can do it.

It is true that there are never any items in the estimates for election expenditures, because no government is going to tip its hand by putting an item in a particular year's estimates relating to election expenditures. But this is the vote out of which they are paid, as far as I know.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, have you considered—

Mr. Chairman: I would suggest that election expenses should come under the Clerk of the legislative assembly and the chief election officer, and what you are speaking about has no relation to that at all. What private industries do is their concern.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am talking about the conduct of the last election and of the law of the province as it relates to it. I will have some comments to make on that. They are not very lengthy but I will make some references to it. I submit that this is exactly what it comes under.

My comments, I think, are appropriate for a person making lead-off remarks. They are ranging over a number of votes, but I think they are all four-square within the items before us at this time.

In the public interests, Mr. Chairman, the Tory party should be prepared to publish, as this party is, an itemized, audited account of the contributions made to it for the last election campaign.

Several hon. members: Why, why?

Mr. Bryden: Such a statement should cover contributions of more than $100 or so from all sources, but it is particularly important in the case of contributions by distilleries in view of the direct control that the government can exercise over their profits and general operations.

The hon. leader of this group tried to open up this matter earlier in the session when he read a certain statement of claim into the record. The Speaker, although permitting him to read the statement of claim, subsequently ruled it out of order on the ground that the matter to which it referred to was sub judice.

We do not dispute the Speaker's ruling—even if we could at this time, we do not do it. Apart from the fact that it is the policy of this group not to challenge any rulings of the Speaker, the authorities he cited in support of his ruling are quite convincing.

The ruling, however, points up the need for reconsideration of the rules of the House. A document that is part of the record of a case before the courts cannot be mentioned in this House, apparently, even though it is accessible to any member of the public. Indeed, it would appear that not even the evidence in a case before the courts can be referred to here, even though such evidence is frequently reported quite extensively in the press.

I am not, of course, suggesting that a member should be permitted to comment on the merits of a case before the courts. But the prohibition on a member even referring, without comment, to the court record in a pending matter is, in my opinion, an unnecessary and unreasonable limitation on free speech in this Legislature.

I may say that I am not in any way criticizing the Speaker. I agree that he interpreted the rules correctly, but I think the rules are unduly restrictive and I think that this is a matter that at an appropriate time we should look into in this House.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

It now being 6 of the clock, I will now leave the chair and we will resume at eight of the clock.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF PROVINCIAL SECRETARY AND CITIZENSHIP (continued)

On vote 1701:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, at the recess I was making some comments with regard to certain of the rules of this House as interpreted recently by the Speaker, and in this connection I would like to read extracts from an article by Mr. Ron Haggart that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of February 3, 1964. I will avoid reading any comments in his article which could be construed as out of order in the light of the Speaker's ruling. I quote:

The ruling which Mr. Speaker Morrow then made on Friday morning is a calamity for free discussion in the place in Ontario which should be the most free—

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Can my hon. friend now discuss a Speaker's ruling that has been given in the House? I do not think he can.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think I made it clear that I am not discussing the Speaker's ruling. I stated several times that I accept the Speaker's ruling, indeed I believe it is correct in accordance with the rules. What I am discussing are the rules on which the Speaker's ruling was based. I think this comes quite clearly within the terms of these votes, since they are votes relating to the office of the Speaker and the legislative assembly. I continue:

Mr. Morrow found that the leader of the New Democratic Party—

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, on a further point of order. If you will not sustain the first point of order, then surely the second one is relative and that is that my hon. friend is not discussing the estimates of The Provincial Secretary's Department in any shape or form.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am discussing—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am discussing, under the general estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) that are now before us—

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would like to refer to the ruling that was made Friday when the member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) asked the Chairman:

Mr. Chairman, following this, does this mean then that when the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary come up as suggested by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cowling) we can ask questions regarding the employees at that particular time?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

So we will abide by the ruling from here on in connection with the vote.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure what you have reference to. If you have reference to the LCBO I think I can tell you that I am not planning to discuss the LCBO any more. I am discussing matters affecting the rules of the House.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I would add another objection and that is that if this hon. member is going to criticize a ruling of the Speaker he might at least do it when the Speaker is in the chair—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am not doing that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He is about to make a remark concerning the Speaker's ruling in this House when the Speaker is not even in the chair and it certainly is not in any way related to what we are discussing here tonight.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: On this point of order being discussed I have been happy to go along, I think quite a long way, in order to accommodate the discussion of the House; but it appears there is only one way to play and that is exactly according to the rule book, because this is just a question of taking advantage of the laxity that has been permitted and I do not think it should be permitted.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would point out once again that I am not discussing the Speaker's ruling. I am discussing consequences that ensue, as far as the rules of this House are concerned, from the Speaker's ruling, which I have stated ten times now that I accept. If there may be some references in this press comment to the Speaker's ruling, I did not intend to bring them forward as criticisms of the Speaker's ruling. I do not think they were intended—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy Resources): We have all read that.

Mr. Bryden: I do not care whether you have read it or not. I wish to proceed to read some extracts from it now, but I—

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, I think this is an awful waste of time, and what the press clipping has to do with the Speaker I cannot fathom. I would like you to rule on it, sir. Are we going to listen to this press report or not?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

I would like to know what the member is speaking to with respect to this report from which he is reading.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to make some references and have, I think, before the adjournment, made a few references to the rules of the House. I think it is appropriate to discuss those under vote 1702 and vote 1707, and since I am—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There is no place in the estimates to discuss the rules of the House.

Mr. Bryden: I submit that there is, Mr. Chairman. The conduct of this House comes under the appropriations that relate to it and those appropriations are under this general estimate. Failing any ruling to the contrary from you, Mr. Chairman, I propose to continue.

I have been interrupted, I do not know how many times, on points of order which in my opinion have no merit. The hon. members have a perfect right to raise them but I would like to complete what I have to say.

An hon. member: It is all right to raise them, is it?

Mr. Bryden: It is all right to raise them, but only the Chairman can rule on them.

Mr. Cowling: Well, Mr. Chairman, how about it?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Cowling: I personally do not want to hear it.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think that is—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

I have already made a ruling, at the request of the member for Yorkview on Friday, and now I am going to keep the member to this ruling. We have wandered away from the estimates of this department and I would like to ask the member to get back on to the estimates.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly trying to stay within the terms of your ruling. My recollection of the ruling you made in respect to the hon. member for Yorkview was in response to a question by him as to whether or not matters relating to employees of the LCBO could be discussed under the estimates of the hon. Provincial Secretary. As I understood it, you said they could, but I do not think it follows that nothing but that matter can be discussed here. There are a great many others that can be discussed here and I cannot see that anything I am trying to raise is in any way at variance with the ruling that you made in response to the request, the question from the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer), sir. If there is any further enlightenment you can give me, I would be certainly happy to receive it, but I do not see that it affects anything that I have been trying to say here.

However, I will try to complete the matter as quickly as I can, Mr. Chairman, and I will reduce the amount I had intended to read from Mr. Haggart's column in the Star and just read the last few paragraphs of it as follows—

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order: We are right back to the same piece of paper after all the talk, and we are hearing something about the Speaker's ruling. I think it is up to the hon. members to abide by that.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I will assure you that in what I plan to read there will be no reference to the Speaker's ruling. I do not think any references I have made are out of order but in order to satisfy the hon. member for High Park, who has a little difficulty comprehending some of the niceties of these points, I will refrain from any further reference to the Speaker of any kind whatever—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Downsview): He always speaks highly of you.

Mr. Cowling: Why does the hon. member not be quiet and sit down?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): This is a typical Tory steam roller—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: After these hon. gentlemen have their various little private meetings, I will continue, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Haggart stated in the three or four concluding paragraphs of his article, the following:

Does the Toronto Star really believe that politicians, speaking in the privileged sanctuary of a legislature, should confine their discussion of disputed facts to those facts proven in a court of law?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I must object that this once more is a comment on the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order. With respect, may I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that our problem is in the nature of your ruling. Your ruling has nothing to do with what the hon. member is dealing with, your ruling was with reference to the LCBO, and we are not talking about the LCBO. However, if I may take the next point, I think it is time now that we got some clarification as to when we will be in order to discuss the ludicrous position this Legislature is now in as a result of a ruling of the Speaker, which is in accordance with the rules but which leaves the Legislature in the position where there is less free speech here than there is outside the House.

If your ruling, Mr. Chairman, is that we cannot discuss that under the appropriation for the Speaker, and conceivably there is an argument that such is not in accordance with the rules of the House, then when are we going to have an opportunity?

Mr. Cowling: On the Budget debate.

Mr. MacDonald: On the Budget debate. Well, let us have this as a ruling from the Speaker, but up until now, every time we have breathed a suggestion of reference to the Speaker's ruling, when we were not intending to discuss the Speaker's ruling, when we were intending to discuss, I repeat, the ludicrous situation this Legislature is now in—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You could raise the whole matter very easily in the Budget debate when the Speaker is in the chair, and then he will defend his own position and his own ruling.

Mr. MacDonald: Is that your ruling, Mr. Chairman? Is that your ruling on my point of order?

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, it does not need a ruling. You can raise any matter you want in the Budget debate when the Speaker is in the chair. You do not need a ruling to discuss this on the Budget debate.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think I can be of assistance to you, sir, by simply refraining from reading any of Mr. Haggart's article. I think it is a very good article but if it causes so much concern to some of the hon. members I will simply refrain from reading it at all.

But I will say, Mr. Chairman, that my concern at this time is not, in any case, so much the need to reform the rules in certain respects, although I think that is indicated, as it is for the obvious need for reform of our election laws. The New Democratic Party has pressed tirelessly for laws requiring full and detailed disclosure by all parties of the contributions to their campaign funds. The Liberal Party in this province is also advocating such a measure and so too are most of the newspapers of the province. Indeed, anyone who is concerned about the good health of our democratic society is necessarily concerned about campaign expenditures. I do not object to individuals, corporations or other groups making such contributions as they see fit to the party of their choice. In fact, I believe they should be encouraged to do so. But such contributions should be publicly disclosed except for those of very small amounts. There is no place in a democracy for secret slush funds representing secret deals between political parties and special interest groups looking for favours. A contribution or deal that cannot stand the light of day should not be made.

Sedulous efforts have been and are being made to conceal from the light of day the story of the relations between the distilleries and the Tory party and government. However, we can see enough of the iceberg to know that beneath the surface there is a huge murky mass. It is time the spotlight of publicity was focused on this mass.

Unfortunately, the press has failed dismally to discharge its responsibilities to the public in this regard. The unfortunate part about the incident involving my hon. leader, to which I have just referred, was not that he read the statement of claim into the record, but that it was necessary for him to do so. Where was the press, that likes to represent itself as the fearless seeker after truth? Newspapers have on numerous occasions published statements of claim in whole or in part, some of which appeared to me to be quite scandalous.

If in the particular case that must remain nameless in this House they were worried about libel actions, the statement of claim should at least have given them a tip-off as to where they should start digging for facts. They could have used their own quite substantial resources and know-how to bring to light facts the public is entitled to know.

But they have shunned the whole subject like the plague. The public is entitled to an explanation of this clear dereliction of duty, and should not be asked to accept mamby-pamby protestations that the press does not want to do anything to hurt anybody.

The question of campaign contributions is vital to the proper operation of our whole democratic system of government. If the press were alive to its responsibility to do everything within its power to help protect and expand our democratic heritage, it would need no urging to dig up all the facts it can about campaign contributions.

Since it is apparently unwilling to discharge that responsibility, there is only one course open that I can see. A Royal commission should be established immediately to inquire into all aspects of the financing of the campaigns of all parties in the last election in Ontario. Such a commission should be given all the resources it needs for a complete investigation, but I should add a precautionary word: the commission counsel and staff should not include active supporters of the Tory party or of any other party for that matter.

The New Democratic Party will welcome and co-operate fully with such a commission. Any other party that has nothing to hide will do the same.

Mr. Chairman, it has taken me rather longer than I had anticipated to make these introductory remarks on these estimates. I would merely point out to you that I do not think much more than about 50 per cent of the elapsed time was actually occupied by me. I have rarely run into so many points of order constantly reiterated. Even though the Chairman apparently had not ruled me out of order, I would start again and face exactly the same round of points of order. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman, but obviously it takes up time of the committee when such points of order are constantly stated.

I will conclude simply by saying that I think that the matter I have raised here is one of the most important matters affecting the future democratic life of this province. I believe it is a matter that the government should very seriously consider. I think that it should accept my recommendation for the establishment of a Royal commission. I believe it will accept it unless there is some impelling reason why it feels it cannot let the information which such a commission would bring to light, come to the light of day.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a couple of comments on this but I would point out first that the hon. member has no one to blame but himself if only 50 per cent of the time he was on his feet was occupied with his remarks. He persisted in trying to do something which was obviously a breach of the rules of the House. He consistently refused to accept the position that was put, so I would suggest to him that he brought it on himself.

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the comment of the hon. Prime Minister about 50 per cent of the time, I defy him to indicate on any occasion when I refused to accept the ruling of the chair, but I do not accept him as the Chairman and I will not accept his ruling.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, let us get back to the point that was raised about the increase in the price of liquor. Once again, I have heard many inferences that everybody except me is dishonest, and this I can only take as a direct accusation against this government. It may be worded in a different fashion—

Mr. MacDonald: We did not say dishonest.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, personally I would consider it to be highly dishonest if the allegations contained in this were true. And we do get a little tired, on our side of the House, of the ever-present attitude that "We are holier than thou," and "No one but us has any virtue," and "Join us because we are the white-haired boys."

The increase in the price of liquor — the negotiations which led to this were commenced before I became leader of this party, long before I became leader of this party; they went on over a long period of time. Although it is not necessarily of any significance, the price was not increased, nor was it decided upon, until after September 25, after the election was over. As I say, this is of little significance to me.

Perhaps my hon. friend knew from the beginning that we were going to win the election. I did not, and I think there are a lot of other people in the province who did not.

However, the point is this: There was an increase, in the price of liquor, of five cents a bottle on Canadian brands. We will disregard the imported scotches; because of a different pricing system there was a different increase there. His remarks were directed particularly to the five-cent increase.

We really do not control the price of liquor as a government, except that we have a monopoly in purchasing. This is quite a control. We have no statutory right to control the price of liquor. We control it because of the way in which liquor is merchandised in the province, and it is only merchandised through stores controlled by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario. And it was the liquor control board which carried on the various negotiations over a long period of time, under various people who served on that board, and eventually this five-cent increase was arrived at.

Frankly, I did not, nor did anyone else in the government, examine the balance sheets or go through the various statements made by the liquor company in their proposition as to why the price of liquor should be increased. The figures quoted in the statement of the hon. member are very misleading indeed. For instance, the increase in profits, from $31.6 million to $34.3 million for Distillers Corporation-Seagrams Limited, involved their entire operation—their world-wide operation. But the hon. member would have it, in the way he quotes it, so that it would apply only to the liquor which was sold in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, there is absolutely nothing in what I said which would justify any implication that I intended this to apply only to the Ontario situation. We have no figures on the Ontario situation. I simply had to take the figures I had; but they show that the companies were doing very well. I think I have a right to assume that they are doing as well in Ontario as they are in the rest of their operations.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would only say, Mr. Chairman, that as I read it and as the hon. member states it, he says nothing here about these being world-wide figures. Perhaps he does not say so directly, but the inference I gather is that the only reason these profits increased world-wide, the only reason there was a price increase, was that these distilleries were supporting the Tory party.

Now then, as far as the total increase in price is concerned, certainly the amount of tax, that portion of the price increase, is a very definite question of government policy. For this we take full responsibility. It was this government and no one else which decided how much additional tax we were to get, as a government, from the sale of liquor. But the five-cent increase, I might say, extended all across Canada. We were not the only province to increase liquor prices at this time. The fatuous part of the argument of the hon. member is that I could say there is an election coming up in Saskatchewan. And am I going to ask the hon. member how much the distillers gave his fellow NDP's? I am not. It is such a ridiculous question. It is such a silly question—an absolutely silly question. The price increase, the five-cent price increase, went right across Canada.

What the other provinces did, as far as the other amount is concerned, the amount they increased in addition to the five cents, I would not know. But we needed money in this province for various things—education, hospitals, all sort of things—and we taxed for it. If we are going to spend it, we have to collect it; and we felt that this was a place where, perhaps, it would hurt our taxpayers the least.

I think I have demonstrated quite clearly that to attempt to draw any connection between this price increase and the election, the time of the election and the funds which might be collected by the Conservative Party, is just absolute nonsense.

I will make this statement once and for all. I do not know where contributions for the Conservative Party come from. I do not know who they are made by, I do not know in what amounts they are made, and I do not want to know. In the decisions we have to make, Mr. Chairman, I just consider it a lot wiser. We all know that political parties need money to operate; it has been ever thus. Of course, always too, through our entire political history, if you read it you will find that these eternal allegations have been made. But they are eternal allegations, and I say there is absolutely no logic in them.

The negotiations for this price increase started long before I was either leader of the party or the Prime Minister of the province. We had nothing to do with them. They were advanced to us by the Liquor Control Board as being proper, in view of the various elements put forward over the period—time costs, labour costs, and materials and so on. They were made after a comparison of previous profit pictures. It was the first price increase they had had since 1956. All these points came into it—and they were not considered by us, they were considered by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario. But when we got to the point where we were dealing with the tax, we dealt with it.

Let me just go finally to the question of the Royal commission. I think my hon. friends over here, Mr. Chairman, should be the last people on earth to ask for a Royal commission. We have had several Royal commissions since I have been in this House, and if the answer did not suit them, they always said "whitewash". This was just automatic—Royal commission after Royal commission. We stood in this House and we debated the Roach report. I can remember standing here last year debating it and it was the same old thing: "He did not do it properly," and "Why?" A Royal commission is the last thing on earth you people should ask for, because you will not accept the findings of one, unless it suits your purpose.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order! On vote 1701.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Vote 1701? I presume the hon. Prime Minister was speaking of domestic liquors when he said there was only a slight—

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, on vote 1701; in looking over the public accounts for 1962, I noticed that $1,749 had been given to three different athletic associations. In the 1963 public accounts book, I notice that approximately nine different athletic associations, or organizations connected with athletics after some fashion, have received a little over $6,200 from this government from the government hospitality fund. Two of the associations are professional associations. It does not matter to me whether they are given to either professional or amateur. The question I would like to ask of the hon. Provincial Secretary is: On what basis did these various associations receive the sums of money they did receive? I have another question to follow after this, sir.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Chairman, I have explained to the House on other occasions that the government hospitality fund of $40,000 is used in conjunction with gatherings held within the province of either international, national, interprovincial or provincial scope. By and large, the Minister tries to meet all the requests within the limits of his budget. I suggest to the hon. member, and to the hon. members of this House, that a hospitality fund of $40,000 for a province the size of Ontario, with 6.5 million people, is a very modest fund indeed.

Mr. Newman: I have no quarrel with the size of the fund at all. The reason for asking the question is for information, because I can recall, looking into the estimates of The Department of the Treasury, and noticing grants made there to athletic organizations. I also noticed grants made in The Department of Labour, then again I saw grants made in The Department of Education. My only thought is that if grants are going to be made to athletic groups of any sort they should all come from the one department, rather than come from three or four different departments of government.

Now I would like to ask of the hon. Minister if the grants that are given here are to conduct an athletic affair, to assist these athletes overseas, or is it some type of entertainment in Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: First of all, Mr. Chairman, taking the last statement first, the affairs are not all held in Toronto. They are held throughout Ontario, wherever the occasion takes place. As a matter of fact, I think in the past two years we have had the broadest selection of places in which they have been held. They are for the provision of either a luncheon or a dinner or some sort of reception in conjunction with the event being held.

Mr. Newman: This is not to conduct, say, a championship. It is solely for the entertainment of athletes or individuals connected with athletes?

Then at this time may I suggest to the hon. Minister that he consider the University of Windsor that is conducting the Canadian intercollegiate basketball championships Friday and Saturday of this week? More than likely the association back home knows nothing of hospitality grants such as this and certainly would appreciate any assistance that this government could make to them in conducting the Canadian championships, and primarily in entertaining the athletes that will be coming in from British Columbia to Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I shall be glad to take that under advisement for some future year. As a matter of fact, the practice which I have attempted to follow—because of the shortage of funds you cannot meet all the requests in one year—but perhaps you meet requests respecting curling and golf in one year, and then racing of different types, and then basketball in another year. It is spread around over a period of years.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, would it be—

Mr. Chairman: The member for York South.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three points under vote 1701.

One little footnote, Mr. Chairman, if I could claim the hon. Prime Minister's attention for a moment. Perhaps I cannot!

One little footnote to our discussion of liquor. Has there been any clarification as to whether or not it was a ten-cent raise on the $4.15 brand?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to speak to the commissioner. It is my understanding that there has not been. But apparently there was some price relating to the kegs rather than the bottle; what the results are I do not know.

The only point I would make about it is that the five cents has not changed. In other words, the decision was five cents per bottle. Now I will check this for you.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the second point I wanted to seek some clarification from the hon. Minister on is in the citizenship division.

What goes into this $219,500 appropriation for maintenance?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The bulk of that is in teachers' salaries. The way that is broken down is this.

The language and citizenship training is $120,000—and general maintenance is $99,500; so you get $219,500. The $99,500 is further broken down; special projects $50,000; information service $7,000; exhibition $10,000; translation $6,000; research projects $11,000; equipment $2,000; printing $11,000; and advertising and miscellaneous $1,000.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, if I may just comment briefly on that. In keeping with my hon. colleague's remarks earlier about more meaningful breakdown of estimates, I think the hon. Minister would agree with me that the term maintenance, when it includes some $120,000 for paying teachers, is at least misleading and certainly not very meaningful.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: One of the reasons is because part of these funds are recovered from the federal government.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the final point in vote 1701, item six, memorial wreaths. This is an old one and let me play my record once again.

This past fall there was something of an undignified schemozzle in my own riding in which many people at the township level who are lifelong Conservatives were disgusted, to put it mildly. This arose from the rather obvious effort in the distribution of wreaths by the defeated Tory candidate in one or two instances by himself, rather than the task being assigned to anybody else.

Mr. Chairman, I know on the previous occasion you got rather indignant when I raised this issue in the House and claimed that in your area it was given to the Silver Cross mothers. Fine; this is done in many other areas. But in some cases it is still handled behind the scenes by the Conservative member or the defeated Tory candidate in seats where Opposition members are elected. In this instance it was done openly and blatantly by the defeated Tory candidate coming in when nobody else knew what the arrangements were and he assumed it unto himself. It was a clear revelation of how the thing was handled.

I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot think of anything that is quite so cheapening of a Remembrance Day than a repeat of this performance every November 11. I hope that sometime this government will cease playing politics, at least with the distribution of memorial wreaths. I will let the matter rest there.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I shall try, in the face of a word such as "cheapening", to be as composed as I possibly can. The hon. member raised this issue on March 22, 1956, in this House and if ever I saw a display that could be called that word, it was put on by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. MacDonald: How?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: At that time you raised the question and you said this:

My question to the hon. member is this: is it true in all instances that Opposition members are not given the right to present the wreath on behalf of the government?

Mr. Sopha: That is a good question.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is a good question, and the answer to that question is no. Every hon. member in this House is given equal opportunity but I, as Minister, will not do the work of the hon. member for York South. Now if you want to know what the hon. members of this House do just speak to the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator). Now there is an hon. member of the Opposition who is one of the most vigorous in making sure that every remembrance service in his riding is looked after and looked after very capably. Year in and year out he digs up new ones and I am thankful to him for that.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Downsview requested that they be delivered to them personally and this has been done. I know those two instances because they contacted me directly, one by telephone and one by mail.

Since the hon. member for York South made the speech on March 22, 1956, I have never been able to find a record of him making any inquiries of the department since. I suggested earlier, and I say this in all fairness, that on September 3, 1964 you contact me not that I contact you. Because it may be you do not want to do that kind of work. But you contact me or the department, and we will extend you every courtesy in these wreaths. With other responsible citizens of the community who are participating in Remembrance Day services as officials or who are aware of them in some other way, have them contact me and I will also extend them every courtesy.

However, I say this, and I say it to all hon. members, that we are pleased when the hon. member for Niagara Falls sends a letter. I am delighted that he has sent me a letter because then the officials of our department do not have that frantic chase to find out where the Remembrance Day services are. I suggest to the hon. member for York South that he communicate to me on September 3, 1964, and he will never have to raise this question again in this House as long as I am Minister.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not have to contact the hon. Minister to let him know who is the elected representative in any riding and the hon. Minister cannot slough over this by saying—

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister cannot slough over this matter by suggesting that one or two Liberal hon. members in the House have got in touch with the hon. Minister and asked him to do what was his duty to do, and that is to respect them as the elected representatives. In doing so they will have put the rest of the Liberals on the spot, because in previous years some of them have volunteered that in their own area the wreaths were still being distributed through the defeated Tory candidate and I am certain that this is the case. The hon. Minister knows who is the elected representative and if he has forgotten he can take out his government directory and he can find out.

Just let me go back to the hon. Minister's contention that I put on a cheapening display. I will recall to him exactly what I said to him back in 1957.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have it here.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine, you read it. There was nothing cheapening about it. What I did was to read into this House record here a letter I got from a very respected former member of this Legislature, namely, Bill Grummett. Bill Grummett had sat in this House from 1943 to 1951 and never once had he been approached, never once during that period, to represent the government of the province of Ontario in the presentation of a wreath. Then by mere chance, after he was defeated, his son happened to be a member of the Legion—I believe it was in Ansonville—and got a letter from the department, which was then distributing the wreaths, saying that a wreath was being sent on behalf of the elected representative, Mr. Wilfrid Spooner.

This is the way it has been operated up until now. This is the way it is still operating I venture, in most of the Opposition ridings. I will say to the hon. Minister, "I'll get in touch with him next fall." But the hon. Minister does not need to say that the responsibility rests with me. The responsibility rests with the hon. Minister, or his appropriate officials to get in touch with the elected representative of each riding who, for better or for worse, is the government spokesman because government is made up not just of the government; it is made up of the Opposition too and if the people in their wisdom decide that they are going to send an Opposition member, he should not be treated in the fashion he has been up until now.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Why does he not write in and ask for it?

Mr. MacDonald: This is the first time that I have been told that it is necessary to write and inform the hon. Minister that I was the duly elected and returned member for York South.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: If you are a legionnaire you should not have to write about these things.

Mr. MacDonald: I am a legionnaire and I will tell the hon. Minister of Mines, through you, that there were a lot of the members of the Legion in Branch 57 who were disgusted with what happened last fall, because most of them had not even met the defeated Tory candidate. He was an outsider and he suddenly turned up to present a wreath. The irony of it is that the wreath got lost so that he had nothing to present and it was a double schemozzle.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word? I am a life member of the Port Arthur Legion and I myself—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand this latest discussion because in my riding there is no one who writes to the member or at least to the hon. Minister. The wreaths come to the Legion branches and they call on the representative of the district to lay the wreath. As far as the Silver Cross Mothers are concerned, we in our Legion branches buy the wreath for them. In my riding there is never any problem at all. It is rather strange how it is done here in metropolitan areas.

I want to support the argument of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. It seems to me, sir, that where you have grants to athletic organizations, I think he has made a very fine suggestion that they should be under one group. In regard to the hospitality fund, would it be possible for the RCAF Association, which is meeting in North Bay, Ontario, on May 17—it is the Ontario body—to be eligible for a hospitality grant because—

An hon. member: You will have to write him a letter.

Mr. Troy: Is it too late this year?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Actually within the limits of the budget I would say that to spread $40,000 across not only the people of the province of Ontario but on a national and an international basis requires a lot of head scratching and stretching of those dollars. Much as I would like to entertain the requests of the armed forces, if some group comes within the aegis of another area, I am sometimes compelled to say, "Well, for the RCAF meeting, you should be provided for by the federal hospitality fund." I have to have some rules to go by. It is very difficult.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the hon. members of the House that it never has been the policy of the department to dictate to the recipients of the wreaths as to who should lay the wreath. There is not even a suggestion. All that the department is concerned with is to find out the information as to where the commemoration services are held throughout the province. I invite again as I did an hour ago, the hon. members to let me know. Over the years the number has been increasing, primarily because the hon. members in certain ridings have been very active in digging up this information, and to spread 600 wreaths across a province the size of Ontario in a short space of time does take some doing.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, you say 600 wreaths?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. Troy: Why then the $6,000? Because in 1962 you spent $6,389. The wreaths that you give I think cost $30, and 600 at $30 does not come to—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The bulk are $10.25 each.

Mr. Troy: Oh. Now then, what is the procedure? Are not these wreaths sent out from the Ontario command of the Legion?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. Troy: So they let you know how many branches—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, they provide the wreaths we purchase. We notify them where to send the wreaths. They are our agents.

Mr. Troy: How do you know where memorial services are being held?

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, point of order!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: After a while you will find out.

Mr. Thompson: Point of order!

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: He has been standing on his feet. I have not spoken for three days.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I, as much as anyone, want to hear of what he is a life member. But before that I would like to say, sir, that I had raised a question in general remarks. I wonder if he wants to deal with those. My point of order is to bring system into the estimates. Would you like to deal with the questions I raised in case there is overlapping on them? Then we will hear from the hon. Minister of Mines. My question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: The Minister of Mines has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Mr. Chairman, the reason I want to speak on this point is because this is absolutely libellous to the Legion units in my district. As long as I can remember, these wreaths have never come to me in all my years in this House. A letter comes from the Provincial Secretary to the zone commander of the Legion. He tells the hon. Provincial Secretary who the Legion head is in each of the places where there is a branch of the Legion. I have about 12 branches that receive a wreath every Memorial Day, and there has never been a thought, to my knowledge, of using politics. Anybody who would use the memorial wreath or Memorial Day for political reasons—well, I have my opinion of his political size. When you mention politics in connection with the Legion or our fallen comrades, whose memory these wreaths serve to honour, I think it is pretty cheap politics.

Mr. Chairman, that is how it is done in my area, and I defy anybody to say that I have ever, at any time in my 13 years in this House, used the memorial wreath for political reasons. I do not think anybody else has.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I should be flattered or disappointed. I got such a big hand. I do not know whether it was for the former speaker, or for me when I stood up.

I would like to speak on the matter of wreaths, and how they are distributed in my riding. I did not think the method was used any other way.

Since the hon. Minister mentioned the fact that I contacted him by letter—I was told in the first instance, when I was first elected four or five years ago, that the member for that riding—the former member was a Conservative and a very fine chap as you will recall—contacted the Provincial Secretary and gave him a list of who was entitled, or wanted, a wreath. In our area, we have seven municipalities. They start at Crystal Beach, the township of Bertie, Fort Erie, Willoughby township, the village of Chippawa, the former Stamford township, and the city of Niagara Falls.

Under no circumstances do I want these wreaths sent to me. I would much rather they go to the branch which requests them. That is the way it has been handled in Niagara Falls, and for that I thank you, Mr. Minister.

But if such a thing happens and a defeated candidate, whether he be Liberal or Conservative, and especially if he be a member of the government, has the authority to pick up these wreaths just to pick up a little bit of political prestige, it is not quite the proper thing to do. My experience has been excellent with the hon. Minister. I have sent in the names of the branches. The only criticism that I might find is late in the day—the wreaths do come through a little later than some of the Legion presidents, or people in authority feel they should have them. They have contacted me by phone, wondering whether the wreath would come through. My only criticism with your department and the wreaths, sir, is that if you would send them through a few days earlier it would save a little anxiety on my part, too.

But you have treated them well, you have sent them direct, and I would like that process to continue. You can rest assured that, as the presidents change in the many branches we have in my riding, they get chomping at the bit. They are doing a job and they would like to know from me, yearly: "Are we going to get them as usual?" I send the letter on to you annually, and you do send them through. I never thought that politics entered into it. I hope it does not start at this stage of the game, although, sir, if the hon. member for York South has had this experience, it is a sad one. It should not happen, not on such an occasion. Under no circumstances should that happen. I do not think that is cricket; I just say that by way of my opinion, and give it to you for what it is worth.

I want again to emphasize that we are happy with the distribution. They do not come to me at all. I do not want them, because I do not think that politicking has to come to that level. I think it is rather a nasty way to pick up a few votes. I would much rather they go to the branches. I can assure you that I am invited to every memorial service, and they all take place at eleven o'clock on November 11. I cannot attend them all, but I do take turns and get about to see the boys; because, in many cases, they do an excellent service, and we do remember the past and what the soldiers have done for us. I think this is a wonderful way for the province to continue this operation, but do not let politics enter at all.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Dovercourt, some time ago, asked some questions—except that he put them in such a way that I can never really tell whether he is asking a question of himself, asking a question or making a statement. So, if I do not catch them all, I will read Hansard. I can assure the hon. member that if there is the slightest vestige of a good idea, I shall not hesitate in adopting it. I can promise you that.

With respect to the issuance of letters patent and the time period, I assure the hon. member, and all the hon. members of this House, and the legal profession and the public generally, that one of the chief items in the coming year's programme will be to reduce the period of processing to a minimum. We have recently brought in Office Overload to catch up with this. I can assure you that nobody really will go out of the province to incorporate.

The reason we have our hands so full is because our corporate laws are so popular, and that is the reason the demand for our services is so great. We did bring Office Overload in, we hope to catch up with the backlog fairly soon and then maintain the period of time.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Why has it taken so long to get around to this? This has been going on for years.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It has not been going on for years. I can assure the hon. member that the members of the department—

Mr. Trotter: It has been going on ever since I became a lawyer, and that is since 1950.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have been exceptionally busy.

With reference to the matters within the item of the citizenship vote, I should like to mention first of all, for the hon. members of the House, that during the past year the director of citizenship, Mr. Stephen Davidovich, was promoted to take a place in the civil service commission as a director of training there. Needless to say his absence has been felt; but he had trained his staff to take over and we will be again catching up with some of the ideas which we have put into effect.

I think if the hon. member for Dovercourt who has more than a passing interest in these affairs, were to review the activities of the department, and review the activities of other jurisdictions in Canada and in the United States, he would come to the conclusion that we in Ontario are leading the way; because, in the last three years especially, we have embarked upon new project after new project in order to ensure that the paths we are on are correct. And that is why, for example in our teacher training programme, people come from other provinces and from the British Commonwealth to learn.

These books that I was showing you, that we have developed for language teaching, other provinces are interested in them. I was noticing in an Italian newspaper published in Montreal that they are very vociferously advocating that the Quebec government adopt a citizenship section with respect to this.

We are in the process of developing these projects and we try to evaluate them. But sometimes you are so busy doing things that you cannot catch up on the evaluating. We propose also to evaluate some of our programmes in this coming year; such as, if possible, the television programme, which again was a joint effort of the federal government and ourselves.

With reference to the schools, it is difficult for us to know the drop-outs. The board of education has no statistics on drop-outs. We do keep statistics in our own schools. In the summer school, for example, we were exceedingly pleased that 65 per cent of the students who started, finished. When you consider that it is in the heat of summer and that many get back to full, gainful employment, I think it is a very good standard.

Mind you, we are interested in getting students into the schools, because once they get into the schools some of this will rub off on them. They may have to quit because of jobs, shift work and things of that kind, but I am sure that every day they spend in our schools is of value.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the hon. Minister, does he want me to ask for further clarification when these estimates come up, on the very things to which he is replying; does he want me to wait until the item comes up under the estimates or may I interrupt him now?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Well I am going through some of the things.

Mr. Thompson: Yes, I appreciate that, but I am just wondering—there are still other questions arising from the hon. Minister's answer; does he want me to wait until the item comes up on this or interrupt him as he is going along?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: If I may just conclude.

We are attempting to evaluate all our programmes in order to ensure that we are headed in the right direction. We have no other jurisdiction to follow in our work, even in respect to the federal authorities which are charged with The Citizenship and Immigration Act in their field. We are embarking on projects and schemes ahead of them, although I will say that the co-operation between the federal Department of Citizenship and our own has been of the highest sort. Between the two of us I think we have some of the finest programmes evolved in this particular field.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, if I could just get more clarification. I can wait if the hon. Minister would prefer. I do not think he has the question I am raising. Does he prefer that I wait, for example, on the citizenship? Does he want me to wait until the item comes up or does he want me—

An hon. member: It is up now.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Minister about projects. I remember two years ago the hon. Minister talking about a kitchen project in which he had teachers going into the kitchens in order to help the newcomers. He spoke with great pride at that time of this project, it was going to be an expanding project. Would the hon. Minister now tell us how much it has expanded?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Well, Mr. Chairman, the kitchen projects were an idea that was put forward in relationship to permitting women especially to gather into a home in a small group in an atmosphere, a sort of informal atmosphere, to take these classes. Our responsibility was to provide the teachers and the materials. We assumed that the social planning council would organize these classes.

Now as to the organization of these classes—mind you, we attempted to stimulate them and we are interested in them, but we are not in a position to organize them at the home level, so that particular project did not continue. I may say that in conjunction with one of the Catholic societies, one was organized and that project, although small, is to my mind working very successfully.

Mr. Thompson: In connection with that project, and I appreciate that it is the voluntary agency that carries the load on this, but if I could say so, it seems to me a very good idea. I think with respect to the voluntary agency needs both encouragement, financial encouragement, and I think it also needs encouragement in the training of the teacher who might go out; I think it should not just die. The department tried it and I give full marks for having tried it and encouraged it. But I think, not only in Metro Toronto, I am thinking of other areas as well, these experiments should be encouraged.

My next question on the teaching is with respect to TV courses. Now this is worked in conjunction with META, I think, and could I ask, is this continuing? I was not clear if it was.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That was commenced as a one-year project. It appealed to me a great deal personally. It was a joint effort of the federal government, ourselves and the Metropolitan Education Television Association. On the surface it is very appealing and I have watched a good many of the programmes myself. It is difficult to evaluate the results because the unseen audience is so great and difficult to spot. Mind you, I have not given up hope. In the coming year we propose to re-explore the use of television and radio, two media.

Mr. Thompson: I am just a little bit concerned that I have generously—as I am sure anyone would—praised the hon. Minister on the initiative of the two programmes. And yet we find in both cases that they are discontinued.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are not discontinued.

Mr. Thompson: Well, the hon. Minister discontinued this kitchen teaching programme. I will not say the hon. Minister discontinued, but apparently it is not going on. Then the TV programme, which I congratulated the hon. Minister on, I find that it is not going on, but he personally thinks it should go on.

I just raise this, that I would think that the teaching of English or French is one of the greatest facilities, a most important aspect, in the integration of newcomers. I pointed out that you have to go out to them in many cases rather than getting them to come to the schools, that is if they are not able to or will not come.

I think the medium of TV and radio is something that should be emphasized strongly. In fact as I look at these estimates, the books and a number of other aspects that are pointed to, it would seem to me you could direct some money to this TV programming. The hon. Minister, when he gets enthusiastic about something, can see that it goes through and I hope that that enthusiasm he has had for the TV courses will mean it will start again.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, under this vote there is an amount of $8,000 for Ministers without Portfolio. Are there such in the Cabinet now?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: There are not any in the Cabinet at the present time.

Mr. Troy: Is that just a prophecy? Will there be?

An hon. member: They are all hoping, are they not?

Mr. Troy: How many Ministers without Portfolio will this cover?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Three.

Mr. Troy: How much do they get, $8,000?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Twenty-five hundred each.

Mr. Troy: That is $7,500. Who gets the other $500?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It all depends when they start and finish.

Mr. Troy: There will be three, though. Well, boys, there is a chance for you all.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, on vote 1701, the citizenship division, I should first like to compliment the hon. Minister highly on one aspect of his department, namely, the International Institute. I have had some little association with some of the teachers in the institute and with the compilation of Mr. Martin's work and have the greatest respect for that agency and what it is doing in the community. I congratulate the hon. Minister for it.

The second very brief point I should like to raise under the citizenship division—and I hope to allude to it somewhat more fully in the Budget debate, but I think it is relevant here—is that many of our new and recent citizens emigrated from Europe with a history of Nazi concentration camps. They have only recently, in the province of Ontario, become citizens, and entitled to certain rights of the citizenship department working within The Department of the Provincial Secretary. They suffered an inhuman ordeal and have a very sad memory of that ordeal; and they are presently, as the hon. Minister well knows, being harassed by the outbreak of Nazi hate literature.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that they are, therefore, being denied the full measure of citizenship to which they are entitled, not merely by virtue of the work of this department but by the Ontario Human Rights Code. I had an instance, brought to my attention today, of a woman who thought she was personally being persecuted and hunted down; a woman, with memories of the camps, who was in a panic-stricken state and whom it was very difficult to placate.

I am sure that in a democratic society this kind of thing does not happen. I therefore would hope, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, that it would be possible for him to persuade his Cabinet colleagues, particularly the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) and the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), to make the necessary representations to Ottawa, and to align themselves in the forefront of the opposition to dissemination of this terrifying hate literature which, I think, impedes the work he would like to see done in his department.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I concur completely with the remarks of the hon. member. I have taken the position that, of all the places in the world in which I could live, I would rather live within the province of Ontario. I think that within this province, without any reflection on any other of the provinces of our nation, or of the United States or any other jurisdiction, we have somehow, in this post-war period, been able to create a climate in which men and women from all parts of the world have been able to live together. I doubt if there is an area in which where a man comes from, or what he comes from, counts less. We have created that atmosphere, and we should always be on our guard against anything which would defile that atmosphere, if I may use the word. I can assure the hon. member, and the hon. members of the House, that this is a matter on which this government, under the hon. Prime Minister, takes a very serious outlook.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask: Under the international institute you have $10,000—what is that for?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is in conjunction—

Mr. Thompson: In your public accounts, sir.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, we do two things with the international institute. We rent premises, we hold our own classes there; classroom rentals last year totalled $5,393. I, with the hon. member for Dovercourt, Mr. Chairman, am quite intimately aware of the work of the international institute. And when it comes to us renting premises, if the premises of the international institute are suitable for the occasion, we tend to lean toward using their facilities in order that they gain revenue. They received approximately $5,300 in rentals from us last year. We have our seminars and other gatherings. Then there was the special research project which they carried on in our behalf—$5,000.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, just before we leave this vote. This afternoon the hon. Minister was talking about the scrolls awarded by his department on the achievement of some very special event like a 50th wedding anniversary. It seems to me the wording on those scrolls was changed during the past summer. Is this so?

I should say that they used to convey congratulations in the name of the government of Ontario. I believe that to that was added congratulations in the name of John Parmenter Roberts and the government. I should tell the hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, that they are not quite as acceptable in Brant county as they once were, but nevertheless we do appreciate their availability.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I might say to the hon. member that I have discovered that if you can make something as personal as possible it seems to get a better reception. When you tie in personalities, rather than just the cold wording of an impersonal object like the government, it seems to be better received. It does not seem to have affected the actions of the hon. members of the Opposition, because I have discovered that although the Opposition constitutes 21.1 per cent of the House, they have received 27.7 per cent of the scrolls.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): May I ask the hon. Minister if he would consider putting the name of the representative for the area—be he Conservative or any other party—on the scroll at the same time? I would be glad if he could. My name is Leonard Austin Braithwaite and I think it would look good beside John Parmenter Roberts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I discovered, two years ago, that the scrolls which are framed—incidentally, it would be interesting for hon. members of the House to know that when I was a private member I used to pay for the frame myself. Upon becoming associated with Dr. MacKinnon Phillips—I sat next to him—I persuaded him that he should defray the cost, as the Minister.

I discovered, two years ago, that one of the hon. members of the Opposition was very astute with a penknife in taking the back off, signing his name under mine, resealing it, and sending it out.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): You would not object to that, would you?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, I did not object.

Mr. MacDonald: That is the personal touch.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is the personal touch. What we are trying to establish is a procedure, through the special services division, that where a member will undertake to present it personally, that is not a request for a direct mailing but will accept it himself and undertake to attend and present it, we will be pleased to have typed across the bottom of the scroll: "Presented by Leonard Braithwaite."

Mr. Braithwaite: May I just answer that? Mr. Chairman, I got one of those the other day. I did not hear anything about this personal touch but I had heard about taking the back off. I did not have a penknife so I thought I would be honest about it and presented it myself and said it came from the government. I thought I would wait until the matter came up, and it is up now. I do not know why you cannot have some of these things made and, at the time they are presented, have the name of the elected representative put in.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: As I say, when the member requests it, sir, if he will request that it be sent to him personally so that he can present it, if he will indicate that to the special services division we are now trying to set up a system where the name will be typed in. However, we cannot permit this where it is requested and mailed direct because I can assure you, when you are dealing with large numbers—we have increased it from 1,200 to well over double that in one year—there are situations which might prove embarrassing. I do not even like to embarrass one recipient out of 2,500. It all depends upon the member's request.

Mr. Troy: I wonder, sir, if you would also package them in such a way that when we get them the glass will be intact? I have had quite a number come through the mail to me in which I have had to go down and have new glass fitted.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have experimented with all types of packaging and that, to date, within the limits of the cost of packaging, is the best we have been able to do.

Mr. Troy: I do not mind if you charge me with the cost, because it is probably cheaper for the government than to pay somebody else to put it in.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned earlier in the day that there are other events for which scrolls are presented. Would you mind repeating them? I thought I heard him mention something about birthdays?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: There are wedding anniversaries—we follow, as a rule, the 50th wedding anniversary and the 60th wedding anniversary. If an hon. member hears of somebody who is celebrating a 51st wedding anniversary and did not get a 50th, we will entertain that type of thing. But if you got a 50th you do not get one for every year. You have to wait until your 60th.

We do also make them out for 90th birthdays and 100th birthdays. As a matter of fact, I have here a clipping from a newspaper, I think it comes from the St. Catharines area. It was our friend Mr. Lavrie from St. Catharines. I think the hon. member for York South will recall his name.

Mr. MacDonald: I recall him distinctly.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: He celebrated his 90th birthday and we sent him a scroll. He said "it was the goldardest biggest birthday card he ever got in his life".

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask this. I have listened, for example, to some of the things a member can write about, sir. I apologize, and it might be my fault on this, but I have not known of some of these things and I am wondering if some of this is hidden; however, I do not say intentionally.

I am also thinking I have been here for a period, but how are others who are new here, to know about some of these things? From what you are suggesting, it has to be on the initiative of the member that these letters are sent. I am sure there are other hon. members here, new hon. members particularly, who never heard of this.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, this is the reason why, in presenting my estimates this afternoon, I chose this way of bringing to the attention of the hon. members of the Legislature these items. I was a member of the Legislature, sir, for, I think, three or four years before I learned about the scrolls. We have been attempting, through the special services division, to develop this to the fullest extent. We accept sources of information from all over. We use press clippings. I would make the suggestion that every hon. member should, especially in areas where there are weekly newspapers, ask somebody in the riding to keep him informed. I see the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Edwards) shaking his head. Either he is most assiduous in seeking them out or he has more constituents who live long, than any other hon. member of the Legislature. I do not know how many he has in his county, but it certainly receives a lot of scrolls. They live a long time in that county. He has somebody who reads all the papers and perhaps also has people in the various churches notifying him. People call up direct.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, one of the obligations of Opposition is to ask some questions and one of the questions I have been interested in was concerning these pamphlets you have in different languages. I am sorry to ask you to do this, it will take a little time, but I would like to know what languages. You mentioned 11. Could you tell me what languages and why you chose those?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I read them into the record. They are in Hansard. I read them.

Mr. Thompson: They are in Hansard? Could I ask you if these were chosen on the basis of the recent immigration flow?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The number printed varies from 10,000 down to 2,000 in proportion. We took the advice of the experts, and from the immigration figures. For example, the largest number in other than English is in Italian. There are 10,000 because the biggest proportion of immigration of non-English-speaking persons has been of Italians. I think the 2,000 figure is in Serbo-Croatian and in Greek. I have not got them before me. The figures are staggered.

Mr. Thompson: How are they distributed, sir, apart from through the members? Could you tell us? To churches?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We are keeping a fair control on them, because I neither want them languishing in the halls nor do I want them just accumulating dust somewhere else. Initially we were mailing them only directly to the recipient; that is, if somebody wanted to receive them he had either to send his name in or write in himself. Then we extended that to include responsible organizations. If some clergyman, or somebody who would take the responsibility, said to us he had a certain number on his mailing list we would let him have them. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, I think, made an excellent distribution. He was, I think, the first to ask for them in quantities of several hundred and they were sent to him. Subsequent to that, we have now reached the stage where, if a member will write in, sir, he can either ask for them to be sent to him directly or ask us to send them to an organization and we will do that. As long as we feel there are responsible people for that.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Is it all right for me, Mr. Chairman, to say a word now?

Mr. Chairman, to be serious, I want to tell you that I think this is one of the most important things, sir, for a member to do for people in their senior years because I know how it is received. The other day I sent one to a lady who, I think, was 94 or 95 and we got her one from the Queen, from the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada and from the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario. To see the letter that I got in appreciation for that remembrance would just warm your heart.

This means a tremendous lot to our people in their senior years who have not been used to receiving recognition of this kind. One suggestion I would like to make to the hon. Provincial Secretary is to have our hon. Prime Minister's signature on the certificate as well, because they know the hon. Prime Minister. They would appreciate it and I would like to see it on the certificate. As far as a member's name is concerned, I cannot see including that at all. He might be gone tomorrow.

Mr. Whicher: So might the hon. Prime Minister be gone, too.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is true, but his name is important as head of government. What I always do is write a personal letter myself in addition to the scroll and send it to them. Some of the replies I have got have really been worthwhile. I think it is a most important gesture to honour our senior citizens, but I would suggest that one thing, Mr. Chairman, that is that the hon. Prime Minister's name go on that certificate. Our people would appreciate it greatly. They are in their senior years and perhaps, they have never been shown this kind of recognition.

Mr. Sopha: What about his picture? Put a picture of the hon. Prime Minister on it.

An hon. member: If you recommend it. Do you so move?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I would say, send a picture along with the scroll.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I am going to see the hon. Minister of Mines gets one when he is 90 years old.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in carrying through with what the hon. member for Dovercourt has mentioned, I can tell the hon. Minister that he did send me quite a few copies in Polish, Ukrainian and Italian and these people found them very, very valuable.

It was an opportunity for the new citizen to familiarize himself with The Department of Labour and workmen's compensation, whose booklets were supplied to me. They are really worthwhile sending to areas or to church organizations, any place where you will find peoples of ethnic character in large numbers.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether his department has ever considered putting out some type of scroll for individuals who have been responsible for heroic acts. I can recall three years ago in this House that I mentioned the fact of a gentleman in my riding who had saved two boys from an ice floe in the Detroit River. I had brought it up at the time and thought that this would have been a worthwhile type of act for which some recognition should have been given by this government. Would the hon. Provincial Secretary please take that into consideration?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before we leave that, I discovered there is one remaining item that I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. Provincial Secretary with regard to personnel in the liquor control board. This is really within the four corners of your ruling.

On January 15 of this year—I will not bother giving the name, I do not think it is necessary—an inquiry was addressed to the personnel manager of the Liquor Control Board of Ontario with regard to an employee who—and I am quoting now:

—was employed from June 24 to September 8, from September 24 to 29, October 19 to December 3, and December 3 to December 15. The employment was not continuous, the period of employment was agreed upon and the board felt that The Vacations with Pay Act did not apply in this situation.

Then there is another paragraph in which the personnel manager of the LCBO said:

It is also noted that this employment was in the year 1962 and the board was wondering why there was such a delay in requesting consideration under this Act. It is a normal practice that employees making inquiries in respect to wages approach the board directly and within a reasonable period of time.

Whatever time the approach is made it seems to me it is relevant, particularly when—if my information is correct—and I have just double-checked it with The Department of Labour—the liquor control board is violating the laws of the province. My information with regard to the operation of vacations with pay legislation is that if an employee leaves the job voluntarily within three months of being employed he is not entitled to vacation with pay. But if an employee is laid off or dismissed, he is entitled to vacation pay from the day he started to work.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): That is if he works for three continuous months.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am told whether or not he works for three continuous months—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: May I add from some personal experience: I had a case just very recently and that was the information I received, that the employment had to be for a continuous period of three months.

Mr. MacDonald: Well perhaps I am wrong. I had this checked with The Department of Labour and the information I got was that if the employee leaves the job voluntarily within three months, then he is not entitled to it; but if he is dismissed or laid off he is entitled to it from the time that he started. Perhaps we should get this clarified.

If the interpretation of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is correct, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a little unfortunate that a man should be hired, in the first instance on June 24 and be kept on for about ten weeks, then he is laid off so that presumably he is not entitled to vacations with pay stamps. Then he is brought back a number of times.

This is the type of thing one finds on occasion on the part of employers who like to chisel on these statutory fringe benefits. They will employ a person up to the very period when the benefit becomes effective, then they lay them off. Sometimes they bring them back on again.

I am amazed at the lack of knowledge of this field on the part of whoever is interjecting from the back bench there, because this is a fairly common practice among that group of employers.

Mr. Sopha: Sounds like a zoo up there.

Mr. MacDonald: And I am rather unhappy at what appears to be the same kind of practice in the instance of the liquor control board.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I know nothing about the particular case, Mr. Chairman. It is hard for me to believe that the board would knowingly commit this type of practice. However, I think the hon. member has read enough into the record that I will be able to check into the matter and provide the hon. member with the answer to it.

Mr. Troy: Since The Liquor Control Act is apparently being considered now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. Provincial Secretary in regard to the regulations regarding banquet permits in dry areas.

At the present time you can only get a banquet permit in a dry area if a wedding is being held. Now it seems to me that there are many worthy organizations, organizations like the Lions Club, Kinsmen Club, Rotary Club, other organizations of that nature, Richelieu Club and so on; they cannot get banquet permits in dry areas. Would the hon. Provincial Secretary recommend to the Cabinet, or whoever is drawing up the amendments that I understand are to be incorporated into the Act in this session, that you consider strongly changing the regulations for banquet permits in dry areas?

Vote 1701 agreed to.

On vote 1702:

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with vote 1702, I hope the hon. Provincial Secretary made a note of it, I think it was just going to go through, but I would ask him again to reconsider the need for research by Opposition, under the office of the Speaker. The reason I am saying this under that item, Mr. Chairman, is because I noticed the salary of one of the employees of the hon. leader of the Opposition under that section. Shall I wait for another?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is correct. The hon. member is correct. This is the point to discuss it.

Mr. Thompson: Yes. Well I think there should be an examination of other jurisdictions.

In some ways we may find that we are better off than other jurisdictions from the point of view of what the Opposition is given. I made a comparison with congressmen in the United States, and in fairness it was pointed out to me at supper that I was talking of federal congressmen while this is a province.

But on the other hand, I would say that in a modern state with a complexity of bills going through, there is real need for the opportunity to get facts, and to conduct research in many ways. The parliamentary library here does a tremendous job in trying to help people, but I think if there was some kind of common pool, if there were some research people in the library that we could go to and ask: would you help in developing background, a skeleton for a speech; people that either of the Opposition parties, indeed government members if they want to, sir, could go to, we would get a far higher standard of speech in this House.

The hon. leader of the new party about three years ago stated an amount that he felt should be given to the Opposition parties. I am not sure how he calculated it and what the amount was, but I do feel very strongly that for good government in a modern society such as Ontario, we have to re-examine how you feed research materials and statistics and so on to the Opposition so that they can ask intelligent and probing questions.

Has the hon. Provincial Secretary any remarks on that or is he satisfied with the amount?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think the hon. member has presented the side of the Opposition fairly clearly. It has been a number of years since a comparison has been made between this jurisdiction and other jurisdictions at our level, both in Canada and out of Canada. I think perhaps I may mention it to the Speaker and he may communicate with other jurisdictions to see what else is being done.

I can only say this at the moment, and the hon. leader of the Opposition was not in the House earlier when I spoke of the matter; he was out for a moment or two, but I think he will agree that the situation he finds himself in as the leader of the Opposition today is vastly improved over what it was the last time he was leader of the Opposition and certainly tremendously improved over the first time he was leader. We are making progress in this respect and I think all hon. private members share the opinion that they do not really get all the assistance they need, but over the years both the physical and non-physical assistance has been improved, and I would imagine that in the years ahead further improvements will be made.

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, on that very point, I would say at once, in agreement with the hon. Provincial Secretary, that so far as the salaries and the office staff of the Opposition is concerned I have no fault to find and I think my hon. friend would expect me to say that.

But I agree entirely with the hon. member for Dovercourt that the great lack an Opposition party feels, and I am sure my hon. friends feel the same way, is in that lack of research facilities. I remember being on a committee not very long ago where that matter was gone into and where it was suggested by the committee members that what my hon. friend suggests now could become an actuality, that there could be a pool of these specialists who could aid Opposition parties, and I presume government party as well, the hon. private members of government parties, to do research on specific questions so that the hon. members would be better equipped to do their job in the Legislature.

I would say quite frankly to the hon. Minister that I think the next big step in reform will come not in paying more to the Opposition staff in the office out here, but rather to provide research facilities so that the hon. members can discharge adequately and fully their responsibility as members. At the present time we are not equipped to do that because of the lack of these very facilities.

Vote 1702 agreed to.

Vote 1703 agreed to.

On vote 1704:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, there is a matter that arose during the last election campaign relating to the conduct of the campaign about which I would like to inquire at this time. I have here a report from the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 29, 1963, in relation to the fact that the returning officer in the constituency of London South, Mr. George Mitches, was thinking, at any rate according to this report, of submitting his resignation, and indeed did submit it. Now the reasons he wanted to submit his resignation are not relevant here and I will not go into them. I just want to quote one paragraph from the report I referred to, as follows:

Mr. Mitches has indicated that he will submit his resignation as returning officer to John White, MPP for London South, tonight. Mr. White said he will have to seek advice before deciding whether to accept it.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that there was one small inaccuracy in that report. Mr. John White was not, on August 29, 1963, the MPP for London South. He had occupied that august position up until about two weeks prior to that date, and he subsequently reassumed the position, but at the time in question he was a candidate in the election just like any other candidate. I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, what it was in the practice carried on in the conduct of the election that led Mr. Mitches to believe that if he wanted to submit his resignation he should submit it to one of the candidates. I would also like to know by what authority one of the candidates in the election considered it was appropriate for him to receive, and consider, the offer of resignation, and to decide whether or not to accept it.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on this. In the first place at no time did I tell any newspaper reporter I was seeking advice about the proposed resignation of this returning officer. What I did tell the reporter was that it had nothing to do with me whatsoever, in view of the fact that the returning officer worked for the chief electoral officer. It may be that Mr. Mitches was similarly misquoted. Certainly, in none of my statements to the press, did I give any indication that Mr. Mitches' resignation, or lack of resignation, had anything to do with me. That press report is completely incorrect.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, my only comment is that it seems that the Provincial Secretary's department is always involved in points of order. We thrashed out, several years ago, that election campaigns and election procedures do not come under this vote. They come under a different department.

Mr. MacDonald: Where?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That was established once when the hon. member for—

Mr. Bryden: It was not.

Mr. MacDonald: It does not come here, but it comes nowhere.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It does. We established which department it came under and the hon. member for York South was in the House, and the hon. member for Woodbine was in the House.

Mr. Bryden: I was in the House and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it was not established which department it came under, and this is the only vote where it could conceivably arise. There is the vote for the chief election officer and I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the money spent in the conduct of last year's election campaign was under this vote. I learned, incidentally, on the public accounts committee, that the provincial auditor does not audit the accounts arising in connection with the conduct of an election campaign. But I do not see that that is the reason why there should not be an opportunity somewhere to inquire into the way money was spent in the conduct of an election campaign.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I want to make this very clear. The hon. Minister has unwittingly misinformed the House. My colleague raised this on at least two occasions, and attempted to debate it under this item. He was told it was out of order here, and we have sought for years to discover where, under this estimate, in discussing the spending of money, we can discuss the money that is spent by the chief electoral officer. We have not yet found out. In other words, it is one of these areas which is just excluded; and, after all these years of exclusion, we have come to the conclusion that the hon. Minister does not want it debated.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is not that.

Mr. MacDonald: All right then. I ask the hon. Minister, through you, Mr. Chairman: Under which estimate does one discuss the estimates of money spent by the chief electoral officer?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I do not run all the departments. I just know that it does not come under—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask you: under which hon. Minister does one discuss expenditures of the chief electoral officer?

Mr. Whicher: I think Reform Institutions.

Mr. MacDonald: I want the answer to it, once and for all.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Perhaps you could take the matter under advisement, Mr. Chairman, and proceed with the estimates of the department?

Mr. Bryden: You may have heard there was an election last year and money was spent—

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, the comment of my hon. friend prompts me to say this: The chief election officer is under The Department of the Provincial Secretary. He is in charge of elections. Now where in the world would elections be discussed, relating to the chief electoral officer, if it was not in relation to his vote in this Department of the Provincial Secretary? It is obvious to me. How can you place it anywhere else?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have nothing to do with election campaigns except to run as a candidate.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has nothing to do with the Speaker, yet he has to deal with the estimates for the Speaker's office.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal to do with the Speaker. I have all the people who come under the Speaker's jurisdiction. Whenever there is any improvement requested in the office of the Opposition it is put to me through the Speaker. You deal with the Speaker, but the Speaker deals with me. I have always made sure that whenever something is done for the official Opposition a proportionate amount also is done for the NDP but I have—

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question? I presume there is money spent by the province of Ontario for elections.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I will give you an answer in just a moment.

Mr. Whicher: What will the hon. Minister say if the ruling does come under—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I have been informed. Last year it was agreed that this was as good a place as any to discuss the matter.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The money for an election is provided by accountable warrant, by accountable warrant.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, in view of what you have just said, I would hope that someone will now ensure that in future the hon. Provincial Secretary will stay awake when these matters are decided.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that I never closed my eyes for a minute. I keep both eyes on him all the time.

Mr. MacDonald: Some people are asleep when their eyes are open.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: This just goes to prove, as I said earlier this afternoon, that when nobody knows where it belongs they come to the Provincial Secretary.

Mr. Bryden: There is only one further observation I wish to make with regard to the money spent on elections, Mr. Chairman. As you indicated, the monies are provided by accountable warrant—I think that is the term—which means that they are additional amounts not provided for in the estimates of any one year, but arise as the need arises during the course of the year.

The difficulty which has arisen here is that these accounts are also not audited by the provincial auditor. This is a matter on which I have no doubt the public accounts committee, in due course, will make a recommendation to the government. I am not suggesting there is any impropriety in the way the money is spent. I am sure it is all spent strictly in accordance with the law; but I think that all expenditures of the government should be audited by the provincial auditor. I think the government should consider some way of making these accountable warrants subject to audit by the provincial auditor.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order!

Mr. Chairman: Order, order! I have been informed that this account has been audited by the auditor of criminal justice accounts who is, by The Election Act, the election auditor.

Mr. Bryden: I am suggesting that the provincial auditor should do it.

Mr. McKeough: My point is this, Mr. Chairman, this is the third matter today that the hon. member for Woodbine has raised arising out of the public accounts committee, matters which presumably at some time or another will form part of the report of the public accounts committee. Is the public accounts committee to present a report to this House or is the hon. member for Woodbine going to bring it in bit by bit?

Mr. MacDonald: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I draw to your attention that earlier this session the hon. Attorney General told us that since he had not had a complete report from the select committee on consumer credit, he might have to go ahead and do something even when he did not have the report. So it is rather a difficult proposition as to when one acts when a committee is considering a matter.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order: I think this is something that perhaps the hon. Provincial Secretary is complaining about, and probably justly so, that all these difficult points come within his estimates.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, because a committee has been appointed is no reason for not being able to discuss the estimates. There are half a dozen different committees appointed. There is a committee sitting today, headed by the deputy Attorney General, inquiring into the usefulness of systems of legal aid. I would presume, surely, that we would be able to discuss the whole question of legal aid under the hon. Attorney General's estimates. There is a committee continuing to sit on municipal affairs and if we could not discuss anything that committee had discussed, we would not have been able to discuss the hon. Minister's estimates.

There are all these various committees, and with due respect to the hon. member for Kent West, if merely because the committee is sitting that subject is removed from the Legislature until that committee ceases to sit, we might as well all go home. There is a committee sitting dealing with taxation. If we cannot discuss taxation in this House, what is the point of our being here?

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, a question on the elections: How much did the election held on September 25 cost?

Mr. Chairman: The accounts have not all been turned in, therefore they have not been paid.

Mr. Troy: They have not been paid yet in full?

Mr. Chairman: There are still some outstanding accounts.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, the real problem here is—and I think it is obvious to all of us—that we can go on with this rather ridiculous debate, but the government really has no control over the expenditure of these funds. They are spent by the chief electoral officer according to certain statutory requirements. I recognize the difficulty of having a discussion about how the amounts were spent, but I would say it is impossible for the hon. Provincial Secretary to answer detailed questions, because the spending does not come under his department, it is done by the chief electoral officer.

Perhaps the way to have your questions answered in this detail is to put them on the order paper and we will get the answers from the chief electoral officer and file them in the House. But there is a real difficulty here which is not caused by any desire on the part of the government to conceal anything that happened. As I say, these expenditures are made by the chief electoral officer and we would have to dig out the specific information from him. The broader questions of—

Mr. Troy: Is it ridiculous then, Mr. Chairman, to ask the chief electoral officer what the election cost?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No. But the point is, Mr. Chairman, you cannot ask him in this House. All I say is that if you want to know this, ask the question by putting it on the order paper. Then we will have an opportunity to get the information from the chief electoral officer and table it.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Provincial Secretary could tell us how the chief electoral officer picks out the returning officers for the different ridings?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Mr. Whicher: In some instances I have noticed that they are more Tory than efficient.

Interjections by hon. members.

Vote 1704 agreed to.

On vote 1705:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on vote 1705. I hope I am not going to affront the sensitivities of the government hon. members, but I was very interested a year ago to receive a letter from a constituent of mine, whom the hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop) has now inherited, stating that he had been trying for quite some time to get on the list with the Queen's Printer.

He was a salesman for a certain kind of stationery product and he wanted to get on the list so that he might be able to tender when the Queen's Printer was seeking supplies of this particular material. He had been told by the Queen's Printer that to get on the list he had to have a recommendation from his representative in the Legislature. I discovered that this is correct. This is the common practice. May I suggest once again that this is a hangover from the days of patronage which, supposedly, you have dispelled and eliminated completely. The proposition that a man who wants to go to the Queen's Printer to make a bid should have to get clearance from the sitting member or from his members, before he can even bid, is really a bit nonsensical.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, this matter is not an easy one and I am glad that the hon. member for York South has had any illusions about politics dispelled.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I have no illusions.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: But he must be aware of the fact that this is a very large province and most of the departments try to establish a policy or method of procedure which can be applicable across the province. Until a few years ago, the bulk of the tendering, I must say, was done right here in Toronto, in the Metropolitan area, with the big printing firms. The Queen's Printer has embarked on a policy of trying to get the work distributed throughout the whole of the province. It would be impossible to deal with each and every printer, that is, supposing somebody would write in and say, "I have a printing plant; I would like to have business."

It is true that in the Metropolitan area we might send somebody out to check very easily on the set-up. But when you deal with a province of this size the Queen's Printer has come to the conclusion—not at my suggestion, but this was a method that he evolved for himself—that irrespective of where the member comes from, and I have said to the House that printing is placed in each constituency, invariably the Queen's Printer likes to have the local member aware of the fact. He uses the judgment of the local member in respect not to the printing facilities, that is a mechanical thing, but to the status of the plant. You cannot deal with every printer in the province, there has to be some sort of yardstick. He has developed this.

I was aware that he had done this on his own. I have not—

Mr. Bryden: It was not done recently; this has been the policy for a long time.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It has only come to my attention in the past year; less than a year.

Mr. Bryden: It has been in effect—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It has only come to my attention. And it did concern me, but he put it forward as a valid way of doing business as long as the government, that is the taxpayers of this province, get dollar value in regard to the services that are provided, which he assures me he is doing. Until I find fault with it or when I do I will suggest to him that he change it. But at the present time it is working so well that I have no reason to comment otherwise.

Mr. MacDonald: May I just comment briefly on this for the consideration of the hon. Provincial Secretary, and then perhaps he can have a discussion with the Queen's Printer?

I was not talking about printing at all. But now the hon. Provincial Secretary has raised it, in terms of printing—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am talking in terms of both; I think it applies to both.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay. The hon. Minister has raised it in terms of printing. I would suggest that the local member is not the person who is going to be able to judge whether or not this printing plant can do the job. Indeed, I would like to meet the local member who would dare to give advice against an order going to a constituent who is seeking to get jobs of printing for the government. Obviously, he is not going to, and he should not be put in that position. I think it is for the Queen's Printer to find out whether or not this printing shop can do the job; and let it be dealt with in the tenders, if tenders are sought.

However, I was referring to something on which I think the case is more clearcut. As I recall, this person was a salesman for a stationery company making rubbers and pencils and things of this nature. Why you had to get this cleared by the sitting member, sir, to put him on the list so that he could tender and presumably give samples of his product—and then the Queen's Printer can make a decision as to whether or not he is going to take this tender or another tender—I do not know. I do not see that there is any justification at all for bringing the sitting member into the picture. There may conceivably be, though I am not persuaded on the hon. Minister's argument.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: As I said, the Queen's Printer developed this as a method of doing business, not on the instructions of the Minister. I have discussed it with him and he says it has worked out extremely well. In dealing with all of the province, I think the hon. members know that there are people who get in and out of business for a quick buck—fly-by-nights. I think that if a member assumes a responsibility in respect to the situation—and I think the hon. members are sufficiently responsible—and if they know that somebody is a fly-by-night or somebody is on the verge of bankruptcy or something of that kind, I cannot conceive of a member not bringing that to the attention of the Queen's Printer.

But, as I say, I have the member on one side putting his case, and the Queen's Printer putting the other side in the light of the work the Queen's Printer has been distributing. Considering the amount of business he does, the fact is that really nobody complains to me. They always say, "Well, we are getting a pretty fair shake, maybe we would like a little more"—that is about the only type of complaint that I ever get.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word in regard to this matter. I had a situation brought to my attention, regarding this matter, not too long ago, when one of the local printers in the city of Oshawa came to see me. He asked me if I would write a letter to the Queen's Printer, and in this case he definitely pointed out that the letter was simply to verify the fact that he was a printer, shall I say, in good standing in the city of Oshawa. I pointed out to him that I did not have the least idea as to whether he was qualified to do the job or not. He immediately told me that the form he is called upon to fill out for the Queen's Printer designated his qualifications in various points as far as the printing business was concerned, and I was not involved in that at all. Apparently, all he wanted was a letter to the Queen's Printer that he was a citizen in good standing in the city of Oshawa. I gave him that letter.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I think what the hon. member for Oshawa has just said demonstrates the stupidity of carrying on this practice which, I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Secretary, is an ancient practice. It dates from the pork barrel days which, I will concede, we are gradually clearing up.

The fact of the matter is that, as the situation now stands, as the policy now stands, as administered by the Queen's Printer, a printer—or other supplier, I believe, but certainly a printer—cannot get on the list through which he is able to bid on government jobs unless he gets a letter from his local member. That puts the local member in the position where, if he saw fit, he could veto a man who might be perfectly well qualified.

Several years ago—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Would you do that as a member?

Mr. Bryden: I would not do it, but I do not think any member should be able to do it. I think these matters should be determined exclusively on the qualifications of the printer, as to his plant, his credit rating and so on. Those are all matters which can be determined, and on which very few hon. members in this House are experts..

I had a case a few years ago where I was asked to write a letter asking that a particular printer be put on the list. The printer showed me through his shop. I would not have known whether it was a good shop or not; I could not tell a good printing machine from a poor one. I had every reason to believe that he was an honest and reliable man, but I had no real information. However, I felt that I had to write a letter for him even on the basis of very limited information, because if I did not he would not get on the list. I could not see any reason why he should not get his chance to bid on government business the same as anybody else.

Any information that the local member can go by can be obtained better in other ways. I suggest that the hon. Minister should suggest to the Queen's Printer that he set up procedures for qualifications, which are established in many other organizations, sir, and that the member should be left entirely out of this matter. As to the technical capacity of the plant, only a technical man can rate that. Other matters, such as the credit rating of the man concerned can be determined from far more reliable sources than such limited information as the local member might have.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk on this just a little bit. Never, in Dovercourt, has the Queen's Printer asked me to give my advice in connection with a printer.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Has a printing salesman come to you?

Mr. Thompson: No, I have never had a salesman—perhaps they think I am of a purer nature, or something, than other people. This is really why I would like to raise this. Let us face it: The last time I spoke in connection with civil service appointments I was speaking on the same principle that I want to today and from our left at that time, a rather enthusiastic younger hon. member shouted out, "How naive can you get?" when I was talking and made a suggestion that perhaps there was some kind of patronage in some appointments. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Gomme) brought up the point that he was proud to have got someone appointed to the civil service.

What I want to say is that I went home on the weekend, and I thought to myself: Here was the hon. member for Lanark, and was this a position where he needed a merit system in order to select the person, or was it a more humble position? I thought: Really, when you look at the political parties across, not only Ontario, but Canada, England and other places, it seems to me that where you have to assess merit so that you can decide qualifications, then obviously we should use the merit system. But where you cannot assess merit, some other type of judgment has to take place.

I am just wondering, sir, in this printing, it is obvious you had no merit basis in choosing one firm over another. I do not know how you can; I do not know the printing industry. In the advertising industry, it seems to me, you do not have a basis of merit. But I think we approach this whole area year after year; we know, we suspect, and perhaps we are unfair in suspecting, that this is an item that will go to party printers, people who will print party pamphlets. Perhaps I am unjust in saying that but you are certainly open to suspicion, because you have no basis of saying how you do, or how the Queen's Printer does, say "Okay, we will give it to this printer because of certain qualifications." You give no qualifications.

A little while ago we had the hon. member for Etobicoke raising a question about a young girl applying to the civil service for a job. I have forgotten the vague term that was given by the examiner, but it was a vague term. There was no ground rule saying it was on an academic basis and so on. "Not adaptable" was the term used. Perhaps that is the term that is used with the printers when they apply, not adaptable. It is vague enough so that you can throw him out, you know, on a number of things. But I would suggest that you categorize this; if you cannot categorize some of these things, I do not know what judgment is used.

I feel there is a hypocrisy about this whole question in the House. Some of us smile smugly and perhaps think inwardly that if we were in we would practise the same kind of thing, thinking that you are practising some kind of patronage.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): What do they do in Ottawa?

Mr. Thompson: I do not know what they do in Ottawa. But the thing I ask is, let us bring it to light, let us have ground rules on this and let us talk honestly about the whole situation.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I just want to say this one thing, that I would not like it to go by with the inference that the Queen's Printer has no standards or no qualifications. There is no basis for that kind of statement at all. The Queen's Printer—as the hon. member for Oshawa has pointed out, sir—once he has a printer on his list, gets a complete inventory of the equipment. There are men skilled in the Queen's Printer's who can assess the equipment and know the kind of printing available. So you have men in the Queen's Printer's office who have all these lists of equipment and then they take the type of printing required.

It is true they could pick a big firm in Toronto. It can do all kinds of work in a first-class plant. They could feed all that work to a printer in Toronto, very easily, with the highest qualifications, the highest standard, but the Queen's Printer does not do that. If it is a certain type of job that a small printer out in the province of Ontario can do, that job is sent out there and we get that particular sheet of paper or form produced of the highest category within the limits of that printing job's requirement. If it is Hansard to be printed, one of the big firms here, for example, is in a position to tender on the job.

When the material is produced—and I have seen this—it has to be of the top standard that is required for that particular job. So long as the Queen's Printer has a system under which the top quality of printing required is produced for the best dollar value for the province of Ontario, at the same time spreading the work in a system of decentralization across this province, I have no quarrel with this system.

Mr. Bryden: Except that the hon. members—

Mr. Thompson: I think that is a very good point. Why is the hon. members' opinion drawn in? But if you do actually have qualifications, then would it not be possible for someone who has applied to be put on a tender? Would he not know clearly why he will not be put on the tender or why he will be put on? I mean, if the Queen's Printer has a stated qualification, then when there is a small printing company applying to do Hansard, the answer would come obviously that for stated reasons the company is not qualified to do the job of printing Hansard. But I would suggest that printing firms applying now get no answer as to why they would not be put on tenders. I do not really know, but I suggest they do not get a qualified answer as to why they are not put on tenders. I suggest then that this raises the suggestion that this discretion is unwarranted and that you are put on tenders because you belong to the right stripe of a party.

Mr. Walker: I would just like to point out here again, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Dovercourt mentioned somebody saying that he was rather naive. I think I am that way too because I know for a fact that the man for whom I wrote the letter was not a follower of my party, he was a follower of the party of the hon. member for Dovercourt. I just want to point out that I wrote no letter in this particular case for anybody who was a follower of my party.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the evening I mentioned the fact of books published in various languages. Are these published by various ethnic newspaper printing houses in the city of Toronto? For example, would a booklet in Polish be published by one of the Polish printing houses, or is that done by a general printer?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Originally when the plan was conceived, we called together all the newspaper people in the business because they have the printing plants. We tried to devise a scheme whereby we would deal with individual members within the group. We had several conferences and the upshot of those conversations was that they preferred that we put it in the hands of a qualified agency which then would control all the work with the result that the pamphlets in all the languages have come out exactly with the same format.

Mr. Newman: The ethnic press in the city of Toronto would get its fair share of the work?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes. I do not know which press is being used but nobody has ever complained to me.

Mr. MacDonald: I have an important problem on which I would like to solicit the co-operation of the hon. Minister. I have been approached this past week by a very irate constituent. His problem is this:

On February 29 he became the father of a very charming baby daughter. He has written a letter to the Pope to see what he can do about the fact that his daughter was born on February 29, so that she has a birthday only every four years. She will be over 80 years of age before she can vote in a country in which he is proud to be a citizen. Since the hon. Minister is responsible for vital statistics, my question to the hon. Minister is, what can he do to placate the genuinely aroused man—you may think this is a joke, but he is genuinely aroused about this. Seriously, when officially is the birthday of a person born on February 29?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, this is one question I will take under advisement. I can assure the hon. member I agree with him. Matters relating to birthdays are very, very sensitive areas when you are dealing with the individual. I do know that the deputy Registrar General is a man who has had a tremendous amount of experience. I forget how many millions of registrations he has. I will put this to him first thing in the morning.

Vote 1705 agreed to.

On vote 1706:

Mr. Troy: I did not know you were talking about vital statistics. Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has been in communication with a constituent of mine in regard to a birth certificate for an adopted child who was born in England. At the time the hon. Minister had said there was no possibility of getting a birth certificate in Ontario. I understand from my lawyer colleagues that if the youngster is born in Ontario the name of the adopted parents can be used and the original certificate may be destroyed. Have any negotiations been tried with the government of the United Kingdom so that youngsters who are born in England and adopted by Canadian parents might get a certificate in the name of the Canadian parents? Is there any possibility of getting through that bottleneck?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think we have, Mr. Chairman, reciprocal arrangements with some of the provinces but this is a matter which I will go into. I think that the instance that the hon. member was referring to was the constituent who was very irate because the department would not issue an Ontario birth certificate for a child born outside of Ontario. I may say that it is a commentary on the regard that people have for the province of Ontario that quite a number of people have approached me asking me how they can arrange to have birth certificates for those who have not been born in Ontario. I just have to tell them that we are sorry that we can only issue birth certificates if the person was born in Ontario.

But the matter of adoptions and the change of name is something which we are continuously looking at in our own province. I undertake to the hon. member to go into this question during this coming year. I think it is a good point.

Mr. Troy: I think the hon. Minister has a letter on file from my constituents and he knows the situation. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Dovercourt.

Mr. Thompson: My question was answered, sir.

Vote 1706 agreed to.

On vote 1707:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 1706, I would like to ask a few questions on members' indemnities and allowances.

Some hon. members: Vote 1707.

Mr. Newman: I am sorry, I would like to come in on 1707.

Mr. Chairman, we do get an advance toward expenses monthly if we so request. We get an allowance at Christmas time if we so request. Now I would like to ask the hon. Minister why it is not possible for us to be paid monthly rather than in one lump sum at Easter time or March 31? Is it not possible for us to be paid every month as they are paid in the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am unaware of the way they are paid in the federal House, but the present payment is in accordance with our statutes. I have continuously approached both the accountant and the Clerk of the House with respect to trying to increase the monthly payments. I know that for some hon. members the major portion of their income comes from this source and this is a matter which we will take into consideration during the coming year.

Mr. MacDonald: May I follow up on that? May I suggest to the hon. Minister what I think is a very simple answer? It may require a change in the statute.

Presently we are paid $150 from the expense allowance which is 90 per cent of that to which we are entitled. I cannot see any reason why, by changing the statute, 90 per cent of the indemnity could not be paid too, and on a monthly basis. The hon. Provincial Secretary is withholding the 10 per cent.

Now I think this is a more sensible way to approach it under any circumstances. I have already suggested, sir, I think it was to the hon. Prime Minister last fall, in the present House we have some 38 hon. members who are newcomers and the fact of the matter is that they will be getting six months' indemnity in the first eighteen months that they are in the House. They get six months' indemnity at the end of March and they will not get another one until March of 1965, which means they have been in the House for eighteen months and have had only six months' salary, so to speak.

I think this is a particular hardship, as the hon. Minister indicated, for those who are living for the most part on their indemnity. But quite apart from the particular circumstances of this House at the present time, I think the common-sense approach of a monthly payment of 90 per cent of the indemnity as well as 90 per cent of the allowance may require statutory change, but from that point forward there will be no difficulties and I have been assured by a little birdie that there will be no problem in the accounting.

Mr. Oliver: I would like to add my word to this, Mr. Chairman. There was a time, as the hon. Prime Minister probably knows, when we were paid at the end of a session and we were paid only if we sat 30 days. I remember there was a time when there was a case in court about it as to whether we had actually sat the 30 days or not and I think the records will reveal that we had to count Saturdays and Sundays in order to get the 30 days.

Since that time, changes have been made and the pay is now on a yearly basis and I cannot for the life of me see, Mr. Chairman, why the members who are elected should not be paid on a monthly basis, one-twelfth of their salary each month. It may be, of course, that some of those on the government side do not need it, but most of us over here do and I cannot see where—I think it would be a reform and I think it would be in keeping with the times. I think it is a reform that the government should take cognizance of and make an early change in that particular item.

There is not any reason under the sun, it seems to me, why when you have served a month you should not be paid for a month under the new set-up in our payment of salaries to the members of the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I have not been in the House as long as the hon. leader of the Opposition and I cannot remember, away in the past, why these things developed. I am told, Mr. Chairman, that this system of payment developed in the first place to ensure attendance in the House in the dying days of the lovely warm spring when people wanted to get home and return to work and that is why this type of payment and accumulation of payments was adopted.

But with the increase in payment that there has been, over the years we have discussed this and quite frankly I am in accord with the idea put forward. I do not see any reason why it could not be paid on a monthly basis. I think we all find that this is a 12-month-of-the-year job, so we will look at it and perhaps bring in an amendment this year that would apply to the next fiscal year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, may I speak on allowances on this vote?

I was rather interested in what the hon. leader of the Opposition said when he spoke about 30 days. I recall the conversation I had with one of the members from the province of Quebec when he was here and apparently they have a certain indemnity and a certain allowance in the province of Quebec, but if they come back in the fall and sit for 30 days, they get another $10,000; if they sit for 29 days, they get $100 a day. I think we speak of the province of opportunity as being the province of Ontario. Some bilingual members in this House might think of the province of opportunity as being the province of Quebec and hope to get elected to that Legislature.

I recall that on March 28, 1961, speaking in the Budget debate, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin (Mr. Root) spoke particularly on allowances to the hon. members and referring, of course, to those who are from out of town and the expense of keeping two homes. I know that I spoke to that hon. member the other day and I recalled that particular fact to him and he said: "Well, I am in the same mind"; even though I notice in the public accounts he is a member of the water resources commission and gets certain allowances there. But still in spite of the allowances he gets from the water resources commission he is of the same mind in regard to increase in allowances, particularly for out-of-town members.

Then some of the hon. members, like the Chairman himself, like the hon. member for Kenora (Mr. Gibson), have to stay here the whole session and do not get home at all, then, too, there are out-of-town members who during the recess are in here at least once every three weeks who have all the expense of coming to Toronto to do business for two or three days and then back home again. Some of the papers say they get a special rate at the hotel. The room is the cheapest part of living in a hotel, I find.

Mr. Bryden: Room service is costly.

Mr. Troy: Well, I do not have to draw pictures for you.

But seriously, sir, particularly for the members who live in urban-rural ridings, to cover their ridings and to represent their constituencies properly, the members have a great amount of expense in travel. Now of course our telephone bills are cut down because we know the number to call when we want to call the Parliament buildings—I will not give you the number for my riding. Something has been done about that.

But seriously, sir, I saw something in the press that there was a certain undercurrent of feeling in regard to it. I notice in corridors I saw people being buttonholed and then around corners whispering about various things in the early part of the session, and then later on there was something in the newspapers about the indemnities and then after that nothing was said.

But seriously, I think allowances can be increased. I do not see any possibility of telling the hon. Prime Minister to increase indemnities. It is up to the government. But I still think he should give serious thought to an increase of allowances. The people who live here in the city of Toronto, the hon. members who live in the city, can walk around their riding in a few minutes.

Mr. Bryden: We are not as energetic as you.

Mr. Troy: I know. If you could not walk around at your age, as I could have in my age, well there is something wrong with you. At least, when I was your age—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Troy: Well, St. Patrick's Day is next week. I do not get a chance to speak on St. Patrick's Day, so there is my Irish statement for you.

Seriously, again I say, very seriously, that I think the hon. Prime Minister and the Cabinet should give thought to the increase, if not of indemnities, of allowances.

Mr. J. Root (Wellington - Dufferin): Mr. Chairman, since a speech that I made three years ago, was referred to, I would like to comment. I do not think, in all fairness to my friend, the hon. member for Nipissing, that we were discussing salaries. We were discussing representation by population. I was making the point that it was a lot more costly to represent a riding outside of this city. I pointed out some of the problems which confronted a member who lived outside the city; the problem of maintaining two residences was one.

I mentioned my own particular riding since the hon. member for York South had referred to a number of hon. members who had a comparatively small number of voters in their ridings. I said that, in my riding, I had to represent two counties, because it embraces two-thirds of Wellington and two-thirds of Dufferin. I had to represent 20 municipalities. I had 11 district high school boards. I had some 13 or so community centres, and about eight or nine fall fairs.

My riding is not like the Toronto riding where you have one phone system. At that time there were 17 different small independent phone systems; and, in spite of the concessions made, it actually does me very little good. Their direct line is out to Guelph and I still have to pay long distance from there; everything in my riding is long distance.

When I am asked to go up to, say, Harrison, it is a 100-mile drive. I drive my car around 25,000-26,000 miles a year and, as the hon. member for Nipissing has said, a member in the city can use public transportation. In some of the ridings he can probably walk across the riding in five or ten minutes.

I just want to make that clear. At the time, we were discussing representation by population. I did make the reference that it costs a member from out of town a lot more to live than it does a member in town. I think I mentioned the fact that the Toronto members are able to park their cars in their own garages at night. We either pay parking overnight, or pay for taxis to move around the city. If we go down to the hotel our constituents come in to see us and we cannot ask them to have a sandwich; we have to take them down to the hotel and entertain them. I know that my hotel bills add up to substantial amounts, and there may be other things that I do not indulge in that add up to a lot more.

I just wanted to make this comment, since my name was mentioned in relation to salary raises. I did say there was a lot more expense involved in representing an out-of-town riding than one in town.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this vote, there are two things I would like to add to what has already been said.

First, I find that the government-leased line to the Brantford area is most convenient in carrying on the business of the riding, and I certainly hope that the government will consider extending this service to all hon. members. I understand that, in some jurisdictions, an agreement is made with the telephone company to provide a certain number of minutes of long distance time between two locations. It is not necessary to have a leased line for that purpose. It is just in the last few weeks that this line has been available, and I feel that the business of the constituency is much easier to conduct, at least, my part of it.

More than that, I think of those hon. members who, unlike myself, come a long distance to attend the Legislature here in Toronto. Fortunately, I can drive home after the session, no matter how late the leader of the House keeps us, and be home within an hour. This is a great convenience that a lot of our mutual friends do not have. I think, particularly, of the hon. member for Kenora who, when he wants to attend the Legislature here, drives to Winnipeg and then flies to Toronto.

Certainly, from the earliest times, the hon. members had a pass on the railroads of the province, which, of course, is very useful to all of us. I would think, in this day, the government should take steps, not to provide an open air pass for all hon. members, but to make an arrangement with Trans-Canada Air Lines or Air-Canada so that hon. members who come from specific areas can travel between Toronto and that area at their convenience. This would apply to the hon. members from London, as well as those from the far northwest, Sudbury, North Bay, Windsor, Ottawa and in the other normal airline connections; and I think this would be a great service. It certainly would go far to equalize the inequities in the representation as it now is.

Vote 1707 agreed to.

Vote 1708 agreed to.

This concludes the estimates of the Departments of Provincial Secretary and Citizenship.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I forgot, in the discussion of the LCBO, to remind hon. members that the lowest-priced liquor in Canada is to be purchased in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, contrary to our usual routine, because of the press gallery party on Thursday night, we will sit Wednesday night rather than Thursday night.

Tomorrow we will go back to the order paper and deal with second readings, the debate on the interim report of the select committee on consumer credit, and then return to the Budget debate. There are quite a few hon. members of the House who wish to speak. Following that, we will take the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions. If we need any other estimates for the balance of this week, we will take Public Welfare.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): What about Highways?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, it may be because of the timing, and we may have to work in another set of estimates this week. I do not think it will be necessary. I am trying to bring some order into this. Highways will come forward on Monday, regardless of what happens for the balance of this week, so that you can be ready for it. It may be that we will not reach this, but I am reaching as far ahead as I can to tell you what we will do.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my hon. friend! In respect to the consumer credit report, have copies of the report been distributed?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I assumed they had.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): No, not to each member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Then, of course, we cannot—

Mr. Oliver: I do not think they have been distributed at all, really.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, I will leave it on the order paper. The members of the committee can make their comments tomorrow and then we will leave it on the order paper. I will arrange to have it distributed, and for the benefit of anyone else who wants to speak I will call it again.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, if I might say a word on this. It was my intention originally to put the report on the record so that every hon. member would have a copy of it in Hansard. The hon. leader of the Opposition objected to this procedure, perhaps very rightly so, and we deferred it. We do not have sufficient copies for all hon. members. The hon. leader of the Opposition received one, and the hon. leader of the NDP has received one. It will take several weeks after it goes to the printer before it is available. Each party has one copy of the report and the hon. members of the committee have all seen the report. I do not know what more we can do at this time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.45 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1964

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton), from the standing committee on highways and tourism, presented the committee's first report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment:

Bill No. 49, An Act to amend The Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act, 1961-62.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill No. 38, An Act to amend The Highway Traffic Act.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham), in the absence of Mr. C. T. Rollins (Hastings East), from the standing committee on natural resources, wildlife and mining, presented the committee's first report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill No. 32, An Act to amend The Crown Timber Act.

Bill No. 51, An Act to amend The Mining Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I have a question of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts), as follows:

Can the hon. Prime Minister elaborate on the hon. Provincial Secretary's (Mr. Yaremko's) statement that the hate literature problem is under active government consideration?

Hon. J. P. Roberts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I first want to assure the hon. members of this House and the people of Ontario that the government is deeply concerned with the recent distribution of what is popularly called hate literature in this province. We will not tolerate such activity here, and everything in our power will be done to prevent it and to bring to justice those who are participating.

I believe it must be the opinion of all that those who are engaged in the dissemination of propaganda designed to cast reflections upon any race or religion are in the lunatic fringe of our society. Nonetheless, we cannot discount the seriousness of the increase of this type of activity.

It would appear from our investigation that those involved in this business are few in number. While they may be few in number, we must be concerned with the many on whom this type of literature has a deep and serious impact. It brings back to all of us, and particularly those of our citizens who suffered so greatly in various countries of Europe prior to, during and subsequent to World War II, the horrors of the days when such activity was common.

An examination of the distribution to date discloses that it can only effectively be dealt with through the Criminal Code, which is entirely within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Of course the hon. Attorney General of this province (Mr. Cass) is charged with the responsibility of enforcing the Criminal Code, and I assure you that within the limits of the legislation, the Ontario Provincial Police and the law officers of the Crown are covering every avenue to bring to justice those who are engaged in this type of activity. The enforcement of the sections of the Criminal Code is very difficult due to the problems involved in apprehending the violator when actually engaged in committing the offence.

The obvious increase in this activity across Canada leads me to believe that possible alterations of the law to permit easier enforcement might very well be of national concern. With this idea in mind I am prepared to, and am asking, that the whole matter be placed on the agenda for the federal-provincial conference convening in Quebec City at the end of this month, with a view to providing more effective methods of control.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. members to the annual review of The Department of Mines which you have courteously permitted me to have placed on their desks.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, for several years past it has been the practice of The Department of Mines to prepare such a summary of the activities of the department and have it published for the information of the House and the general public just as early in the new year as is humanly possible.

I regret that this book was not available a week ago when I presented the department's estimates for consideration. It would have served a very useful purpose in helping hon. members to follow my remarks on the various phases of the mining industry and the operations of the department as I outlined them to you at that time. The fact that it was not ready then was due only to circumstances completely beyond the control of my department—circumstances which have delayed publication by about three weeks.

Even so, it is now just a little over two months since the close of the year under review, so I feel that we have maintained our record of service in presenting the fact-laden account in an attractive form in a very short time.

For that, I would like to pay full tribute to the members of my staff who co-operated wholeheartedly in making the necessary data available. The same sort of co-operation was, as usual, provided by the industry which provided information and in many cases photographs as requested. Finally, through the hon. Minister of Energy Resources (Mr. Simonett), I should like to acknowledge the contribution which members of his staff made in providing the chapter dealing with oil and natural gas.

I do not intend to say more at this time, Mr. Speaker, but I would commend the report to the serious study of all hon. members. I think that such a study will give them a better idea than any words of mine could, of the activities of my department and the progress of the great industry it was set up to serve. The title, "Developing Ontario Through Mining", speaks for itself and for the great importance of the mining industry to the entire province and to Canada.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the annual report of The Department of Reform Institutions of the province of Ontario for the year ending March 31, 1963, Parts I and II.

Mr. Speaker: I beg to inform the House that in response to several requests, another meeting on matters of practice and procedure will be held with the Clerk of the House tomorrow, Thursday, March 12, at 10 a.m. in committee room No. 1.

I might say that the recording device was out for four or five minutes. This general blackout, as it were, is throughout the building and as the recording device was off for four or five minutes, I would ask the Minister of Mines if he would submit the report on his annual review to the Hansard table; and if the member for Scarborough West would also submit his question to the Hansard table so that it may be recorded in the debates.

Orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, just before we proceed, I want to call some second readings. Perhaps I was sidetracked when we got into the discussion on the report, but it is necessary that we have these second readings if these bills are to get into committee. If anyone is taken by surprise by any I call—I think the ones I will call have been on the order paper for a week or so—however if anyone is caught by surprise, we can leave it over. But some of them I want cleared so we can get into committee work.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill No. 52, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the basic principle of this bill as I see it is that it is now going to be permissible for school boards to provide for payment of honoraria to their members on a more generous basis than has been possible in the past, and on something which one might say approaches a remuneration for their services.

I welcome the adoption by the government of this principle. I think that members of school boards are entitled to be paid for their services. I think more people would be able to serve on school boards, if they felt inclined, if they could receive compensation for the time they spend on this very important and arduous work.

My reservation with regard to the bill is that, in my opinion, it appears to be too niggardly. It provides—I will take the type of municipality with which I am familiar and that is the last one in the scale set forth in the bill, municipalities where there is an average school attendance of 60,000 or more—that the maximum honorarium which may be paid to a member of a school board in such a municipality will be $150 a month.

I will speak only of the municipality with which I am most familiar, and that is Toronto. I would suggest to the government, and to the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), Mr. Speaker, that $150 a month is an undue limitation in this municipality. Aldermen are paid substantially more here, and my observations leads me to the conclusion that school trustees in this municipality have duties which are just as onerous as the duties of aldermen. Indeed, they deal with sums of money which are of about the same magnitude as the city budget. I believe that the limitation which should be imposed here should be no less than the limitation, whatever it may be—I regret to say I do not know offhand what the maximum amount permissible for an alderman in Toronto is, but I would say the same maximum should apply for trustees.

I think the time has come when we should recognize that trustees have an important role to play in our municipal government. They are dealing with very large sums of money, varying of course according to the size of the municipality. I think that they should receive the same scale of remuneration as aldermen or councillors. I have spoken specifically of the city of Toronto, because that is the municipality with which I am most familiar, but I would like to indicate, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks are intended to be more general than that. I think the scale the hon. Minister has proposed in his bill should, all up and down the line, be comparable to the scales which are now permissible for municipal councillors or aldermen.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I would simply add that in some of the fringe municipalities around metropolitan cities, like the one which I come from in North York, the school business is very big business. Just recently the 103rd school was opened in that municipality. The trustees are operating a business of very great magnitude. They take as much time as the members of council, and in many cases more, because of the intricate operation of that whole system. It seems to me that something more than the $150 should be offered here as well as in the city of Toronto. I think this is true of a great many of our growing municipalities, where school boards certainly are operating very large budgets, very large businesses, and taking a great deal of time.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Just to reply, I am very pleased to see the hon. members opposite agree with this in principle. I think they fully appreciate that this is quite a departure from previous practices in this province. I think they might be interested to know that these figures are more or less in accord with the feelings of the trustees' council of the province, which group represents a great bulk of the school boards, and that we should not regard this as being a salary or compensation for the task but an honorarium to enable capable people to serve on the boards.

While I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. members opposite, I think they will find—and this bill will be going to committee and I will suggest that perhaps one or two people from the trustees' council will attend at this meeting to give the hon. members some indication of why these amounts, certainly initially with the commencement of this principle, might be appropriate at this time.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS AND BOARDS OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 53, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks. Once again, in general principle, we in the New Democratic Party are in support of this bill. I think that the whole question of larger units of administration in our rural areas is one that is occupying more and more thinking on the part of those who are giving leadership in this field.

Earlier in this session, in the broader context of Municipal Affairs, we did our best to get the hon. Prime Minister to broaden the terms of reference of the committee which has been studying municipal affairs in this province for some time, so that it could look at this key issue of larger units of administration. I understand that one of the recommendations of the committee is likely to be along this line; therefore I hope that the government is moving in the direction of tackling this problem. Because I think, without tackling it, we are not going to be able to solve any of the smaller problems which are part of it.

It is within that context that my support for the principle of this bill comes. I think that all those who have studied, in an objective way, the problem of providing education in this modern world have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to provide a modern education in the little red school-house and that a larger unit of administration which can get more teachers in one group, with greater facilities, is the kind of thing we should be moving toward.

I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister and the government for having the courage to move in this direction, but there are going to be some problems, and I am the first to acknowledge it. I would just like to say, Mr. Speaker, the tragedy of this is that the problems arise from the government's failure to move in the broader field of municipal affairs, and in the taxation issues related to it.

When the New Democratic Party was founded in 1961, we spent a full year studying and shaping policy which was adopted at a convention in the fall of 1962. One of the committees which did study the problems of the rural area was our farm committee, in which we had a representative group of farmers from almost every walk of agricultural life, every commodity group, representing in a very accurate way, the opinion throughout the rural area. When we came to the costs involved in farming, one of the issues invariably raised, and raised with emphasis, was the excessive burden of education costs, because of the fact that farmers have to pay their taxes, not only as you and I do on our home, but also on all of their farmland.

The result is that you get the kind of inequity created, for example, by a farmer selling a quarter of an acre of land on the front of his farm. A family which maybe has five or six children then move in; they are paying much less tax than he is. He may have no children, but obviously that is not a valid principle to bring into the picture, but he is paying it over all of his farm land. It was for that reason that we included in our programme as one of the six or seven areas in which we might move to reduce farm costs; item (c) which reads as follows:

To relieve the burden of education costs on farm land as distinct from residential and other farm property.

Now I submit that all of the difficulties that we are going to face, or perhaps more accurately most of the difficulties that we are going to face, and undoubtedly we will be hearing when this bill goes before the standing committee, will be in relation to this fear, undoubtedly justified in some instances, that the already excessive educational costs will become even more burdensome because of the fact that we have not got a basic equity in our tax structure.

However, I still want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that we support the principle of this bill, we congratulate the government for bringing it in. We hope that they will move with speed in coming to grips with some of the older problems that are going to create difficulties in implementing this.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, just in case the hon. member for York South left the impression that this idea only had its birth in the new policy enunciated by his party in 1961, I thought it might be worthwhile once again pointing out to the House that some of us on this side of the House have been making repeated requests to the government over the period of the last five years, at least since I have been here, that this sort of reform take place.

I would have hoped that along with this very advanced step The Department of Education is taking we would have had a similar indication from the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) that within the municipal sphere there would be a similar consolidation, or a comparable consolidation, of municipal jurisdictions. It cannot go without notice at this time either, Mr. Speaker, that His Honour Judge MacDonald recommended to the hon. Attorney General the consolidation of police forces, and there was reference made in the debate on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) as to the consolidation of hospital units.

It would seem to me that the government so often approaches these problems only by nibbling at the outer fringes and does not get to the real root of the problem of administration of our affairs on the whole provincial-wide basis. This certainly is a step forward and we in the Liberal Party commend it for that, but I think that there would be substantial wisdom in the hon. Prime Minister forcing the hon. Minister of Education, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, the hon. Attorney General and the hon. Minister of Health to sit down as a group some day and all move along the same lines for the common good of the province. This is a step forward and for that reason we will support it, but again, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the government to co-ordinate all these efforts so that what makes sense in one department will be translated into action in another department.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly not like the hon. Minister of Education to pass his comments on the move to consolidate the school sections without saying something about it myself, but it seems to me that this lies in the next bill rather than in Bill No. 53, so as long as he realizes that, I would like to wait a moment.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill No. 54, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on Bill No. 54, which might better be called the little red schoolhouse abolition bill, in that its most important section states that: "Subject to the subsections 2 and 11 on and after the first day of January 1965, every township shall be a township school area."

The hon. Minister of Education has described this as a milestone and I submit to you, sir, that it is indeed, because it means that the basic unit of education administration is being swept away by act of this Legislature and as we all know, having had to deal with the situation on a local level over the past few years, there has been a strong and definite movement to do this on a permissive basis before many years.

I believe that The Department of Education has now come to the conclusion that they have gone as far as they can on a permissive basis. I hope that the hon. Prime Minister, as well as the hon. Minister of Education, is cognizant of the fact that the legislation now provides for compulsory unification of these boards of trustees against the will of many of the people concerned in many cases.

So here we have government legislation that provides for the compulsory amalgamation of these three-man boards. As has already been stated, the Liberal Party is going to support this legislation, but we feel that it cannot pass second reading in this House without drawing to the attention of the hon. members three or four points that I consider quite important in this connection.

It is obvious then that the control of the administration of the local schools will move away from the immediate area, but I agree with the hon. Minister that it would not move so far away that it would be in any sense a removal of local autonomy.

Certainly there are going to be some dislocations having to do with assessment and the local education rates that are going to be very troublesome indeed. I would trust that the hon. Minister of Education and his advisers will do everything they can to assist the local areas where these dislocations are going to be severely burdensome.

The change that is going to be more important than any of these is the fact that the responsibility at the local level will cover a considerably larger area. The new trustees will have a much larger budget to deal with, and I would think that associated with this change there must be a reversion of more responsibility to the new and large board than the local three-man trustee board ever had.

I had the distinct impression that the three-man board in the school section simply implemented the dictates of the local inspector, and in many cases this was done quite effectively. But the three-man board was concerned with the painting of the desks and plumbing that was out of order and keeping the furnace going and so on. Surely with these amendments the time will then have come when a larger, and I would think a more efficient, board, having a larger budget to work with and a broader area of responsibility, must be granted ever increasing responsibilities for the actual education that takes place in the schools under their control.

This, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the hon. Minister, is the way the development should go. As the areas of responsibility increase, we will find that the new boards of education are in a position to form education committees, that is committees that would look into something more than just the hiring and the firing of teachers, the provision of the essential plan for education. They will have to assume considerably more of the responsibility for the education process that goes on within the schools under their responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I once again appreciate the approval in principle by the hon. members opposite and I assure the last hon. speaker that we have already established in the department, with the anticipation that this legislation will go through, a special group to deal with the individual school sections and townships to help them resolve their problems due to this consolidation.

I should also like to point out that while I think most of the attention has been focused on the fact that the township will become the smallest unit for administration in the province, the two permissive sections I think really are worthy of some note.

The permissive sections allow townships to join together to form, not necessarily, and the point is not geographic as much as in numbers perhaps, an even larger unit of administration. The second permissive section goes beyond this to allow the elementary and the secondary to combine into one board of education.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this in itself is rather significant because it then enables the point that was raised by the hon. member for Brant to be realized; and that is that the board of education can itself provide certain inspection facilities and other direction and supervision that is not available to them with the size of unit that presently exists.

I will get into this in more detail during my estimates, but I think that a much closer relationship between elementary and secondary education in this province is desirable and the permissive sections in this piece of legislation will, I hope, go toward that end.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General) moves second reading of Bill No. 65, An Act to amend The Division Courts Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE NOTARIES ACT, 1962-63

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 66, An Act to amend The Notaries Act, 1962-63.

THE SUMMARY CONVICTIONS ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 69, An Act to amend The Summary Convictions Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SECURITIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 70, An Act to amend The Securities Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENTS ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 71, An Act to amend The Fire Departments Act.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, may I inquire if the hon. Attorney General intends that this bill will be referred to the appropriate committee so that any parties affected may make representations?

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): It will go to the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 73, An Act to amend The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

ONTARIO LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Hon. Mr. Cass moves second reading of Bill No. 75, An Act to establish the Ontario Law Reform Commission.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, if I may, on this bill I hope that if the hon. Attorney General does select a committee that he does select at least one individual other than a lawyer so that in the writing up of the bills they can be understood by the average individual and not be in the gobbledygook that we find bills quite often are when submitted by lawyers.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to say quite what my hon. colleague said. I would have hoped on the second reading of this bill that we would have some substantial elaboration from the hon. Attorney General as to what is contemplated. On the surface this sounds like a very fine idea and I think we should have a law reform commission in the province. But we do not establish really very much by passing a bill.

There has to be some real indication from government that people of substantial competence are going to be appointed, that the government is prepared to devote enough dollars to make the committee work, that there are going to be research facilities, that the committee will meet on regular occasions, that there will be adequate direction and all that sort of thing.

Certainly the question of law reform in this province is a very important one and there should be a continuing review of it. For at least recognizing the problem and bringing forward this bill, I commend the hon. Attorney General. But I would like to see a much stronger indication of what is likely to be the possible programme of this commission.

If, for example, it is merely going to sit and work at an early date on the next revision of the Ontario statutes, it might be perhaps a waste of time. But I am sure the hon. Attorney General has much more than that in mind and I would like to hear from the hon. Attorney General as this bill goes through its second reading, just what facilities the government intends to place behind the workings of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, I accept with gratitude the kind words which the hon. member for Downsview has had to say about this bill. It is always nice to have the leadership, which we in Ontario provide in the legal profession as well as in other areas recognized, particularly by our own people.

This is an innovation, Mr. Speaker, on this side of the waters, in English common law jurisdictions. I can assure the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that had we any intention of suggesting that only the next revision of the statutes should be done by this commission, the word revision rather than reform would undoubtedly have appeared in the title.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the title to the proposed Act and the provisions of the bill amply demonstrate that this government is prepared to provide the vehicle for a proper study, by appropriate and competent people of stature, of our laws of Ontario. The bill further indicates that the government is prepared to support that in a financial way. But Mr. Speaker, it would be quite inappropriate for this House, even, to endeavour to outline for the chairman and members of the commission where they should start and in what area they should first go to work.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, we have committees of this House studying several areas of law reform, if I may call it so. There are a great many areas that need that study which have not been touched and it would be my thought that those would be the areas into which the commission would first direct its work.

However, I would say further, Mr. Speaker, that it is my opinion that this should be left to the commission, which will be appointed in due course. It will consist of people of stature—as I said to the press, I think, when I was questioned about it before—from the legal teaching profession, from the bench, and from the legal profession. I would add to that, for specific purposes, those from any other area of law which there may be in this province.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say, not only to the hon. member who made the comments, but to all the hon. members of this House, that this is a new departure for English law of the provinces in Canada. It is one that we think is desirable, one that would bring tremendous results, but it is one that must be entered into with caution, and with care and with due thought. So, Mr. Speaker, I say again that this government is prepared to ensure that this commission is a proper commission, is properly supported and is put in the position to do the kind of work which the hon. member for Downsview suggests might be done, and in which statement I concur heartily.

I would not think, Mr. Speaker, that this particular bill would need to go to the legal bills committee because this actually is a matter of principle only. The mechanics of it are something which have to be worked out and it could well be that another year there may be amendments to this bill if we find the proper working tools for the commission are not included in the bill.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, if this is not going to committee I have a couple of questions. First of all, I think it is a very worthwhile move on the part of the hon. Attorney General and the government and I think we all look for big things from the commission. But there are a couple of questions. First of all, how is this commission going to fit into the framework of advisory committees which the hon. Attorney General now has? Will this supersede them? Will this, for instance, supersede the administration of justice committee, or will it be above that committee? What will be the set-up in the framework of consultative and advisory committees that the hon. Attorney General now has; just what place will this particular commission have?

Second, will the report of the commission be made public?

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the member?

I do not want to be too restrictive, but these are particular questions I thought perhaps you could ask whenever the bill gets into committee of the whole House.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: I do not know under which section I could ask the hon. Attorney General these particular questions, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask for wide latitude—

Mr. Speaker: I just thought you were straying from the principle and you were getting into questions of detail.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Well, I am asking questions, sir, but these are on the principle.

The second one, sir, is whether he would advise the House as to whether or not the report is going to be made public? Whether the report will be to the hon. Attorney General as an advisory report, strictly within his own discretion as to whether or not it will be made public, or whether it will be tabled here, or just what will the status of that report of the commission be?

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to endeavour to answer the questions asked.

First of all, the hon. member will note that this is a commission and not a committee and therefore it has somewhat different status from an advisory committee to a Minister, such as the Attorney General's committee on the administration of justice. That is a committee which advises a Minister and meets at the Minister's call, considers things submitted to it by the Minister and makes confidential reports and recommendations to the Minister.

It is my opinion, which of course is subject to change by practice or the demands of the situation when this commission is operating, that this commission will report as required by the Act to the Attorney General and then those recommendations undoubtedly will be referred to the Attorney General's advisory committee, which is the operative committee and which advises as to legislation, and thereafter, as now, will come to this House.

The reports of the commission, as outlined in the legislation proposed, would, I myself believe, be public reports and might well be tabled in the Legislature, but this is purposely not included in this bill at this time. I have found, Mr. Speaker, and I have had now some little experience with these matters, that when something new is started it is very difficult to know in what way it will proceed and exactly what is necessary. It could well be that those people we might have in mind to approach to be members of this commission might well feel that their recommendations and reports to the Attorney General should be confidential reports until their recommendations had been considered by the government.

It might well be that the commission would consider that their reports might be public reports. So far as I am concerned, I see no reason why they should not be public reports and either tabled in the Legislature or released for the information of the hon. members and the general public. I think that is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which must be left until the personnel of the commission are appointed.

I can say, so that I will forestall any further question on that at the present moment, sir, neither the government nor I have any names in mind specifically for appointment to this commission, but I do say to the hon. members that when the commission is appointed everyone will concur that the people picked for the position, and who will have by then agreed to serve, will be the best obtainable in this province of Ontario.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, just to add very briefly to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for St. George and the hon. Attorney General.

I am wondering whether or not there should be a statement of policy in this bill that the commission shall, as commissions do, report to the Legislature. The hon. Attorney General has made the distinction himself. This is not a committee of a Cabinet Minister reporting only to that Cabinet Minister, but it is a commission. It is a commission of this whole Legislature. If it were merely a committee, the hon. Attorney General as he saw fit could appoint such a committee and it would be a matter of internal management of his own department.

An hon. member: Right!

Mr. Singer: But the hon. Attorney General has come to this House and says here is an Act that I recommend, please put it through the legislative procedures. He is asking us to create an Ontario Law Reform Commission which will be the Ontario Law Reform Commission created by all of the hon. members of the Legislature. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, most appropriate that the commission, being appointed by all of the hon. members of the Legislature, should be required to report to all of the hon. members of the Legislature and at regular intervals.

I would hope that that thought could be reflected in this Act, and that perhaps the word "Attorney General" could be removed from the pertinent section and the word "Legislature" inserted in place of it and that a term of every 12 months, or something along that line, be put in.

I think the hon. members of the Legislature are going to be most anxious to see that the commission's progress is satisfactory and in a manner that will be of great assistance to the people of the province. But if we do not see these reports and we have no way of getting them, if this is left to the discretion of the hon. Attorney General, then he might just as well appoint a committee and remove the bill.

He has asked for a commission. Let it be a proper commission and let it report regularly to the Legislature so that we can see what they are doing.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, just briefly, I want to underline what the hon. member for Downsview has said. I am a bit puzzled at the hon. Attorney General's intervention that this is going to be purely an advisory commission to himself.

Hon. Mr. Cass: No; I did not say anything of the sort, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, it is going to be submitted to you, and you in turn will submit it to the advisory committees and they will make recommendations as to legislation.

I have no objection to it going to a committee to be reviewed for the purpose of specific proposals for legislation, but the proposition that this kind of a basic study indicating legal reforms in the province of Ontario should be a private document, not even coming to the members of the Legislature, let alone the general public, it seems to me, is unnecessary and undesirable.

We happen to have within the structure of our own party a committee which is looking at various aspects of the law; in fact a subcommittee of it presented a brief to the legal aid committee this morning. One of the things—once again since the founding of the New Democratic Party—that we have been conscious of is the need for this reform. We were conscious of it because as I understand it in Great Britain the law society has sort of a built-in structure, a built-in organization which is doing this all the time. Perhaps that is what the hon. Attorney General—

Hon. Mr. Cass: The Lord Chancellor's committee!

Mr. MacDonald: The Lord Chancellor's committee; and I think that is what the hon. Minister had in mind when he said for the first time on this side of the water. If the law society has not taken the initiative, again I congratulate the government for taking the initiative in establishing it. But it seems to me that whatever would emerge from a commission of this nature is legitimately the kind of ideas and study that should be thrown into the general pot for public discussion more widely in the legal profession rather than being retained as a private document of the hon. Attorney General for reference to his advisory committee.

Hon. Mr. Cass: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might just have a word with respect to the hon. member's comments?

It certainly is not the intention of myself as Attorney General, or of the government, to keep the reports of this commission in any way secretive. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is not a Royal commission, such is a little different; it is a commission for a very interesting and specific purpose.

There are, as you will notice from the bill, Mr. Speaker, no restrictions on what the commission may take as their area of inquiry or how they may proceed. In England, the Lord Chancellor's committee is appointed by the Lord Chancellor. It only looks into those matters which are referred to it by the Lord Chancellor, who is a semi-political judge, he is a member of the government. It reports confidentially to the Lord Chancellor who, if he wishes, may make it public.

One of the things here, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for York South has said and as I have said, is that this is an innovation, a new thing here. I do not wish, and I am sure the government does not wish in any way to prevent us obtaining the proper people who should serve on this commission. As I say, we have no specific people in mind so far as approaching them is concerned, but we do know that there are some people who would be admirable here.

Until we know what their attitude is going to be with respect to this, I think it is very advisable that the bill remain in its present form. I, Mr. Speaker, have no objection to having the matter reconsidered when the commission is set up, and we have a chance to ascertain how the chairman and members wish to operate, how they wish to report, and what they suggest should be done with their reports.

I reiterate—and I am glad to know that the hon. member for York South agrees with me, because it is the only way in which intelligent and intelligible legislation can be introduced here—that we do have to have an opportunity of having the appropriate advisory committees, who sit on all legislation coming from my department, endeavour to get it into not only an understandable form but a form which will give members of my profession a great deal of difficulty getting around. You know, Mr. Speaker, there are two sets of lawyers—those drawing the laws and those very busy finding loopholes in them.

We wish, on our part, to give all the help we can to those of my department who do prepare these laws.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this, I would first of all say that I am not a lawyer. I think you will appreciate that I am trying to get more clarification about this bill. But I was interested when the hon. Attorney General referred to the process in Britain. I am thinking again of some material I read a couple of weeks ago about the Frank commission in Britain and also the Wyatt commission, I think it was called.

Hon. Mr. Cass: A different aspect entirely.

Mr. Thompson: This is a different aspect on regulations. Well, could I again ask this question? In Britain, I notice they also have a scrutiny committee which is made up of members of Parliament. It only sits during the session of Parliament, but it is examining regulations to see if they are ultra vires. I am wondering—in the broad section where you have talked on section C, judicial and quasi-judicial procedures under any action—what I notice in Britain, as well as in other Commonwealth countries where they have developed some kind of a scrutiny committee — they have one, I understand, in New Zealand which is made up of members of Parliament. I really am making this point to suggest that it should come under the examination of the Legislature. I am thinking, with the broad functions given to a commission which is going to carry out a reform—I just raise the danger that if it does not report to the Legislature, that it takes away, I think, what should be in a democratic society, the great institution for inquests, and that is Parliament. I just raise this as a point that I hope this commission will report to Parliament.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 25th order, debate on interim report of select committee on consumer credit.

ON CONSUMER CREDIT

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say at the outset that it was not my intention, in tabling the interim report on consumer credit, to circumvent the rules of the House the other day. My purpose was only to give the House information. I am quite content, however, with the present arrangements, and will say now what I intended to say then.

In the last decade or two, consumer attitudes towards money have changed considerably. Today, people not only carry a mortgage on their homes, but many carry mortgages on the furnishings and the equipment which they have in them.

I think it is already obvious to the committee that there is an important educational job to be done. A great deal is to be learned, especially by the beginner, about the various forms of credit available and the best methods of utilizing them. Credit, when used properly, can be a valuable tool. On the other hand, it provides many pitfalls for those untrained in its use.

It is to the benefit of the community at large to prevent individuals becoming over-expanded financially. The committee is aware, too, that the public on many occasions may be victims of fraudulent practices. I think it is in this area where governmental action can be most helpful.

I think it would be fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that some of the advertisements used in the various new media make it sound all too simple to obtain credit. The unfortunate result is that the public sometimes feels that credit belongs to them as a right, rather than something to be established by a reputation for paying their bills. The "buy now, pay later" philosophy has become a way of life. Earlier generations made a point of having the money in hand before making purchases. Today, the average young family is inclined to purchase many of the comforts of life on time.

The committee was established by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in April 1963 with the following terms of reference: To examine into, study, and report on all matters relating to the actual cost of credit to consumers, such as instalment purchases, borrowers and mortgagors in the province of Ontario. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the committee's attention is particularly directed to investigation of means by which total charges for borrowing money may be revealed in regard to land mortgages, chattel mortgages, conditional sales, agreements, credit retail purchases, and similar transactions.

Following the election, the committee was reappointed on October 30, 1963. Shortly after the appointment of the committee, advertisements were inserted in the newspapers and invitations were extended to quite a number of agencies extending consumer credit.

In the series of hearings which followed, the committee met for a total of 16 days during June, July, August, November and December, 1963. The committee heard briefs from a total of 80 groups and individuals.

I would like to say, on behalf of the committee, that we are all very grateful to the various organizations for the time and effort they put into their briefs, and for the manner in which they were presented.

As chairman of the committee, I would like to express my appreciation for the co-operation we received from everyone concerned.

As anyone will see from reading the interim report, certain observations and suggestions have been made for the guidance of the government in any legislation which may be introduced during the current session.

The committee's intention is to bring in more specific recommendations in their final report.

As has already been mentioned, there are many aspects yet to be investigated. These include life insurance companies, retail sales and instalment transactions, and conditional sales.

One additional field which the committee will be scrutinizing carefully, as it seems to present an area in which the public can be easily victimized, is door-to-door selling.

At the outset, the committee decided to request the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) to make available to the committee certain senior officials on his staff. This was done. Considerable background material was given by them to the committee about legislation pertaining to the whole consumer credit field.

The Supreme Court of Canada subsequently ruled The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act to be within the powers of the province. The importance of this decision cannot be overemphasized, and considerably strengthens, we believe, the position of the committee, as well as government officials responsible for the protection of the public.

Thus far, the committee has heard from mortgage brokers, lawyers, banks, trust companies, finance companies, acceptance companies, a collection agency, agriculture and labour associations, new and used automobile dealer associations, trade associations, service and consumer groups, as well as senior federal and provincial officials already mentioned.

The committee felt that some mention should be made of the current advertising practices which seem to overstress borrowing rather than savings. Advertising by various institutions today does not in all aspects appear to be desirable. Therefore further consideration will be given by the committee to this matter.

Traditionally, most people find it necessary to carry a mortgage on their home. It is estimated that 99 per cent of all homes have a first mortgage, and approximately 75 per cent of all homes today have a second mortgage when purchased.

Almost every family owns a car today and 85 to 90 per cent of all cars purchased are financed. It might be interesting to the hon. members to know the common purchases for which loans are made, which are as follows: Renewal or financing of mortgages; purchases of an automobile or other consumer goods; home improvements; consolidating debts; vacations; education; emergencies; and illness.

The committee was astonished to hear of some hair-raising transactions in which rates of 37 to 87 per cent were charged on mortgages. In consequence, the registration of two mortgage brokers has been terminated.

An interesting development, since the committee was constituted, is the willingness of a large number of companies of good financial and professional reputation to advance up to 85 per cent of the value of a property at rational rates of interest, and with only nominal arrangement fees.

The committee found widespread misconception of the meaning of "term of maturity" and "amortization". Amortization refers to the number of years over which payments must be made before a loan is paid in full. The term of the mortgage, or date of maturity in many instances, is substantially shorter than the time indicated by the amortization period. This sometimes results in the borrower believing that the loan will be repaid in a shorter time than is actually the case. He frequently finds that there is no provision for renewal of the mortgage and he is required to pay a substantial sum to discharge the mortgage, which is frequently referred to as the balloon payment.

Not infrequently, the borrower in the past has been forced into a position of paying a substantial bonus in order to have the mortgage renewed.

It is the feeling of the committee that we should strengthen the hand of the superintendent of insurance, Mr. C. Richard, FCA, and the registrar of collection agencies, Mr. E. J. Simone, who are responsible for the supervision and administration of The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act, by certain changes in the Act which are desirable.

Reference to the statement of mortgage form is also made in the report of the committee. The recommendation is that compulsory filing of the statement by the lender be made with an appropriate government agency, stating the true rate of interest.

The committee was alarmed at the evidence presented, indicating the widespread abuses in the used car field. The hon. Attorney General has opened an investigation into the charges which were brought to his attention by the committee. In the opinion of the committee, used car dealers should be licensed and only permitted to conduct a business providing they can give evidence of financial stability and good reputation.

Disclosure of the true cost of credit—without having reached any specific conclusions, it may be added that the preponderance of opinion before the committee has been in favour of full disclosure in principle. There would appear to be no opposition to the enactment of compulsory disclosure legislation, provided that it applies equally to all lenders.

In closing my few remarks of summary, Mr. Speaker, I would just say that consumer credit is a matter which concerns everyone today. There remain many areas yet to be investigated and it is therefore the request of the committee that it be reappointed to continue its inquiry.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few remarks to what has already been said to this House by the chairman. I might say at the very outset that I find no fault with the interim report, simply because it is in its preliminary stages and we are just feeling our way.

I would like to make a few comments of my own personal opinion. I might say, at this time, that I did not report to my hon. Liberal colleagues in caucus because I did not feel there was too much that could be said at this time. If hon. members were to look through the transcript, they would find that, in my personal opinion, the cost of credit should be revealed to the purchaser. I think of one individual—others of my hon.

colleagues will express their opinions no doubt on this interim report but I think, as I see it from where I stand, that it should not only be revealed to the public when they purchase an item, whether it be an automobile or a shirt, on a revolving account, what the dollar cost is but also the interest rates, the amount of interest paid.

This has been one point of disagreement in committee, if we had any at all. There are some for, apparently, at the moment; and some against.

I do not think that this committee should be done away with, even though we might change the personnel on the committee if you see fit, but I believe they are doing an exceptionally good job of revealing to the public what has been taking place. We find a few bad apples, it seems, in every basket of business in this world of ours, and we have disclosed to the public where large interest rates have been charged, especially by mortgage brokers—that is second mortgage. We recall a figure which came from the people of the press, of some 87.5 per cent interest paid for a bit of money borrowed. If we can do away with those culprits, we are doing a service to the people of the province.

I found that, in many instances, the interest rates are much higher. The only time I found that out, Mr. Speaker, I might say, is when it was revealed to me in interest rates. The dollar faction, as far as I was concerned, did not impress me too much, because you know you must pay a dollar; but when one works it down to the interest one finds that interest rates fluctuate considerably, naturally, from 6.5 per cent or six per cent to some 87 per cent.

I might say this for Mr. Simone, while I am on my feet. He has done an excellent job. I believe that this man should have more help in his department to investigate these people who are not doing the job that they ought to do. So I feel that if the government does nothing more than accept some of his recommendations, and help him implement the statutes hon. members have before them, it would indeed be rendering a service to the province.

However, with these few remarks, I feel that I should not pursue this any further, simply because I think the committee should continue to review it, and come in with a report in another session, I hope.

I might be a little political at this time, and say that this came about—

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Take it easy with that political stuff, George!

Mr. Bukator:—some two years ago when our leader presented a bill pertaining to that very subject. Our leader said at that time, in this bill, that he wanted complete disclosure. Then, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Prime Minister said that his bill did not go far enough and should be extended further. Then he appointed this committee.

I think we have explored some of those avenues and have not completed what we have to do, so I feel that before we can be too critical at least we should finish our work.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, there are a few aspects of this report I would like to comment on. May I, at the outset, say that it has been my privilege to serve on quite a number of select committees in the past ten years and, with the possible exception of the toll roads committee, chaired by as illustrious a person as the now hon. Prime Minister—this is away back in 1956-57—there has been no committee on which I have felt that there was as much satisfaction in the work and that there was as much ultimate possibility of achieving something really worth while. Therefore I want to say at the outset that we are only well into the task which we were assigned and I would certainly support the recommendation of the committee that we should be re-appointed to continue the job.

One of the aspects of the report that I want to comment on briefly is the whole question of mortgages, the regulations in The Mortgage Brokers Act and problems related thereto. I think one of the rather ironic developments of this committee is that there was, at least in an embryonic way, the powers within the department to regulate some of the excesses that one could find in this field.

Unfortunately, for some reason or other the people involved—and with the last speaker I agree, sir, they are just about as competent and courageous civil servants as I have seen—still felt that they could not move to implement those powers. Indeed, I think one of the benefits of this committee was that an atmosphere was created in the general public by the revelations the committee provided, and this strengthened their hand. Therefore they were in a position to move in dealing with at least two of the people who could be described as nothing other than operators who were victimizing their clients on many occasions.

But I think there are related problems to this on which the committee did not report because it is really outside its jurisdiction. I want to draw this to the attention of the House, and particularly to the hon. Prime Minister and such other hon. Ministers as this might appropriately fall to, and that is that I do not know how, in an open market, in a free enterprise economy, the government is going to regulate all the excessive rates of interest that can develop.

To me, the longer I was involved in the work of this committee the more I became conscious of the fact that there are various levels of interest rates that have developed in certain categories of companies. In many instances they were developed to bail out people who had become victimized at an interest rate beyond that. In other words, there were people who had become caught in the excessive levels and were now being bailed out by respectable companies—I am almost inclined to put quotes around that word—which charge anywhere from 24 per cent to 27 per cent interest.

There are others who were victimized at that level, or at least got in beyond their depth, and there are others who are bailing them out at 15 per cent to 18 per cent. And in turn there are people in the 15 per cent to 18 per cent range who, rather rarely, can have their financing done at what we might normally consider the appropriate rates of interest of six per cent and seven per cent for the first mortgage and 10 per cent to 12 per cent for the second mortgage. So that this is an infinitely complex situation, and I would acknowledge that in an open market I do not know how we are going to come to grips with it all.

However, I have one suggestion. It seems to me that if we are going to regularize this field, and in a very easy way drive out the excessive interest rates that are being charged—in face of the desperate need for housing that we have in our society today, it can be done by a return to government second mortgages. If we have government second mortgages, at an appropriate interest rate, it will make it possible for people to build a home without being burdened with a mortgage that hangs like a millstone around their necks for perhaps the rest of their working life time. It seems to me that this kind of a move will establish a kind of standard that will drive these excessive rates out of existence altogether and automatically.

Indeed, there is another reason why I would suggest the government should give consideration to this. I was interested, in studying the rates that are being charged, to discover that if a person seeks to borrow money, even from established companies in the Metropolitan area of Toronto they will pay perhaps six per cent or seven per cent interest. If they happen to live outside Metropolitan Toronto, even though no further away than perhaps Collingwood, or Sudbury, or the north—

Mr. Letherby: Or Moonbeam!

Mr. MacDonald: Or Moonbeam. When you get that far away you are getting up close to the moon and the beams, but it is much closer to Metropolitan Toronto than that.

To continue, they will have to pay an extra one or two per cent. Now the irony of this is that the money that is being loaned to them may well be their money. It may be money from insurance companies and trust companies that comes from these areas of the province as well as the Metropolitan Toronto area. Yet when these people, collectively speaking, want to borrow back some of their money they have to pay back a higher interest rate because of the fact that they happen to live outside the Metropolitan area.

There are reasons why this is the case. I am not going to bother to go into them now, but I submit that even with the reasons being laid out on the table and assessed and accepted, it is still unfair that people in one part of the province should be penalized as compared with the people who happen to live in the Metropolitan area.

I submit if we had a separate second mortgage, as the government offered some years ago, that they could be offered at interest rates comparable all across the province and it would remove that kind of inequity.

In fact, I would just draw the attention of the House to the recommendation that was made in this particular field—returning to my original theme of tightening up the regulations and strengthening the hand of Mr. Simone and others in the department—at the bottom of the typed report, pages eight and nine, it reads as follows:

In order to strengthen the position of the insurance department officials and thus afford them greater measures of protection to the borrowing public, certain amendments to The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act have been drafted. Specifically, it has been proposed that adequate penalties be provided for breaches of the Act or for failure to comply with the directions or ruling of the registrar.

Now that will be helpful.

Second, that the period of limitation from prosecution be extended from six months to one year after the facts are known, bringing this in line with The Securities Act.

Third, that where an investigation reveals an offence under the Act to the Criminal Code, a report be made to the Attorney General; and finally, together with some minor amendments designed to make the Act a more effective instrument, these amendments are endorsed by the committee and we refer them to the attention of the present Legislature with a view to their early implementation.

I hope the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) can see fit in the concluding weeks of this session to bring in amendments of that nature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other area of the committee's work, in which we operated on the periphery, so to speak, and this is various areas of racketeering in door-to-door selling, which is related to the question of consumer credit because in most instances we find that these conditional sales agreements are then sold to finance companies and the purchaser, often the victim, finds himself involved very quickly with the finance company.

I want to draw to the attention of the House the kind of thing that I see as one of the major aspects of the committee's work in the future and I can do it in specific terms. I had a call from a constituent of mine about two or three months ago in what I think is rather a typical and yet alarming kind of experience.

This person, a housewife, happened to be working one day in the kitchen when the phone rang. When she went to the phone she heard a recorded voice at the other end which said if she would call such-and-such a number that there they would make available for her, a barbecue on certain conditions, exactly what those were I forget. She called the number and found herself in connection with a company that was selling vacuum cleaners and related attachments to vacuum cleaners. They offered her this barbecue if the salesman could come to visit her.

Well, hon. members know the rest of the story. A slick salesman came. He delivered the barbecue, and before he left she had signed one or two documents, she thought with care, but she discovered she had signed a conditional sales agreement and a promissory note and was deeply involved.

However—and one may become critical of the average citizen on this, but she is really faced with heavy odds in this kind of a deal—this housewife felt she had clearly indicated she wanted to discuss this with her daughter, because she was buying it as a present for her. She thought she had clearly indicated that there was no deal closed as yet. The salesman led her along in this belief by saying, "I will come back and demonstrate it to you and your daughter next Monday."

When she discussed it with her daughter that evening, they came to the conclusion that the price of $249 was exorbitant. She called the company and indicated that she wanted to cancel the order, got some form of words which suggested that they would oblige her, and she thought perhaps she was out of this whole little trap. However, she discovered very shortly that she was not out of the trap, she was caught. And without going into all the details, she also found very quickly that this paper, as it is termed in the trade, this "hot paper," was sold to the Premier Finance Company—and I would be very intrigued to know at what discount. She found herself faced with the Premier Finance Company which operates out of 400 University Avenue.

I tell hon. members this story but I want to put along with it a comparable kind of experience. A few months before that, I had a letter from—I think I made mention of this yesterday—a former member of this Legislature, who is well known to many of the older members, Bill Grummet, up in North Cochran. He passed on to me the instance of a farmer up in northern Ontario who had found himself approached by a salesman on behalf of the Mural Stone Company of 27 Hotspur Road in Downsview. The name of the road is rather an appropriate one for this company.

The farmer signed a contract to have horizontal sidings put on his house, four sides, and to do something about the foundations and the eaves. He was assured by the salesman that the cost was going to be $1,895. However, he subsequently received papers, not from the company, but from a finance company and discovered that he was caught—and I draw attention to this—by the same finance company, Premier Finance Company, 400 University Avenue, and he was caught, not with a $1,895 bill, but with 60 payments of $48.50 which total $2,910.

Interestingly enough, in connection with the same transaction—I suppose it is a conditional sale or agreement that he signed—the authorizing agent's name had been rubbed off so that it is now indistinguishable, and that his name had been rubbed off and his wife's name had been put on instead. Therefore, you have what, to a layman, would appear to me to be clear fraud.

But the point I am making is that this is a widespread practice. It is all very well for us to say these people should be aware, but they are licked before they start. This has been pointed out by the credit unions and related bodies in Quebec, who are doing some advertising at the present time to try to educate the public and make them more alert to the traps that they can fall into from door-to-door salesmen.

The point that I think we in the committee have to give consideration to is that it is obvious that there are some finance companies in this field which, if I may put it this way, Mr. Speaker, are dealing in "hot paper." There are companies who are willing to operate with these door-to-door salesmen who in many instances are misleading the public. As quickly as they make a sale, they get rid of the paper to the finance company so that the purchaser finds himself not dealing with the retailer or the merchandiser, but dealing with the finance company. If there are some who are making a practice of this and undoubtedly doing it with healthy discounts, then it seems to me that here is an area where the committee is going to make a very real contribution to our present society if it can move into it, get full details and make some recommendations for future action by this Legislature.

A third area that I want to touch on briefly, Mr. Speaker, is some of the discussions and differences of opinions that we got into in the committee on the cost of credit and how it should be calculated.

I think there is unanimity in the committee that the cost of credit should be disclosed and it should be fully disclosed. But there are some differences as to whether or not the full disclosure of the cost need go beyond disclosing the interest rate without involving all other costs of credit and calculating it as part of the interest rate. One of the characteristics of this kind of transaction is that apparently the average person takes a look at six per cent as an interest rate and can be lulled into a sense of security. What he does not realize is that if he is paying a bonus, if he is paying legal costs, if he is paying search charges and a lot of other costs that are dreamed up and added, he may be paying not six per cent but 15, 20, 25, 30 or 40 per cent. If he knew he was paying 40 per cent for the money that he is actually getting, he would not borrow the money or he certainly would be more cautious.

It is certainly my view that we should, in the committee, seek to come up with some sort of formula—and I am mindful of the difficulties involved in this — which would make it possible to alert the public to the real cost of the credit. I was interested—and I draw to the attention of the House—one quotation from the interim report on page 4:

The main objective and implicit responsibility of this committee is to find means of making sure the public knows how much is being paid for borrowed money and to eliminate confusion and misrepresentation respecting consumer credit.

This view is also expressed by the Royal commission on Canada's economic progress which stated in its report that:

The insensitivity of consumer borrowers to the cost of funds may be impossible to overcome, but we should at least take steps to ensure that individuals are informed of the rates of interest they are required to pay, and informed in such a way that they may easily, without using slide rules, compare the rate charged at one source with the rate charged at another source.

Related to this, Mr. Speaker, is another very fortuitous development in the operations of this committee. We began its work feeling that what we could do at the provincial level was severely restricted, that we were dealing basically with interest rates and that this falls clearly in federal jurisdiction. Therefore, we felt perhaps all we could do at the provincial level would be to have statutory requirements for full disclosure of the interest rate.

But now that the committee has proceeded in the first chapter of its work, we have had our hands strengthened immeasurably, because finally the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada has come down on the case that was taken under the Ontario legislation, The Unconscionable Gifts Transactions—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act.

Mr. MacDonald: The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, correct. And this judgment indicates that while interest is a federal matter, the full disclosure of the cost of credit involves not interest per se, but all the other costs related to it, at least as I understand the judgment. Therefore it is within the jurisdiction of the province to deal with this matter. It will not be meddling in something that is a federal responsibility if it tries to come to grips with disclosing and making regulations with regard to the whole disclosure of credit of which one part, and one part only, is interest rates. I look forward with the assistance of our distinguished counsel to seeing what we can present—I should say the distinguished counsel of the committee and the distinguished counsel that we have as members on the committee, because there are many of them—and I hope we can come up with some proposals for this Legislature's consideration in the future.

My final comment, Mr. Speaker, would be with regard to the used car situation. We got into a little difficulty with this in the committee. I thought the committee was really making some headway on one occasion when a rather rare combination, the hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) and I buried our hatchets and combined in a motion that got the unanimous support of the committee, drawing to the attention of the hon. Attorney General that here was a problem that he should look into. I am not going to attempt to detail the next two or three rather strange and weird weeks, because the hon. Attorney General clearly indicated that he was not going to move and then subsequently tried to rationalize his stand that he really was moving.

However, the interesting thing is that nobody believes him, even the normally sympathetic Conservative press simply did not believe him.

However, when, after some very great assistance from the Better Business Bureau, which has been trying to cope with this problem for years, I was able to alert the public to exactly what was going on, the pressure was such that the hon. Attorney General had to move. That is fine. I think it is our obligation now to await the report of this investigation which, I trust, sir, will come in the relatively near future so that the committee can have the benefit of its conclusions in making recommendations in the coming year.

I would make only two comments in reference to this, Mr. Speaker. One is that I concur completely with the recommendation which is suggested in the interim report, that while it appears to be infinitely complex and detailed and difficult to come to grips with all of the shenanigans in the used car field— aspects of it can be described as nothing other than "racket"—I think the simplest way to deal with it is the process of licensing; rather than what we have had, which has been simply registration.

It is almost incomprehensible to realize that for years, in the province of Ontario, literally anybody could go into the used car business no matter what his reputation, what his background, what his financial position was. Indeed, I know of one or two cases of people who literally got out of the penitentiary, came to Toronto, went down and bought a used car licence, and went back into business. When I say "went back into business," I mean the kind of business that originally got them into the Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. Letherby: Monkey business!

Mr. MacDonald: Namely, defrauding the public. All they had to do was pay $25.

For reasons which mystify me, The Department of Transport has seen fit to do nothing other than the registration of used car dealers. I would urge that the hon. Attorney General give consideration—perhaps even before he gets a report from the committee he has set up—to act at least on establishing a licensing procedure; because, if you license used car dealers, it means they have to present necessary credentials, they must have necessary qualifications. If they begin to accumulate a record, at the Better Business Bureau, of defrauding the public in one way or another, if one had an appropriate tribunal before whom the people who have been victimized can come and make their complaints, it would be a very easy proposition just to take the licence away from these people. You will not have to go chasing them around the lot, so to speak, in the fashion that police and everybody has to do now—as they try to keep one step ahead of the person from whom, unfortunately, they have extracted some money for a jalopy that should never have been sold in the first place.

I would urge upon the hon. Attorney General the proposition of licensing; and indeed I think it is something with which this Legislature should be presented in this session. I do not think we need to wait any more.

I have just one final comment, the second one I referred to a moment ago. When I was involved in the public discussion, and revelation, with regard to what is going on in the used car field, I was genuinely convinced that these practices—and there is a common pattern of them in the field—were restricted to a group of what I described as "fringe operators". I want to say to the House, in all seriousness, that I was wrong; that some of the practices which are to be found among fringe operators are also fairly common practices among established dealers in the Metropolitan area.

Indeed, in the number of complaints which came to me with details—and I have passed them on to Inspector Erskine, who is doing the investigating work for Mr. Bray—I have noted the number of instances having to do with established dealers. I have drawn this to his attention and I have discovered that he is getting a fair number. Indeed, there are one or two instances in the city of Toronto of allegedly established and respected dealers who are just as bad as the fringe operators.

In other words, I would say to the House that this is a field which, I am afraid, we have neglected so long that some of the practices, which originally may have been confined to the fringe operator, have tended to become so tolerated that they have been picked up by some of the established operators. Therefore, there is all the greater need for us to move with haste and see that they are brought to a halt. And, I repeat, it can be done, I think, with the so-called established dealers as well as the fringe dealers, through a simple process of licensing so that they can be brought to account if their conduct subsequently does not live up to the qualifications.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate my support for the recommendation in the report that this committee should be reappointed to continue its work, because—with the topics we have merely skirted around—it may well be that we have got literally years of work to do.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make so bold as to make a few comments about this interim report. I deliberately say "make so bold" because I am the only person who has risen, up to this time, who did not have the advantage of being a member of that select committee. I hope, sir, that I will not offend anyone except the most sensitive when I say I am somewhat sceptical of the work of these select committees. Especially am I so when I see them come before the Legislature, as they have always done in my time, which is not long, and ask to be reappointed.

That is a particularly germane observation to the work of this committee, because—germane observation; I mean, in order that I may extend my remarks, to explain exactly what I mean: This committee gives the impression that, in being reappointed, it needs more time to investigate the many ramifications of credit buying in the province. Yet, during the deliberations of this committee, you will recall, sir, that they came upon some things so flagrant, so startling, so shameful and unconscionable, that the hon. member for St. George—very apt that it should be the hon. member for St. George—in a certain very real sense was hammering at the door of the hon. Attorney-General himself, demanding immediate action against certain individuals whose machinations had been turned up by this committee. I pictured him, in my mind's eye at that time, as the great promoter of public benefaction. He was not going to suffer these evil influences within our society for another day.

And yet the same hon. member for St. George, in another aspect of the curious—I am not going to use a stronger word than that—deliberations of this committee, I recall reading one time, and I have since confirmed it with my hon. friend from Niagara Falls, the initial attitude of the hon. member for St. George was, “I do not care what interest rates are charged. As long as the borrower knows what interest rate is going to be charged, then that is enough of a salutary device to warn him about the consequences of embarking upon this line of credit.”

Mr. MacDonald: That is not quite accurate.

Mr. Sopha: Well, it is pretty close. It is a pretty accurate version.

Mr. MacDonald: No, he is guilty, but the hon. member is making the wrong accusation.

Mr. Sopha: It is a pretty accurate version. Before, he kept saying—and he said this more than once at the deliberations of the committee, so I read in the very accurate press with which we are blessed in this province—that the matter of interest rates is of no concern to the provincial government at all. He gave his opinion as a lawyer, I suppose, that that was so. Interest rates, he said, are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government and there is not much the province can do in that regard.

Of course, that leads me naturally to another curious aspect of the workings of this committee. Mr. Speaker, I was indeed surprised at the hon. member for St. David, who, in reading off this dissertation and presenting in a sort of responsible way this interim report, managed to get through his remarks without having said a word about The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, first raised by my hon. friend from York South.

Now, during the deliberations of the committee of course—

Mr. Price: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I did mention The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, forgive me, because the hon. member is up in the back row, I—

Mr. Price: Would the hon. member like me to read to him what I said about it?

Mr. Sopha: I will accept the hon. member's word for it that he did mention it.

Mr. Price: Here is what I said about it. I said:

The Supreme Court of Canada subsequently ruled The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act to be within the powers of the province. The importance of this decision cannot be overemphasized and considerably strengthens, we believe, the position of the committee as well as the government officials responsible for the protection of the public.

Mr. Sopha: Fine. Of course it is accurate to relate that this committee operated under a certain pall of pessimism, if not cynicism, because during its deliberations The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act had been within the Court of Appeal of Ontario and the Court of Appeal had ruled it to be ultra vires of the province. That Act, of course, was the only venture of the province of Ontario in a legislative way, into the field of the control of credit and borrowing and when it went, as it did in the Court of Appeal, the province had no other means of, in any way, supervising, restricting or controlling borrowing within the province.

I think it might be interesting to relate also in regard to that case, that as it wended its way through the Court of Appeal and up to the Supreme Court of Canada, the attitude of the law officers of the Crown of this province was not one that especially was marked by optimism. Of course, I might say at this point that constitutional law within The Department of the Attorney General is not one of its long suits. They are not very strong in constitutional law, in that department.

I think it accurate to relate that the only person who was concerned with that case and its appeal throughout the superior courts of judicature in this country, the only person concerned with it who had any optimism at all about the outcome, was the former Attorney General, now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts). I am told reliably, without citing who tells me, that of all the people involved, only he said, “We are going to win”. Everybody else concerned with it said, “No, we have not a hope because it deals with interest. Interest is a matter of federal jurisdiction and we will be thrown out in the Supreme Court of Canada”. I can imagine the joy that came to his heart when finally the Supreme Court of Canada said that he was right, that the legislation was within the jurisdiction of the province.

My friend, the hon. member for York South will forgive me, I know, when I say that my interpretation of the result, or as we say in the law, the ratio decidendi, of that case is not exactly the one he gave to it. As I understand the case, it was very far-reaching in the decision, for the Supreme Court of Canada said that the Act does not essentially deal with interest at all. If it dealt with interest, then clearly it would be ultra vires of the province, but what the Act seeks to get at is the whole nature of the transaction—that the court is required, and empowered to, under that statute, view the transaction as a whole and then having looked at every aspect and every facet of it, and applied the test of conscience to it, if it finds that the transaction is of harsh and oppressive nature, then it may give relief, set aside the transaction wholly or in part.

Mr. MacDonald: I do not dispute it.

Mr. Sopha: That goes very far and I may say it is one of the two reasons that I rose to make some remarks. I want to now detail the first of the observations I have made.

That decision, in laying down the rule that it did, empowers and enables the province to go quite a long way, in giving protection to the consumers and the citizens of this province. I would think that no matter what recommendations the committee finally comes to, that so long as they do not deal exclusively with interest, so long as those recommendations are directed at the nature of the transaction, then it may be felt that the Supreme Court of Canada will look upon legislation that this government or a subsequent one introduces here, as favourably as it has looked upon The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act. That is very heartening.

I suppose one of the reasons, of course, the Supreme Court ruled the way it did, and I am not seeking to criticize the decision of the court at all, is that the federal government has not entered this field. There is no federal legislation on the books, apart from one or two very old and archaic statutes, The Small Loans Act and The Money Lenders Act. Other than that, the federal government, of course, has not ventured into the field to protect consumers from the sharks and the unscrupulous people who will mulct them. If it had a statute like The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act, I dare say that our statute would not have been found to be intra vires of this province.

However, to sum up that point, I say there is considerable optimism about the translation of the final recommendations of this committee into statutes.

Mr. Letherby: There is nothing final for a long time to come.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: Yes. I am glad to see the hon. member back. We missed him last night.

Mr. Letherby: Why does the hon. member not let his own member of the committee—

Mr. MacDonald: I do not know whether we should be more embarrassed or your colleagues.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: I am not going to stop, Mr. Speaker, to exchange inanities or unpleasantries with my friend, the hon. member for Simcoe East.

Mr. Letherby: The hon. member should not have anything to say on it at all.

Mr. Sopha: He may favour us, sir, by doing what he did yesterday, and that is disappearing.

Mr. Letherby: I do not disappear because the hon. member wants me to.

Mr. Sopha: The second point I wanted to make was that I hope this committee when it resumes its deliberations, will look into a matter which I contend has become a very flagrant and worrisome and anxious problem in this province. That is the matter of wage assignments.

I looked at the last paragraph of the committee's interim report. I was somewhat disheartened as it states in very general terms that it did not single out the matter of wage assignments as being a specific ground of inquiry. What is happening, very briefly, in this province now, is the development of a practice whereby when the consumer goes to the finance company to arrange a line of credit to purchase some chattel, automobile, electric washer, dryer, or whatever it may be, the company takes an assignment of his wages. That is a very effective device, in that when the time comes that the borrower does not keep up his payments, the company may notify his employer to have the employer deduct a certain portion of the man's wages and send it along to the company.

I have come across cases where an individual will have as many as three wage assignments against him at one time. Twenty per cent of his wages—I think that is the usual percentage—20 per cent will be going to company A and 20 per cent to company B and 20 per cent to company C, and he is left with a pittance in order to support his family.

The problem is further exacerbated, Mr. Speaker, by the fact that the courts have held that where a wage assignment is in operation the balance of the wages belonging to the workman are not immune from garnishment. We have actually run across the very distressing circumstance where an individual has a wage assignment against a pay period and at the same time he gets a garnishee. Under the state of the law now, the judge must order that in addition to the wage assignment, 30 per cent of the balance must go by way of garnishment.

I am not one of those persons who particularly favours the device of garnishment. I do not like it. I do not like it because I have a certain feeling of a certain sacrosanct quality about a person's wages. I know, I have seen it with my own eyes, that once a man's wages are attached for debt, the consequences in distress and suffering and want to his family are very gross indeed.

With this additional device, that is becoming ever more popular, of a wage assignment, human distress is multiplied to a great extent. I hope this committee early in its deliberations will go into this, what I conceive to be, a very pressing problem.

Finally, I had the advantage—the things in life, of course, happen by coincidences—I had the advantage at noon of being the recipient of the hospitality of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) in that he provided me and my hon. colleague from the Nickel Belt (Mr. Demers) with two tickets to a luncheon held at the Royal York Hotel. The price of the tickets said $4 and the luncheon was every bit worth that, and especially was it better since we got the tickets free.

We went to that luncheon held by the prospectors and developers association and there we had the advantage of hearing an address by the vice-president of one of Canada's leading banks, the vice-president and general manager, and he traced in his remarks the development of the use of credit in our community. It seems that a generation, or perhaps a little longer ago, it was considered to be something of a black mark on the escutcheon of the family if a person was in debt. In fact, they tell me that a generation or so ago if a person had a mortgage against his house he was in some sections of the community considered to be sort of a second-class citizen, or beyond the pale, so to speak.

Well, so it was with debt. Our forefathers did not like debt. They had an innate feeling against it, almost as against venial sin, I suppose. But that speaker traced the development of the use of credit, and of course nowadays, in the modern life of the sixties, everybody is in debt.

Governments are in debt, and maybe it is governments who have made it fashionable, maybe they have made it fashionable for the rest of us to go in debt. They go into debt; so do we.

Now everybody has his debts; his mortgage, his car is financed, he has an overdraft at the bank. Perish the thought, I hate to think of it, but I will be home Friday to look after it.

Now the committee reports that the total of amount in consumers' goods extends to some $5 billion. So therefore one can say with the greatest feeling of assurance that this has become a very important aspect of our daily living in this country. If this committee feels that it needs more time in order to pursue its deliberations, then God speed it in its endeavours in doing so, so that some order may be brought out of chaos and some relief may be given where there has been dislocation.

I only say this in closing, that if during the deliberations of that committee once again hon. members find aspects, find areas where immediate relief is necessary, then let us hope that the door of the hon. Prime Minister and the door of the hon. Attorney General is open to them, led by the lion of St. George.

An hon. member: Let us hope we do not have to push the door in on him.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, led by him. He will go and slay the dragon, slay the dragon if need be; and then let us have the legislation at the next session of this Legislature, because there may be people in the community who cannot wait.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, speaking of dragons, the hon. member for Sudbury is breathing hard today, I hope he is not snorting too heavily.

In any event, I would like to speak about some of the matters that came before this committee and particularly some of the matters referred to by the hon. member for York South. In speaking about some of those matters, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can clear up some of the misconceptions and misinterpretations placed on the record of the House by the hon. member for Sudbury.

If I may cover the hon. member for York

South's speech in reverse order, Mr. Speaker, may I say to him and to the House that I agree completely with his views in regard to the licensing aspect of used car dealers, especially in the Metropolitan Toronto area. I know that I am treading on very dangerous ground here when I get into licensing in Metropolitan Toronto at the moment. I am not referring to the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission at the moment, I am referring now to the class A garage owner's licence issued under the authority of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett).

Mr. Speaker, I would hope the government and the hon. Attorney General and the hon. Minister of Transport are not going to wait for the special investigating committee which the hon. Attorney General has set up to look into the used car field. I hope the government is not going to wait for that committee to report before bringing legislation or regulations before this House changing this particular aspect of the used car business.

The situation in Metropolitan Toronto is especially bad. I have a couple of well-known examples in my own riding of some of these people, and for the benefit of the House and for some of the rural hon. members who have not bumped into this problem, one almost needs a completely new dictionary if one is going to investigate the car business here in Toronto.

There are all sorts of weird phrases, some of the more polite ones being new nouns. "Switcheroo", for instance, and "Patsies", are the order of the day, on Danforth Avenue in the evening, I gather. There are all sorts of weird phrases.

Before we really get into the field I think the committee is going to require one of these earphone sets so that we really can understand what is going on. We are going to have a witness in front of us and we are going to have somebody interpret for us off in the side wings.

Here in Toronto at the moment the situation in regard to this licensing is extremely bad. We had evidence presented to us, sir, that some of the holders, for instance, of Class A garage owners' licences in Toronto are older retired gentlemen, and in a couple of cases retired women even, living in the Ford Hotel, who probably would not know one end of a Volkswagen from the other. The situation has reached the point now where on some of these used car lots in Toronto there is a different licence for just about every week of the year.

Now, hon. members may say: How can this affect our people? Well, this affects people this way. If they go in one week to buy a used car relying on the fact that the government—they do not care which government has licensed that person who is looking after the lot that week—and they enter into some negotiation, perhaps even contractual relations with that person for that week, they buy a car under certain conditions. They go back the next week to the same lot, speak to the same salesman, and lo and behold, they find that the licence in the little shack at the back has been changed. It is no longer the same licence.

Instead of John Smith whose name appeared last week on that licence, this week it is Pete Jones. And the salesman merely says: "Oh, I'm sorry, the outfit that was running this lot last week is no longer here. You made your deal with the licence-holder of last week." At least this is the legal and technical argument they are faced with. "You made your deal with John Smith, he was running the lot last week. I am sorry, John Smith is no longer here this week, Pete Jones runs this lot this week."

Of course, to try to get legal redress under these circumstances is not only baffling for the layman, but I can tell hon. members from my own personal experience, it is pretty baffling from a professional person's point of view in Toronto.

In any event, this is a very unsatisfactory state here in Metro Toronto where these licences can be held by people who have no interest in the business at all and they are switched from week to week. There are a great many other abuses which I hope the committee, if it is reappointed by the House, will look into and investigate, especially in the used car situation.

But the point is this, that the licences at the moment are handed out on a pretty free-and-easy basis by The Department of Transport. This is the meat of the matter as far as it affects us here in this House today, Mr. Speaker.

The evidence presented to the committee by people in the business was that almost anybody with the necessary money could present themselves to The Department of Transport and be granted a licence. In many cases, these people are totally unfit to hold a licence. This is one field especially where the government, I hope, is going to move in this session, without waiting for any more evidence to be presented to it along that line.

The next general subject I wanted to get into, and about which we have had a scholarly if not correct dissertation by the hon.

member for Sudbury, Mr. Speaker, is the constitutional law aspect of this matter. I do not think I am unlike any of these other members on that committee, or for that matter any of the other hon. members in this House, Mr. Speaker, in that when we hear of a problem which comes before us we immediately want to find the solution to it. I must say, that even with the decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada recently, the hands of this committee are pretty well tied in certain aspects of the mortgage business and certain aspects relating to interest in the province of Ontario.

This is not the fault of the committee; it is not the fault of the terms of reference; it is not the fault of the government of this day or any other day; it is the fault of The British North America Act and our outdated and antiquated constitution in this country. I could reel out speech No. 47, which I have made on innumerable occasions to both the committee and this House, regarding the constitution; but here is a very good example of how our constitution, our legislation in this country, is certainly not up to date at the moment.

Reference has been made by the hon. member for Sudbury to certain observations I made, at the beginning of the committee's deliberations, to Mr. Simone, who is a very good civil servant of this government. I think he is doing a very worthwhile job in his position here, but I do not believe that a government official should use wrong means to correct a wrong. I think, if a government or if a person in public life has to use wrong means to correct a wrong, then he himself is committing as great a wrong as the wrongdoers in the first place.

At the very beginning of our deliberations, when we were first getting into the mortgage interest field—this was a time before the Supreme Court of Canada had handed down its decision regarding The Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act—I think it was a fairly widely held opinion, perhaps not in the department of the hon. Attorney General in contrast to what the hon. member for Sudbury said, but within the legal profession, that Ontario's Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act was ultra vires of the province. As a matter of fact, I think I can remember sitting listening to law lectures with the hon. member for Sudbury at one point, when this particular Act was trotted out before us as a prime example of a piece of legislation that was ultra vires of the province. In any event, the background to this whole matter is The British North America Act.

Under The British North America Act, the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction in the interest field. When we get into this credit business, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that a great many of the organizations and corporations which are most active in the credit field also fall exclusively under federal legislation. I can think of no better example than the banks of Canada.

I am not criticizing the banks for what they have done. I think they have moved into a field, in the last few years, and they have attempted to clean up a nasty situation; but they have done it most illegally. The Bank Act has certain restrictions and certain stipulations in regard to the interest the banks can charge. Interest, generally, is exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal government. When we as a Legislature, or the Ontario government as a provincial government, attempt to enter into this field and bring in legislation, we bang right into the frustrating wall of an antiquated constitution. This is the point I have attempted to bring out during the deliberations of this committee.

The banks, generally, are great purveyors of consumer credit in this country and are governed by the federal government. Interest is governed by the federal government. We can come along with all the most pious hopes in the world, but it will not change that particular aspect of it. It is this aspect which has caused a great deal of worry to the committee members.

I think that the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, quite frankly, is bad theoretical law. I think it is very good practical law because, as the hon. member for Sudbury pointed out, the federal government has no legislation in this particular field at all. I think that is a crying shame and I am certainly willing to give full marks to Senator Croll and others for their attempts to enact some legislation at the federal level.

But the point is that the committee's deliberations are tied somewhat in relation to this field. The suggestion I have is this: I do not know whether the terms of reference of that committee are wide enough to do it. I did speak once with the committee counsel and he did not believe that they were wide enough to do it. If the government, and this House, is going to reappoint the committee, may I suggest that it be made crystal clear in those terms of reference that the committee will have power to, if necessary, hold joint meetings with the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate—which is also investigating the consumer credit field?

This is such a woolly, grey area, as far as the constitution is concerned, that I think we do need some very strong joint procedures in order to work out necessary legislation in this field. As I say, I think it is a great shame that the federal government—not only the Liberal federal government but the Conservative federal government of past days—has not moved in this field. I hope it will. I rather suspect that it is going to wait before it does anything for this joint Commons-Senate committee to report.

I think it is a shame, too. I think there are several very obvious fields of necessary legislation at the federal level. But the point is this, I think that our committee here, if it is reappointed, should have the power at least to have discussions with this other joint committee; if not, to be able to hold some type of joint meetings. I do not know if this has ever been done before.

Mr. Sopha: Committees at Ottawa are out of favour right now.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: The hon. member for Sudbury says committees at Ottawa are out of favour right now. Perhaps he would be good enough to bring his good offices to bear on the present Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada to change that opinion, because if that is the opinion of the Prime Minister of Canada, then the Prime Minister of Canada is wrong.

Mr. Sopha: It is the opinion of the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I do not even know if it is possible, because I do not think it has been tried before. We certainly should be able to hold discussions with that federal committee. I would welcome it. I think the other members of the committee would welcome it, because the only alternative to that is that the hon. Attorney General and the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario should bring strong recommendations and strong suggestions to the Rt. hon. Prime Minister of Canada at one of these Dominion-provincial conferences to amend The British North America Act in this field because it is a pretty messed-up situation at the moment, in the credit field.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No red herring!

Mr. MacDonald: Is the hon. Prime Minister sure of that?

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: No one really seems to know who has the authority to do what in this field. We have control over the form of mortgages, for instance, they have the control over interest. The Supreme Court of Canada has now ruled that our Unconscionable Transactions Relief Act relates not to interest, as pretty well everyone thought it did, but rather to the whole manner and shaping of the contract, and if this includes matters pertaining to interest, it is still intra vires the province.

If we come along with any legislation or any suggestion of legislation regarding disclosure of interest, one of the largest groups in the country does not have to pay any attention to us whatsoever and that is, of course, the banks. If we came along with legislation tomorrow stating that here in Ontario the purveyors of credit have to set out disclosure of interest, or even set out interest rates, the banks would not have to follow it.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the hon. member sure of that?

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: No, I am not sure of it, but these are some of the things that I think can only be delineated and clearly delineated by discussions between our group and the existing group at Ottawa.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): We need a glossary for the hon. member's language, too.

An hon. member: That is an old word. Too many lawyers.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I hope I have made the point that the terms of this particular committee should be broadened to include negotiations, discussions and, perhaps, even public hearings with the joint committee sitting in Ottawa.

Mr. Singer: It gets worse.

Mr. MacDonald: Sounds like a good idea.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the select committee studying the true cost of consumer credit, I find it necessary to say a word in connection with our experience. First of all, may I say, this is the first select committee on which I have sat and I am somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Sudbury say that he did not think that it should be reappointed.

Mr. Sopha: I did not say that!

Mr. Reilly: I was wondering whether he was referring to whether or not it should be reappointed, because in the first place he said he was surprised to see us come forward and ask for reappointment; perhaps he was not referring to this specific select committee.

Mr. Sopha: I said I was sceptical.

Mr. Reilly: And then he went on, of course, before he concluded to say that, "I hope when it resumes its deliberations that it will study some other phases." So I assume now that he is in favour of reappointment of this select committee.

I would certainly volunteer to sit on this committee if it is reappointed, and if it is the wish of the hon. Prime Minister and those who select members for it. But whether or not I sit on the committee, I think perhaps this government would be doing a disservice if it did not reappoint this particular committee, Mr. Speaker.

In the field of second mortgages alone I feel that a lot of good has been done. We have heard different reports, and they have appeared in the press about people paying up to 87 per cent on mortgages. This of course is a most flagrant case and when the details of the case were made known it was for a small mortgage of some $500. It was in a small town, I think, up in Schomberg. It surprises me when I realize that from the standpoint of mortgages there has not been a control on them earlier but the question of the market, I suppose, governed it. I could almost say, and I think most members of the committee would agree with me, that the market as far as the second mortgage field is concerned now has almost dried up. There is no such thing as an 87 per cent mortgage, or a 50 per cent mortgage or a 35 per cent second mortgage.

Mr. Singer: Is there not?

Mr. Reilly: No, except if you want to take it on the basis of a five or ten per cent equity.

Mr. Speaker, in our committee, we asked what the situation was from the standpoint of mortgages, and mortgage interest. I specifically asked one mortgage broker, did he think that the mortgage rate of interest should exceed 12 per cent on a second mortgage? He said, no, not as far as he was concerned. He had lent money at nine per cent on first mortgages and a maximum of 12 per cent on a second mortgage. Later when I asked him how many rejects he had, he said there were about 80 per cent; in other words, four out of five were turned down. He was not doing any service to the people who actually needed it. He required 30 per cent equity to lend money. Under those circumstances it was tantamount to a first mortgage, not a second mortgage.

The hon. member for York South has brought to the attention of the select committee and to the attention of the House the situation that happens from the standpoint of application of an exterior material to housing at a cost of some $1,895. Over 60 payments, he tells us, at some $48.50, the total cost is $2,910. This really has nothing to do with our select committee, it is really a merchandising problem. There may be some falsification from the standpoint of the particulars, but actually on the basis of spending $48.50 for 60 payments over five years, it does not sound unreasonable to me, if these were the arrangements that were entered into.

I think where the difficulty is and what has been explained to our committee is that under these circumstances a person actually enters into a dual contract. He comes into a position where he says, "I shall arrange to have an application of exterior siding placed on my house", and then, secondly, "I shall pay somebody else for the use of the money", and he does not realize that he has entered into two contracts. This is the one thing that can be considered by this committee if those in their wisdom, decide to reappoint the select committee. This is one phase of our work which requires further study and on which some improvement can be made.

If you were to look in the newspaper and look at the advertisements, Mr. Speaker, under "mortgages"—as a member of the select committee I find myself automatically becoming interested in money for sale, and mortgages for sale, and I watch these columns daily—you have a large selection and it has been marked down there with emphasis as to the rate of interest. There is no interest advertised above 12 per cent, regardless of circumstances, for second mortgages and there is a number of people lending money for second-mortgage purposes.

As far as we are concerned now, the situation has vastly improved. I would be inclined to say that it might be more popular of course for a member of the Legislature to refer to the people who gouge others as those who are highway robbers or as the hon. member for Sudbury preferred to put it, those who are sharks and those who perhaps are somewhat unscrupulous. I think it is more popular to talk along these veins, but actually as far as the committee itself is concerned, it has done a fair job for which it has been assigned so far. Unfortunately, it has not been sitting long enough to deal with some of the things that should be dealt with. Some hon. members of this House have already spoken about the question of the licensing of car lots. This, in the opinion of most members of the committee, I think, is something that should be done.

The hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Niagara Falls, along with other hon. members on the Conservative benches, have pointed out some of the problems that have appeared and some of the people who have spoken to us at the committee. It has been most worthwhile and I am in general agreement with most of the things that have been said.

I would say that from the standpoint of disclosure I do not agree that it should be mandatory to say that an interest rate should be automatically disclosed. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that it should be on the basis of a dollar rate. I think that most people who have come before the committee have proved that, as far as we are concerned, most of us earn our money by the dollar. We spend our money by the dollar. And if someone were to say to me, "Reilly, it is going to cost you $15 for the use of $100", I would either accept it or reject it because I know what $15 is on $100.

I think that, in most instances, what happens is that the people who, in the parlance of the street, get "rooked" are people who cannot figure interest rates. They are interested in knowing what it costs them, and what they can afford to pay. It has been the experience of a lot of people in various trades who are lending money, and who are financing people, that the customers want to know how much it is going to cost them per month. Not in percentages, but what it is going to cost them in dollar costs. Then they make a decision as to whether or not they would like to pursue it.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, a representative—I believe the manager—of the Better Business Bureau was one of the first to appear before our committee. When he came before the committee he said he had very little trouble, as I recall it, from the standpoint of The Small Loans Act, on the basis of 2 per cent, 1.5 per cent and 1 per cent. There were very few complaints.

Most of his complaints were on the basis of merchandising. I suggest to you, and to the hon. members of this House, that this is a very important phase for consideration by the select committee. It has already been brought to the attention of the House. It should be pursued, and the place to pursue it would be in a select committee. I suggest very strongly that it would be worth our while to reappoint members to this select committee; and, if I am appointed, I would be most willing to serve. For the hon. members' interest, I attended every session.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I might just say to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Eglinton, that it may make a very great difference how long that loan may run. The $15 on the $100 for six months is an entirely different thing from $15 for 12 months, so the rates would depend entirely upon the term of the loan.

The thing I wanted to mention particularly, Mr. Speaker, is this: At the time of the Throne speech debate, I raised the question of a four-day postponement as far as the operation of contracts signed at the door were concerned. Shortly after that, the hon. Attorney General indicated that the legislation in Britain, to which I called attention at that time, was being examined by this government. And the hope was expressed that it might lead to some action here. The hon. Attorney General is not in his seat at the moment, and I am afraid I do not know of any other place where I might raise this question. Perhaps the hon. Prime Minister might have the answer to it?

It is a very simple question, as to whether such legislation has been received, whether it is receiving consideration, and whether we can hope for some action during this session of the House.

Mr. W. E. Sandercock (Hastings West): Mr. Speaker, when I was appointed to this committee last fall, at the two-day session we had, I missed a great deal of the proceedings. But when I did attend, I realized that this was a very important committee. I was impressed at the way these finance companies came forth with all their briefs. They seemed to have nothing to hide. They would explain every detail, and I think the committee was very proud of the co-operation we received from all these finance companies, and also the banks.

I would like to compliment the chairman of our committee. He was a very friendly chairman. I think the people who appeared before this committee felt at home and gave every co-operation to the whole committee, probably on account of the very friendly manner in which the chairman handled the affairs of the committee.

One thing grieves me a bit; that is that people have to borrow so much money. It seems a pretty hard way to have to live, having to pay these high interest costs. It is just too bad that people cannot get caught up a little more and not have to make so much use of this borrowing.

When one considers that one finance company in Canada alone has 1,547 employees, and those employees' salaries have to be paid out of the borrowings, it just seems a pity that we have to have this. But it has been said here before, today, that that seems to be the way the government and other people, firms and so on, operate. Probably it would be a great drawback if this was not done. It just grieves me to see the people, who have to borrow, having to pay these high interest rates; but it seems to be the way they want to live.

I can understand, from what little I have seen of this committee, that there is a lot more to be investigated. I would certainly go along with seeing this committee carry on. There is still a great deal of work for them to do.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before this debate is adjourned—and it will be adjourned in case anyone else wishes to speak after they have had an opportunity to examine the report—I would like to make a few comments.

I think the discussion here, today, justifies the faith that I at least have in the select committees of this Legislature. I have seen a good many of them over the years and I think they do a great job. Much of the legislation which is passed through this House has arisen from the deliberations of the select committees. I can only assure the House that this committee will be reappointed.

I am interested in all the pressure for haste which is now indicated. When I think back to a time last spring when I made motions for appointing several select committees, I remember I was told that this was ridiculous, that the life of that Legislature was over, that we were going to have an election. I must say, to be completely honest, no comment came from my friends in the New Democratic group, but the hon. members opposite told me that this was ridiculous.

As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) even went so far as to itemize the cost of these committees. He said it would be a waste of money if they were appointed last spring to sit during the summer, with the possibility of an election during the summer or the fall. Well now, I am pleased to hear today's comments by the hon. members who sat on this committee. I am glad to think that good sense triumphed in those days of last spring, and that we are not just now starting to do the work which obviously needed to be done so badly. When this select committee was appointed, there were some misgivings as to how effective it could be. I think the comments which have been made here, today, illustrate the complexity of the subject.

I can assure the hon. members to draft legislation to deal with some of these problems is very difficult indeed. But because it is difficult is no reason why we should not attempt it. It may be that some of the legislation, which will be produced as a result of this interim report, may not be the most perfect legislation in the world. Nonetheless, I can assure the House that the hon. Attorney General and his staff are doing everything in their power to produce what will be workable legislation, so that it may be brought in here before this present session ends.

This was the reason I was anxious for an interim report to be brought in—in order that we could hear what the committee thought, in a formal fashion, upon which we would base legislation.

In regard to the particular question raised by the hon. member for Yorkview, I cannot tell him whether that particular piece of legislation is being examined or not. But I can tell him that, right at the moment, there is work going on in the hon. Attorney General's department to produce legislation. I have no doubt they are looking at everything in sight, because it is our intention to do what can be done.

The questions raised by the hon. member for St. George, regarding terms of reference and whether they were broad enough to permit this committee to work in conjunction with a set-up committee and perhaps the committee of the House of Commons: I really do not know what the federal government is doing in this regard. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before the session ends perhaps the chairman of the committee, along with the committee counsel, could go into the matter of what appears necessary and examine the terms of reference. If they need alteration in the latter days of this session when the motion is moved to re-establish the committee, it would pose no difficulty at all to change the terms of reference so that we can ensure that the work this committee is doing will be carried on.

I would only say once again, that I am very delighted with the work that this committee has done. I have a feeling myself that much has been done that does not need to be legislated. I think as a result of the publicity that the committee has engendered, the wide publicity these matters have received across the province, that people are reading the fine print, which before they took for granted. I think people have been brought to realize that there is a thing called interest. It can be very serious. One can be paying large amounts and not realize it. It can be hidden under various names and if nothing else perhaps this committee has served to make the borrowing public a little more sophisticated in its dealings with the lending institutions and particularly in this field of double contracts.

As the hon. member for Eglinton says, which is something I saw in my own law practice so frequently, and which is one of the reasons I was interested in having this whole topic gone into: Where a person really makes a contract to purchase something and makes another contract which has nothing to do with the original purchase, nine times out of ten, in fact, he does not know that he has entered into the second contract until he tries to redress the bad bargain he has made in the first place.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The twenty-fourth order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. R. J. Harris (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, in participating for a few minutes this afternoon in this debate, may I personally express my compliments to you for the very business-like manner in which you carry out your duties in this House.

I would also like, for just a moment, Mr. Speaker, to pay my tribute to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mackenzie). This hon. member is my seatmate, and so very many times, my wise counsellor. I think there are a few things of interest that many hon. members in this House would like to know about him.

Do hon. members know that this man in his youth attended, with his father, meetings where the founder of this country spoke—Sir John A. Macdonald? And do you know that he stopped his horse and wagon when he came down here to watch the construction of this big building, in which we are sitting today? As well as that, he joined in the festivities that took place when our soldiers returned from the Boer War. Then in World War II, he won an MC himself, and for the past 20 years he has maintained a schedule that would put any younger man to shame.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harris: I would just like to add that for the sixth time, he carried his riding, with a majority of over 6,000 votes.

My congratulations also to the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) for the very fine Budget he presented here, a few weeks ago. I am particularly impressed when I see that with a Budget of $1,304 million, over 70 per cent of this money is being employed for education, highways, health and welfare. Despite Opposition efforts to belittle this, I am convinced that they would not cut $1 from these large expenditures. I am well aware of what the hon. member for Bracondale (Mr. Gould) did say, about a week ago, that he would cut $150 million from The Department of Highways estimate, but I did not see any of his hon. colleagues nod their heads in agreement.

In spite of John Maynard Keynes' theory, which many people subscribe to, that in times of depression a government should carry out deficit financing and in good times of course, it should make large debt reductions, I would just like to say, in my humble opinion, a balanced economy is far more desirable than a balanced budget. It is to this end, namely, a truly balanced economy in Ontario, that this government is working and has worked so efficiently and so well, particularly during the past two and a half years.

In my own riding of Beaches, during the past ten years, there has been a very large turnover in population and the whole character of this area is changing. What was a predominantly Anglo-Saxon riding is now made up of a very large number of new Canadians, of Italian, German, Dutch, Polish, Ukrainian, Lithuanian, Estonian and Hungarian descent. During the past few years, I have come to know hundreds of these very fine people and when you talk to them as I do on numerous occasions, you find that they came here because of the type of government and the opportunities that are presented to them in this country and particularly the opportunities that are presented in this province of Ontario. I feel very privileged to represent these fine people and to have an opportunity to pay my respects to them through this Legislature.

During the past six weeks, several hon.

members have given us the benefit of their research into the many aspects of technological change. Many of us agree with a great deal of what has been said on all sides of the House, but to me as a member of the select committee which sat last year, the select committee on manpower training, there is just one aspect of this very vital subject that I want to bring to the attention of the government at this time. I would like to refer you to page 71 of this report, under the heading, "Research, a Neglected but Vital Need." I would just like to quote several very short paragraphs here:

The development of an educational and training system which is geared to the unfolding needs of a changing labour force can be no more than wishful thinking unless a continued programme of research is carried on. Such a programme must be designed to identify the nature of our future manpower needs, to throw light on the consequence of these needs for education and training policies, and to assess the effectiveness of various education and training activities.

Nothing has disturbed this committee more than the paucity of research which has been undertaken in this country in each of these areas. Not only do we lack sufficient information on the past and present composition of the labour force and on the future outlook in this regard, but we also have very little knowledge about the effectiveness of our existing educational and training programmes.

The deficient state of our information in these and other respects must be quickly overcome if we dare to have any hope of developing and maintaining sound programmes to prepare our labour force for the challenges of the future.

Then on pages 116 and 117 under the heading, "Forecasting Changes in the Nature and Composition of the Labour Force":

Primary consideration must be given to the development of as much information as possible on the current and future needs of the economy for trained manpower. At least two types of occupational forecast must be developed, one for the immediate future and one for the more distant outlook.

In both cases criteria must be developed for use in deciding the reliability of results which are forthcoming. In both cases as well, it will be necessary to develop sound assumptions as to the future development of the economy upon which to base the occupational forecast.

Consideration should also be given to the use of properly constructed surveys designed to determine the need which employers anticipate in future. Every effort must be made to see that all the information developed on this subject is made available to those who need it most as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the government is very much aware of this report. It has already turned several of our recommendations into legislation but I did want to bring to the government's attention the section that I just quoted. That section to me is one of the most important recommendations in the document.

Mr. Speaker, a year ago this month, I was involved, as many of you know, in a very serious motor car accident and I have no hesitation in saying that the very fast and efficient ambulance services that operated out of Peterborough were a big factor in ensuring that there was no loss of life at that time. My family and I were very fortunate, but I hate to think what might have happened if that same type of accident happened even 50 miles farther down the road. May I just quote from Dr. L. A. Caldwell, from the December 29 Financial Post? Dr. Caldwell is the chief of the Ontario Medical Association committee which was set up to study ambulance services, and he says:

We have a horse and buggy set-up in the space age. It is not only ridiculous but downright dangerous to human life and the situation is worsening rapidly.

I feel that medical men regard ambulance services as a partial medical function and they are very concerned about the minimum standards that exist across Ontario. I believe government action must be forthcoming in this vital area of service at a very early date, setting up proper regulations. If need be, subsidies should be made available to properly qualified ambulance services. In my opinion, the responsibility rests strictly with the government and I hope it does not delay this action for too long.

In his deliberations on this subject the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) might give consideration to providing a percentage of our provincial police with a properly equipped ambulance-type station wagon. I think they might tie in with the ambulance services, but I would not want to see them in any way replace the ambulance services.

Mr. Speaker, during the past few months there has been more discussion by the general public concerning hospitals and management of hospitals, in fact, every sphere of hospitals in this province, than at any time in our recent history. This, of course, is due in part to the many inquests that have gone on and for many other reasons. Those people who are charged with the responsibility of running these institutions are deeply concerned. They are mainly concerned because they fear the public will lose confidence and there is no doubt that this has already happened to a degree.

But I also feel, on the other hand, that there will be much good result from this. I say this because I feel that medical advisory boards will be able to make recommendations far better than they could have a few months ago regarding doctors' qualifications to their respective hospital boards. As well as this, the hospital administrations themselves will be trying harder than ever to do the best possible job not only to improve their public image but to improve every service that goes on in their hospitals.

In attempting to define this in a more specific manner, it seems to me that the only authority that is able to deprive doctors of the right to operate in a hospital is of course the hospital board. As I mentioned a few moments ago, the boards operate on the recommendation of their respective medical advisory committees. The boards, of course, cannot judge for themselves because they are at the discretion of the staff. There may be personality problems; there could even be economic problems when they are discussing these things.

The College of Physicians and Surgeons has no power under the present Act to restrict operating privileges for the inefficient. It is only when doctors commit crimes or some serious misdemeanor that they are able to do anything about it.

The problem from the hospital board is that it can deprive a doctor from privileges in a certain hospital. This leaves the doctor able to operate outside the hospital. Of course they cannot advise other boards because of the libel problem, and also no board should act on the decision of another board because it would not have all the facts direct.

To sum this up, possibly the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons should have power directly to prohibit doctors. After all, it licenses these doctors as surgeons and therefore it should have the power to remove them. The Act should be amended as soon as possible to give the College of Physicians and Surgeons wider authority to prohibit doctors from operating.

I am pleased to see that my two friends opposite are both in their seats—the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) and the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis). Every hon. member in this House may not know, but one is my neighbour on the west and one is my neighbour on the east—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): We have him surrounded.

Mr. Harris: In fact, when the hon. member said that, it reminded me of a remark that his hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald) made when I was speaking about a year ago in the House. He congratulated me on the speech I made at that time but he ruined everything because when I was finished he said that he was very pleased that I was able to speak but I would not be here again, or he inferred that I would not, but I am very pleased to be back again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harris: But seriously, I do want to commend both hon. gentlemen for the remarks they have made on the hospital problem during the past few weeks, because as far as I am concerned they have not gone unheeded.

Again, following the estimates of The Department of Health, the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) made many constructive suggestions. But when they referred to the articles in the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 12 to December 16, I was almost going to jump up at that time and say a word refuting some of these things as I know them.

I would just also like to say at this time that I took the opportunity, if none of the hon. members has done it, of going over to our own legislative library and putting the film in the machine they have over there. I read those articles again through the micro-filming service that is available to all of us over there—any of the hon. members who have not taken advantage of that, I suggest that they do.

Getting back to what was said at that time, I wish to refute a few of these claims as I know them at the Toronto East General Hospital. This hospital does not require registered nurses to carry dinner trays to patients at any time. Toilet cleaning and that sort of thing is the responsibility of the housekeeping department—not the nurses. It has been the policy at the East General for years to pay a differential rate to registered nurses and nurses' aides who are required to rotate during the summer months. Job frustration is not the most common reason that nurses are leaving the profession. The most common reason is marriage and pregnancy.

Nurses are not required to act as messengers in the hospital, the one exception being to go to the pharmacy for narcotic drugs. The statement that nurses carry 90 per cent of the night-shift load with extremely limited nursing supervision is a very broad statement. Most emphatically this is not the case. The students in that hospital spend one-third of their time in the hospital wards and the other two-thirds receiving instruction.

I do not deny for one moment the many statements that have been made in recent weeks about the shortage of nurses. But I do say emphatically that this situation is improving and it is far better than it was a year ago. To improve this situation further, I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) that immediately there should be set up in the larger centres across this province, properly conducted training centres where registered nurses in particular—those who have not practised for five years or more—could be retrained. By doing this I am sure that hundreds and hundreds of the more than 20,000 registered nurses who are not now working and who—there are not 20,000 on the provincial registry but there are 17,000 or 18,000, and I am certain another few thousand from other provinces are here—but they could be lured back into the service. Along with this, if they were to receive an adequate pay increase, to which I say they are entitled, all our problems would be cleared up in very short order.

I would also like to say, on this subject, Mr. Speaker, that we read almost daily about the activities of the committees for the advancement of professional nurses. They are to be commended for their activity, but I would like to point out that if one of their objectives is the right for some form of collective bargaining, every registered nurse who is a paid-up member of her own organization should have a right to vote on that question at their own convention—that is the convention of the Registered Nurses Association of Ontario—which will take place next month. Further, I would think that if they do not like the hierarchy of their own organization they should have the right to vote them out.

Many hon. members in the Opposition, during the past few weeks, have spoken of nothing being done in hospital construction and a lack of leadership in health matters. I just want hon. members to look with me for a few minutes at some of the undeniable facts in the situation.

In 1947, when this government first entered the field of capital grant assistance to hospitals, there were just over 15,000 hospital beds in Ontario. On December 31, 1963, 16 years later, that figure was increased almost three times, up to 43,669 beds. The grant at first was only $1,000 per bed. Later we raised it to $2,000 per bed. Later we raised it by including grants for certain service areas, which brought the grants to the equivalent of $3,400 per bed. Again, last summer, we raised it by 60 per cent to the equivalent of $5,500 per bed, or a third of the cost of a typical hospital bed.

As well as all this, grants to psychiatric units are $8,500 per bed. Of course, let us not forget the renovation grants, which are paid out are equal to a third of the cost of any renovation which takes place in a hospital.

At the same date in 1947, there were 4,093 graduate nurses working in hospitals. In 1963 there were 26,000. Their starting salary, back in 1947, was $1,560 to $2,100 a year. Now their salary is $4,020 per year. Of course, this is for a 40-hour week, as opposed to a 48-hour week.

As I said a few moments ago, I am not satisfied with that pay scale, but I did want to point out to hon. members what we have done and how far we have come.

Up to and including 1958 operating deficits plagued hospital boards and municipalities alike. Indeed, I can recall the city of Toronto having to provide something in excess of $1 million yearly to cover, only in part, the operating deficits of the hospitals. Then came January 1, 1959, which of course was the birth date of the Ontario Hospital Care Insurance Plan. At the very same time, of course, we saw the end of our operating deficits for hospitals. Provision was even made so that a very large part of the cost—sometimes even the whole of the cost—of the few remaining hospital indigents was met.

Capital debt outstanding on hospitals at January, 1959, has been tremendously reduced. It was $68 million, just a few short years ago, in January, 1959. Now that has been decreased to $46 million.

Those are just a few of the highlights of what has been done by this government. Mr. Speaker, these things just did not come about by chance. They were the results of the leadership given by this government—a quality recognized by the people of Ontario five times now since 1947, and recognized by everybody except a few of my friends across the way.

The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer), a few days ago, read a few more editorials about the needs of Metropolitan Toronto. This government has never denied them.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh, nonsense! The government had to be shamed into giving aid to the subway. Anything it does for Metro it has to be shamed into.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member has neglected to add that at that time, the only tangible evidence of leadership in this problem came from this government when capital grants equal to approximately one-third of the building costs were provided. The hon. member neglected to note that this is in keeping with the government's oft-expressed belief that hospital costs should be shared on a three-partnership basis.

Let us not forget that the government's insurance plan insures the costs of operating hospitals. We provide a third of the cost of construction. Remember, the cost of constructing and equipping is in the order of over $18,000 per bed. The annual cost of maintaining that bed is over $7,500. All of this cost—and I will repeat it again—comes from the insurance plan.

Leadership from this government has already brought about a recognized sufficiency of beds in Ontario except in Metro. I do not want, in any way to minimize that problem. I am sure that the Toronto Daily Star's science editor, Leonard Bertin, is doing a good job in explaining the situation in detail, and I hope that his articles will continue to stir up public opinion. Indeed, I would like to commend the Toronto Daily Star for its editorial last night, headed: "Students' beds for patients." This suggests again the possibility of emptying some nurses' residences and converting them so that patients could use them.

All these things will help to get this problem straightened out. That is why I want to commend these people for some of the remarks they have made, and also the newspapers. Personally, I believe there are now in existence, or in formation, enough public-spirited citizens in this Metropolitan area to help undertake the job of organizing, planning and establishing these hospitals to meet our needs. I do not believe the provincial government should go into the exclusive business of building and operating more hospitals.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that this government boldly stated it would provide its third of the cost of hospitals. Where does the federal government stand? Where do all the Liberal and New Democratic federal members of Parliament for Metropolitan Toronto stand on this issue?

Mr. Bryden: The federal government puts up 45 per cent.

Mr. Harris: Let them go to work and impress on their other sharing partner in Ottawa the desperate need that is faced here.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, this is the item on the order paper which permits me, as the member for Brant, to say something about the Indians in that constituency. I think that my remarks will apply equally well to the large number of Indians found in other areas of this province. They are particularly timely at this juncture, since the papers have announced that there will be a federal-provincial conference dealing with Indian affairs. It will be held in Ottawa, I understand, in May of this year.

Certainly the government, itself, has rediscovered these fine people. They sent the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts) on a tour of his northern domain and, according to the reports we have read about this tour, he was quite shocked at the conditions in which he found our Indian brothers living in that area of Ontario.

He referred to them, using such phrases as "minimal existence," "under-fed children" and "atrocious housing." It is true that the Indian population in Canada, standing at about .2 million now, is expected to approach one million at the end of this century. It has been said that there will be many more Indians living in Canada, in 20 years, than there ever were in the past.

Certainly the problems the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests was recounting to the press and public of this province about the Indians he viewed were not identical with those of the Indians of the Six Nations in Brant county. I want to spend just a moment referring to the special problems there which I feel that this government can have a hand in alleviating.

These people, of course, did not come to Canada until after the American revolution when they found that they had picked the wrong side and the King of England granted them large and valuable land holdings along the valley of the Grand River. So in every respect they are United Empire Loyalist and came here with great loyalty to the king and very little loyalty, nor even respect, to the local arms of the king's government. But they were granted tremendous tracts of land in the valley of the Grand River which they have seen fit to sell off over the years since they have taken them up. The farm that I presently work was a part of this original reservation.

But there has been a great deal of development since that time and the Indians in the Six Nations reserve are now governed by their own elected council, although there are a large number of the Indian bands who do not take part in this election and they feel they owe loyalty to the Queen herself and look to her for direct government.

The council itself looks after the affairs of the reserve much as the council of any municipality would do. I know that any hon. member of this House, particularly those who have had experience in municipal affairs, would be interested to travel to Ohsweken, the centre of the reserve, and see this council in action. They would find it most effective in governing their own affairs.

The only peculiar circumstance is that the Queen's representative, the Indian agent, sits right up beside the Chief of the Council and has considerable jurisdiction over the decisions that are arrived at.

But as the hon. members of this House know the affairs of the Indians are governed by The Indian Act, a federal statute which has been described in many ways, but in my view is over-paternal, in many ways oppressive and tends to blanket the initiative of these people. The present government in Ottawa has seen fit to introduce legislation that will bring into being an Indian Claims Commission before which the Indians on the reserve in Brant riding and any other band throughout the province or throughout Canada, may appear to state their grievances, whether they are long standing or of more recent beginning.

This Indian Claims Commission is well set up, in my view, because it specifically states that the ordinary rules of evidence will not apply so that members of the Indian band may come before the court and state in their own words, without documentary evidence of any type if that is the circumstance, what their claims are. I feel that every effort will be made to see that the Indians are satisfied after these many years.

There are many ways in which the provincial government can take part in these discussions and see to it that some of the grievances of the Indian people are looked after even before they approach the claims commission.

The first one I want to refer to is the need for roads, not only in the reservation in Brant country, but in the other areas of the province. Certainly many of the hon. members who have been present for a number of sessions have heard this discussed in the past, and they will be pleased to know that the Indian road that was discussed, I guess for the last eight years, has now been built on the Six Nations reserve near Brantford. It was built by the co-operation of this government with the federal government and it now is possible to drive on a very good paved highway from one end of the reserve to the other. I feel that the Indians are aware of the advantages of this and will make good use of the road.

I would also like to point out to the hon. members opposite that this does not mean, of course, that their highway demands are satisfied for all time—

Mr. J. M. Gould (Bracondale): Get around to that 150.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly I am sure that my hon. colleague from Bracondale would in no sense stand in the way of highways development for the Indians, even though the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) may be looking for an excuse to do so.

I regret that the hon. Prime Minister is not in his place because he and I share some of the responsibilities for the representation of the reserve. I think there is one concession of the Six Nations Reserve that lies in his constituency, but he knows as well as I that the Indian reserve in Brant county is divided by the Grand River and there is no way, unless we count crossing of the ice in the winter, whereby the Indians can get from one side of the reserve to the other without driving about 30 miles. This means that farming operations are simply impossible unless the equipment is duplicated.

Certainly the road that the people up there are so proud of should very well be extended as soon as it is at all possible to the Grand River and be completed with a bridge to the other side. There will certainly be tremendous advantages here as far as tourism is concerned, as well, and I may refer to it under one of the estimates later. But the improvement of the roads and the building of the bridge is certainly of first priority.

Unfortunately I am scaring almost all of the hon. members of the government away.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Touché, touché!

Mr. Nixon: I wanted particularly to bring to the attention of the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) that there are still some difficulties on the reserve in Brant county, and I understand that it extends into other jurisdictions as well, over the responsibility for law enforcement.

We have a detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the reserve, they are well equipped with radio cars and so on, but under some circumstances it is required that the Ontario Provincial Police be called in. I have heard of some emergencies in which a call has gone to one jurisdiction and it has been pointed out that really it is the other boys who are responsible, and I feel that much can be done to do away with confusion.

I am aware of the fact that there was sort of an informal conference on this, but I am not aware that any definite decisions arose from the conference. Certainly in the minds of the Indian people themselves there is a great deal of confusion as to who is responsible for law enforcement. They are very much in favour of the jurisdiction being left with the Mounted Police detachment and they feel that this detachment should have jurisdiction over their whole reserve.

Along these same lines, there has never been any reasonable fire protection in the reserve on the banks of the Grand. This is a very serious hazard as far as the people there are concerned. I think I have a clear memory of the drought period last fall when many of the fields which are not under intensive cultivation in the reserve and tend to grow up in quite a lot of dry, weedy material were a very serious fire hazard indeed. I feel that the hon. Attorney General if he is made aware of my remarks, might do well to instruct the fire marshal to look into this difficulty and see to it that steps are taken to provide even minimal fire protection for this large area.

Just a week ago there was an account in the local newspaper about farm buildings being destroyed there and it ended by saying there is no fire protection of any type and the buildings burned to the ground.

Now there has been a considerable amount of discussion about the possible integration of the Indian community with the rest of the community of Canada and of Ontario. I do want to say that some considerable steps have been taken along these lines, particularly as far as education is concerned. Those Indian students who have gone past the elementary school into high school from the Six Nations Reserve move out into the high schools in the Brantford area, and I believe they also attend Dunnville or Hagersville, and there is a considerable amount of integration there. I think the Indians in the grade school at the Muncey Reserve have been integrated to a great extent in the London area and certainly this is an advantage to all concerned. Not only do the Indian students and young children have an opportunity to mix with other students, but the students in the regular schools have an opportunity to meet with the Indians and have some idea of the cultural heritage that they bear.

There is a tremendous responsibility, I think, on the part of the provincial government to see to it that steps are taken to encourage this as far as possible. Of course it must be borne in mind that the Indians themselves are very conscious of their heritage and the fact that it can be best handed on through a control of their own school system, particularly in the lower grade level. I would never advocate anything that would do away with this responsibility that the Indians hold so closely to themselves and consider so important.

Unfortunately, there is a tendency in the Indian school population to leave at probably the entrance level and not bother with the difficulties that are bound up with the extension of their education into the secondary level. I think that the statistics show that school leaving or school drop-out among the Indian population is considerably higher than the average across the province. Because of this, there are at least two things that the government should undertake, to continue some form of education for these young people who leave the regular school system and take up some farm work or some other work around the reserve, or just off the reserve.

I think particularly of the importance of the recreation commissions that should be established in the reserves. I think this would apply in the northern areas as well, where the Indians are well known for their athletic ability and many of them are well known in the historic annals of athletics. You have all heard, no doubt, of Tom Longboat, who was an internationally known athlete. Certainly those of us who live in an area where there are many Indians know of their abilities and the fact that they always establish winning teams in hockey, baseball and so on. The recreation commission then, would be of great benefit under these special circumstances where so many of the young people are not attending school on a regular basis.

As well as this, the community programmes branch of The Department of Education has already instituted some programmes on our local reserve, but it seems to me that a local commission that would have the responsibility of fostering many more of these community activities would be most valuable under these circumstances.

As a matter of fact, I believe it was mentioned in the House last year, that an example was set in Manitoba by establishing a development officer, who should be an Indian if at all possible, and I am sure this is possible because there are large numbers of Indians who are well educated and willing to work with their own people. A development officer could be established on these reserves. His responsibility would extend not only for the development of certain handicraft industries and other tourist developments, but also along the lines of education that I have described.

I think that the attitude of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forest is an excellent one, as it has been reported in his comments to the press, certainly. As we head for a federal-provincial conference dealing with these matters, I hope he will take to himself the responsibility of at least representing the government at such a conference. I think he is in a position to know the problems of the Indian community and I feel that he is also of a mind to represent them well before such a commission. There is a very real need here and I know that he realizes this need most effectively. The affairs of the Indians are really in his hands in this connection. I am sure he is aware of this responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to comment briefly on the way the committee system in this House has changed during this present session. I would suggest to you, sir, that the changes which have been described by the hon. Prime Minister as really a modern innovation, are an innovation that is in no way irreversible and I would also suggest to you, sir, that the committee system could be made much more effective if some further changes were introduced.

I think particularly of the standing committees that have been meeting during this session. There are many of them that have not yet met, and the fact is that it is a serious lack in the ordering of the affairs of our work here in the Legislature that they are not meeting on a regular and established basis.

It appears that the leadership of the House has decided that the committees will deal with legislation only. There are a few exceptions to this. I think of the committee on commissions, chaired by my friend, the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Harris), where we do have an opportunity to delve into the workings of the various government commissions. I also think of what has happened to the education committee that has been diluted with health and welfare, themselves extremely important topics. The committee of course has not met. It will meet as a result of action taken this afternoon, in giving second reading to some bills on education. I feel there is a much greater responsibility and a much greater service that could be offered by these committees if they were established on a regular basis with a known routine.

I do not want to praise the hon. members opposite unduly, but I think of the first few weeks that I spent in this House following the byelection early in 1962, when the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) was chairman of the committee. We had an opportunity not only to discuss legislation, but we met on a regular basis, got on quite a reasonable basis of familiarity with the officials of the department, and were able to question them personally on developments in education at that time.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the membership of the committee, be it education or any other, were established on a basis that would carry over from one session to the next, that by the time four years had elapsed, we would have more than a superficial knowledge of the working of a department. or more than that, an area of responsibility. Under the present set-up, I say to you that this is entirely impossible. Even the questioning having to do with the legislation that is brought before the committee tends to be superficial. It is the modern innovation that the hon. Prime Minister has referred to, that all questions, even of the most minute detailed character are brought before this House and in his view, and I submit in the view of many others, that is perhaps the way it should be done. But I think that the fact that the committee system is falling into disuse is a very serious thing indeed and I hope that the leadership of the House will take some steps to counteract it.

I believe that these committees, and I think particularly of the committee on education, could be established on more than a standing basis. I do not want to be recorded as favouring the multiplicity of select committees, but there is no doubt that the extension of the membership of this House to 108, and the fact that the hon. Prime Minister himself must feel the pressure to keep some of his noisier supporters busy at something, would indicate that surely here is an area where the hon. members of the House—including the hon. members of the Opposition, and I would include myself in this—could develop more than what must be described as a superficial knowledge of the working of these various departments.

Even the committee of supply, which concerns so many of our hours these days, has changed considerably, I suppose in the time of many of the hon. members here, to the point where it is very poorly attended. It sits long hours and the various hon. Ministers are subjected, as I suppose they should be, to the very closest and most minute investigation of details of their department. I know that it has already been stated in this House that the very fact that the hon. Ministers' advisers are brought into this chamber and sit at a table before him, where in fact they are unable to take part in the discussion, but must poke notes at the hon. Minister and whisper advice to him as he consults them, does not lead to an increase in the dignity of the proceedings here in any way. We see the variety of government advisers sitting white-lipped and trembling as they are endeavouring to find the answers to all of these problems. When the hon. member for Nipissing posed some questions, as a matter of fact I think twice in the last few weeks, we found that the House had to adjourn until this policy could be straightened out.

It seems to me that if these standing committees were doing their job effectively, if they were permitted to do their job effectively much of this questioning could be done with the appropriate officials of the department present so that they could speak for themselves. This would have a further advantage in that we as members would not have to ask around and say, "Who are the distinguished-looking gentlemen sitting at the table at the present time? Is that the deputy Minister?" and so on. We would know who these people were, we would hear them in action, and I think that our respect for the advisers to the hon. Ministers would be increased considerably.

But more than this, it has been pointed out in this House on many occasions already in this session, and I know that it will be brought to the attention of the hon. members even further, that as the government takes more and more power unto itself, as business gets bigger, organized labour gets bigger, and the number of government commissions and boards which are handing down bureaucratic decisions increase, it is becoming more and more difficult for the individual citizens of this province to be assured of their freedom. It is certainly the responsibility of this House to see to it that proper curbs are put on the expansion of the erosion of this individual freedom and I feel that the committee system in this House might be developed for this very purpose.

We have heard much in this House and we have read much in the press about the possibility that the Legislature might appoint an Ombudsman who would take as his special responsibility the protection of the individual freedoms of the citizens of the province. And if this were to come about it might be a good idea. The hon. member for St. George (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) might be a good appointment. There may be a time in the future when he will be searching around for some activity other than political activity and his ability to shake up the bureaucrats in any level of government is well known.

But all of us have acted as a form of ombudsmen when we have phoned the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board on behalf of an individual, when we have approached the various government departments to assist in the correction of some decision that perhaps has been somewhat unthinking or lost in the bureaucratic maze, so that the individual feels at least that he has suffered a loss of his freedom.

It may be an Ombudsman would be the solution to this problem, but certainly it is also possible that a revamped committee system of this Legislature might well provide the machinery whereby individuals could appeal to this House as of the highest court in the province. We could think of the labour committee, acting on behalf of the Workmen's Compensation Board. There are many other circumstances whereby individuals could appeal to a committee which would be representative of this House and would have the constitution enabling it to meet even when the House itself is not in session. But certainly it is apparent not only to the hon. members of this House but to the citizens across this province that there is a gap and an ever-widening gap between the individual citizen and those in authority in government.

Legal aid itself, which is under discussion by another committee, perhaps meeting in this building at the present time, will have much to do with closing this gap if it is properly implemented on a workable basis. The situation demands attention and I am quite sure that the government realizes this and is looking into it carefully and will take some steps whereby the individual liberties that we treasure so highly in this system will be guaranteed.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): May I ask the hon. member a question? In those final remarks, I wonder if the hon. member, in thinking about this problem, had ever considered the position of the private member in this House and how his position is whittled away by continual charges of patronage when he is serving that purpose, as every hon. member must do, of—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): This is not a question, it is an argument.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not like—

Mr. Bryden: I would just like to see the hon. Prime Minister respect the rules, that is all.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Prime Minister has asked me if I thought that continued insinuations as to patronage would erode the ability of the private member to act—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: To look after the people in his—

Mr. Nixon: I will look after that. Mr. Speaker, I would say that the private member has a very special position in that he has the responsibility to act for the individuals that come to him. And if there is ever any indication when the private member approaches any government department that he is not favoured because he is approaching as a representative of the wrong party, I have never personally been exposed to this. The patronage that the hon. Prime Minister has brought into this debate at the present time is something that he knows far more about than any other hon. member in this House. And if there has been any erosion of the ability of a private member from any part of the House in approaching any civil servant, then this erosion would surely lie with the government that he heads and those that have gone before.

I would certainly say that it has been said in other jurisdictions when the possibility of the naming of an Ombudsman has been brought before a Legislature that the leader of the House has said that the House is full of ombudsmen. Every individual hon. member is able to act in that capacity. And I think there is a great deal of truth in this.

Nevertheless, when the hon. Prime Minister refers to patronage there is also the suspicion that has been brought out by hon. members not sitting too far from the hon. Prime Minister himself, that when we do speak for our constituents we are doing so for political purposes only. So the sword is two-edged and we have been exposed to this.

If the hon. Prime Minister feels that our ability to approach the various departments of government has been eroded, then this is certainly another good reason for the appointment of an Ombudsman, or a man with the authority similar to that of the provincial auditor who is independent and has special powers to approach the various government departments. This is another argument in favour of such an appointment.

I feel that if the leadership of the House were to look carefully into the committee system, it would be quite possible to develop something whereby the hon. members of this House could make their services more generally available to the citizens of the province over a continuing period, even extending beyond the session of the House itself. In this way we would become expert in work with various government departments, we would have the ability to keep a probing eye and a careful eye on the workings of these departments, and we would also provide a channel whereby individual citizens would have their liberty safeguarded.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, there was some confusion as to the speaking order of priority on the Budget list and I appreciate the willingness of both the Whip of the government party and the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson), who was involved in the slight confusion, in allowing me to speak at this time. I appreciate it, Mr. Speaker, because the remarks I want to make relate directly to the very forthright and excellent statement made by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) to the House at the opening of the session.

I do not wish to over-belabour the publicity given to the hate-literature problem in the province of Ontario and in this country. I was most pleased, as every hon. member of this House must have been, to hear the hon. Prime Minister enunciate that the government was deeply concerned, that it would not tolerate such activity, that it would bring the so-called lunatic fringe to justice, and that it cannot discount the seriousness of the problem. His reference to the federal-provincial conference discussing the matter is exceedingly heartening.

I, too, Mr. Speaker, recognize the difficult sensitivity of the subject where it regards civil liberties. I would like to read into the record a statement on the position of the Canadian Jewish Congress, which they released on March 9, 1964 and which I recently came across. It is as follows:

We welcome the statements by public leaders, the columns and editorials which have stated this position in recent weeks, stated it eloquently and forcefully.

That is the position of the hon. Prime Minister. I continue:

We hope that more such statements will be forthcoming to reinforce and underscore the fervent wish, of Canadians of all religions and origins, that there shall be an end to this dissemination of hatred, this incitement to violence and disorder.

Mr. Speaker, I want to enter this field briefly for the following three reasons, and I beg the indulgence of the hon. members of the House.

One: Because my riding of Scarborough West has been subjected to the dissemination of the material.

Two: Because I frankly feel, and I hope this is not an offence to any individual member, that the hon. members of this House do not realize the nature and extent of the hate-literature campaign.

Three: Because it is totally different from anything which has ever been distributed in this country heretofore. Before, one was subjected to a certain degree of subtle and sophisticated, if you will, anti-Semitism and race hatred. But now it is much more truculent, open, brutal and crude. I think the best way to convey that, Mr. Speaker, is to inform the hon. members of the record over the last several month. I think, perhaps, chronologically will do it.

On March 31, 1963, there appeared an advertisement in the classified section of the Toronto Globe and Mail. It read as follows:

Nazi propaganda leaflets. An interesting and unusual hobby. Free sample. Write PO Box 431, Scarborough.

Subsequent to that there was a campaign of swastika-smearing on a large number of synagogues in the Metropolitan Toronto area. It lasted over the summer of 1963.

Then, Mr. Speaker, came the series of leaflet distributions which, I think, would be of interest to the hon. members of this House.

First, on July 2, anti-Semitic neo-Nazi tracts were distributed outside Massey Hall when Martin Luther King came to address a meeting on Negro emancipation in the United States.

Second, at the end of the month of July, copies of Common Sense, a newspaper, were distributed at a supermarket in the Dufferin-Glencairn plaza area. Common Sense, for the information of the hon. members of this House, has a circulation of 91,000 throughout Canada and the United States every two weeks. As the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) mentioned earlier—I do not intend to read all of this material into the record—it is an affront to human decency and to human dignity. But I think hon. members should be aware of some of its nature. "Three Per Cent Control 97 Per Cent" is the headline of this issue.

"Zionist War Crimes—"

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member say where it is published?

Mr. S. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall come to that. Common Sense is published in Union, New Jersey, in the United States, by Conde McGinley—a man who is associated with the National States Rights Party—under the banner, "America's newspaper against Communism". It is a paper slanted strongly against the Negro movement and, of course, is anti-Semitic in content.

It has been received by members of various communities, particularly the Jewish communities in Toronto, in Vancouver, and in Montreal, over the last seven or eight months.

Again at the end of July, 1963, a dossier of literature was received by a prominent citizen in this community. It was called "Crusading Literature," and I want to name some of the pamphlets on this list which, it is suggested, should be spread throughout the community: "Jews boast Christ impostor"; "The Jews and their lies"; "Rulers of Russia"; "Mental robots: exposing the materialistic and communistic mental health conspiracy"; "Campaign against Christian prayers"; "Nine men against America—exposing background of Supreme Court membership". This gives the spectrum of neo-Nazi mentality and where it is aimed. Let me continue: "Quarantined by the anti-Christ"; "Seven reasons for abolishing the United Nations"; "There goes the Middle East—exposing the Zionist conspiracy". Such is the nature of that literature.

In October, 1963, Mr. Speaker, a packet of literature was received by a citizen in the city of Toronto suggesting dissemination of the contents throughout the city. Subsequently, material from this packet was distributed to large numbers of people, particularly in the Jewish community throughout the city and I think it is instructive to know what this packet contained. The first item was a little blurb put out by the Christian Educational Association, Union, New Jersey, USA. It read:

Christians, for heaven's sakes wake up! Know your enemy! Know how it operates the invisible government in the United States of America and also in Canada!

Then came supposed quotes from reputable American periodicals indicting all so-called liberal and progressive movements. There followed similar quotes from British publications.

Then in a little pamphlet called "All communists of the world unite", it lists individual periodicals—of which there are some 28 propagating, in a circulation of tens of thousands, precisely this kind of hate-material throughout the United States and Canada. I think it was this kind of thing to which the hon. Prime Minister made reference when he said earlier that the problem has become Canada-wide and that it has accelerated in volume.

In the same kit comes a heading on a leaflet, "Jewish threat to freedom", put out by the National Socialist Movement in the United Kingdom. I want to read you two short portions of it:

Defend your heritage against this Jewish threat! Support the Nationalist Socialist Movement in its fight for the liberation of our country from Jewish control, the exclusion of coloured immigrants and the establishment of a new and greater Britain for the British.

Continuing on, the White Canadian "Youth Corps", led by a certain young man named David Stanley, according to newspaper reports is associated with similar violent and abusive neo-Nazi sentiments, including a disciplinary apparatus modelled on the National Socialist Movement during the Weimar republic and Hitler's Reich. Its publication ends with this paragraph:

It is now up to us, the national youth of Europe and America, to build anew that way of life that millions died to protect. We, the new generations of Nordic youth, will continue the fight for race and nation which began in National Socialist Germany. Only when victory is finally ours and the destiny of Europe again lies in the hands of her peoples, will we rest.

And finally, the most sordid of all: from the American Nazi Party in Arlington, Virginia, pictures embodying the swastika movement and the young men who have joined.

Perhaps the most horrifying document of all has received very wide circulation through buildings in Scarborough and elsewhere in this city, and has also received circulation in Montreal. It is called "Eichmann Speaks", and I simply say, Mr. Speaker, with some effort at restraint and dignity, that this is a combination of necrophilia, homosexuality, sadism and masochism such as is very infrequently put on public exposition. It embodies a degree of sexual and mental perversion which is horrifying to any reader. I table it for the hon. members of this House because I think it instructive to know that this is the kind of literature that is going through the mails of large sections of the community. The packet further includes the programme of the American Nazi Party, membership forms, social and economic policy, and finally cartoon brochures of the history of America and a cartoon showing history embodied in the hands of one of the most atrocious Nazi caricatures of the stereotyped Jewish human being, with the State of Israel flag in one hand, and the United Nations flag in the other and the hammer and sickle hanging above.

And so it continues.

On October 20, in St. Catharines, began the distribution of yet another piece of literature which has horrified all responsible community elements. A tiny little piece: "The falsehood about the six million Jews said to be gassed by Hitler exposed". Again the combination of crudity, brutality and sexual perversion.

In early November, to several prominent rabbis in the city of Toronto, to the Canadian Jewish Congress, to the Canadian Mental Health Association, to the YMCA, and to the B'Nai B'rith Youth organization there were sent several leaflets of a new pattern. They purported to be quotes from, again, eminently respectable writers. One of them taking a quote from a book by Maurice Samuel; another one, entitled, "Special Bulletin", under "World Service", with the heading "Communism is Jewish", and at the bottom: "Christians unite, boycott Jewish filth, Nazism is dead but Communism lives, fight Communism or die a slave."

Then from a right-wing Fascist extreme group in Sweden, a similar document: "No gas chambers", purporting to deny the fact that during the Second World War such atrocities were committed.

Subsequent to that, Mr. Speaker, a series of magazines and periodicals, Canadian and American in origin, appeared with precisely the same kind of content. "The White Sentinel" from the United States; "Six Million Jews" from Alberta; "The Patriotic Educational" material from the United States; "The Winrod Letter" on mysterious Jew power from Alberta; "The Voice of Freedom" published by the Mutual Co-operation League of Canada, which some members may be familiar with because of its Toronto editing; and "The Storm Trooper", with the most ghastly pictures on the cover and accounts within this publication, an exceedingly expensive publication, let it be said, of the American Nazi Party in the United States.

In early November, 1963, there floated down from buildings in Scarborough and were left in apartments throughout the Metropolitan Toronto community, slips of paper roughly four by six inches in size, declaring: "Hitler was right, Communism is Jewish". It was followed at the end of November by another special bulletin: "White Men Awake". Again the same thing, Communism is Jewish and this time attributing the Kennedy assassination to Jews.

On Friday, December 20, there was found in an apartment at 600 Eglinton Avenue West, near Bathurst Street, a publication called "The Magazine of the Century—The Cross and the Flag" with a distribution of over 25,000 copies monthly—the National States Rights Party of the United States headed by Gerald K. Smith. Again the same tripe and the same filth.

In 1964, as every hon. member of this House is aware, the campaign was stepped up. Material was sent to students at Loyola, McGill and Sir George Williams College in Montreal. It included hate letters that were published on the front page of the Toronto Telegram from the National White American party. It contained caricatures of so-called Jewish leaders through the Soviet years, reminiscent of Nazi cartoons in the period of the 1930s and the 1940s. And again of very wide distribution to individuals and groups of particular racial and religious origins.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to make these points to the House and I think it need not be overstated. There is something profoundly wrong with a society where the definition of immorality is primarily sexual in content. We prosecute with some relish the Fanny Hills and the Lady Chatterley's lovers and note, at times with relish, certain untoward contacts of visiting dignitaries. But the true moral degradation of the society, the true obscenity, the deplorable depths to which human minds are capable of plunging, somehow escape the public discussion, the public notice and the legal jurisdiction.

It is therefore with particular pleasure that we accept the statement read by the hon. Prime Minister. Any emphasis which hopes to remove discrimination on the basis of race, creed and colour, is what is so important and which touches the very soul of the Canadian cultural fabric.

I agree with the hon. Prime Minister of Ontario that we deal with a perverted, lunatic fringe. I remember that Sinclair Lewis in the 1930s wrote a novel, "It Can't Happen Here", and being a person who believes profoundly in the social democratic process I am convinced that is true. But this kind of microcosm of malice feeds on itself and multiplies, and what is anti-Semitism today becomes anti-Negro tomorrow and anti-Catholicism the next day and anti-Christianity in the total thereafter.

It is worth remembering that the few thousands of people who managed somehow to survive the Hitlerian apocalypse are only too conscious of the fact that it might happen here. So it is important that all the provincial Premiers right across the country pursue at the federal-provincial conference, the efforts to amend the Criminal Code which would give it the substantive quality necessary to bring these people within the ken of legal jurisdiction. It has been suggested that there should be an addition to section 166 of the Criminal Code which would prohibit incitement of violence against groups or members of groups as well as individuals and that a new clause should be added to section 62 of the Criminal Code which would deal with the spreading of false information.

Indeed, I thought to myself that for the purposes of educating human beings in this society subjected to this kind of thing and often impressionable, that the hon. Prime Minister's very worthy statement today might well be published in several newspapers right across the province above his signature. I suspect that nothing would make quite as great an impact and spread so wide a degree of sanity as perhaps that individual act, at this particular stage.

Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing with an isolated phenomena. I want to say to the hon. members of this House, with every ounce of conviction in my body, that I was emotionally staggered to find the material and to wade through it. I urge on the hon. members of the House an awareness of it and a willingness to deal with it.

If the hon. Prime Minister will allow me, I wish to adjourn the debate. I have a few very short comments to follow.

Mr. S. Lewis moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go on with the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions when we return at 8 o'clock. We have a night session tonight.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1964

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Clerk of the House: The 49th order; House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Johnston in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF REFORM INSTITUTIONS

On vote 2001:

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, I have the honour of presenting the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions.

May I at the outset, express my apologies to the hon. members of the House for not having had before them the annual report of the department before today. I had originally planned on getting it on their desks three or four days ahead of my estimates, but it just did not work out that way. I hope, with more experience, the next time I am presenting these reports there will be ample notice given.

In seeking the approval of an expenditure of some $20 million of taxpayers' money, I am conscious of the need to justify this expenditure—and to convince this assembly that its manner of spending is both well considered and beneficial to this province.

In this new House there are many hon. members who may not be familiar with the many facets and the multitude of duties of this department, so I propose to outline and explain the facilities, services and varied operations that are needed to fulfill our obligations. I propose also to indicate the general lines of policy we intend to follow over the next twelve months.

I say to indicate because I do not feel, at this stage, that I should try to present a detailed blueprint of future progress. In thus reminding hon. members of my comparatively short term as Minister of this department, I am not creating an alibi in advance, because I hope I shall not need one. I mention it to emphasize the complexity of the problems inherent in a department dealing with people—men, women and children—usually with deviant behaviour patterns.

General: If the psychiatrist, after 20 years of study, experience and practice can say: "How little we really know about the problems of human behaviour", then I know this House will not expect me to present a detailed blueprint after only a few short months of experience in this office. However, I am not seeking to evade decisions. There are areas in which I intend to be specific. These are the areas affected by my personal attitudes, outlook and opinions, as well as the views of many of my very capable staff.

I believe that penology must progress towards more effective rehabilitation. We must have more and more basic research, and more and more public acceptance of an enlightened policy based on this research. I do not know, nor does anyone know, if society will ever treat its offenders without resorting to custody as we know it today. What I do know is that, in this day and age, society is committed to a policy of custody, which it is our duty to carry out. And I further know that within the institutions controlled by this department, all those committed to our care will constantly be treated with the respect and dignity due to one's fellow men, regardless of the position in which they find themselves.

I need hardly, at this stage, remind this House of the strong humanitarian principles held by my predecessors. In passing, I pay tribute to them for their approach to the difficult problems to which they also applied themselves.

I am pleased and indeed proud to inform hon. members that wherever I have visited our institutions and talked with staff and inmates, the practice of the humanitarian principles is very evident, and I can assure this House that each and every inmate of our Ontario reform institutions will continue to be treated with such respect and feeling as we hope will lead towards his regaining his self respect, his respect for his fellow men and his own personal dignity and place in society.

At this point I should also report that in my discussions with staff I was surprised to find no antagonism existed between custodial and treatment staff. From my experience in this House, and from readings in the subject, I had expected that there would be at least some tensions, created by differences in philosophy, between them. However, I was pleased to find that, if there are certain inevitable differences in stress on certain aspects, this does not prevent full co-operation, a state of affairs which I think speaks very well for the direction given by my very able deputy Minister, Mr. J. A. Graham, and others of the staff.

Fauteux Report: Hon. members will forgive me if I take longer with my comments than I would normally like, but I remember sitting in this House, listening to the debate on this department's estimates and hearing many references to the Archambault, Fauteux and Stewart reports, and it appeared, at least to me, at those times, that those making these references were under the impression that everyone knew something about these reports. As the hon. members may be hearing such references during the debate on these estimates, I am going to take the liberty of giving some background information on these reports, in the hope that it will help hon. members follow discussions with greater interest.

In reading the history of penal reform in this country, with a special reference to the conditions of the '30s which led to the establishment of a Royal commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Archambault of Quebec, a great deal of credit is obviously due to the late Miss Agnes McPhail. She played a very important part in bringing to the attention of the public and legislators to the need for reform in this field, and I would like at the outset to pay great tribute to her memory for the work she did in this respect.

The Archambault committee tabled its report in 1938, making sweeping recommendations which covered the varied aspects of the correctional process: probation, treatment and parole. As a result of the outbreak of World War II, little was done, however, to implement the commission's recommendations. In 1953 the Fauteux committee was set up to examine the practices and procedures of the remission service. This implied a wide field and so a comprehensive review of the prison system of Canada was carried out.

Although the Fauteux report did not undertake as exhaustive a survey as did the Archambault, it was obvious, early in the investigations, that many of the deficiencies previously noted still existed, and in consequence many of the Fauteux recommendations would be confirmations of the Archambault commission.

The intent of the committee then was to prepare a document which had a good chance of being translated into action within a period of ten years. One such recommendation was the establishment of the National Parole Board, and this has now been in operation since 1959.

A great deal of progress has been made in the field of corrections in Canada since the publication of the Fauteux committee report. Much of the credit for this is due, in my view, to the Honourable Davie Fulton who, as Minister of Justice, was most active in pursuing a modernization programme for federal institutions and also inspired workers in the correctional field throughout the country.

All offenders in Canada who receive sentences of less than two years are the responsibility of the province in which they are sentenced. Hence the sentence, "Two years less a day". Those receiving sentences of two years and over are the responsibility of the federal authorities. Thus all offenders in Canada receiving longer sentences are under the same jurisdiction, while all offenders receiving less are under many different jurisdictions. I would ask hon. members to keep this last fact in mind. I repeat: All offenders receiving longer sentences are under the same jurisdiction, while all offenders receiving less are under many different jurisdictions—that is, the ten provinces.

In view of the varied standards of treatment services under different jurisdictions, one recommendation of both the Fauteux and Archambault committees was that the federal government should assume the responsibility for the care and treatment of all persons committed for a period longer than six months, instead of the present minimum two-year period.

This is the next move on which we are awaiting action by the federal government. The government of the province of Ontario is already committed to a programme of joint action with the federal government in the implementation of the basic recommendations of the Fauteux report as a result of an Act passed in this Legislature in 1959.

This is the position at the moment, and I would hope that the federal government will move as rapidly as possible towards the implementation of these recommendations, so that the provincial jurisdiction may plan, with some certainty, their future programmes. In saying this I would not want to leave the impression that this is, by any means, a simple matter, and that I am unmindful of the difficulties to be met by the federal authorities before this programme can be instituted.

The committee set up in 1953 by this Legislature, under the chairmanship of Mr. W. J. Stewart, was to study and report upon problems of delinquent individuals and custodial questions, as they affected Ontario. A great number of useful recommendations were made, most of which have been put into effect. Others have been carried out with appropriate modifications.

Department organization: The Department of Reform Institutions is therefore responsible for the custody, training and rehabilitation of all men and women sentenced by the courts of the province to terms of under two years for any single offence. The department is also responsible for the operation of the Ontario Training Schools for juveniles and for supervising the private training schools, also for juveniles. We are also responsible for the supervision of the city and county jails.

In the adult field, with which I propose to deal first, we have a number of institutions of varied types, with many different treatment and training programmes. These I will detail when I describe the classification programme. But to give hon. members some idea of the extent of our operation here are a few general facts.

The total staff of the department is almost 2,500. The average population of our adult institutions is 3,000 males and 142 females. We have five reformatories, five industrial farms, two training centres, four clinics, three forestry camps, eight district jails, one women's guidance centre and one women's treatment centre. In addition, the department is supervising 1,105 men and women who are on parole to our rehabilitation officers.

It is in this variety of institutions, which enable us to carry out our detailed classification programme, that the strength of the department lies.

Classification: Because I believe that classification and segregation are of great importance in our rehabilitation programme, I will describe our methods in greater detail than other aspects of our work. But, before I do so, I should explain why we need to classify and segregate.

Although scientific knowledge of detailed treatment methods and their individual effectiveness is still far from complete, experience has shown that inmates fall into many different groups, with many different attitudes and problems. The greater the variety and the more individual and personal the treatment programme, the greater we feel is its chance of success.

We know also that our chances of success are greater when we select those with a higher degree of motivation and transfer them to smaller institutions with a specialist staff trained in dealing with their particular problems. In this way the intractable offender and the troublemaker is prevented from interfering with the treatment and progress of the person who has every chance of benefiting from an intensive programme.

While treatment is, in general, more effective under reduced security conditions, we obviously must not reduce security below such commonsense levels as experience dictates with particular types of offenders. We must have degrees of segregation, not only within the department as a whole, but within individual institutions, so that the inevitable intermingling of offenders causes as little harm to individuals as possible.

It would be absurd, unless one had completely solitary confinement, not to expect a certain amount of bad influence to be exercised, but one can also expect the reverse. There is no reason why those who are better inmates might not be exerting a beneficial influence on the less responsible type.

Wherever possible, at each stage of the classification process I will give the following information: the reason for this particular stage; the basis of classification; the staff involved; the characteristics of selection; and the change of location, or programme resulting from this stage.

First stage: The initial stage in the classification programme is when inmates are transferred from the jail to the reformatory—ensuring that the older, more experienced criminal does not mingle with the younger element—making necessary security allocations; and, where possible, transferring a man to an institution which will enable his family and friends to visit him with the minimum of inconvenience.

Factors considered in this stage are: age; sex; type of crime; criminal record; length of sentence; previous institutional history; and, where applicable, recommendations from the courts. This stage is carried out in head office by the chief inspector and his staff with consultation where necessary with the chief psychologist, the executive assistant to the deputy Minister, in some instances recommendations from superintendents, and under certain circumstances final approval by the deputy Minister.

In order to give some idea of our general basis of classification and segregation I will detail the institutions to which offenders are initially classified from head office, and the type of offender sent there.

Adult male institutions: First I will describe those appropriate to males. Guelph is a reformatory with accommodation for 860 and takes all first offenders, and those under 20 years of age, living in the south of the province.

Elliot Lake is a reformatory with accommodation for 52, and takes, as far as its capacity permits, a similar classification; that is, all first offenders, and those under 20 years of age, from northern Ontario.

Mimico, a reformatory, has accommodation for 352 and takes recidivists with sentences of six months or less, with special emphasis on alcoholics and those from the Toronto area.

Burwash industrial farm, with accommodation for 790 in its three camps, takes recidivists over 20 years of age, sir, usually with sentences of 12 months or more.

The four industrial farms, at Burritt's Rapids, Burtch, Fort William, and Monteith, with accommodation varying from 90 to 240, take recidivists over the age of 20 with short-term definite sentence under 12 months.

Finally, in this initial classification programme we have Millbrook, our maximum security reformatory, with accommodation for 250, taking three main groups: (1) behaviour problems, including arsonists; (2) sex deviates; (3) drug addicts. All direct transfers to this institution must be authorized by the deputy Minister who makes his decision based on recommendations from the chief inspector, the chief psychologist and, where the man has previously been at Millbrook, from the superintendent of that institution. After this initial classification stage each institution has further internal classification stages. These can best be shown by an example of how they affect inmates at the Guelph reformatory.

Training classification (Guelph): All young offenders are interviewed at Guelph by a training classification committee and assessed for suitability for transfer to an open training centre. The basis of classification is behaviour, custodial risk, and motivation. The committee consists of the superintendent from Brampton, the superintendent from Burtch, and a Guelph psychologist who has given each inmate a series of psychological tests.

The criteria for Brampton, which is a minimum security centre offering academic schooling and training in 11 trades are: 1. an IQ of over 88; 2. an aptitude for trade training; 3. age between 16 and 25 and considered suitable for transfer to an open institution.

Criteria for Burtch are similar except that this centre deals with IQ's of under 88. With this type of inmate, Burtch places greater emphasis on improving school grades and offers only three semi-skilled trades, to a maximum number of 50 students. This stage is called classification for training purposes.

Programme classification — Guelph: The next stage of classification at Guelph is for all inmates and is the programme classification. The points considered include behaviour, age, aptitude and ability, length of sentence, results of psychological tests, academic level and intelligence, and in most cases the inmate's own preference.

The committee consists of the social worker, school headmaster, assistant superintendent, and captain. A location change, for example, which may result from this classification stage, for those who would seem capable of adjusting to an open setting, is transfer to the minimum security forestry camp at Hendrie, which has accommodation for 40 men. Those remaining at Guelph may be directed to a particular type of employment or employment plus training, or full-time training, with a possibility of part-time academic school.

All institutions have a similar programme classification although they do not always have a similarly constituted committee, nor are they all able to offer similar facilities.

Addiction classification: The next classification stage is for those suffering from addiction to either alcohol or narcotics. Although many factors are taken into account, the strongest factor is the motivation and desire of the inmate to be cured of his addiction. The addiction committee at each institution consists of the superintendent, a social worker, a psychologist or rehabilitation officer, and in certain instances a member of the staff of the clinic concerned.

Those men suffering from addiction to narcotics are transferred, for the last three months of their sentence, to the drug addiction clinic at Mimico which has a maximum capacity of 25. Alcoholics are transferred to the Alex G. Brown Memorial Clinic or annex for the last 30 days of their sentence. The combined accommodation of this complex is 150, which gives a total treatment turnover for the year of approximately 1,000 men.

Females: All females are transferred initially to the Mercer Reformatory. First offenders and those who have not previously served a sentence in the reformatory are given psychological and IQ tests. The first classification stage at Mercer is the treatment and training classification. The committee consists of the superintendent, a psychologist, and a representative from the guidance or treatment centre.

Those first offenders under the age of 25 who have the ability to benefit from a programme of training in either academic or vocational pursuits, and are suitable for an open setting, are then transferred to the Ontario Women's Guidance Centre, known as Ingleside. Inmates with intense therapy needs, who are likely to benefit from the treatment centre, are formed into groups for transfer to this centre at an appropriate time.

For those remaining at the Mercer Reformatory, a programme classification committee consisting of the superintendent, a school teacher and a nurse, interviews all inmates, and classifies them into groups with programmes of employment or training or a selection of both. Where academic training is appropriate, volunteer inmates are allocated to school classes.

Brampton programme classification: This, then, is the general basis of our classification system. It is but a sketchy outline of a very detailed and thorough system.

It would take a great deal of time to relate in complete detail the full classification programme as carried out, for example, in Brampton alone. Here a number of small classification committees, consisting of two or more persons from the treatment and administration group will classify and segregate inmates for programme, training, and treatment purposes. This is not just one single interview with the inmate, but a constant ongoing appraisal throughout the period of his training, so that, as he develops, he may be reclassified into more appropriate groups.

Training programmes: Having given a picture of the various institutions and the types of inmates selected for training purposes, it would seem advisable at this stage to detail the training programme. First we have an academic programme in all institutions accommodating inmates under the age of 20. It is sometimes necessary to have the very lowest "pre-reading level" grades taught, and equally necessary to teach up to Grade 10 in full-time school classes. Above grade 10, certificates are obtained by correspondence courses.

We find that vocational training is one of the most valuable tools available in the work of rehabilitation. Ability developed and skills learned in vocational trade classes give a man a solid basis on which to develop his self respect, and provide him with the necessary confidence when approaching a prospective employer. Trades taught include welding, machine shop, woodworking, construction, sheet metal, hairdressing, sewing, tailoring, radio and electronics, bricklaying, auto mechanics, electrical wiring, and plumbing.

I am pleased to inform hon. members that changes in The Apprenticeship Act and apprenticeship system will enable many young men from our training centres to make much greater practical use of their training in the future. We expect, under the new regulations, to be able to apprentice a youngster to our department for training in a particular trade. In the future, credits may be granted to a student for training taken while in one of our institutions and he may from this, where appropriate, receive a certificate of qualification.

Industry and farming: Aversion to work seems in many ways to be a most significant common characteristic among many offenders, which I suppose is not surprising. In consequence we maintain an industrial programme, which assists in training and acclimatizing men to modern workshops, where they learn to use machines under commercial conditions, and get accustomed to good work habits.

Instead of a man leaving our institutions estranged to normal working conditions, his time has been made to serve him, in teaching him to adapt himself into modern industrial practices and methods. The production of our industries and farms is all absorbed by other provincial departments and institutions.

Industry: Industry and farming in this department are large operations, producing well over $3 million of revenue annually. The extent of the operations is very wide, including tailor shops in a number of institutions making a variety of garments ranging from nightgowns to overcoats.

Our canneries make jams, jellies, marmalades and mincemeat, as well as canning fruits and vegetables. Machine and sheet-metal shops make beds, tables and doors for our own detention cells. We make snow fences and field monuments. At Millbrook we produce the motor vehicle licence plates, and also print books in Braille for blind school children.

For the benefit of vacationers and tourists we make barbecues, fireplaces and picnic tables for The Department of Lands and Forests, many from wood we cut ourselves. At Burwash we have an extensive timber operation, felling the trees and clearing land for reforestation. We have a lumber mill and make most of our own wooden furniture. We have a woollen mill at Guelph for making our own blankets, and a quarry and brick kilns at Mimico. We make shoes and slippers and, in fact, most of our inmate clothing.

Farming: There are eight major farms within the department providing food for our own and other provincial institutions, with six herds of registered dairy cattle, three herds of beef cattle, poultry flocks and, may the Lord forgive me, I find that I am now at the head of a department which also raises over 1,000 hogs annually.

Hon. members will realize that it is important, both on our farms and in industry, to maintain these big operations if we are to keep men employed in productive work, which is obviously good therapy.

Forestry camps: Equally good therapy is the community centred work of our forestry camps. Here, selected inmates, living and working in a completely open, rural setting, carry out an impressive and worthwhile programme of community projects. These have included establishing and improving parks and conservation areas, bush clearing, road widening, forest maintenance and clearing, rebuilding historical sites, and other projects, large and small, for local communities. The value of this work, from a community standpoint, increases its value as therapy, because the inmates understand and see that their work is both important and valuable.

Recreation: Physical training and recreation is another important part of our training programme. Under the direction of trained instructors, all our institutions carry out a full sports programme and regularly scheduled classes in physical education. Appropriate indoor recreation, such as a weekly film, discussion groups, book clubs and so on, are used to add variety to the programme.

Books play an important part in the lives of men who are imprisoned for a long period of time. Our institutions provide an exceptionally fine library service, catering to the needs of all types of inmates with varying degrees of ability. Books of entertainment and recreation, as well as educational books, are all provided. Recently an inmate confessed to the librarian that he wanted to spend his time improving his limited reading ability, because his young children, having started school, were now able to read better than he could. Between 80 and 90 per cent of inmates use the library regularly, reading on an average one book a week—making a total issue over the whole system of over 150,000 books each year.

Religion: Spiritual training plays an important part in the rehabilitation of men and women. All institutions hold regular voluntary church services, Bible classes and, where appropriate, confirmation classes. Chaplains are available for counselling, at the request of all inmates, and in some institutions operate group therapy sessions within the treatment programme.

Treatment Programme: The treatment programme continues to play its most necessary part in the full rehabilitation programme, including group and individual therapy, films, lectures, and counselling from psychologists, social workers, chaplains, teachers, psychiatrists, doctors and rehabilitation officers. In keeping with the experiences of other social agencies and government departments, both in federal and in all ten provinces, we are short of our complement of clinical staff. This is a fact and no amount of wishful thinking will change it, Mr. Chairman; nor will any amount of bemoaning and bemoaning our difficulties.

Instead, we are tackling this in a systematic approach to students, offering bursaries for research to new and present staff, and endeavouring in every way to attract to this work those people who seek careers with a challenge, which calls for a certain degree of self-sacrifice and dedication to a worthy purpose.

Although the expansion of university programmes and social services in the community is increasing the overall shortage of professional staff, we see very definite signs of future reinforcement of our clinical services.

Mr. Chairman, although I am now reporting a present deficiency, I have every hope that our planned policy will enable me to report, at the end of next year, a more satisfactory increase in our overall clinical staff position.

Medical: Medical and dental services are available at all our institutions. Larger institutions have well equipped hospitals with full-time medical and nursing staff. Smaller institutions rely on part-time medical and dental staff. During the past year we moved the TB ward in Guelph to its new quarters, completely isolated from all other parts of the institution. This is the only TB hospital in a penal institution in Canada and it is a most useful service. Built by the inmates themselves, under direction of our own tradesmen, the hospital is in two sections, one for active and one for inactive cases.

Food: Food services are of course important in reformatory life, and can easily become a source of irritation to those imprisoned. Perhaps this is not surprising when one considers that, three times a day, seven days a week, 52 weeks in the year, a man sits in the same place, with little change in table companions, eating food he has not selected and, occasionally, a selection he does not particularly like. It is not surprising therefore that even food can become a focal point of tension.

However, with intelligent appraisal of this situation, with careful and imaginative planning of meals, not just for one day but balanced and varied over long periods, we have managed, without any suggestion of luxury, to provide meals which are satisfactory both as to nutrition and variety.

Mr. Chairman, as I said previously, I am only able, in a reasonable period of time, to give a brief outline of a most extensive department. However, this description of the adult institutions of our department will serve, I hope, to inform and interest hon. members in this work. And while I have this interest, I would extend to all members of the Legislature an invitation to visit any of our institutions they have a mind to. If sufficient hon. members are interested we could make arrangements for a tour. This does not mean, sir, that individual members are not welcome, nor that they should not take opportunities to visit institutions whenever possible. This invitation includes our training schools, with which I now propose to deal.

Training schools: Eleven training schools are operated under the jurisdiction of this department. Four for girls and four for boys are the direct responsibility of the department, and two for boys and one for girls are operated by Roman Catholic religious orders, subsidized by our department.

Any juvenile up to the age of 16, either committed by the courts or admitted as a result of direct application by the Children's Aid Society, or similar society, is placed under our wardship until the age of 18 or prior release.

Classification: Just as in the adult field, classification plays an important part in our training schools. Each of the schools, although having the same basic programme, gives special emphasis to that part of its programme most suitable for the particular children committed to its care.

All youngsters go, initially, to a reception centre where they are given psychological, aptitude, and intelligence tests to determine the type of programme which is most likely to be of value to them, and most effective for their rehabilitation. Each school has its own further degree of classification and segregation, breaking the numbers down into smaller groups which have mutual characteristics and problems.

Programmes: I will not repeat details of services which I covered in the adult field, but will merely reiterate that we maintain equally high standards in the training schools in such services as medical and dental, food, accommodation, clothing, library, and recreational facilities. Our programmes invariably cover academic, vocational and recreational training as well as both spiritual and psychological counselling.

There are certain basics such as the emphasis on academic training, where we follow The Ontario Department of Education curriculum and issue grade certificates of promotion, so that a youngster may transfer from the training school to his own school at his correct grade level. This is obviously most important with youngsters who, due to previous difficulties, are usually academically backward. We hope to lead a youngster back to the satisfaction of regular progress in school by overcoming general or particular backwardness. And we hope to increase his self respect, which grows with earned progress.

Self-respect is an important factor which is usually lacking in youngsters when admitted to our training schools, and we try to help a youngster regain it in various ways. A sense of inadequacy is usually first overcome in the vocational shops, where a youngster's interest is aroused along some particular line and he comes to recognize his own growing ability—and this is very helpful. Sometimes an interest and ability in sports is used to lead a boy or girl towards assuming responsibilities similar to those which are to be placed upon him in everyday life.

All of our schools maintain strong associations with the churches of the community. Within our schools youngsters are taught to respect their own church and religious affiliations, and may attend confirmation classes, as appropriate, either in the school or in local churches.

Review Boards: The progress of youngsters from the moment of entering school is evaluated by means of detailed reports from staff who are in association with the youngster. These reports are regularly considered by review boards. The youngster is present part of the time during such reviews, and strong and weak points and difficulties of adjustment are discussed with him. With progress, the youngsters' responsibilities are increased, and as they gradually become capable of carrying out their responsibilities, they graduate and are put on placement.

Placement: Most youngsters graduating are re-established in their own homes, but, when this cannot be done, they may be placed in foster homes. The rehabilitation officer, who will counsel and visit with the youngster during his period on placement, has prepared for this time from the moment the youngster enters the training school. His home has been visited, his parents have been counselled and difficulties which may have led towards the youngster's delinquency are discussed with the parents. It is hoped, in consequence of these visits, that when the youngster is ready to return to his home environment, that environment is equally ready to receive him. Youngsters are supervised until the school authorities and the advisory board are confident that wardship can be relinquished, or until the youngster reaches the age of 18. Thus placement can be considered as an extension of the training period under practical circumstances but still with the help and counselling of the school staff, leading towards successful adjustment in society and the satisfaction of living a happy and purposeful life.

Girls: The girls' schools are at Galt, Lindsay and Port Bolster, and a private one in Toronto. All girls for our schools are sent first to the reception centre, which is a separate building on the grounds of the larger training school at Galt. This building, which serves the double purpose of a reception and a diagnostic centre, was initially equipped as a maximum security school. Most of the outside security measures are still necessary for the many different types of girls coming both to the reception centre and diagnostic centre. However, most of the internal security features have been withdrawn. This, of course, is part of the general trend in all similar institutions where, as knowledge and experience gradually teach us how to use psychological rather than physical measures of restraint, then the physical security measures can happily be withdrawn without seriously affecting the programme.

On the reception side of the school, girls are given aptitude, intelligence and interest tests in order to obtain a personality picture. This picture is supplemented by information which the school obtains from the probation officer, the family, the court and the last school attended. The decision on which of the schools is most likely to meet the needs of each particular girl is based on this total picture.

Girls who are mature enough and responsible enough to benefit from a programme which places great emphasis on academic training, in a school giving greater individual responsibility and freedom, are sent to Lindsay, which has just completed 18 months' operation.

Trelawney House at Port Bolster is a large converted house and a prefabricated school-room having accommodation for up to 20 girls who are likely to benefit from group living in a home-like atmosphere.

At the training school at Galt there is accommodation for up to 120 girls whose personality and attitudes indicate that they will require reasonably close supervision and control.

Girls requiring intensive clinical treatment are retained at the diagnostic centre, and those who have failed to adjust in a more open setting, are returned there from the other schools.

Boys: Boys go initially to the reception centre at Bowmanville where there is a testing programme similar to that given the girls.

The training school at Cobourg has a programme designed to meet the needs of younger boys, usually under the age of 14. To enable these youngsters to be accommodated with their own age group and size there are seven houses at the school, each with its own day rooms and indoor recreational facilities.

The programme at Simcoe is designed for boys aged 14 and over who are most likely to be stimulated into furthering their academic education. Each of the four houses, into which boys are segregated there, has single bedrooms and two small dormitories, as well as a day room lounge for reading, writing, television and quiet games.

Bowmanville with a normal capacity of just less than 200 is designed for boys 14 years of age and over who will be most likely to benefit from a balanced programme of academic and vocational training. Accommodation here is for five groups of boys in houses, each with its own day room, recreation rooms and locker rooms.

Under the administrative wing of Bowmanville, is the Coldsprings Forestry Camp, which has now been in operation for 12 months. Coldsprings has accommodation for up to 40 boys whose aptitude makes forestry training particularly suitable. The spirit and enthusiasm of staff and boys at this camp confirms our opinion that this experiment is most worthwhile, and must now be regarded as accepted policy with this age group of boys, and we plan a further expansion of this programme.

Finally, in the training schools we have the maximum security training school at Guelph, which receives boys from all over the province who by their actions have shown themselves completely unable to adjust in the open setting of the other training schools. Normal capacity is 48 in individual rooms. One wing of the school is segregated for reception purposes, enabling boys to adjust to the setting before integrating into the school programme.

I regret that time does not permit me to go into greater detail concerning our training schools, because I feel that they are the most important work of this department. I have a great deal of sympathy for these wayward boys and girls, many of whom are the products—I should say most of them are the products—of broken homes and have not received the guidance, love and security of a unified family circle.

It is our hope that the training we are able to give them, and the care and support we provide after they leave our schools, will help them to appreciate that somebody does care, and will also teach them the value of care, guidance and love when they, in turn, raise their own families.

Human behaviour: Although I have been able to give only an outline picture of this large operation, hon. members will realize that the problems we face in dealing with human and particularly criminal behaviour are very intricate, and allow of no easy and glib solution.

In the short time in which I have been engaged in this portfolio, I have studied dozens of reports and spoken to many engaged in this field, here and elsewhere, and there is one conclusion I have come to. That is that the longer one works in this field of penology, the more experience one gains, the more study one puts into it, in any capacity, whether it be as a chaplain, a psychologist, a custodial officer, yes as a Minister, the longer one labours in these vineyards, and the more one learns about it, the more one realizes that as yet we have very little scientific knowledge of human behaviour, or anti-social and criminal varieties of human behaviour.

We are still not able to speak with much certainty on the effectiveness of particular attitudes to individual problems.

Oh yes, we speak of a more enlightened approach. We speak of greater progress in the handling of offenders—no corporal punishment, increased emphasis on training, research and treatment, more facilities for parole, presentence consideration and after-sentence, rehabilitation, more prerelease and after-release attention than a few years ago but with all this, no one can say for certain that this approach or that approach is the answer to the behaviour problem of a particular offender.

On checking offenders' files one can find, for example, that offender A, with similar problems and almost the same background as offender B, was given the same prerelease and after-release treatment in similar circumstances by the same treatment staff, yet offender A became a repeater, but offender B never appeared again. We still do not know why, but we must try to find out.

As I have stated, I have studied literally hundreds of files and been intrigued by the many possibilities and potential pitfalls which may face a person if he attempts to draw general conclusions from the study of those files.

Until such time as we are able to measure the human being's emotions, his personality and his motivation, in the same way as today we can measure his height and his weight, then and only then will be honestly be able to say that we are beginning to understand the complexities of human behaviour.

Since I was appointed to this post, I have received many comments and advice from those interested in this work, who sincerely wish me to start off with the right attitudes. Besides these personal contacts, I have tried to read as much as I could on the subject. I have tried to keep the work in its proper perspective. I have tried to balance our needs with the needs of other services, but I have become so convinced of the importance of this field, and the need for us all to get further enlightened in it, that I have tended to think, talk and read very little else.

I must confess that my great disappointment is the absence of scientifically derived knowledge of what precise course we should take. However, this is evident in all I read and all I hear.

Initially I felt that at least a fairly obvious answer was a vast increase in treatment personnel. But I quickly came to realize that the sincere psychologist, the sincere psychiatrist, the sincere treatment person will tell you that, even if we, as a department, were able to increase and did increase our number of treatment personnel tenfold, perhaps even to the extreme ideal of one worker per inmate, we would still have no guarantee that we could treat a particular person with any reasonable assurance of success.

In fact, the professional people would seem to advise most strongly against this kind of thinking. This is evident when an eminent doctor of psychology will say, as he has said, recently and publicly:

The supervisor in our training schools is doing his job much more effectively than I am. When he is asked to carry out his job in a particular way he will do it with a much higher efficiency than I as a psychologist. My knowledge of human behaviour is still so scanty that I consider I am doing my job with no more than a 20 per cent efficiency.

In other words, the study and treatment of human behaviour problems is still an inexact science, a very inexact science.

Research: It is obviously necessary to improve our position in this respect by means of research. We have, in this department, over the years, carried out an impressive amount of research. Even so, we recognized that this, and similar work being done in other parts of Canada, still left much to be desired, and could not be fully effective until a centre for basic study and research was established. Included in our estimates this year is a sum of $30,000 toward the cost of operating this centre of criminology, which has now been established at the University of Toronto.

I am convinced that this is a major step forward in correctional practice in this country. The value of the centre will extend far beyond the provisions of training and research. Its influence will be felt widely; but I should, at this time, warn against over-optimism and expecting immediate practical results.

I have tried to impress upon hon. members the complexities of these problems, and so, in consequence, I must emphasize that the effectiveness of this centre is going to prove itself in long-term, careful and meticulous study. This can only come from an initial establishment along the right lines and I am pleased that we have played a part in taking this initial step.

In my awareness of the importance of this centre, which must inevitably place great stress on basic research, I have not overlooked the need for field research within our own institutions. The two must be co-ordinated and complement each other. We must know not only what leads to criminal behaviour, but also how effective our present programmes are at leading away from criminal behaviour. We place great importance on this, and so I was very pleased to be able to announce to this House, a few days ago, the appointment of a director of research, as the first major step in the setting up of a research section within the department.

I have asked for a list of priority research projects, which we can deal with over a five-year programme.

Finally, I intend that we should make the most effective use possible of information gained from these research projects. This implies not only the establishment of a statistical branch to evaluate results, but also the preparation and distribution of résumés that are meaningful to all members of the staff and other workers outside the department.

Present Programmes: I hope that by emphasizing the importance I place on increasing our knowledge in this field, I have not given hon. members the impression that we do not know where we are going, or that we do not know how effective some of our programmes are. This is not so. Our information when dealing with individuals is weaker than when dealing with groups. We may, for example, know that our programme will be effective in a particular instance with, say, six out of ten, but we can never forecast with which six. So that, much as we stress the importance of more scientific information, we have already, through private projects—through evaluation of particular aspects of programmes—been able to build up a set of principles and methods which we know are effective in our rehabilitation programme.

Open Institutions: This is why we could, with confidence, open the new treatment centre for women in Brampton during this past year. The department had been working towards this for a number of years in the group milieu therapy unit at the Mercer, which indicated the lines along which this centre should be established. We built a forestry camp for boys from the training school. We already have three adult forestry camps, two training centres for young men, and a guidance centre for young women; all of which are completely open institutions.

Perhaps I can best describe what I mean by an open or minimum security institution, by giving a picture of the custodial arrangement at our forestry camps and training centres.

There are no barbed wire fences in any shape or form. Most have no fences at all, nor are there iron grilles and barred windows. There are limits as to where students or inmates may go, but these are all covered by rules and regulations and not by physical barriers. The roads of the training centres and camps lead directly onto the highway, without gates, sentries or guards.

We maintain security by selection and psychological means. When men first come to these institutions and see their fellow students walking in and out of the buildings, within easy access of highways, they must inevitably realize that escape is merely a matter of walking off. This is put in perspective during their orientation period when the superintendent says, in effect: "There is no drama in escaping from this institution. It is easy. A baby could crawl away from this place, so do not think that if you run you will be regarded as big or clever or brave. Instead, we shall feel that it is a further example of you running away from your problems, fellow students will consider you weak rather than strong. We are here to help you overcome your problems, so that by the time you return to society, you will be able to know, with confidence, that you can face a problem and solve it without running away from it."

And, Mr. Chairman, it works. About five per cent do run away, usually in the face of severe emotional stress. So far they have always been recaptured, and due to our initial selection have rarely caused much difficulty. I am certain that the overall benefits of an increased therapeutic atmosphere more than outweigh the few difficulties which arise.

Therapeutic Institutions: We are very conscious of the need of a therapeutic atmosphere. In consequence, we intend so far as we are able, to extend our clinical complex to provide treatment for specialized groups of behaviour problems. There is need for clinical treatment of those offenders with patterns of sexual deviation. Scientific knowledge of the treatment of this type of behaviour, whilst still limited, has now reached the point where a clinical programme within our department is feasible. Plans for a new approach are now being considered.

We know that many men respond to trust in a very positive way. We know that given the opportunity many offenders will derive psychological benefit from participating in community centred work. With our success in the forestry camp field we are currently investigating locations for a substantial extension in the number of camps. Further to this, we feel that it will be more effective and more economical to replace older buildings and institutions with a number of smaller camps, rather than rebuilding larger institutions. This is in keeping with our policy of classifying and segregating offenders into as many groups as possible, of such small size that individuals in them do not tend to lose their identity and, in consequence, gain greater benefit from individual and personal contact with the staff.

Chaplaincy Services — Developments: In recent years the contribution made by well trained chaplains in schools, hospitals, clinics and correctional institutions is being increasingly appreciated. In view of this, we appointed a director of chaplaincy services—the Reverend Maurice Flint who, in addition to being a graduate of colleges and universities in England, Canada and the United States, is also clinically trained and has had considerable experience in the correctional field, working for a number of years at the Mercer Reformatory. In the past year, and in keeping with this renewed emphasis, chapels have been equipped and built at the reception and diagnostic centre for young women at Galt, at the forestry camp at Camp Hendrie and at the Burwash industrial farm. New chapels are planned for Mimico, Guelph and the Bowmanville training school in the coming months. We are singularly fortunate that many of our chaplains have experience and training in additional disciplines such as psychology and sociology. With this knowledge they are often able to make valuable and unique contributions to the treatment programmes.

Since his appointment, the director of chaplaincy services has received a great number of applications for vacancies in the chaplaincy corps, many of which, unfortunately, were lacking the very necessary qualifications set forth for these positions.

Chaplaincy Training: However, with the co-operation of ecclesiastical authorities a training centre for chaplains is to be established in Toronto this summer under the direction of our director of chaplaincy services. During a course of three months, chaplains, interested ministers and theology students will undergo intensive supervised internships in an institution, whilst studying, not only their ministry and role in the correctional field, but also, the great importance of their own personal orientation in such a setting.

Post-release Problems: A very vexing problem is experienced by men trying to adjust to society after release. Most men and women find that the difficulties they encounter in readjusting to family life, seeking employment and other aspects of life in the community, cannot be overcome without help.

A great deal of help is available to ex-prisoners from many voluntary agencies and societies. The work done is most commendable, and plays a vital part in the reduction of crime through rehabilitation. Organizations such as the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society, the Salvation Army and many others, do most valuable work.

Equally, the official after-care programme carried out by the department is a most effective part of our work. Rehabilitation officers working with adults and juveniles cover the entire province by area, usually being located in one of our own institutions; in addition, regional offices have been established in London, Hamilton, Ottawa and Port Arthur.

After-care is closely related to the Ontario Board of Parole, and in this way our own rehabilitation officers can counsel a man before release and help him plan for his return to society.

Society's Role in After-care: This return to society presents our greatest challenge. Every authority in the world agrees that the attitude of society toward the released prisoner is the greatest influence on his future conduct. Men who have responded to our programmes may still revert to a life of crime in the face of rejection by society.

We, as a government and as a department, cannot set aside our obligation to society in this respect—an obligation to inform society of its responsibilities in this field, responsibilities which, if accepted, must work to the benefit of society itself.

Success or failure of our programme cannot be measured at the time of release; our work does not stop there, nor is it confined to the inmate himself. We must continue our rehabilitation programme with the man after his return into society.

Both he and society must recognize at this point that there are mutual obligations. A man must strive for family adjustment, steady purposeful employment, financial stability, dignity, and respect in and for society. Equally, society has obligations to appreciate that released men and women need employment and financial stability, and earn respect if they are endeavouring to rebuild their life with dignity. Success can only come with full acceptance by both parties of these obligations. Success in this field comes only when a man or woman is re-established in the community and living a purposeful life.

To quote from the Fauteux report:

Ultimately, the kind of correctional system that Canada gets will depend upon what kind of system the people of Canada want.

Recognition of this fact implies a tremendous challenge for the future. I accept this challenge and my department accepts it. We must try to ensure that the people want and get the best in penal reform.

I am confident that with a staff dedicated to this purpose—a staff which has earned our thanks—and with the support of this House, we can reach much further toward this goal.

I hope I have convinced this House that on this continent, Ontario is in the forefront in this field of penology. But that is where we ought to be. However, this does not imply that we are by any means satisfied. There remains much to be done, and it is our intention to keep making progress and maintaining our aggressive leadership in this field.

There is difficulty negotiating the dark recesses of the human mind. There is difficulty relieving the pressures, the stresses, which this modern complex world exerts on the minds of so many who are just not strong enough to withstand these mountainous waves of tension.

We are dealing by and large with those who are subject to an environment which does not fortify them against this stress. We must help them make good this deficiency. It is not an easy task but it is a task to which we must apply ourselves with ever-increasing zeal.

I ask that hon. members indicate their support, and endorse this programme and policy by the approval of the estimates of this department.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, for five years now, I think, I have listened to estimates of this department, being a member of the Opposition.

Something I think that should be pointed out about this department is that when these estimates are given it seems to me that about every two years the Minister stands up and we appreciate his humility, as indeed we have with the hon. Minister tonight, in that he says it is a very complex problem. I do not pretend that I can stand up immediately and answer this. It is going to take time for me to understand this problem and be able to see the complexities of the department.

Then, sir, within about two years, having apologized for the situation, we see another Minister take his place, with the same abject apologies and the same situation continues in connection with the institutions that are meant to rehabilitate the young offenders in this province.

I would say, sir, I do not know the reason. I think first of all that the genial hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) stood up and used that fine old phrase "the finest of the finest", who, he said, were in our institutions. In fact, he waxed so sentimental about it, that I think the reason he was moved was that there was concern he was going to settle himself in one of these institutions.

Then, Mr. Chairman, with the same humility, we heard the former Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Haskett) tell us that he was starting new in this game. They all emphasize that they are unacquainted with the ways of the man who ran afoul of the law and it is something they are going to have to study a great deal. We appreciate their estimates on that point. The new Minister stood up and told us that he was going to study it.

Well, sir, I think he was trying to study it when he was moved.

Now we have a new Minister, sir. I do not want to suggest, as some would, why his experience should be particularly fitted to take over the department of correction. I would say this: Having been the liquor commissioner, he certainly must be aware of some of the problems which arise from consuming that beverage too much. I am not speaking personally. I would say this, sir—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: That is a good point. It could allude to anyone in this House, sir. "There, but for the grace of God, go I", is the thing which should be on many of our minds. But I am sure hon. members are aware that people are in those institutions to a large extent, because of the habit alcoholism has created in their lives.

I would like to make another point and then follow on to your remarks. Not only is it because of alcoholism, but the second point is that, as I understand it, a great number of these young people, a great majority of them, are under the age of 24. So you do not need an enormous amount of research to get two points. One is that alcoholism—perhaps it is a symbol of strength in our society—is one reason why many people run afoul of the law. Another point is that their age appears to be 24.

Then we look at the treatment centres for this disease of alcoholism. I understand there are three beds in the alcoholic research centre in Toronto which are available to women who suffer from the disease. I do not want to talk to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) about a shortage of beds because we are, at this point, concentrating on The Department of Reform Institutions. All I will say is that when a new Minister takes this post it is very obvious that the new Minister has done a great deal of homework. He has studied a great deal, if he has written this himself, and I would suggest that he probably has put a lot of work into this. I would feel that if you can stay, and do not look on this appointment as a sentence from which you are going to get out on parole or something, if you feel you are to stay at this, perhaps we will finally achieve results in the way of having a real reforms department.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: I beg your pardon? Well, sir, I am now going to follow through on your remarks.

I should say that I stand up here without notes other than those I made as you were talking for the simple reason that I thought we would have a clean sheet in approaching this because, once again, it is a new Minister and the hope in our hearts will be that there will be a new approach.

Now, sir, you talked about the Archambault report, the Fauteux commission, the Stewart report. You described Agnes McPhail and how she had pushed for reforms and perhaps had been responsible for the Archambault report being started. You also referred to Davie Fulton and the work that he has done in implementing a great deal of the Archambault report; and I would say as well, apart from any party considerations, that both of these people have earned the respect of penologists across Canada for the forward steps they have taken. I would hope, sir, that you, in taking this great challenge, may some day be included in the ranks of McPhail and Fulton.

I say this because one of the things I have noticed about the Archambault report which impressed me is that a recidivist who comes at the age, I think, of 25—I am sorry I am not speaking from notes, but I am just speaking to you on this vast subject, because there are so many areas you could attack on this thing. I think the point we should remember is that a recidivist, from the Archambault report, and I think they took over 300 recidivists and they worked out the average cost to the community, to society, of these young men, and found that it costs society something over $36,000 for each individual.

I would suggest to any person sitting in this honourable chamber, if you had $36,000 which you had spent at the University of Toronto or somewhere else, and you found that results had not been derived to your satisfaction, you would be making a great row about the effectiveness of that particular institution.

I would suggest that the taxpayers should start taking a hard look. I agree with the hon. Minister when he says that he hopes that the public will take a look, just on the basis of finances, at the tremendous cost that is involved, in the failure to rehabilitate the young offender.

I would say, sir, and I know there are many other factors involved, but take the recidivism in Holland—and in many ways this is unfair, to make comparisons between a country which has the conformity that there is in Holland and here—but apart from all that, recidivism in Holland, as I understand, is less than three per cent. I think it is one per cent. The recidivism from the hon. Minister's institutions, sir, is something over 75 per cent. I would say that because of that we cannot refer to Ontario in the glowing terms that we have. Indeed, I would say that this is a sort of contagious disease that seems to have infected most of the hon. Cabinet Ministers of the Tory right.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It is a deeply rooted disease, too.

Mr. Thompson: It is a deeply rooted disease in that they suggest we have the finest departments in all the land. And when they refer to land—I mentioned yesterday, the modesty of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko)—he said it was only America. I think you both have eliminated yourselves from that modest scale referring to it as—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Canada.

Mr. Thompson: Pardon? Canada! We are really coming down the scale on that one because—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It could be the whole continent, but I do not know that.

Mr. Thompson: No. I see.

Well, I would say that one of the dangers about this is if a man is complacent then he is unconcerned about trying to see the difficulties.

I say it is a contagious disease, just to add that little flourish in it, because I do not think that the hon. Minister is complacent about this situation. I think the hon. Minister feels this is a real challenge.

I would say frankly, sir, that some day when the Liberal Party—when, I say, not if—when the Liberal Party becomes the government of Ontario, it would be an ambition of mine that I might have the opportunity of looking after The Department of Reform Institutions.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I will make the job a lot easier for you.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): I have my room, I have my room in Millbrook.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate we are going to follow the very detailed background which the hon. Minister has given to the House in this discussion and I think I will probably stay on that approach. I say at the start that every hon. member will appreciate this report that the hon. Minister has given.

However, Mr. Chairman, before getting into it, the report starts at the classification and segregation within the institutions. I think an important factor which the hon. Minister should have an interest in—I realize he will say: I cannot be in charge of every area in the community; but I am thinking that prior to people going into one of the institutions—and I could quote again from social workers who are in our community. I am sure, sir, that as you read those files you must have seen remarks by magistrates when they are sentencing some young man, sentencing him with regrets because there are not facilities outside of institutions to which to send them.

I think of people, even people employed in the welfare department of this province, who have stated that they wished there were facilities other than the institutions so that there might be a chance for a young man to be able to stay in society rather than going into one of the institutions. I would suggest that in this whole area I could go on for a great deal of time.

This is the area that, when you look back—and I did, I remember, in one of the periods when we were having these estimates come up, I went back to the library. The hon. Provincial Secretary was talking about the hoary files that they have back there, and I mean by that, the ancient files. I looked and I found that at the turn of the century there were suggestions that they should have some kind of greater foster farms for young people, rather than sending them into institutions.

Now when we come to the institutions, and I have not even looked at the report on your institutions, I will start first of all with—I can start with any of them. I would suggest to you that in general they defy every modern approach to penology in that they are far too overcrowded and far too big. I think you, sir, recognize that these institutions cannot do the job when they are so completely crowded.

I notice the suggestion by the federal government of making an institution in Cornwall, and the criticism by the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society in connection with the location. Frankly, on the whole I would say that in the placing of institutions by this government, it appears to me the only reason for the placing of them has been purely on a political basis. I think of the last one that has gone up—the girls institution. We ask where did it go up? Did it go up near the University of Toronto, perhaps Western University? No, for some reason, Lindsay was chosen as the site of the institution.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): What about the one at Cornwall?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He just mentioned that when you were not listening. You woke up at the wrong time.

Mr. Thompson: And I would suggest to you that to me it is very apparent why Lindsay was chosen. If I could just point out some of the philosophy that there has been in this department. I remember again in one of the estimates, where the man from Lindsay, I will put it that way, the man from Lindsay who dominated the whole of the philosophy of every department, replied when I talked about the need for small units in order to get proper rehabilitation for the offender. The man from Lindsay said, bringing out a voice that came from Elizabethan times in connection with his philosophy, "Bigger and better institutions". That is why today, I would suggest, because of going into the background of this Elizabethan, punitive approach, just throw them away and keep them there. That is why we have not got the facilities in order that we can have a proper treatment clinic.

Apart from the buildings, staff is needed. It always seems to me that we look with hope to each Minister before he packs his bags and moves on to another portfolio, that he may get some staff.

Last year in talking about staff, I think that the former Minister of Reform Institutions gave us the number he was going to have as a work force. If I recall, sir, there were going to be 15 more rehabilitation officers and a number of others. I am sure he will have something to say on it. But anyway, I know that he needed a great many more trained staff.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): He did not stay long enough to get them.

Mr. Thompson: And he did not stay long enough to get them. I would suggest, and we have many times suggested this, that the reason the hon. Minister will not get staff is because there is not the atmosphere conducive to professional people moving into the department. He mentioned that he wondered at the conflict between custodial care and treatment. I will suggest to him that he will keep on wondering about that, because unless he changes things, he is going to find there is a far greater emphasis on custodial care than there is on the treatment aspect.

I suggest this because even last year, and certainly I can keep going on this as well in almost any area, but even last year the Minister talked about the Mimico treatment centre. If I recall, even as he was talking about this, the professional staff was walking out. It was not going to have anything to do with it.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Like the fellows in Burwash.

Mr. Thompson: I would suggest that in respect to staff there has got to be a whole new approach. When I first came here, in my first speech in the House, my maiden speech, being interested in prison reform, I asked the question whether a young person graduating from university could start in the prison reform system and could gradually work up through various departments in order that he might take a real position of responsibility some day. I was assured that this could happen. If I was the young man with the attitude there was before, I would say that he would have to have a very thick hide and a very thick skull to stay in a situation like this, if he was a professional psychiatrist or a social worker. I feel in the past there has been a constant conflict between custodial care and treatment. The hon. Minister talks about classification and segregation. All I can say, sir, is I hope he stresses that this is to be done early.

I can recall again going out to one of his institutions and talking with one of the staff. I am not going to mention the person's name, but we talked about the presentence report, which I am sure she would have had. She explained to me she did not want to look at that because it would predisposition her for her feeling toward the inmate. This is her theory. I admit that with human beings you cannot have a complete scientific knowledge of them, but if people are not going to look at the background which the hon. Minister is proudly suggesting he will have, then it shows the whole weakness in this.

I read the areas of classification with great interest and all I can say is that I hope, sir, that the hon. Minister will be pushing steadily to have a classification officer. I think for example, of the Archambault report again; I understand that one of its suggestions, either the Archambault or the Fauteux report, was that we should have a classification officer for every 150 men. I would suggest that when you have 9,000 people a year flowing in and out, it would be impossible for the staff that is available to be doing the classification.

I feel that in this, one of the real weaknesses is that in the county jails and indeed the city jails as well, where you have so many offenders, there is no responsibility, as I can see, taken by this correction department with respect to staff for these people. I think this was suggested by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald) last year, and certainly by our party and will continue to be suggested.

If you are going to go into correction, you better start trying to get an integrated programme and taking full responsibility for the whole detention situation of offenders of the law, who are there two years less a day. I am referring to responsibility for the county jails, having a look at the staff requirements and so on in these jails.

I have never heard, sir, what plans are contemplated when the Fauteux report is implemented and when you will have the federal government taking responsibility for all those offenders serving six months and over and you will have only the six-month group to take care of. But I think when you look at this six-month group it would seem obvious to me that the area that you have to look at is really—I suggest this to you because you will have far more knowledge than I on this—that the majority of those who are receiving six-month sentences again are to a large extent alcoholics and they are a young age group.

I would like to hear from the hon. Minister, if we could, two things. One is with respect to the federal-provincial distribution of authority. When the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) goes down to Quebec, is this going to be brought up? Are you going to push for this, so that you do not have this sort of twilight zone of responsibility, waiting for something to be done? I would ask if this is one of the discussions that the hon. Prime Minister is going to raise at that federal-provincial conference?

I raise the question of the facilities and by that I mean brick and mortar. I hope, sir, that always you will be following the United Nations' recommendation to build small units and get away gradually from these enormously large units that you have. As I understand, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) has stated that from now on this would be the policy, that new institutions being built would be small units with a desirable location, such as near universities or near cities to provide jobs, depending on the type of person who would be going to them.

I appreciate that it is hard to get staff, but I say again that if you dig into this you will find that one of the reasons you do not get staff is because they are crushed and suffocated by a lack of reform approach in connection with the philosophy of the department. Perhaps it is because of salary, but I suggest that there are people who will face the challenge and enjoy it. You see this in other countries, in other jurisdictions, where they do have full-time psychiatrists. I think of Dr. Richmond, out in British Columbia, the man they brought from England.

I think of the probation department—and I agree that the hon. Minister does not handle that, but I think of the adult probation department out in British Columbia where they had a man called Ernie Stevens. He taught at the university and attracted a number of university graduates with their master's degree. They had a large number of these people working for them, because it was suggested to them that there would be a reform philosophy.

I would say that, for many young men and women with ideals, the challenge of helping to reconstruct lives is enormous, provided they are not suffocated. To me, somehow, as I sat in this House over the years and saw the flow of trained people coming in, then moving out, I could not help thinking that it is not the trained people who are at fault, it must be the philosophy of the department.

I will leave to others—many of my hon. colleagues I am sure—the questions with respect to the institution itself. I just raise the question of staff, and also of overcrowding. I would like to come to the point of rehabilitation. I raise this because I still have not fully understood the role of the Ontario parole board. We have learned in other estimates from other hon. Ministers, the total number of reviews it has made; but I question how intensively the Ontario parole board has made these reviews and how broad its coverage is within the institutions.

I raise a question with respect to rehabilitation. I am thinking of, for example, the one to which the Reverend Kerr is appointed.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What does the hon. member mean by reviews, the number of reviews? Does he mean how many—

Mr. Thompson: I mean how many came before the parole board. I raise the question of the whole basis of a man getting out.

Let us start with an adult. It seems to me that, after having done his period of sentence, he moves out into society with $20 and a "good luck" pat on the back. We say we have these rehabilitation officers. I would like to know what the case load is for each of these men. The hon. Minister mentioned the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society. I would like to know how they fit into this situation. It may be that the John Howard Society does not handle these people on parole from provincial institutions. They do in other provinces. Perhaps the hon. Minister would clarify this whole area for us.

I noticed—and I appreciate it—that at the opening of the remarks of the hon. Minister he emphasized this point of rehabilitation. We can see many of the reasons which would make it difficult for a young person to be rehabilitated. During this training in the institution he was not getting recognition for this. I congratulate the hon. Minister that now he has, in the apprenticeship branch, given a recognition for the training.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister, and I think he will be doing this, that he should be looking at the vocational training. He should be looking at this whole area of training, the academic training. I just wonder if it is only the department's institution at Brampton which has these facilities for giving vocational training, using skilled people. I would like to hear about some of the other institutions.

I suspect that there might be a tendency—I raise this each time—to have men working on jobs which are going to produce revenue to keep the institution going. By that, I am thinking of such things as the hon. Minister was talking about—the park benches or picnic tables, and the work of making motor vehicle licence plates.

I knew previously, when we have talked of this, that people have referred to the virtue of work. I am not sure of the virtue of monotonous work, and whether the initiative of some people is not perhaps dulled by making them do this kind of work. They could be getting a feeling of achievement and accomplishment if their talents were assessed and they were allowed to try to work on greater endeavours. They could enjoy this and move out into the community with an ability to work at something they learned "inside". I am not sure if there are any outside firms in which they could be employed, for example, in making licence plates. I think that is an exclusive skill, provided by the province for its own inmates.

The whole parole question, of course, is one that should really be looked at very closely. Last year we talked about the point of view of half-way houses. I suggest, very strongly, that the idea of half-way houses has certainly proved effective in Windsor. I know that the hon. member for Windsor-Walker-ville (Mr. Newman) will have more to say on this. Certainly, in the United Nations congressional report half-way houses were advocated. I will not go into the description of what I mean by half-way houses; but I noticed, last year, when we brought this up, sir, that the then responsible Minister leaned over to his staff with respect to half-way houses, then told us that, in their judgment, they did not think this experiment was worth following through.

I would suggest to the hon. Minister that when he looks at the United Nations congressional report—which, after all, brought together men of experience in the penal field, including the hon. Minister of Mines—one thing which was strongly suggested was half-way houses.

I would suggest that perhaps a little bit of boldness on the part of the department in connection with innovations might be well worthwhile. I suggest this because your lack of boldness, your sturdy adherence to the Elizabethan approach, has certainly not proved effective when you think of 75 per cent as a figure with respect to recidivism. I have had this on a number of occasions, and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) will be looking it up for me as I am talking.

I should say that one person who mentioned a figure of over 60 per cent was the chief probation officer of the department, Mr. Dan Coughlan—and again I am recalling from past estimates. It is not a proud figure. I would be glad to send the figure Mr. Coughlan mentioned over to the hon. Minister.

I could go into a number of aspects in connection with a person coming out of an institution. I would like to say that, assuming we had an ideal situation with all kinds of treatment and understanding within the institutions, the test of whether it has been effective from the point of view of the individual, and the point of view of society, is how the man or woman adapts in the community. It is because of this that I am re-emphasizing this, because the hon. Minister was conferring—although I am sure he was listening to me—with his officials. I am re-emphasizing the need for having some kind of half-way houses, to assist the man in moving from the institution into the community. I am suggesting that you should be trying experiments.

The hon. Minister of Mines, sir, when he was the Minister of Reform Institutions, came back from the United Nations congress and told us he was thinking that the men should receive pay for their labours. We never heard any more of that. At that United Nations congress, there was a whole variety of ideas brought up—visiting of families, and letting a man go out for a period to work and having to report back again to the institution.

All I am saying is, that really the hon. Minister has given us an account of this department, an account which is a history of the department. I admire the work that has been done in assessing the facilities that exist today, but the thing that I will admire is when the hon. Minister will have engendered into this department that the department should have a real meaning of reform. The thing that I will admire is when the hon. Minister, like Agnes McPhail and Davie Fulton, will not, as the previous Minister has suggested—and I should say I read the estimates last night—will not as the previous Minister has suggested, suggest that the Fauteux report was really meant for the federal government and that the principles of the Fauteux report, principles of sound penology, did not apply to the provincial set-up.

Sir, we have hope in the hon. Minister, because he acknowledged that he read the Archambault report, he read the Fauteux report, he read the Stewart report, and there was one, you know, in 1890 which recommended a number of these things. Our hope is that not only will the hon. Minister have read these recommendations but he will actually put some of them into practice.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to extend my congratulations to the hon. Minister upon his appointment to this extremely important post in the Cabinet. I hope that he is, as the hon. member who has just spoken said, looking upon this with some degree of permanence, that he is planning to stay with it for the next four years. At that time the voters may have a word to say. But if in the fullness of time the voters should see fit to return that government—which, of course, we will do everything to prevent—then we hope he will continue in this post and make it a permanent vocation until the job that should be done in the reform institutions is completed.

I hope too that the hon. Minister in presenting this speech tonight means every word of it and I have no reason to suspect he does not. He has outlined to us a picture of what is possible, and obviously he has become very well acquainted with the whole field in the short time that he has been Minister. I can only regret that his predecessors had not seen fit to carry out much of the idealism which he has presented here tonight. But I suppose since that portfolio passed from hand to hand so rapidly, it was very difficult for permanent policies to be undertaken and carried through.

Tradition dies hard we know, particularly Tory tradition. But when the hon. Minister says today that the old is going and that this new emphasis is coming, then we are taking him at his word and wishing him well at it.

Thorsten Sellin of the University of Pennsylvania, in his very comprehensive survey for the Swedish government, said that the new techniques in penology are:

—meant to be adapted to the nature of the offender, and designed to restore him to the community as a law-abiding person, as soon as possible by the most effective means available—or, to prevent his return so long as he remains a threat to an orderly, social life.

This is the point of view which the hon. Minister has outlined to us here tonight. What is expressed in this and by the hon. Minister is certainly to protect society from a danger and to transform that danger into an asset. If the transformation cannot be achieved, then society has no alternative but to continue the isolation for as long as it may be needed.

But I think it is obvious to all of us that if that isolation can be terminated, then it is just good business for society. It saves us money and human resources to make the transformation and to get those inmates of our institutions back into society. I want to deal with this point a little more in detail later on. But in the meantime, let me direct the hon. Minister's attention and the attention of the House to the situation that exists today.

The hon. Minister gave us an outline of the kind of procedure that is now being worked toward and the kind of procedure that in many of our institutions, and in many of the committees of those institutions, is being undertaken. But in spite of what the hon. Minister hopes to do, the fact is that he has inherited an institution which must be drastically changed before it can even begin effectively to accomplish his aims.

In the face of deeply ingrained tradition toward the offender against society, progress in this field is agonizingly slow. The hon. Minister mentioned the work of Agnes McPhail in both the federal House and in this House, and the Archambault report. He also mentioned the Fauteux report, which was tabled some years ago, and which recommended that all offenders serving more than six months sentence should be the wards of the federal government.

I have here in my hand a speech which was made by the then leader of the Liberal Party, in 1961, when Mr. Wintermeyer was the leader. This is one, I think, of the most comprehensive essays in this field that I have read, although I will say that perhaps the hon. Minister tonight surpassed this one in comprehension of the problem and in what he hopes to do. Because he has the power to do it now, we take it more seriously than this one.

The thing that was interesting about this speech is that during it the Ontario government was urged to use all its good offices to get the Tory government in Ottawa to implement the Fauteux report. During the speech the then leader indicated that if only a Liberal government were in power in Ottawa, the thing would be done and the problem would be solved.

Mr. Thompson: Where does he say it? Will you quote it?

Mr. Young: Tonight we heard the other point of view when another government here is now urging the government in Ottawa to take the necessary steps. So it seems that in Opposition our friends here to the right are extremely progressive. I perhaps should make the exception of the hon. member for Bracondale (Mr. Gould) who does not want to be associated with progressive ideas, or so he expressed himself the other day. But by and large the hon. members to my right in Opposition are extremely progressive. However, just as soon as they become members of government they duck back to the right of the Tories. Here we have another illustration of passing the buck in this matter of the Fauteux report.

Mr. Thompson: Are you suggesting that he goes to Ottawa and talks to him?

Mr. Young: Wonderful! All right, but I suggest that my hon. friends here, who should now have a real "in" with the government down in Ottawa, should make that pilgrimage and use the influence they have.

Since we have this illustration of buck-passing again, I would take for granted that there is very little chance of the Fauteux report being implemented at this time. If that is the case, then I think we have to start exactly where we are. We have to take for granted that, over the foreseeable future, as long as the Liberal Party is in power in Ottawa and as long as the Conservative Party is in power here, we can expect that all offenders with sentences over six months are going to be looked after by the province of Ontario.

Mr. Thompson: Pessimist!

Mr. Young: I may be a pessimist but I perhaps—

Mr. MacDonald: Reality breaks into one's home.

Mr. Young: Let us get on with the speech. One of the fundamental problems the hon. Minister has to face is the fact that a great many people in our society just refuse to face the fact that the offender is, in large measure, the product of the society in which he lives. I think this is one of the tough facts that the hon. Minister has to face. Society, our people should recognize, would do better to reform the offender than simply punish him for his nonconformities.

Sometimes, of course, the offender is mentally and physically incapable of conforming to socially acceptable standards. In that case society must, for its own protection, remove him from society and maintain him, perhaps, as long as he lives.

It is cheaper that way and it is better, both for the offender and for society. But this is a very tiny minority; and most offenders against the law have not been able, for a wide variety of reasons, to adapt themselves to the rules of behaviour laid down by the society in which they live. Or, perhaps too often they accept the commercialized version of success which is pushed at them constantly over the public media.

Making a fortune, and doing it as quickly as possible, is a socially acceptable thing to do. Doing it through hard work is not very easy. Actually, few seem to achieve it that way, the young person observes.

He is not in a position to corner the market on sugar and make it that way. He cannot gain control of a mining company and manipulate the shares until he has rooked all the little people who have invested their hard-earned savings in the resource industries of the nation. He cannot form a tobacco combine and sit tight with government sanction until the growers are willing to sacrifice the profit part of their crop. He cannot dip directly into the company coffers and give himself large stock options at the expense of the shareholders. He cannot even set himself up as a used car lot dealer and operate on a gullible public.

So when these and other ways are closed to him he takes a short cut. Perhaps steeped in television violence, he buys a gun, available almost anywhere, and walks into a bank or a store and attempts to get his share of the available wealth.

Or, in another direction, society constantly bombards him with sex. Advertising, movies, newsstands—everywhere the money-grubbers prostitute sex to their own purposes and the tragic casualties of the process must be cared for by society.

Or take a further illustration, which has already been dealt with by the hon. member for Dovercourt, Mr. Chairman. The advertising industry works overtime to make the consumption of alcoholic beverages the smart and the socially acceptable thing to do. Governments with huge revenues from the liquor industry hesitate to do anything effective about changing this image. So, too many young people take the thing seriously. They go overboard to be really smart. They do in a big way what is socially acceptable and they find themselves in very serious trouble.

As I have already indicated, there are some who seem incapable of living in society without running afoul of the law, although experience in a country like Denmark would seem to indicate that these are fewer than we might expect. But there are many who are in a weak position where the commercial and other drives of society tip the balance to anti-social actions. Bad housing, unemployment, inadequate educational facilities—all contribute to the situation as well as many other personal factors.

Many of these people, I think the hon. Minister said tonight, have an aversion to work. As I look around at the seats here tonight I think that is not entirely confined to the young people who go to our reform institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, you are competing with a hockey game tonight.

Mr. Young: At least the hockey players are working and I suppose they do need some support; perhaps we do not need it here that much.

Society then—because it is involved in responsibility to the offender and because, too, it is just good business—must step in with constructive programmes designed to assist these people back to socially acceptable behaviour and help them to develop, within themselves, the ability to adapt to the mores of their civilization. But, as yet, a good many of our people have not accepted this concept. Too many still cling to the custodial and punishment idea. They refuse to accept the fact that they, too, have some share of the blame and that society itself has a responsibility here.

The second problem which the hon. Minister faces is that he has inherited a plant and a staff geared, still far too much, to the custodial approach. He has expressed that very idea here tonight and is aware of it. Many of the institutions have been said by both the speakers to be far too large, and they are overcrowded far more than the hon. Minister was prepared to admit tonight. They lack the degree of specialization needed for effective work. The institutional staff has come up through the custodial tradition; and while there are a great many good people among them, they are undertrained, underpaid and overworked.

Progress is being made in this respect, I admit, but the crowding in many of the institutions forces the staff, even when it wants to do a good job, to be overwhelmed with the immediate custodial task. They just do not have the time or opportunity to do the individual work needed to get at the individual problem.

Case loads in both probationary and placement fields are double what they ought to be, and individual attention of sufficient degree is extremely difficult to give.

The greatest problem of all, of course, for the hon. Minister, is in the field of specialized staff. He has mentioned tonight that perhaps specialized staff is not as important as some would have it but I think he recognizes the fact that this is one of the great problems. When he sees, as he does in some of the institutions, offices for psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers, with not permanent people occupying those offices, then he faces trouble. Psychiatrists for an afternoon a week, or for a day or two a week, just cannot fill the need.

As a programme series on the CBC pointed out so effectively recently, the psychiatrists who visit Cobourg for one day a week can do little more than recognize and note cases for treatment. They just have no time to adequately treat these patients. There is no place in Ontario, really, to send them for the care and for the treatment they ought to have. Smith's Falls and Thistletown, which should give this service, are both inadequate and desperately overcrowded.

Those of you who saw that picture on the CBC, outlining the problem of "Jimmy" realized the desperation which is faced in this field.

The same thing is true of probation and rehabilitation services, of course. They are made up of people who are dedicated and extremely hard-working, and I pay my tribute to them here tonight. But they lack adequate training.

A short time ago—and perhaps the hon. Minister could bring us up to date here, I do not know whether these figures are still true—in the entire rehabilitation service there was not a single fully-trained social worker. We hope that is changing, and changing rapidly. As I pointed out, these people, as well as those in the probationary service, struggle under a case load which is double what they should have, to do effective work.

The hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass) pointed out, in the CBC series to which I referred, that there are no university courses for these people, but that some in-service training is being given. It is obvious that because of the heavy case load and the time and effort the staff members have to devote to their job, the time they can spend on in-service courses is extremely limited at the present time. So, all the courses we can offer are conditioned by the case load and by the dedication of these people to their task.

As far as ordinary jails are concerned, far too many of them are relics of a prehistoric past and they are awaiting modernization. A clipping, if I can find it here, from the Toronto Daily Star of recent date is headed:

CROWDED JAIL CONTRIBUTES TO JUVENILE CRIME—JURY

Overcrowding of the Don jail could be making new juvenile delinquents by forcing youngsters to mix with hardened criminals, a Supreme Court grand jury said yesterday.

Shortage of space at the jail makes it impossible to segregate different types of offenders the jury reported to Chief Justice J. C. McRuer. This could be a particularly bad factor in relation to the present need to do everything possible to reduce juvenile delinquency the jury said. The jury noted that over 800 male prisoners are often kept at the jail in facilities designed for less than 500.

Now the hon. Minister is aware of these conditions, I do not have to tell him about them. Underneath the picture he painted tonight, I am sure, is the hope that they can be overcome.

I am not telling him anything new here at this time, but I am not so sure that this government is willing to face up, in any realistic way, to the problem of correcting them. I hope I am wrong in this, but certainly the estimates before us do not seem to indicate a realistic approach to the problem.

The government has appointed a new Minister. It agrees in principle that the reform emphasis is needed, at least the hon. Minister says so. But like the pharaohs of old, I am afraid they tell him to go out to make bricks without straw; or maybe it is hay in this case, real green hay that is needed.

For fundamental to a practical reform programme is the investment of large capital funds to bring the institutions and staffs up to date. Without such an improvement the work cannot go forward with any degree of speed or success.

So in line with what I said already, and in line with the picture the hon. Minister gave us, in line with what the hon. Minister said, I am going to lay before the hon. Minister a ten-year plan of development and urge that he undertake it on a crash basis.

I am suggesting that he should undertake such a ten-year plan designed to completely transform the present reform set-up from the custodial to the redemptive emphasis. Let me assure the hon. Minister that if he gets the plan underway and a change of government occurs in the meantime that we will carry it through to completion and improve on it.

An hon. member: Oh, you have a hope!

Mr. Young: Well, you know, stranger things have happened. In the days to come we are going to look forward to real progress across this province and one of the progressive measures the people are going to take is to elect a more progressive government.

All of us realize the transformation we would all like to see cannot be carried through overnight. We know that it will take some time to revamp the institutions and to train personnel for the job that must be done. But the start that is being made now with the new hon. Minister ought to be accelerated and the department should work to a plan which sets out goals and deadlines over the years ahead.

Basic, of course, to such a ten-year plan is the philosophy of treatment for the offender. I think we have had something of that treatment philosophy here tonight from the hon. Minister himself.

That philosophy emerges both from the needs of society and of the offender. Both need protection, and if that protection can be achieved through probationary procedures without the offender having to carry the stigma of an institutional record, then this is a consummation devoutly to be wished. But if he does have to be incarcerated, then the ultimate aim should certainly be his restoration to society as soon as possible as a well integrated full-fledged citizen.

This means that his incarceration should be as far as possible related to the society to which he will eventually return. Part of the pattern of treatment—we have heard something of that too—part of these patterns which are emerging are devices such as indefinite sentencing, careful classification, upgrading of education and of skills useful in society, contact with the outside through letters, visitors, occasional weekend furloughs. Then comes the gradual reintroduction into society through more frequent and more extended furloughs, outside jobs, prerelease homes and careful supervision and assistance for a reasonable time after release to assist in the adaptive process.

Restoration as complete as possible, and as quickly as possible, is basic to the philosophy of treatment and of success of a long-term plan.

I have here a document written by Clas Amilon telling of the Swedish penal system and he speaks of the treatment of young offenders 18 to 20. A national youth prison board, he says:

—is responsible for questions of release. Before granting release in each individual case, the board considers whether the objective of the institutional stay has been achieved or whether there are other valid reasons to terminate the treatment. Release may be conditional or definitive.

Conditional release or parole is usually granted after approximately one year, that is the normal minimum sentence. However, if parole is considered ill-advised, the board shall re-examine the case at least every six months thereafter. Parole must be granted after two years, except under extraordinary circumstances.

The parolee shall be kept under supervision for at most two years more by a supervisor and may be required to observe certain rules concerning place of residence, employment and so on. During the whole period of parole, the youth prison board has the right to return the parolee to the institution for misbehaviour.

James Bennett, the director of United States Bureau of Prisons, says this:

In the United States we have created prerelease guidance centres in several large cities for the purpose of helping young inmates scheduled for parole to make the difficult transition from institutional to community life. They come to the centre from the institutions two to four months before their release date, work at jobs found for them in the community and receive intensive counselling tailored to their individual problems.

So far, our preliminary data indicates less than a quarter of the youngsters who have the benefit of this programme fail on parole. This in sharp contrast to half of those who are released directly from the institutions to the community. A number of states are now setting up similar programmes.

Indeed, here in Ontario we are beginning this process and I hope it will continue and will be intensified.

Now the ten-year plan that I am proposing to the hon. Minister should immediately set up a timetable for the establishment of smaller institutions with specified and specialized functions. Many of our present institutions are just too big, and many of the smaller ones are far too crowded. A realistic plan must be built which will make it possible to deal with each individual on the basis of his needs and to return him to society at the earliest possible time. Staff members must be able to establish close and friendly contact with each offender. The smaller the group, within reason, the better possibility of such a contact.

Again, quoting from Clas Amilon, in a publication of the Swedish institute:

Morally, a sentence to youth prison is regarded as a punishment and is imposed by a court. In reality, however, youth prison is a sanction of educative nature imposed for an unfixed period of time.

According to the law, the length of treatment may not generally be less than one year. In practice, however, parole is now often granted after only approximately ten months. The maximum duration is four years.

It is thus characteristic of youth prisons that the duration of the treatment is not specified in the sentence but is determined during the course of the treatment. Differentiation at the local level is achieved through the small-group principle. According to this principle, pupils are placed in small units of approximately ten each.

And the hon. Minister mentioned this kind of principle tonight.

In this way, it is possible to protect the easily bullied, the passive boys from the active, aggressive pupils and to bring together those with similar interests and potentiality.

Apart from the differentiation aspect, the small-group principle has numerous other advantages from a therapeutic point of view. A sense of solidarity between personnel and pupils is more easily achieved. Individual treatment is facilitated. The pupils are given a degree of security impossible to attain in a large community.

Conflicts between the members of big groups frequently result in riots, mass escapes, collective defiance and so on. When manifestations of mass hysteria of this kind threaten to develop in small groups, they can be more easily controlled or prevented by personnel, and the psychological forces generated by group living can be used to good advantage by those in charge.

There is a close relationship between the principle of the small group and the size of the institution. None of the institutions in the youth group can accommodate more than 90 pupils and most of them have 30 to 60 beds. The colonies in turn, all of them of the release-home type, have accommodation for only 10 to 15.

Even if the institution is constructed according to the pavilion system, and the inmates are divided into small groups, it is extremely important from the therapeutic point of view that the senior officials have a detailed personal knowledge of the inmates and of their problems, which is obviously much easier if the institutions are not larger than stated above.

Now this is a picture of the institutions that are now being established under that jurisdiction. Denmark and other jurisdictions are undertaking similar programmes, and as the hon. Minister has indicated, this is the goal here which we hope he will be pressing toward in a realistic way.

The trend toward smaller institutions, we realize, is apparent in Ontario and has been for some time. But the speed of building is just too slow, and we are not thinking in adequate terms of what small institutions ought to be. Just because we are not building rapidly enough, the increasing population in the province is sending more youngsters into our institutions than we can handle. The result is, as we know, drastic overcrowding. The institutions have no control over their intake. The courts send problem cases there whether there is room or not. The only way to make room for the new ones is to get rid of some of the others who have been there for some time.

In our boys schools, the length of stay in 1949 was one and a half years. As I noted in the report we got today, it is just slightly over half of that at the present time. If we had adequate institutions, adequately staffed, I would say that this denotes very real progress. But as one authority in the field put it, it is simply kicking them out the back door to make room for those coming in the front door, and too many of them will be back.

The third emphasis that I want to make in regard to the ten-year plan is specialized institutions. These can be grouped for ease of servicing and within easy reach of specialized staffs. The functions of each must be related to the particular need of its occupants. Again the locations of these are important and I will not dwell further on this as they have been covered adequately, I think, by the hon. member for Dovercourt.

Mr. A. Kirkpatrick, executive director of the John Howard Society of Ontario, says:

We obviously need to diversify our institutions by programme with appropriate function properly related to the degree of custody. Basic programmes will vary between industrial production, educational training, farm operations or road and park clearing.

One of the essential differentiations is to develop medical correction centres. These should be places under medical control, where we would basically attempt to work with those people who appear individually sick and who obviously need a highly individualized type of treatment, with medical orientation and a high complement of professional services for diagnosis and treatment and research.

This brings us to the next phase of the ten-year plan, and that is adequate staff. Ultimately, the goal of the plan must be that every institution—and I would like to stress this point—whatever its size or nature, should have a fully trained penologist or social worker as its superintendent. Adequate medical, psychological and psychiatric skills should be available and all staff should be a vital part of the treatment team. This is, of course, a long-term goal but it should be possible within the ten years.

The first step toward it is the strengthening of the university departments and that is under way—for staff training in penology and related subjects. Encouragement must be given young people to enter the field. It seems to me that consideration must be given young people to enter the field. Thought must be given to paying full university expenses for young men and women who will undertake university work leading to degrees and professions related to this field, in return for a commitment to at least year-for-year for the time they are assisted.

I realize that many young people may not want to be assisted for the whole period; they may have resources which allow them to take one, two, three or more years. But I would think that we should do our utmost to offer the incentive to young people who want to enter this field. That is necessary. We should as a society pay for their training in return for at least year-for-year of service for that training.

I know the Budget comes in here and perhaps if the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) were here it would send shivers up and down his spine, I do not know. But to attract and hold good people in this field, we must offer them a sense of achievement and more freedom to work than they now have under non-professional supervision. We must also be willing to pay salaries which match other lines of work. To quote Mr. Kirkpatrick again, he says this:

All of this comes back to the necessity for the selection and training of staff. Salaries and working conditions need progressive improvement to make possible the development of a professional directional service.

There is no use building structures alone unless staffs are trained and ready to work with the type of inmate to be placed in those institutions. Only staff can develop the type of programme necessary for a truly corrective approach to the problem of penology.

It is not just enough to train them in function but it is essential to train them in attitudes as well.

Mr. Chairman, to match the university expansion geared to staff, there must be a rapid speed-up in in-service training. Again this has already been undertaken in this province. But there are a good many superintendents and employees all along the line who are top-flight people but who have not had the opportunity to qualify as full-fledged penologists and social workers. Leave of absence for such people, who want to qualify, should be arranged. Perhaps it could be a six-month period every year. This would have to be worked out. Adequate pay should continue during such leave of absence. The department headed by Dr. Penfold in Guelph should be strengthened for more intensive in-service training for present custodial staff, who may not have the background or the inclination to tackle university courses.

For some time to come I think we must realize that the present staff will largely have to be depended upon to man the institutions. But gradually, with retirement, with improved training for present staff, and with intensified university training of specialists, changes can be made to bring reform institutions into line with modern thinking and modern demands.

When the 70s, which we heard so much about one day here in this House, arrive, we hope that we will be heading into the kind of institution that this province ought to have and of which it can really be proud.

The research department, which the hon. Minister mentioned and concerning which he made the announcement the other day, is under way and I can only say that it is very unfortunate that the hon. Minister had to make this announcement at this time. This kind of research department should have been set up years ago by his predecessors, but we are now glad that the hon. Minister has taken the initiative and has started the research department. I hope that department will be strengthened as quickly as possible to survey the whole field and to make recommendations regarding the future in this field.

But in the meantime, while this process is going on, Mr. Chairman, surely there can be at least provision for one fully qualified social worker in each institution? I know they are scarce, but with adequate salaries offered and with more freedom to work in their own way, I think more can be obtained. Certainly there are qualified people who can be attracted into probationary and placement fields. Such people do not work for money alone, but a good salary scale will certainly assist in bringing them into the service.

I have here an article from the New Statesman of January 31, 1964, part of which I want to put before the House. It is written by Geoffrey Frampton and is entitled, "A Lesson from Denmark". I am not going to read it all, but it does give a point of view which I think is one of real accomplishment. Speaking of the offender, Mr. Frampton points out that:

In Denmark he cannot conduct his own defence, a means by which so many of our prisoners—

he is speaking of England, of course:

—ensure their own conviction but he gets full legal aid as a matter of routine. If he is convicted he may have to refund the cost of it. There is keen competition among the Danish bar for appointment to the panel from which defence counsels are chosen.

I might call the attention of the hon. lawyers in the House to this particular passage. I continue:

Justice is manifestly swift. All but the most serious cases are tried within a month of the arrest or other commencement of proceedings. Even when the trial must take place before a jury in the high court, that is to say where the permissible sentence is one of eight years' imprisonment or more, it will seldom be delayed more than two months.

There are no juvenile courts. The Danes never think of a child offender as a criminal and no one under 15 can be brought before a criminal court.

Even charges against juveniles between 15 and 18 are generally withdrawn by the public prosecutor and referred to those admirable voluntary bodies, the children's protective committees.

From 18 to 21, an offender is liable to imprisonment only in extreme circumstances and the sentence will normally be served in an open-camp juvenile prison. More probably the offender will go to a probation hostel or to the care of a probation officer.

Liberal use is made of a suspended sentence. In 1958, for example, 1,171 offenders received suspended imprisonment sentences, the suspension being for two or three years. Two hundred and seventy-nine of them were restricted as to residence or employment, and 130 were prohibited from the use of alcohol or drugs.

A recent survey showed that 52 per cent of the offenders given suspended sentence got into trouble again but of these, only 40 per cent had to go to prison.

Parole and probation for Danish offenders are supervised by a unique body, the Danish Welfare Association, heavily state-subsidized but dependent on the willingness of citizens to give paid but non-professional help. It involves the public in the work of crime prevention and the rehabilitation of offenders to an extent paralleled only in Holland.

But by far the most significant Danish penal work is being done with the compulsive offenders. Habitual offenders, besides those accused of sexual offences or other crimes carrying heavy sentences, including murder, are psychiatrically examined outside the prison. The results of the examination will be before the trial court.

As long ago as 1925, Denmark passed legislation making special provision for those who, while not insane or certifiably mentally defective, were suffering from mental impairment or sexual abnormality at the time of their offences. If such people were found to be dangerous, or if they have committed offences making them liable to heavy prison sentences, they go for an indeterminate time to a special institution providing psychiatric help and are released when they are no longer a threat to public safety.

And this is interesting:

Of the first 300 psychopaths thus detained, 147 have been convicted of offences against property, 88 of sexual offences against children, 25 of other sexual offences, 16 of arson, 13 of murder and other crimes of violence, and every period of detention was between two and three years. Their psychiatric treatment has been continued on parole.

Mr. Frampton finishes his article by saying:

By and large, it is the willingness to scrap ineffective methods and institutions which, so far as I can judge, distinguishes the Danish system so sharply from our own.

Mr. Chairman, just because the ten-year programme I have outlined cannot be achieved overnight it should not be dismissed. As I indicated earlier, the hon. Minister should adopt a plan such as this. He should phase it over the next ten years. He should set realistic yearly goals—only he and his department, perhaps, can do this—then he should put price tags on these goals and get on with the job.

I know the old question of cost comes up when a proposal like this is mentioned. But there is an old bit of wisdom which says, "If you need a thing badly enough, you will pay for it whether you have it or not." If the roof develops a leak and you postpone repairs you will see the validity of this old maxim. In the automobile age it can readily be applied to delay in necessary trips to the garage when the car is not in good running order.

The cost of our present reforms programme is all too apparent. It takes about $3,000 a year to keep a young person locked up. W. T. McGrath, executive secretary of the Canadian Corrective Association, puts it this way. He says:

This costs money. Money to pay salaries large enough to attract and hold sufficient staff. But this is cheaper than failure. The juvenile delinquent we fail with today is a criminal tomorrow.

It costs approximately $2,500 to keep a man in Kingston penitentiary for a year and, as the executive director of your society has written, "When we send a person to Kingston penitentiary for ten years we are signing a promissory note for $20,000." Add to this the cost of those long, complicated trials, the police services, and the high cost of failure in terms of money alone becomes apparent.

If a worker can stop one delinquent a year from developing further he will save his salary many times over. There is no place where economy is more destructive than in this matter of staff.

One expert in this field told me one day not long ago that one criminal in his lifetime might well cost society over $100,000. The hon. Minister is familiar—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member has a good deal more to say, perhaps I should move that the committee rise and meet and continue on these estimates when they are resumed.

Mr. Young: I would think a very few minutes. But I am willing to —

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, it all depends how long you wish to speak.

Mr. Young: I would think that five minutes would finish it. I will yield to the hon. Prime Minister if he wishes.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Right.

Mr. Young: One expert in this field tells me that in the lifetime of crime a recidivist might well cost us $100,000 and I said the hon. Minister is likely familiar with these figures and could give them perhaps more accurately.

Add to that the social cost of the wealth that he is not producing, as well as the human destruction and suffering he causes, then the cost to society, as we see, is very high. Every young person reclaimed and sent back to society is a useful member, saves untold amounts of hard, cold cash, and adds greatly to the accumulated wealth of society over his lifetime.

We need complete modernization, Mr. Chairman, of our reforms paraphernalia badly enough right now, that we are paying the price of it right now. Modernization will need a big capital investment over the next few years, but that investment will save a great deal of money over the years ahead. It will also save countless young people from continuing their original rebellion against their surroundings. It will save untold bitterness and human waste.

The new postwar generation is just beginning to storm our university doors. Many of them can be persuaded to invest their lives in this undertaking if it is presented to them as the crusade it is, and if they see it as a meaningful and rewarding life's work, with freedom to try out new ideas—and if there is reasonable security for the future attached to that job.

In closing, I might say that the new hon. Minister has a very challenging task ahead. The government must give him the backing he needs.

A start is obviously being made, but these estimates are just too thin to deal with the situation. Another year is coming. We hope that more adequate plans, phased with definite targets and goals and costs, will be laid before us in a more realistic budget next year. So we wish the hon. Minister well and hope that he does have the support of his government, and that in the days ahead he will achieve the goal he has outlined before this House tonight.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with these estimates and the estimates of The Department of Public Welfare.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.35 o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SEPARATE SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS AND BOARDS OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, just a short explanation of one or two of the provisions in these amendments. For the most part they represent tidying up or housekeeping pieces of legislation.

Regarding the Act to repeal The Residential and Farm School Tax Assistance Grants Act, of course under the new grant structure this Act itself will no longer be necessary and the regulations under it are being transferred to The Schools Administration Act.

In dealing with the other Acts, they will all, of course, go to the standing committee and will be dealt with there, but there are one or two provisions that perhaps are worthy of notice. The Public Schools Act will now provide that there will be some consideration given in the calculation of grants where average daily attendance has been affected by inclement weather, such as snowstorms in the western parts of the province and such other conditions.

There are one or two other interesting provisions under The Separate Schools Act, and I regret the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Braithwaite) is not with us this afternoon at this moment, because the word "coloured" is being deleted from The Separate Schools Act.

I think I should say though—and I once again regret that the hon. member is not here—that I have been studying the history of this legislation. I ran across a document prepared by a student at the University of Toronto, I think for his doctorate, tracing the history of these schools in southwestern Ontario. It is the only document really tracing the history that I have been able to discover. It points out quite clearly that there was no discrimination at all intended in the original enactment of this legislation and that, in fact, there has been no discrimination, as we use the term in this day and age, intended or contemplated, with this legislation. But I think it is obvious, with the development of our school programme here in this province, that this is no longer necessary and the word is being deleted.

We are also deleting from two Acts the reference to the word "dumb", because of the connotation given by some people to this; and this once again is being deleted from The Public Schools Act and The Separate Schools Act.

The bulk of the other amendments, Mr. Speaker, are primarily administrative in purpose and I am sure will be discussed rather thoroughly at the standing committee.

THE FARM PRODUCTS GRADES AND SALES ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Farm Products Grades and Sales Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE CORPORATIONS TAX ACT

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Corporations Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1961-62

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Income Tax Act, 1961-62.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE HOSPITALS TAX ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Hospitals Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE GASOLINE HANDLING ACT

Hon. Mr. Allan moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Gasoline Handling Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Provincial Treasurer be good enough to give us an explanation of these bills he has introduced?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the first bill introduced is amendments to The Corporations Tax Act. These amendments are mainly for the purpose of bringing our Act in line with the federal Act. These amendments are presented each year to the House.

The Income Tax Act is brought in for the same purpose. Practically the only change is the addition of the privilege of farmers and fishermen to average their income over a five-year period as is permitted in the federal Tax Act.

The Hospitals Tax Act has to do with the changes in the tax additions to the new places of amusement as announced in the Budget statement, exempting those up to 75 cents and lessening by one cent the tax on admissions between 75 cents and a dollar.

The Gasoline Handling Act is an amendment to provide authority to transfer the Act to another Minister.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), a copy of which he has had in advance.

Did the Ontario Farm Union request an appointment with the Cabinet to present its annual brief, and if so why was it not granted before the agricultural estimates came before the House?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Firstly, the Ontario Farm Union did request an appointment to present its annual brief. In answer to the second part of the question, the date of the introduction of estimates is never considered when granting requests for meetings with these various organizations.

I believe that the union has been in touch with a member of the Cabinet staff and they are presently working out a convenient date. We have not as yet seen the brief they will present. We do not know what documents or proposals it will contain. In any event, there has never been any relation established, to my knowledge, between the time any estimates were presented to the House and when these deputations are received by the Cabinet.

The Cabinet sees a great many groups during the year and there are various factors governing the time at which they want the meetings. Some wish to present their briefs in connection with their annual meetings. Some of them want to present their briefs before the officers of a particular group go out of office, to be succeeded by another group in the annual elections. Some of the new executives of groups wish to have their own meetings and pass fresh resolutions in their constituent bodies before they present the briefs to us. Some of them want to come in before the session starts. Some of them want to come in after the session is over, during the spring and early summer.

From the point of view of the Cabinet, we try to take them in the order in which we receive them, while others have to be integrated with work which must be done while the House is in session.

I am not aware that any request was made to see us prior to the submission of the estimates of The Department of Agriculture. Frankly, it would never occur to us to put these two things together. For instance, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture was here on February 18. The Ontario mayors and reeves were here last December. The Municipal Association was in this week. So one of those groups came before the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs and one came after. There has never been any attempt on our part to relate one to the other.

What we do, as far as possible, is to accommodate the wishes of these groups and I can only assure the House that those who want to see us are always able to do so.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, on behalf of the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), I would like to draw the attention of the House and present to the House the 1964 issue of the official road map of Ontario. As hon. members will note, the cover this year features the Garden City Skyway.

In addition to the annual updating of the road data, The Department of Highways has added three new features for the information and guidance of the motoring public. Very briefly these are:

1. A list of the standard broadcasting stations in Ontario. This will enable a motorist to tune a local station for the area through which he is travelling. Many of these stations provide special broadcasts for the motorists during the summer months covering news, weather and local matters of interest.

2. Interchange numbers on Highway 401 have been shown for the convenience of motorists identifying the point of turn-off for specific highways and municipalities. This I may say will be of particular interest to those engaged in the primary tourist field.

3. Locations of service centres on Highway 401 have been shown. This, of course, will serve a useful purpose in the case of emergency or the planning of stops on a lengthy trip.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister a question in regard to the road map? I would like to inquire if it is the intention again this year that the road map will be sent out at public expense to all constituents in the constituency of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko).

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Minister would indulge me just for a moment that I might reply?

A year ago, sir, this matter came under consideration. I remind the hon. members of the House who were present and those who are new members, that the member from the riding of Bellwoods, as a service to his constituents, requested on their behalf what they could request themselves. That is, they could write to the hon. Minister of Highways and get the map returned in an envelope. That is their right as taxpayers of the constituency of Bellwoods and taxpayers of this province. The member for Bellwoods did that at a tremendous amount of time and energy on his own part and those associated with him, with no expense to the service or the staff of The Department of Highways.

Mr. Bryden: Who paid the postage?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Bryden: It came out of your own appropriation?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, this is the point; I sent them with a covering letter that was not political.

Mr. Bryden: At public expense.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, notice that raucous roar of laughter from that side of the House. That was raised on the last day of the session—the last day of the session. It so happens that somebody told me: “You know that the NDP—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! First of all, I might say that this question was out of order because it was not submitted to the Speaker before 12 o'clock. Secondly, the question was addressed to the Minister of Tourism and Information, but I quite recognize the right of the Minister to whom the inference was made, Mr. Chairman, to make a short reply. I do not want his reply to go into a speech, so if he will just in a word or two complete what he is going to say, I shall accept it.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, by mistake I discovered that an hon. member to his left hand had sent out some mail, so I sent a note. I said, “Reg, how many pieces of literature did you put in the mail?” And the hon. member looked at me and he wrote back, “700.” Well, I thought 700 for one hon. member to send out is not much. But the weekend afterwards I was in the city of Hamilton where my parents live and an NDP hon. member sent out a political letter to everybody in his constituency.

Mr. Bryden: Did he send road maps out?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Not a road map but a piece of NDP literature.

An hon. member: Shame.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Just to conclude my remarks, the leader of the NDP has—

Mr. MacDonald: Who is the hon. Minister talking about? Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! That will be all of the discussion under this order of business. I recognize the point of order, but as I said there will be no more discussion under this question. Now first of all the member raised a question without submitting it to my office and I allowed him, in a bit of leniency, to ask the question. I am asking now that there be no more discussion on this subject.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I raised the question in relation to a document tabled here and asked for permission to ask the question, but the point of order I wished to raise was that if the hon. Minister wishes to refer vaguely to some hon. member of this House, he should specify the hon. member to whom he is referring.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wentworth East (Mr. Gisborn) sent out 700. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Davison) sent out 10,000.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

May I point out to the members that for their convenience the interim report of the select committee on consumer credit has been printed as an appendix to yesterday's votes and proceedings which are in the binders today.

Orders of the day.

Hon. F. M. Cass (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to submit the annual report of the inspector of legal offices for the year ending December 31, 1963.

Clerk of the House: The 29th order: House in committee of supply; Mr. N. Whitney in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF REFORM INSTITUTIONS

On vote 2001:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I do not know if it is the hon. Minister's intention to reply to the remarks of the two hon. gentlemen, but if he wants to I will follow on after him.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, first I would like to congratulate the hon. members for Dovercourt (Mr. Thompson) and Yorkview (Mr. Young) for the fine contributions they made last night to the debate on these estimates, particularly as they agreed with most of the things I said in my remarks.

I also want to thank them for the expression of hope which they made last night that I should hold this portfolio for a great number of years. I must say that the idea is not entirely repulsive to me. As a matter of fact I find the portfolio very interesting and a great challenge, and I hope before I lay down the gauntlet in this respect, that I will have contributed a great deal toward modern penology.

May I also at the outset, Mr. Chairman, before someone draws it to my attention, point out that if and when the hon. members are reading the schedules in the annual report, part one on page 57, they need have no fear that this department has invented a new traffic offence, although this traffic offence, if there were such a one, would indeed be one worthy of great interest. I refer to that on page 57 under traffic offences, in which there is a line entitled "careless driving." Very good, if you can do it.

Mr. Chairman, last night the hon. member for Dovercourt made some reference to there being three beds in the alcoholic centre for treatment, and I think he was referring to women. I think I should point out that our women's treatment centre at Brampton, which is our clinic for treating addictions, has a capacity of 16 beds and has rarely reached that capacity. The bed count at the moment: the occupancy is seven. I should also point out that we only treat people who are properly motivated. In addition some treatment is given at the Mercer Reformatory by psychiatrists.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): I mentioned the foundation—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, this has nothing to do with our department.

Mr. Thompson: No, I appreciate that. I think in my notes you will notice—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think the hon. member will appreciate that I have a big enough job trying to answer for my own department without going any further afield.

Mr. Thompson: Well, you are an aggressive fellow. You could easily take over some of the other areas.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member for Dovercourt also made some reference to overcrowding. Now I would be very much interested if the hon. member would tell me which places are overcrowded. I know there are one or two which have some overcrowding, but there is very little overcrowding in our institutions, and then in a very small number of them. Perhaps it would be helpful if I read the daily count. The latest one is March 11, covering all institutions.

Guelph has a capacity of 860 and there are 903 there at the present time. The neuropsychiatric centre at Guelph has a capacity of 25 and now has 17 occupants. Camp Hendry, which is a satellite of Guelph, has a capacity of 40, there are presently 39 there. O.R. Elliot Lake has a capacity of 52—normal capacity, I should make it clear when I refer to capacity I mean the normal capacity for which it was designed—Elliot Lake has a normal capacity of 52 and there are presently 60 there.

McCreight's Camp, which is a satellite of Elliot Lake, has a capacity of 44; there are 25 there. Millbrook has a capacity of 250, there are now 202 there. Durham Camp, which is a satellite of Millbrook, has a capacity of 14; there are now 13 there. Mimico has a capacity of 352 and there are now 329. Hillsdale Camp, which comes under Mimico, has a capacity of 30; there are now 26 there.

The alcoholic clinic at Mimico has a capacity of 150, there are presently 48 there. The drug clinic at the Ontario Reformatory at Mimico has a capacity of 25, there are five presently there. The Burwash institution has a capacity of 790, presently there are 776 there. Fort William has a capacity of 90, there are presently 63. Monteith has a capacity of 210 and there are presently 162 there. Rideau has a capacity of 160 and there are presently 145 there. Burtch, with a capacity of 200, presently has 175.

The training centre at Burtch, which is a satellite of the institution at Burtch, has a capacity of 40 and there are presently 36. Ontario Training Centre at Brampton has a capacity of 200, and presently has 167. Mercer Reformatory has a capacity of 160, there are presently 80 there. The Ontario Women's Guidance Centre at Brampton, which has a capacity of 24, presently has 22. The Women's Treatment Centre at Brampton has a capacity of 16, there are presently seven. The totals for all of these institutions: normal capacity 3,732, present occupancy 3,300.

Mr. Thompson: I would disagree on two counts.

One is that I would suggest from the knowledge of many experienced men—I think for example of McHugh, who has been the governor of Sing Sing for many years—who suggested that 903 men in an institution such as Guelph is completely outmoded as an approach. He suggested an institution that large would not be able to reform an offender. I am sorry I do not have it with me, but I think, in looking at reports of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope), he was constantly emphasizing that he was going to get smaller units rather than crowding men into these large institutions. I also would suggest that Cobourg—I did not hear the figure on that, but in previous reports that we have had, even in the annual report, it has been admitted that Cobourg is overcrowded.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, first of all, we are referring to the adult institutions. The figure for Cobourg is that there is a normal capacity of 175, and there are 199 there at the present time.

Of course, there are two matters here. In the first instance, the hon. member was talking about the most advisable size of an institution. That is one thing. I agree with him, and our department agrees, that some of these institutions are too large. We are doing our best, and working on a programme now. For example, we will operate satellites out of them so that we can reduce the number in them.

But overcrowding is another matter. One may agree that perhaps 600 is too large; but one does not necessarily have to agree that, if it has a capacity of 600 and if there are 550 or 605 in it, that is overcrowded. This is the point I was making.

The hon. member for Dovercourt also referred to some plan, that there should be some place to go to before going to the reform institutions. He was referring, of course, to what is commonly known as probation houses, something of that nature. Of course, this is presently done. It is done at Concord. Homeless boys, and some who have convictions and are placed on probation, go there. They receive a grant from The Department of Public Welfare. Of course, the hon. member should know too that probationees are not the responsibility of this department but are the responsibility of another department. We do not deal with probationees.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate very much the hon. Minister answering these questions. This is one of the problems, I think, where there should be a close liaison between The Department of Public Welfare and the hon. Minister's department. But I would suggest that the house at Concord is just one example. I feel that there should be many of these.

You could refer to other communities, other countries, where there is a great emphasis on giving a choice. I have a strong suspicion that, possibly, a number of young boys and girls sent to institutions are sent there because of a bad home situation. The magistrate then has no alternative but to send them to an institution to get them away from the home. I agree it is not the hon.

Minister's department, but I know he is the kind of person who is going to see that these supplementary agencies are filled up. I say that if you have more probation hostels then perhaps you will not need to have so many large institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is a matter which has engaged my attention, too. Quite frankly, I think this whole area has to be considered by all of the jurisdictions. I think, at some stage or other, and pretty soon, that representatives of the federal Department of Justice, sir, our own Attorney General's Department, our department, perhaps The Department of Health, and perhaps one or two other jurisdictions I cannot think of at the moment, should get together to discuss some of these things. As a matter of fact, I think perhaps some set-up can be arranged whereby they could meet at regular intervals to do this. It is my intention, as soon as I have had some more experience in this field, to urge that this be done.

I should point out too, incidentally, that in reference to the suggestion of the overcrowding—and I have already pointed out that we are working now on a programme to reduce the size and distribute the inmates in smaller institutions—Mimico is the only other institution, really, which is over the maximum of 300 recommended by the Canadian Corrections Association. The Canadian Corrections Association has suggested that the maximum should be 300.

Mr. Thompson: The Fauteux report says there should not be over 600.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, the Canadian Corrections Association says we should not go over 300. I would be more inclined to go along with 300 than 600.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, it depends on the size of the institution we are talking about.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes. The best figure, they say, is 200. All of our other institutions, as has been pointed out, are below 200 and they are not overcrowded. In fact, no jurisdiction in Canada has so many varied institutions of such small size as we have. I believe, too, that last night the Don jail was specifically mentioned. This is, of course, not our institution, not in our jurisdiction. I should point out also, that it is costing us about $500,000 a year to try to reduce this overcrowding by removing, to our institutions, those serving over 30 days. This is all we can do in respect to that.

I presume the hon. member would like me to answer as many of the questions he asked as possible? The hon. member for Dovercourt also made some reference last night to the locating of institutions for political purposes. I have no knowledge of such institutions, no knowledge of any institutions in our jurisdiction which have been located for political purposes. I do not know to which ones he made reference. I discussed them all with my department and I can elicit no information which would lead me to believe that this was done. In any case, I can assure the hon. members of this House that, as long as I am Minister of this department, no institution will ever be located for political reasons.

Mr. Thompson: I would say I appreciate getting this assurance from the hon. Minister. I am, certainly at this point, not going to attach the sins, which I allege, to him; but I would think, when he is deciding where he is going to place new institutions, that he will have ground rules placing them. I think that, if he has logical ground rules, when he looks at the places where he now has institutions perhaps he will see that these institutions do not quite fit into the ground rules which the hon. Minister, as a progressive reformer in this area, will follow through on.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: There are some ground rules, of course. As a matter of fact, I would refer the hon. member to a speech I made in Kingston when we were discussing detention matters. We certainly expounded our views in this respect, at that time. If he would like it, I could get the speech and read it here. It will only take about another hour, but I will be very pleased to provide him with a copy of it. As a matter of fact, I might tell him I am rather proud of the fact that the John Howard Society is having the speech reprinted for distribution amongst their people.

I should also point out, too, in respect to any fear that an institution would be located for political purposes, that the statements I made in Kingston would certainly preclude anything like that. Because, if anything, it took a great deal of risk of incurring some political disfavour. I am very pleased that I did not, at least not to date. I am sure I can give the hon. member a feeling of satisfaction that this will not be the case.

A reference was made also by the hon. member to 9,000 admissions, that we are handling 9,000 people. This figure—9,000 or 10,000—is used every year apparently when these estimates are discussed, particularly in referring to the number of treatment staff we have to look after 9,000 people. It may give the impression to some of the hon. members that, at any given moment, the staff would have to look after 9,000 people. This is entirely wrong, of course.

I am not suggesting that the hon. member is deliberately designing his statement so they will get this impression, but this might be the impression he would leave with some people. This is, of course, the yearly turnover. It is not quite the exact figure. As a matter of fact, it is higher than that.

The population at any one time in our adult institutions is just over 3,000. The staff we have are not being required to attend to 9,000. They are being required to attend to about a third of that, or a little more than a third.

The hon. member also referred to a person in our institution who refused to look at a presentence report. This concerned me a great deal, because of course there is no use in having presentence reports if the greatest value is not derived from them. I made some inquiries about that since last night. We know the one he is referring to, because this case was mentioned, apparently, on some previous occasion, whether in this House or some place else, I do not recall.

The information I have been supplied with is as follows. The superintendent that the hon. member probably referred to, who incidentally was a graduate trained social worker herself, when she stated she did not make use of a presentence report was merely indicating that in her initial contact with a girl she wanted this to be without prior prejudice. It is obvious, however, great use needs to be made of the presentence report in planning the treatment programme, and it is always used, I can assure the hon. member.

At the present time, we have on file reports of treatment meetings, held by this particular superintendent, in which the presentence report is used in planning a course of treatment for every person coming under her jurisdiction.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, I would like to say that I did not use the name of a person. I am not sure really if the person you are suggesting is the one to whom I talked. Frankly, in the tour I went on, I had a great respect for the dedication of the people. These were conversations I had, and I hope I have in no way embarrassed a certain member of your staff, because I am thinking of the superintendent with whom I was impressed. I am just saying that the person to whom I did talk—and I cannot recall who it was at this point—impressed me, and I was also somewhat struck by her remarks in connection with presentence reports.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am very pleased to hear the hon. member refer to the dedication of the staff. This is the way I have found all of them wherever I have visited. I have not visited all of the institutions, but this is the way I find them generally. He may rest assured the person we are referring to was not even consulted. It is just that many of the staff thought this is the one he may have been referring to. But in any case, I can assure him that the presentence reports are of course used, and used extensively. They are most important.

The hon. member also stated that in many instances we give a man $20 and let him go. Of course, this is a perennial chestnut we hear every year, with all due respect to the hon. member. I am very much concerned about this statement because I read a lot of articles about this. Many newspapermen who go in and make a few inquiries, talk about the man who leave the institution with $20 in his pocket and no place to go and who is forgotten by everyone. That is only the case with those people who leave our institutions and want to have nothing to do with officialdom.

We have a very able rehabilitation service. These rehabilitation officers work with these people before they leave the institution; make arrangements to look after them and to help them after they get out; try to find, and do find them in many instances, lodgings; help pay for the lodgings; try to get work for them, and stick with them so long as that person is properly motivated.

I am sure the hon. member will agree there is no use trying to help anyone who does not want to be helped. As a matter of fact, we have not even got the legal right to do it. A man has served his sentence, he is free.

We offer him all the guidance we possibly can. If he accepts that guidance, he is given that guidance very gladly. But, and this is understandable, many of the people who are in institutions do not want to have anything to do with the people who put them there. They want nothing to do with them. "Give me what is coming to me and let me go." This is precisely the point. We help them. We have done everything possible.

As a matter of fact, I was a little disappointed in reading some of the newspaper articles. They kept repeating this, because of course they have been talking to people who are in that category, who do not want to be helped. They may tell somebody they want to be helped, but they do not. If they wanted to be helped, we would help them.

I followed through on one of these. There was a letter to the editor of The Trentonian in Trenton. I am going to read this to the House. It is very interesting. I think it is typical of the sort of thing on which many newspaper articles are based. The editor put this foreword on the head of the letter:

Normally unsigned letters do not see the light of day. But one I received in my mail this morning is of such a nature that it is worth breaking the rule and reprinting it here.

This is dated, Trenton, Ontario, Sunday, December 1, 1963.

DEAR SIR:

I have been reading articles in The Trentonian about rehabilitation of prisoners and am very interested. Being an ex-inmate myself, I have many things to say about rehabilitation.

I have just completed a sentence of ten months and eight days. Even though I want to go straight I may not be able to do so. I was discharged recently from a reformatory and am without a job or money. I was released with $46 on me but had to buy a winter coat and other clothes plus pay for a room for the weekend and am now broke.

During my time in the Ontario Reformatory I learned a trade which is tailoring, but what good is a trade when you apply for a job and say you have been in jail? You always get turned down. This is the reason why so many guys go back to jail. I have done almost three years in various reformatories and want to stay out but what can I do when I am broke and without a job? I am not going to freeze to death or starve to death because I will go back to jail before this happens. So there goes your rehabilitation down the drain.

One thing I would like to point out though, is that there should be more maximum security reformatories like Millbrook. I did the first six months of my sentence there for riotous conduct in Guelph last summer and it really changed my way of thinking. After about six months I was reclassified and transferred to an industrial farm.

I want to reform. I cannot do so without employment and a place to live. I am not eligible for welfare, as I have not lived in the town for a year, and cannot collect unemployment insurance as I have not enough stamps.

I know the public will say it is all my own fault and I agree with them. I was released on parole from Guelph last spring with the help of that fine organization, the John Howard Society, who got me employment with a local firm and helped me as much as possible, but I went and got into more trouble and went to jail again.

I was a rebel against society until I was sent to Millbrook where this rebellious mood was taken out of me.

You may think I am some type of crackpot writing to you like this but I just want to prove to other young men that being in jail is no good. I quit school in Grade eight and I have nothing but a record of three years to show for it.

I am not complaining because I was sent to jail, for I deserved the punishment I received for breaking the law. I would join the army if I could, but because of my record I can't. I would like to see this letter printed in your paper to show that being in jail is no good.

Yours respectfully,
An ex-inmate

I will not bother to read the rest of it. There is some comment from the editor about where he should go for help and so on, but when I read this it concerned me. It was obviously written by a man of some intelligence; he appeared to be sorry for having broken the law.

He had apparently been trying to help himself; he regrets he cannot get assistance, and so on. I was concerned, too, that he said he had to buy a winter coat and other clothes because I know our rehabilitation officers provide them with clothing. We make clothing in the institutions and it is not institutional type of clothing. They get overcoats if they are released in the winter. They are looked after in that respect.

I was concerned about all of these things and so I wrote a letter to the editor. Now, unfortunately I have just noticed that it was marked "Private and Confidential" and not for publication. If I had known that I would have asked for permission and read it here.

In effect, I told the editor what I have told the House this moment. I told him I was very much concerned about this and asked whether he would help me try to find this person. I asked him to do what he could to find this person. After all, Trenton is not that large a place. Here is his answer and this is not marked confidential and I can see no reason for not reading it. He said:

DEAR MR. GROSSMAN:

The letter on which my article of December 4 was published was not signed, nor did the writer later contact me as I had hoped.

Oh yes, I missed a part, the part that I did not read.

The part that I did not read in the clipping was where the editor asked him to get in touch with him and told him that he would help. He said there is help available and told him to get in touch with him, or the John Howard Society, and he would do what he could. So I presume that the man may have got in touch with the editor and therefore wrote him. I continue:

There were numerous offers of local help, including jobs at his trade.

This is what the editor elicited from advertising in his paper to give this man assistance.

The probation officer was also interested. I used the medium of the newspaper for the double purpose of trying to create a sympathetic public appreciation of an ex-prisoner's problems in the hope that he would respond. He did not.

I regret that I am thus unable to help in that respect. From the response and telephone calls, I judge that there is much more public sympathy toward this problem than some suspect.

I am aware of the work done by rehabilitation officers, probation services and private groups such as John Howard. Penal reform has also been bent toward improving the chances for complete rehabilitation of convicted persons yet much depends on the individual's attitude, and it looks as though the letter writer did not give himself or anybody else a real chance.

My sincere thanks for your personal interest. Notwithstanding the failure to get this man to respond, I hope that some good was done by publication of the letter.

I stand ready to do whatever my position permits to assist those who work to help ex-prisoners.

Yours sincerely,
R. C. Cornish,
Editor

I am very appreciative of the trouble the editor went to.

I only point this out to illustrate to hon. members the care we must take in reading some of these articles which are written and which, of course, draw the sympathy of the reader. But where anybody says he has left any of our institutions with no money and no help that is entirely incorrect.

We have a fine rehabilitation service, and we will do anything to help a man if he is properly motivated.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to say, first of all, that although you mention a number of the people who are released from jail, you do not give us the proportion of these—I suppose it is hard to get—who do not want any help. For some of them it may be because they are independent and are going to adapt to the environment. For some it may be because of resentment at having been put in an institution. But my point is that if people come out of prison with a chip on their shoulder they want nothing to do with the authorities.

I suggest there are a large number of those, perhaps because there is too much custodial emphasis in the institution.

My argument to you, sir, on the point I was raising, is that it seems to me that certain intermediary steps must be taken before you allow a man to return to the community. When you talk of rehabilitation services I think of myself as a parole officer; having taken parolees, admittedly from the federal penitentiary, I know the real problems of trying to get them jobs.

I suggest, with the flow of people coming out of your jails, that many of them will not be able to get attention. I think you have about 145 rehabilitation officers across the country? I am not sure of the figure, but anyway I suggest that they will not get sufficient treatment. I also suggest—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The case load is 50 to 60.

Mr. Thompson: I am holding up other people who will want to discuss this but the need for such things as halfway houses—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is another matter I propose to deal with, because either the hon. member, or the hon. member for Yorkview raised it. I do not recall which.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): How long is this conversation going on?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Which conversation?

Mr. Sopha: That which is going on.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member for Dovercourt wants answers to his questions.

I think I should answer them. I would be very pleased to save the time of this House. I would not want to be accused of ignoring the questions which were raised by the hon. members in their speeches last night. I presume he wants the courtesy of getting replies to whatever he asked me to give him. If he does not want them—the hon. member nods, he wants answers to his questions.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I think this is very useful—the thing which is going on here.

We are getting answers to some of the questions. We are finding out some of the answers we want. Certainly, in connection with this last item, I would like to ask some further questions. If this is the time to do it I would be glad to, to terminate the two-way conversation and make it a three-way conversation, if that will help any. If the hon. member for Sudbury—

Mr. Thompson: I think, Mr. Chairman, that the point that my friend, the hon. member for Sudbury is making is whether I have been interrupting you after you have spoken. Perhaps he would prefer, after you have answered the question, that it come up in the estimates at the appropriate time. I know that he, like I, appreciates that you are answering my questions but my answer to that, sir—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting in this House, and I have heard the hon. members appeal to the Chairman: "Where do we get the answers to this thing?"

There may have been some things asked by the hon. members last night which may not appear in a particular estimate, and I would not want to be accused of not answering these questions. I am quite prepared, if the hon. members wish, to let them go until we get to the items and hope that the questions they raise will be answered there. I have answers to the questions raised by the hon. member for Yorkview last night but I am quite willing, Mr. Chairman, to abide by their wishes or by your ruling.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could add a question to the general line of questions being asked by the hon. member for Dovercourt? I am asking in particular, Mr. Chairman, about the Harold King farm and that general type of organization. I am wondering if the hon. Minister would comment on the good or bad that this type of organization is doing. I understand that this particular farm is in dire financial straits. Does the government have any particular plan for aiding these organizations in their rehabilitation efforts?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I should tell the hon. member that this was a question asked by the hon. member for Yorkview last night. I have some comments on it but I am looking for guidance. I do not want to hold the House up.

Mr. Braithwaite: Thank you.

Mr. Thompson: I think the hon. Minister is looking at me. We appreciate very much his elucidations of the questions. For myself and my party, we hope he will continue with them.

Mr. Chairman: Order! I would like to suggest that, wherever possible, the Minister let the details of his remarks be discussed during the appropriate vote. Certainly, if there are any specific items which he does not feel will be covered in any vote and which were mentioned last night, I would think that it would be in order for him to answer those specific questions and then let the remainder be answered during the specific vote.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I would have to go through all these and hope that I could make a decision as to which ones are in the estimates. For example, the question of half-way houses will not be in the estimates. I think, in all fairness and for my own guidance too, that if we have this sort of discussion and if I could answer the questions, I might learn something I would like to know about. So if it is all the same, Mr. Chairman, with your permission, may I proceed on this?

The hon. member for Dovercourt also asked—unfortunately I am a very poor hand-writer; I cannot sometimes read my own notes and I wrote them last night—I do not know whether he asked if we would refer some of our parolees to the John Howard Society, or whether he stated that we did not. I am not sure. But in any case, the answer is that we do. We do refer parolees to the John Howard Society.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to ask the hon. Minister: On this whole parole system he has clarified his classification, or lack of classification, in connection with people entering the institutions. It seems to me that the parole system, at least my grasp of it, is one of confusion. The hon. Minister referred a little while ago to a probation officer taking charge of some parolees—well, he used the words “probation officer” or I thought he did.

But, for example, at the remissions branch of the federal department, it is sometimes suggested that the John Howard Society should look after the federal people coming out of federal institutions. The question that comes to my mind is why would the John Howard Society take over some of the parolees when the hon. Minister already has rehabilitation officers?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are back again to what I tried to explain earlier. There are many people who want nothing to do with the government who put them in the institution. They are just resentful, they want nothing to do with official people. They are prepared to go to places such as the Salvation Army or John Howard or Elizabeth Fry, because they feel these people are not government people. This is where these organizations play their great role, and they are doing a good job in this respect. But this I think will explain the reason for that.

There was also a suggestion that we use prisoners to produce revenue. This, of course, is not the reason. The whole point is that we teach them good working habits, teach them trades, and we see nothing wrong with this and I am sure the hon. member would not either. It is good therapy for them to know they are working and producing something of value, rather than just making little rocks out of big rocks. They take a great deal of pride from some of the items produced, for example, the Braille books. They know they are useful, they know they are doing something of some use.

The hon. member and other hon. members of this House will appreciate that one of the problems of some of the people you get in the institutions is that they have felt completely useless in society—not needed, of no consequence—and it is nice for them to feel they are doing something of some importance. Those of the hon. members, for example, who may have visited Brampton, will have experienced the very great pleasure that some of those inmates had in exhibiting some of their products to the public. We see no harm, either, in reducing the expenditures of the institutions because, after all, the taxpayers of this province are expending some $20 million. If in the process of doing this therapeutic work, we can also help them pay for their keep, there is nothing too much wrong with that. I think the hon. member will agree.

The hon. member for Dovercourt also, in discussing this aspect of it, talked about the innotonous work that some men do, such as making licence plates at Millbrook. It is something I thought about when I visited Millbrook. I should point out that this is no more monotonous than some of the work they would find in industry generally—I mean, this sort of automatic work done by machine, cutting out dies and that sort of thing. This is in existence in many of our plants across this country. So these inmates working at this sort of work are taught certain good work habits to begin with. They are taught that this is the sort of thing you have to put up with sometimes when you are out working.

I should also point out to the House that unlike the system which they would find in private industry, we do shift them around. Because their freedom has been taken away from them, they are within certain confined quarters, and we realize that the monotony would be more irksome than if they were outside, and so we progress them to other types of work. I should also point out that the licence plates are made at a maximum security institution and there is a limited type of work that you can do in a maximum security institution. This is one of the reasons for that.

If I may turn to some of the questions the hon. member for Yorkview raised; he was referring to smaller institutions. I think I have already mentioned that this is precisely the way we feel. Some of the jurisdictions, as a matter of fact, that the hon. member mentioned last night or perhaps was thinking about, have probably learned about this from the Ontario system. Many of them have. As a matter of fact, I would not be too much surprised if, in some of those jurisdictions the hon. member was referring to, in their Parliament today some member of the Opposition was not getting up and referring to something done in the Ontario jurisdiction that he thinks their government ought to employ. We have much to learn from many others, but many others have learned a great deal from us and I think that is the way it should be. But we are going into the smaller institutions all the time, whenever possible.

Now the question of half-way houses—

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the hon. Minister as to how fast or how rapidly he plans that these smaller institutions be built? For example, are we thinking of replacing the Guelph institution with clusters of smaller institutions to get this large group separated out as it ought to be separated? Are we thinking in terms of phasing this in any realistic way? I think this is the crux of the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell the hon. member. You cannot lay down this kind of plan, it is not possible. For example, we are hoping to reduce the situation at Guelph with satellites.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Are they scheduled in public works?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Some of them are and they do not have to be scheduled. The smaller forestry camps do not have to be scheduled in public works, because we do them with our own labour. In fact, I think all of the forestry camps have been put up with our own labour, so this does not have to be done.

Mr. Trotter: Guelph would be in public works.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, we are not going to build a new Guelph. What we were talking about is reducing the number of people who are going to be in Guelph, to begin to funnel them out to forestry camps and places of that nature, which perhaps start off as satellites of Guelph. Then we can deal with Guelph after we have accomplished some of this.

The hon. member should also realize you do not just deal with one institution at a time. We have other programmes. I have a couple of experiments going now which I cannot talk to the House about. We want to experiment with them first to see how they work out. If they work out well, then we will proceed on that. It is very difficult to have a time schedule in this type of work.

Now as to half-way houses: This is another subject which elicits a great deal of sympathy from people when they read about them in the press. They certainly caught my interest. They usually attract to themselves some prominent people who are very sympathetic to the problems which released prisoners find when they go out into free society. I have done some studying on this subject and again this is one, I would like to inform the hon. members, which is very difficult to handle. This is another area where you might give the impression that all or a good portion of correction people favour half-way houses. This is just not so.

I think the people who are doing the job are trying to do a good job and in many instances probably are doing a good job, but we have to approach this with a very great deal of caution. I would, on this particular subject, say that there are at least a great deal of pros and cons by qualified correction people. I would like to summarize the opinions expressed by two eminent criminologists—perhaps the hon. member for Dovercourt or the hon. member for Yorkview will have heard of them—Barnes and Teeters. They have just written a book recently—I should say 1951; it was revised in 1954—called New Horizons in Criminology. These people are considered—pardon?

Mr. Thompson: That is an old one.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is an old text.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, all right, I think the same thing applies. I could have chosen half a dozen other opinions. This has been discussed at correctional meetings, correctional conventions, and they are not by any means—

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): The Attorney General of the United States endorses half-way houses.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know how the half-way houses are working in the United States and I am not taking my guidance from the Attorney General of the United States. I was only giving you one opinion. There are other opinions. There are people who give you strong reasons in favour of them. All I am saying is that it is not quite as open and shut and as black and white as you suggest. There is a grey area in this which has to be explored before you go into it.

If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I will read this. This will be a good summary, I think, of the opinion of those people who suggest you move slowly in this field. They state that of course this is not a new idea. Many of these homes were started in the last century. I am quoting from them:

If they are to be effective at all, they must be clearly and completely separated from prison authorities.

I think that is fairly obvious in view of what I said earlier. If you want to help people, a half-way house is supposed to be what it implies; a place where the person will go after he leaves the institution, before he takes his place in society, a sort of shock absorber. But if he is going to do this, if he is a person who is to go into a half-way house and he is to have confidence in it, he wants to be away from officialdom again. So it cannot be associated with a government body. This is, I think, elementary to the whole thing.

A number of such homes are in existence but throughout the world finance is their big problem.

Of course this is one of their problems here.

Modern thinking does not recommend these homes indiscriminately. There are many reasons for this.

For instance, it is inevitable that the careful selection and segregation of inmates under the classification programme must be completely disregarded in these homes and ex-first offenders mixed with ex-penitentiary inmates.

This is something we would not actively encourage. Now hon. members will recall last night I went to a great deal of trouble to detail our classification and segregation system and I think you will all agree that in modern penology this is an accepted method. This is elementary, it is fundamental to the whole business of rehabilitation. You have got to classify and segregate. This is one of the problems, apparently one of the criticisms, of some half-way houses. They just do not do it. They are not geared to it.

Two eminent authorities in this field have said that we cannot condemn the system. We certainly cannot accept it with much enthusiasm.

I am not quoting myself, I am quoting somebody else.

It might be more practical to send released prisoners individually to the various missions than to herd them together in an ex-convicts home. It is a makeshift.

They further say, and I quote again:

A new approach to this problem is to bend every effort and stimulate the client to help himself. Self-reliance must come from within. What he needs most is expert guidance.

This is our own feeling, really, on a half-way home. We feel that we have advanced beyond this, certainly within our own organization. We believe in expert guidance towards self-reliance.

There are some half-way houses. Some of them are attempting to do a good job and there is no doubt that in some instances they have succeeded in helping some person who has come out of an institution and gone into a half-way house. We will certainly do everything possible to help encourage any half-way house which appears to be doing the kind of a job it should be doing.

But again, this still would not come within the aegis of our department, because they would, as a matter of fact, they may possibly qualify for some financial assistance from The Department of Public Welfare. Although even there, there is a great danger. If they are going to get financial assistance, openly, from a government institution again, and I use the term very carefully and with qualification, in the view of the ex-inmate, it would have the stigma of a government institution.

So we are looking at this, we are following it and we are hoping. We have officers to co-operate with them wherever possible and we hope that if this is going to develop, we will do everything we can to develop it along the right lines. But we are being very cautious at the present time and study is continuing.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I would like the advice of the hon. Minister before I get started on my remarks—

Mr. Chairman: This is vote 2001.

Mr. Singer: Well, that is what I want to try to find out. I have a problem I want to discuss concerning the pretrial examination of charged sexual offenders, their treatment in the institutions and so on.

This is a problem that certainly concerns this hon. Minister, to some extent concerns the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Cass), and to some extent concerns the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond). It is a very serious problem and I wonder if this hon. Minister wants to hear the criticism and attempt to reply, or whether, Mr. Chairman, it should more properly belong with the hon. Attorney General.

It is all the same to me, but it should be discussed and I propose to discuss it during this session.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact—was the hon. member here last night? I think he was when I made my speech.

The hon. member will recall that we were not satisfied with this situation and that a study was being made in an effort to devise a system for handling the sex offenders and so on. This is another reason for the establishment of a department of research, so we will be able to do a little better work in trying to establish what is the best way to handle this.

Mr. Singer: Well, I presume then from the hon. Minister's remarks that he is prepared to deal with this.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Insofar as after they enter our institutions. I mean, if there is anything that can be done for them before they come into our institutions, obviously—

Mr. Singer: Well, I cannot make half my speech today, dealing with only half of it, and then half later.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, I think the hon. member is quite capable of doing that.

Mr. Singer: Do you want it under this estimate, or under another one? Which one?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Maybe I ought to look at the estimates.

Mr. Singer: Let the hon. Minister think about it while I go on with another subject.

The hon. Minister did refer to his speech in Kingston. I was very interested in that Kingston speech and a newspaper clipping concerning that appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 18 of this year. The head on it was: "Favours regional units—Minister would scrap county jail system."

I think that the way the hon. Minister is reported here, it sounds as though he gave a very enlightened speech and a very advanced type of speech. I think it is important enough perhaps to read this whole news report into the record.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The news report the hon. member is referring to is completely incorrect if it said I suggested they scrap the county jail system.

Mr. Singer: Well, that is the head on it, a two-column head, and it appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 18. It said the hon. Minister would scrap the county jail system:

Abolition of the county jail system in Ontario was proposed last night by the Reforms Institutions Minister Allan Grossman. Mr. Grossman suggested replacing the county jails with detention centres serving three or more counties and providing full rehabilitation treatment.

Speaking to the John Howard Society, he said existing county jails are not rehabilitation units and in most cases have buildings that are completely out of date. The regional detention unit should have competent clinical staff that would draw up a complete dossier on each inmate, his personality, his record, his problems and provide a course of treatment originating immediately after each sentence, Mr. Grossman said.

Urging county councils to co-operate in providing the centres, Mr. Grossman said his department would assist with financial grants and specialists, advice and aid in staff training.

The province does not operate the existing 35 county jails and two city jails, but it pays part of the cost and inspects and advises on the efficiency of their operation. Mr. Grossman said some of the existing jails are physically impossible of being brought up to modern standards. They were built in times when communication was slow and laborious. There is no longer a pressing need to have a jail in each county town, the Minister said.

The new units should be in a location that would provide adequate treatment facilities, he said; they should have professional treatment personnel available and an overall therapeutic programme to serve every inmate.

Mr. Grossman said the units should provide varied types of accommodation, segregate offenders, allowance should be made for the fact that only a small percentage of prisoners need maximum security.

Now I am not sure whether I correctly understood the hon. Minister or not. Does he say that this is—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I would say the article is practically 100 per cent correct, except for the heading which would be apt to be misleading. I do not think it was meant to be that way, but it could be misleading.

Mr. Singer: Well, all right, I accept the hon. Minister at his word. I would say that perhaps then the man who put the head on the story had a very intelligent idea and that he could have drawn the background for that idea from many of the remarks of the hon. Minister.

Now the hon. Minister mentioned the Stewart report and I am sure that he has paid some substantial attention and devoted substantial time to informing himself about the contents of the Stewart report. The Stewart report certainly outlines in the greatest detail imaginable all of the drawbacks of our present county jails. You would not have to read the Stewart report, or this hon. Minister would not, if he familiarized himself with conditions at the Don Jail. I do not know the other city jail, I guess that is the Hamilton jail, is it?

I think the most backward step that has been taken in reform institutions in recent years was taken by the hon. Minister's immediate predecessor (Mr. Haskett) when, as a result of a labour dispute, he threw up his hands in disgust and cleared up any doubt that existed and said back to the municipalities and to the counties go these jails.

In so doing I think he sent the whole system of penal institutions in this province back into the dark ages all over again.

It seems to me—or it seemed to me and that is why I was delighted to read this clipping—it seems to me that the day has long since gone when each little county can run its own jail. And the hon. Minister set out all the reasons, I do not need to elaborate on it. I do not think I can say it any better than the hon. Minister did.

I would have hoped last night when he introduced these estimates, that he would have given us promise of bringing about some of the reforms that he mentioned. He gave us a very fine history of the department and a story of some of the methods the department is using. This was all very interesting. But I listened with great interest hoping to hear of some immediate reforms the department is planning.

The hon. Minister says, and with justice, that he has not been there too long and that he is not too sure yet as to which direction several matters should take. But he did bother to inform himself, I am sure, about the facts that he had to state to the John Howard Society when he spoke in Kingston, and this is something that there has been sufficient talk about in the Legislature in recent years so that we could have hoped for action.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: As a matter of fact, I was not out to Kingston just to talk to the John Howard Society. I met with the representatives of four counties and they now have under active consideration the possibility of combining all of their facilities into what we prefer to call a regional detention centre. They are now awaiting some further detailed information from us as to what we will do to assist them. We are doing everything possible to assist them to arrive at the conclusion that we would like them to, and that is to have a regional detention centre serving the four counties. We will give them every financial assistance required to accomplish this.

I think it was a Chinese philosopher who once said, "If you are going to take a trip of 1,000 miles, you have to make the first step," and this is what we are doing. I do not want to run out to the counties like a bull in a china shop and tell them what they are going to have to do. I think if we can do it the right way with their co-operation that is the best way to do it. Admittedly, it is slower but I think it will be more efficient when it is done that way, because we will have the co-operation of them all.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, this is fine and as I say, when the hon. Minister has only been in the portfolio for a question of a few months, you cannot properly expect that he is going to reform the whole world overnight.

On the other hand, in no uncertain terms, in terms that could not have been more abundantly clear, the drawbacks of our county jail system were detailed. I was just looking at it yesterday as a matter of fact. There were 12 volumes of evidence collected by that commission. There was a great big thick volume of report and there is a final small volume of report. Many hon. members who are in this House served on that committee. This was one of the most thorough-going investigation committees this House has ever set up.

No one could escape knowing the terrible state our county jails are in, having read that report. The hon. Minister acknowledges this. Earlier in the debates, not on this department, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) took some substantial moves to consolidate school areas. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) has been criticized because there have not been substantial steps taken to consolidate municipalities, and the same criticism has been directed to the hon. Minister of Health concerning hospital planning.

Now here is something again, that if this province is going to move forward at all, we have to recognize we are living in a different day and a different age and that buildings which were built to serve the needs of 100 years ago along the line of penal institutions, just do not serve the purpose today. There are not revenues in the counties to be able to maintain them, they are not properly staffed, the counties are not able to pay the staffs enough to get competent people, and as a result there just is not a proper system of reform institutions being run in these county jails.

I would hope that the hon. Minister would discard a little of the Chinese philosophy he gave us a few minutes ago and be prepared to say loudly and clearly what he apparently said in this speech at Kingston—that the county jail system has outlived its usefulness and we are going to move ahead as quickly as we can with reason and replace it with something that is far better.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Singer: Will the hon. Minister commit the programme of his department to this? Is he prepared to say that in one year, five years, ten years, the county jail system is going to be done away with, that there will be a multi-county system worked out, that the department will assume responsibility, that there will be finances made available to hire proper staffs and that these staffs will be properly trained, that the department will take over responsibility for the Don Jail so we are not going to get into these interminable struggles about payment and the sort of nonsense that has gone on in the Don Jail in the past? That is the sort of thing that we had hoped we would hear from the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member suggesting that the province take over the county jails? Is that what he is suggesting?

Mr. Singer: Yes, I am.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: We are not prepared to do that at this time. I would say that it is not the intention for the province to take over the county jails. What we are trying to accomplish is what the hon. member referred to as a multi-county jail system. This is what we are trying to do. The terminology we employ is only used because it is better terminology in modern-day penology, to refer to them as detention centres. And they will get financial assistance.

In the first place, as I pointed out in some detail to the representatives of these municipalities, under the system that we are suggesting and the assistance we are prepared to provide, it will cost them considerably less to go into that system. The system also will be a better system. It will be a system in which modern correctional thinking can be applied, modern treatment can be applied, and so on. This is precisely what we are planning.

If the hon. member, as he said he has, suggested we should take them over, frankly, this is not what we are prepared to do. As a matter of fact, we can argue, "Why should we take them over? The federal government should take them over." We could argue this about anything: that we should take over the educational system, we should take over everything and leave nothing to the municipalities but collecting garbage. I mean, we are not prepared to do it aside from the costs involved and so on.

We are getting along very well in our discussions with the four counties involved and this is considered by all the correctional people in this province as a great forward step. They are hoping we will be successful because it is quite possible the other provinces, usually following Ontario as they do in this field, would follow suit. Perhaps, then, it would be a lot easier to get the other counties who can arrange such a system with our help, guidance and financial support, having seen it work in this particular area, to follow suit and we would have a very good system of regional detention centres across this province.

I do not want to suggest that we should stifle discussion on this, but really at this moment there are some very sensitive discussions going on and we are very hopeful. I would hate to hear anything said here which might exacerbate the situation and destroy our chances of success. I am sure all hon. members would like to see the four very old jails involved in these four counties done away with and a modern system put into effect.

Mr. Singer: I agree with the hon. Minister. I cannot quarrel with him on that. I would hail the day that we could do away with those four old jails and replace them with a modern—what was the phrase?—treatment centre, whatever you want to call it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Regional detention centre.

Mr. Singer: Detention centre. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the Fauteux report the recommendation was made that the federal government was about to take over—and the hon. Minister indicated that it is moving along these lines—all custodial care up to periods of over six months. It would seem to me that when that comes about there is going to be a substantial sum of dollars left over that the province is presently using, and to what better use could those dollars be put than to let the province move in and take over these detention centres in county units? These are the people who are going to remain, who are going to be left in your custody. These are the people you would be looking after.

Your big problem, and I suppose something that deals with the delicacy of these negotiations being carried on, is the financial one. This was the big problem that surrounded all of the discussions in the Don Jail—the financial one.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is not in this instance, may I—

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I might tell the hon. member that it is not a financial problem at the moment, because what we have in mind will save a lot of money for the municipality. The problem is not a financial one, it is local pride, location and that sort of thing. Probably one of the most sensitive areas is the location of such a centre.

In regard to what we might do—if, as and when the federal government implements that portion of the Fauteux report whereby we only handle offenders up to six months—I will take the words out of the mouth of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and say that we had better not spend that money until we get it.

Mr. Singer: Well, maybe so. Perhaps the hon. Minister could take a leaf from the hon. Prime Minister's (Mr. Robarts') book, and see if this sort of thing cannot be put on the agenda for the Dominion-provincial conference as well. Because here is a field where the federal government and the provincial government have to work together.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have tried to do that. The Attorneys General of the other provinces, and my predecessor, had apparently attempted to get it on the agenda of the previous Dominion-provincial conference without success. We are going to do it one of these days. We are going to do our best to have it discussed.

Mr. Singer: Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to make this plea, and address it to the hon. Minister and those of his colleagues to whom it applies.

The problem of the administration of justice—and your department really is a branch of the administration of justice, you take some of the end results and look after them—is a problem that concerns all of the people of Ontario, because the crimes which are committed and which require the attention of your department do not know any geographic bounds. If they are committed in this province then they are the responsibility of all the people of the province.

The hon. member for Simcoe Centre (Mr. Evans), who serves with me on the select committee for municipal affairs, was describing before that committee one day an incident which happened in his community, where a chap from Toronto went up to Barrie—I think it was—committed a serious crime, was tried there, convicted and finally hanged, in the proper place, in the county town, I guess. By accident of geography, and because the man involved happened to move from Toronto to Barrie on that particular night, it cost that county the sum of $40,000 to take care of this man. This is not a problem peculiar to Simcoe county, or which should have been limited to Simcoe—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member will appreciate that really belongs in the Attorney General's—

Mr. Singer: But it is the same sort of thing. If, instead of having been dealt with in the way he was, this man had to be confined for a substantial period of time, Simcoe county would have had to pick up the bill. I suggest that crime like this knows no boundaries, that whether the man happens to be caught and convicted in Barrie or Toronto or Kingston really makes no difference. Nor should it make any difference—

An hon. member: Or Manitoba.

Mr. Singer: The problem of treating these people, after they have been convicted and come within the provincial jurisdiction, should be the problem of all of the taxpayers of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What about Kennedy?

Mr. Singer: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What about Kennedy? What about the man who has been convicted of such an offence and is being hung? Why should this not be—

Mr. Sopha: The word is hanged.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Sorry, hanged—our expert here in semantics; I bow to his superior wisdom.

Mr. MacDonald: In either case it is right.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You say either is right? One way or the other it is not very pleasant. I agree that it should not have anything to do with boundaries, but if you want to follow this to its logical conclusion what difference does it make that he happened to commit a murder in Ontario, rather than Quebec or Manitoba? As a matter of fact, he may not have been in this province for more than one day. I mean, if you want to follow this through, it should go to the highest—

Mr. Singer: I was trying to tackle the possible at this point. When the hon. Minister says what he does, I will not disagree with him in theory, but he is in fact talking about amending The British North America Act and I do not think we are going to be able to do that by any action we take unilaterally in this Chamber. But, by unilateral action in this Chamber, we can at least extend our responsibility from one end of the province to the other—from the east to the west, and from the north to the south. We can control that much.

It may be that there are a number of reforms needed, as my hon. colleague the member for Sudbury has said, to bring needed changes to The British North America Act. It is going to take a day or two to work those out. But I would suggest that, in the administration of justice and those various fields which flow from it, and in this department in particular, there could and should be, and must be, a recognition that all of these matters belong properly to all the people of Ontario; and all the people of Ontario should pay for them. That is why I was so hopeful, when I read this news clipping, that this was the direction in which the hon. Minister was moving.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is the direction we are going.

Mr. Singer: I was going to suggest that the hon. Minister is only going to be able to arrive at the end of the road, in the direction which he is travelling, if he is prepared to take over the cost of institutions.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow up—

Mr. Sopha: Which member?

Mr. Chairman: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. Sopha: It is difficult to get a word in edgeways here today.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: The hon. member for Sudbury has spoken in this House plenty.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister of Mines should tell him how it is done.

Mr. Young: Could I ask a question following up what was already said about the matter of the release of the prisoners? I can understand what the hon. Minister has said: That many people do not want to be associated any further with officialdom; they want to be clear; so, at that point, some money is given them, they are looked after as far as their clothing is concerned, and are then sent out into the cold, cold world. But even there, there are associations like John Howard and others who will help.

The question I want to ask is about both the probation and the rehabilitation service. You mentioned, I think, that the probation service had an average case load of 30 to 40, was it—or 40 to 50?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Parole.

Mr. Young: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Parole. The hon. member is making the same mistake I have been making about once a week for five months, to confuse probation with parole. We have the parole services; The Attorney General's Department has the probation services. Naturally, because when you are on probation you have not been put into an institution.

Mr. Young: But you also have a placement service for the younger people?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Young: As far as the placement service then, you were not speaking of that when you mentioned the case load of—the figure you gave?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that it is the same. We call it the parole and rehabilitation service. They are one and the same branch.

Mr. Young: But then the case load is down to about the figure that you mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Fifty to 60.

Mr. Young: And is that a satisfactory figure? My feeling is, and the feeling of those I have talked to, that this is too heavy a case load for the people concerned to be able to handle the thing effectively.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, Mr. Chairman, they tell me that the ideal is supposed to be 40. If the hon. member will recall, last night I even suggested that you could go even further than that. I mean if a worker, a rehabilitation officer, has 40 under his care, it could be argued that if he only had 20 he could do an even better job because he could stick closer to his subject. We would like to have more and bring the case load down, of course; in fact we have openings, we have vacancies, for rehabilitation personnel.

Mr. Young: Then this is an average? A great many officers may have more and some may have less, so the average works out something like this. And the hope is that the number will come down? Also I think the hope was expressed that the general qualifications of the officers will be raised before too long and that certain standards be set.

Could I ask a question as to where salaries start in this field?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Rehabilitation Officer 1 starts at $3,750 to $4,400; and it runs up to Rehabilitation Officer 4—

Mr. Young: I'm sorry, I did not get the first figure.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The first, Rehabilitation Officer 1, the temporary officer, he gets $3,750 to $4,400. Rehabilitation Officer 2—

First, Rehabilitation Officer 1 is on probation and he gets the salary range from $3,750 to $4,400. After he has passed his probationary period, he becomes Rehabilitation Officer 2 and his range is $4,400 to $5,250; Rehabilitation Officer 3, who supervises an area, his range is from $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. Young: Then the salaries are coming up somewhat, but it seems to me that fully qualified officers still, perhaps, cannot be obtained for this price. There is a job to be done here.

I would ask one more question before the hon. member for Sudbury gets his opportunity here—and when he gets it we are sure we are going to hear wisdom. On page 8 of part 2, Training Schools Report—this is the training school advisory board annual report—we are told that the board met during the year each Thursday, with one exception, which fell during the Christmas vacation. In other words, 51 meetings, I suppose, during the year. These people on the board deal with, according to page 9, 11,000—or it did last year—11,455 cases.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, that is not true.

Mr. Young: This is not the case?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I must in all fairness, at the risk of being kicked under the table by my deputy, say that I am not at all happy with these tables as they exist. They confuse me the same as they do the hon. member. This really shows the volume of work done. If the hon. member will notice, it includes Applications Recommended, Applications Refused, Deferred, Recommended by the Minister, Refused, Deferred and so on. You add them all up and you have an idea you are dealing with 11,455 people and that is not the case at all.

Mr. Young: But there will be 11,455 cases to be dealt with because the case might be at various stages, to be dealt with at various times.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: In many of these instances, if not most—I do not want to say most, because I do not know—the action would be the signing of a document if the application is recommended to the Minister and authorized, as far as I am concerned. Once it is authorized and I see no reason to do otherwise, I merely sign the document. I think this is like the executive directors of some of the private agencies. I have been a member of the board of many of them and they want to show you just how much work they do, but it really does not tell you. It tells you a sort of volume. There is a great deal of work involved in it but it does not give you a really true picture.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, it just seemed to me that this was a tremendous volume of work these people were trying to undertake in a very short time, because I understand—

Mr. Chairman: Order! You are permitted questions and you have heard these answers and you certainly have no right to make a speech at this time.

We are on vote 2001.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I think we have a right to make a comment on these estimates.

Mr. Sopha: If you want all the time this afternoon, go right ahead.

Mr. Chairman: You can ask a further question, but we are now on vote 2001 on which there is no right to make a speech at this time. The member for Sudbury has a question.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, the thing I want to ask the hon. Minister then is—and I was simply making a preparation here—this committee meets once a week and it meets for a short period, a half a day or so. How many cases would it deal with then at each meeting?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not think we can answer that, Mr. Chairman. I do not think we can answer that just now. If the hon. member would like I will have that information given to him. I mean it is one of those details; you cannot have everything here. You can see that I am getting very late now.

Mr. Young: It just seemed that they are rather overloaded in their work. That is all.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I should point out, it has been pointed out to me of course, that the advisory board does not deal with all of this. A good portion of this is routine detail done by office staff.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I want to extend to you my most grateful appreciation, sir, for being my champion.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I do not know in the words of my friend, the hon. member for Yorkview, whether anything I say may be acquainted with wisdom, I shall have to let others be the judge of that. But if it is, sir, if it approaches wisdom, then it will bring a refreshing change into the environment this afternoon.

I wanted to say to the hon. Minister that I may have appeared to be a bit cranky, and I do not ever want to give that impression, but I did not fully agree with the method in which he was presenting his estimates. I thought the presentation of estimates extended beyond the carrying on of a little conversation between him and first, the hon. member for Dovercourt, and then between the hon. Minister and the hon. member for Yorkview. I did not really, sir, see anything that was said in the remarks, the very able remarks, the penetrating remarks of the hon. member for Dovercourt, that stimulated the reading of that exchange of correspondence between the hon. Minister and the editor—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Your colleague does not agree.

Mr. Sopha: In order to provide a basis for my further remarks under this vote, Conduct of the Main Office, may I ask the hon. Minister this simple question, sir? He can provide me the answer. Of the 3,300 people resident in our institutions today, what proportion or what number of those 3,300 have been incarcerated before?

Mr. Trotter: Ninety per cent.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is ridiculous.

Mr. Trotter: Yes, 90 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I presume the hon. member is now trying to get at the rate of recidivism.

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I will tell the hon. member that there is nobody in Canada who can tell him what the rate of recidivism is. Incidentally, one of the hon. members used the figure of 75 per cent last night. That is ridiculous. It is absolutely ridiculous.

In the first place, there is no way of getting at the actual rate of recidivism as the system exists today, not only for us but for the federal government and all the other provinces.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister is not able to tell me, I take it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Nobody can tell you.

Mr. Trotter: Ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. MacDonald: Is it not ridiculous? People in the field for generations have been using the term.

Mr. Sopha: Will you let me continue, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member gets up and asks me about the rate of recidivism—

Mr. Sopha: You are not able to tell me—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I cannot tell him and I would like to explain to him why I cannot tell him.

Mr. Sopha: It seems to me, again to borrow my hon. friend's words, to be patently ridiculous to have prisoner A, B, C or X in the institution and not be able to tell from his fingerprints whether he has ever been in an institution before. If he has been in an institution of detention before, of course he is a recidivist and I venture to say that the figure of 75 per cent adopted by my friend the hon. member for Parkdale last night, and put forward as being attributable to a man in the probation field, is not at all exaggerated.

I am under the impression that the whole of the institution of Burwash Industrial Farm, the whole of the inmate population, consists of those who have been in institutions before. There are 100 per cent of them of course. No first offenders go to Burwash. I think, and perhaps the hon. Minister can tell us this, not many first offenders, if any, go to Monteith Industrial Farm either. And I venture to say that if one mentions the figure of three out of four as having been at these places before, that he is not too far out.

I want to say this too in criticism of the hon. Minister and I hope he will accept it as being constructive. I objected to the method of his putting forward his estimates because in the reading of this correspondence and this memorandum, it did not seem to get at the formulation of general principles with which we approach our institutions of reform and rehabilitation in this province. It is true that he might be concerned about one individual not having an overcoat. That is fine; that is a good act of charity whether it be Jewish charity or Christian charity. All religions are together in that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Judeo-Christian charity.

Mr. Sopha: Judeo-Christian charity, I will accept that. That is fine. But it does not get at the formulation of a general principle, which in that case would be: What should we do in order to maintain some contact of after-care with these people after they leave the institutions? The fact that he has to write to an editor of a paper in an endeavour to help him find that individual, indicates that there is no system of maintaining contact with them at all.

In the lack of the formulation of general principles, I am fortified, having read these two volumes right through, that there is no attempt to do so. You look at the first volume and most of it is a setting out of various statistical tables and pictures, and we have to put up with two, the immediate predecessor and the present incumbent of it. In the second one the process is repeated in that it is almost all pictures and statistical tables.

Now I ask the hon. Minister, through you Mr. Chairman, are these people like the Bourbon kings, are they like the Bourbons that they have learned nothing and forgotten nothing? It must be that having set out all these statistical tables, that there is not some attempt to analyze what they mean, evaluate them and to say in the report: "Here are the lessons that we have learned about detention and correction in this province." They are the most bland and emasculated statements of the activities of this department in the preceding year.

But in examining them one speedily comes to the formulation of the statistical principle, that is easy to come by. I refer to page 56 of volume one, and I see in that, by looking at the last figure, that 56,272 of our people passed through their institutions last year.

Now remember that figure: 56,272.

But hearken! Under liquor offences, intoxication or drunkenness, 21,000 of the total were in the institutions for those offences. Other liquor offences, 5,000. So we are up to 26,000, of the 56,000, were in the institutions for infractions of the liquor statutes of this province. And 26,000 of 56,000—that is more than two-thirds, is it not?

Yes.

Driving while impaired, that is 3,000; so we are up to 29,000. So we have more than 50 per cent who are in for infractions of the liquor statute. But then you go to the other page and you single out certain offences; rape or attempted rape; threatening or intimidation; carnal knowledge; break, enter and theft; and so on. Then you know, if you have any experience in the field at all—and one thing about this Legislature, you are not supposed to talk about any experience that you have in any field yourself; for some reason it is resented on the Treasury benches.

Not long ago the hon. Prime Minister of the province got up and mentioned something about his experience in the courts and he said: "Well we remember, we lawyers who have been in the courts, but we do not talk about our experiences as much as some other people do in the courts." I had the feeling that he meant me when he said that, in bringing my personal experiences to bear.

But then I looked down the front bench and there were six lawyers, six of them. Interestingly enough all six lawyers in the government are on the front bench. There are none in the second row at all, except with the possible exception of the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Macaulay), who is not here, there is one. Six in the front bench and one in the second row, which is indicative of some correlation—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I say to the hon. member for York South that on occasion I have had to suffer him.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: I am making my speech. I want to say something about this department out of a sense of duty, because many of the people I have occasion to represent in the past and who have paid me good money are now in the care of the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wish the hon. member could do a better job.

Mr. Sopha: Well, they do not always go.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 2001 carried?

Mr. Sopha: No, it is not carried, and it will not be carried for a while yet.

So we see that more than half the people in the places of detention in this province are there for some reason of having either infringed the liquor statutes of this province, or they are there because liquor played some major part in stimulating them into the conduct which was found to be socially unacceptable and led to their detention.

One may look at it in another way. If the government of this province, which has exclusive control over the distribution and sale of alcoholic beverage, makes $90 million of profit—the profit I think will approach that figure this year—if it makes $90 million, then in a sense they have to take $20 million of that profit in order to support this department. This department, so far as liquor impels people into reform institutions, is then eating into the profit that the government makes out of the sale of liquor. They are eroding that profit.

Therefore, if for no other reason, because of its consciousness of the necessity of profit and the dependence, from the revenue point of view, upon the profits from the liquor control sales, then you would think that they would set up the most comprehensive research system possible in order to find out they can prevent these people going into institutions and thus eroding their profits. That would be good business sense, absolutely good business sense, to do so.

They often are inclined to brag about the $750,000, I think it is, that they give to the Alcoholism Research Foundation. But that is a drop in the bucket compared to the $20 million that they must spend in order to maintain this department.

And that leads me on to the expression of this general principle, which I think should not be lost sight of. I remember some years ago that the then Attorney General of this province, now the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), came out with a brilliant idea. Ideas are always brilliant to him, they are like a Roman candle. He had the brilliant idea that we should set up some farms or places of detention in this province whereby those convicted of intoxication under The Liquor Control Act would be separated and some rehabilitative processes would be applied to them.

Whatever happened to them? We never heard, after that initial speech, about the inauguration of this device. We never heard a single thing since about what has happened to it because—and here is the important thing—it is truth to tell that our places of detention, whatever they are called in this province, exist mainly as stopping-over and drying-out places for those addicted to alcohol. That is their main function.

A remarkable thing it is that if a man has the complete freedom to drink—let us face it and it is stark reality—if a man had the complete freedom to drink and there were no inhibitions and no prohibitions, no restraints upon him at all; then a man would not drink a great period of time, until they would be mustering six pall bearers to take him to his heavenly reward.

That is true! The human body simply could not stand it.

But with a Minister in this department providing the stopping-off places, sir, the drying-out places, it means that the drinker, the heavy drinker, when the arm of the law picks him up and brings him into the magistrate's court, he is dealt with according to the statutes in that behalf, without benefit of counsel. Indeed he is dealt with ahead of the QCs. I have said that before; he gets preference in the courts. Drunks first, QCs second.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, I can believe that. I do not doubt that. My hon. friend, let the record declare his words: On the basis of some of the appointments he feels that is an appropriate order.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): The hon. member has moved one up the ladder.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, but continuing with my point: this department providing such stopping-off and drying-out places extends the life of the drinker. It refurbishes his body and restores his mental equilibrium so that he leaves your institution, and after an appropriate time again becomes addicted to alcohol. He is arrested again and he goes through that cycle of in and out of the institution.

Mr. MacDonald: He has the fun of doing it all over again.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, but it is not much fun. It means that 20—how many did I say, did I get up to 30,000 people?—are in effect the flotsam of a society that cannot do anything to help them, and apparently a society that is not particularly interested in arriving at solutions. As far as I can see, the department of this hon. Minister has the responsibility to conduct—they have just one centre, that one at Mimico—the treatment and rehabilitation of these people.

I cannot say that these thoughts, or these words, are of my own initiation. I noticed that Professor Stuart Jaffray, who is a man renowned and respected in the world of sociology and who, I think, is head of the department—or if not head of the department, one of the senior personnel of the department—of sociology at the University of Toronto, in his laconic but very pithy and very penetrating statement, had this to say recently in one of the Metro newspapers:

We continue to pack our prisons with the most familiar types of offenders—drunks, prostitutes, and petty offenders. Most of them are many-time offenders, for whom imprisonment has obviously already failed; indeed, it has contributed to their failure. Yet we go on doing it—ostriches with our heads in the sand so we can't see what we're doing. Who will examine these foolish heads?

Well, certainly not The Department of Reform Institutions.

It is my criticism and my condemnation, if you want to go that far, of this department, that I look in their annual report and I do not see in it any formulation of broad and general principles, of improvement, or of any attempt to analyze and determine from their experience what is to be learned.

I recall, a year ago, that the then leader of the Liberal Party of this House made a very comprehensive and penetrating speech about the record of this department. I think I do recall he traced what a young offender might expect out of his life once he got in the hands of this department. He traced it in a statistical way, by showing that this is what has happened on the road toward recidivism. I think I am safe in saying I read somewhere that the rate of recidivism in our society is one of the highest in the western world; far higher than in Britain.

An hon. member: How do you know?

Mr. Sopha: Far higher than in Britain, to the extent that the hon. gentleman shakes his head—then to that extent he is the ostrich which has its head in the sand, if he is not ready to recognize the problem. Recognize the problem before attempting to tackle it. Where do we go? Where are we going? Are the numbers in our institutions going to increase with our population? Social dislocation—are we always going to have it with us in this way? One could go on for a long time and talk about the dislocation to the family. One could talk about the variation of sentences.

May I say, sir, without fear of offending anyone, that I recently defended two people. Listen, this is very serious. Each of them, in the operation of a motor vehicle, had been responsible for the deaths of three people. Two separate accidents, but each was responsible for the deaths of three people.

One of the offenders was sentenced to two months in jail. The other offender, a man of previously impeccable background, a steady worker, a good citizen, a good family man, a man who attended his church, was sentenced to twelve months in jail. He got twelve months. The other man got two. Why should there be a discrepancy?

Mr. MacDonald: You were better on one day.

Mr. Sopha: No, it was not that at all. There were different judges. Why do we not examine into the possibility of this province adopting a system such as they have in California, where the sentencing is done not by the courts at all? It is done by another body.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Do you not realize you are talking about matters that come under The Department of the Attorney General?

Mr. Sopha: They do not, sir, with respect.

Mr. Chairman: The last sentences do.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I am almost finished.

Mr. MacDonald: You mean you concede you are out of order?

Mr. Sopha: I do not concede it at all. When I speak about sentences, sir, I say to you, with greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, that so far as this department is concerned, I am dealing with the question of how they come into the hands of this hon. Minister and how he becomes responsible for them. Insofar as the length of their sentence is concerned, it is inexplicably tied up with the matter of their rehabilitation. That is what I sought to set out.

Let me come to the general conclusion about the two men: The one with two months is in the same institution as the other with 12 months—Burwash Industrial Farm, where the deputy Minister was so kind as to send this first offender at my behest. The deputy Minister, sir, is always kind. He is always attentive when you ask him to do something that is reasonable.

I could not say, in respect of the two, that there is any more likelihood of the one becoming a repeater than the other.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How do you do that? I would not dare—

Mr. Sopha: Except for this: That one—the man with the longer term, the 12-month man, will be exposed to the university of crime that Burwash is, for a longer time. That is what Burwash is. It is really a university of crime, because it has all the repeaters, all the old pros, and indeed it has a good many people who, I suppose, have been in federal penitentiaries, which are the highest post-graduate level. They are people who have arrived. That type of anti-social individual will pursue a life of anti-social behaviour and we have such. Of course we have that type of individual; if he has been to a federal penitentiary and then goes to a junior institution like Burwash, he is very high in the social status there. He might almost be deputy governor.

Those are some of the problems that I beg leave, and crave the indulgence of the House, to point out to this hon. Minister. And up to now I must sit down with a feeling of despair and depression and cynicism that we are not going very far towards their solution. But what can we do? What can we do when we face the majority—77 who have the mandate of the people? I will tell you in a moment what we can do.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): You cannot do a thing about it.

Mr. Sopha: That majority, of course, in the words of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) has the Maginot line mentality. In other words, "We went to the polls on September 25, then for every intent and purpose what we do is all right." It is all right, it is correct, and is ideal!

But I tell you one thing we can do, one thing we will continue to do—that is to continue to point out the problems, grave and pressing social problems, which exacerbate dislocations in our society, and will continue from year to year to do it. And if the hon. Prime Minister who is not in his seat—wants to keep changing the Minister of this department, Mr. Chairman, as he has done three times in the past five years—in our five years, have we not had three? If he wants to continue to treat this department as being—what?—the bottom of the social scale—

An hon. member: The runt! The runt of the litter.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, the runt of the litter. Is it a stepping stone to something else? Is it a stepping stone, a sort of trying ground?

Mr. Letherby: Yes, of course it is.

Mr. Sopha: Will you occupy this department? Is that the place picked out when the hon. Prime Minister recognizes the merit of the back row over here; or is it the department where the moonlighters in the back row graduate? Those are questions that we would like to have answered.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Leader of the Opposition): Or is it the door out?

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Or is it, as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says, the department you land in before you get booted out, finally?

An hon. member: A half-way house.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, may I just correct a couple of things which have been said here? In the first place, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Sudbury. He is always interesting but then he gets a little wild. I do not like him referring to the department as "the runt."

In the first place, you must remember, he is referring to a department which has 2,500 persons, most of them very dedicated people. I do not think it is the right thing to suggest that they are working in a department which is, so to speak, at the "bottom of the barrel."

Mr. Sopha: It is not their fault.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not going into all of the details, but I would be very glad to be invited to do this to explain why no jurisdiction on this continent is in a position yet, certainly in this country, to give a rate of recidivism. But the hon. member himself has illustrated in a very concise fashion why that is so. He referred to some 26,000 liquor convictions which are included in the figures. Most or at least many of those liquor convictions, as the hon. member very well knows, may have been convictions of the same person half a dozen times in one year, but they are added up to make this, so-called, grand total. This is one of the problems we have in respect to recidivism.

And the hon. member—I was rather surprised, he is supposed to be a very able QC—suggested that it should be a very simple matter by the method of collecting all of the fingerprints to be able to tell who has served an offence before. Now my hon. friend, I am not a lawyer but I know perfectly well that you do not fingerprint anyone who is convicted of a non-indictable offence, and this is one of the great problems. This is what we are trying to get squared with the federal department. We are trying with all of the provinces and the federal department to arrange a system whereby we can collect, collate and do something with these figures, because thousands of people are convicted of non-indictable offences and by law they cannot be fingerprinted. You can never add up these people because you do not know if they have served an offence before. They give wrong names and all that sort of thing and unless you have their fingerprints you cannot include them.

Mr. Sopha: You could do that if you amended The Reform Institutions Act to provide for the fingerprinting of everybody who came within your institutions. It would not be ultra vires at all.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am completely shocked. I do not want to use the word "ignorance" because he is not ignorant. I am completely shocked that the hon. member should mention that. Everyone knows that this is a matter of federal law. You cannot fingerprint—

Mr. Sopha: That is one aspect. It might be the double aspect and the court might very well hold that for one aspect it is criminal law and under the federal jurisdiction, and for another aspect it is provincial.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Now you are trying to confuse me like a good lawyer. All I tell you is that it is federal.

Mr. Sopha: Well, ask your lawyer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The lawyers say that it is a federal matter.

Mr. Sopha: Then change your lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Maybe it would be better to change the federal government.

An hon. member: Don't do as I do, do as I say.

Mr. Thompson: I do not think the hon. Minister answered the hon. member's main point.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What was that, I do not know? He asked so many, he went into a speech.

Mr. Thompson: We behold this shuffle of people going through in connection with alcoholic disease, and what are you really doing about it? He raised this challenge to you.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would you do? We are doing our best to treat those people who are—

An hon. member: We are wondering what we can do about you.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Thompson: You ask me what I would do about it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not asking you; I did not ask that question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thompson: Have you got an answer?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The answer is very simple when you are sitting over there. I am telling you what we do. You said, what are we doing? Let me tell you.

Anyone who, after examination by our people, appears to be properly motivated, will be given every possible assistance. As I pointed out earlier, at our alcoholic clinic at Mimico we have many vacancies, although I forget what the figure was. We had about 48 there and we have room for some 150. We have 48 there because you cannot take a man and tell him you are going to do something about his alcoholism or his alcoholic habits against his will. He has got to be willing, and if he is willing we will do everything possible for him, and we have done a lot for a great number of people. But for most of these people, unless they are prepared to go along with you and let you help them, you cannot do anything.

Mr. Thompson: Are you suggesting that of all the thousands who go through your jails there are only 48 who are willing to get treatment?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: At this particular time there were 48, yes, that is my answer.

Mr. Thompson: You are saying that of all those people who have got into trouble because of alcoholism there are only 48?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: Of almost 29,000—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There were not 29,000. You keep repeating the same figures. You know perfectly well that any lawyer will tell you that a lot of these figures are—

Mr. Thompson: Never quote lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Chairman: No, but these are tables. A man is convicted once for ten days, he is convicted for two weeks, he is put away for a month. He will do it three, four, five, six and eight times a year, and these are all added up to bring this grand total. I am not underestimating the seriousness of it in any case, but I tell you that these figures are not correct because of that. You cannot use the figures 26,000 to 29,000. And the answer to most of these things which have been raised is: That is why we have started a department of research.

Less than two years ago the Dominion Bureau of Statistics started to gather together figures on these things and it cannot do much without help from the provinces. We are the first province to set up a department of research, so we will be able to go along with this and have some proper figures of recidivism.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I will tell the hon. Minister that when getting this research he had better get some research into the figure of 48 people whom he suggests are the only ones of the number—and I agree with him and take back the number I gave previously—but that there are only 48 people who are motivated to get treatment for alcoholism. I have met with alcoholics, and I could go into drug addiction as well, and have met with drug addicts, and I think of the lack of treatment and the lack of trained staff provided by this province, particularly as the hon. member for Sudbury has pointed out, the very shame of the fact that you are getting these millions of dollars from the sale of liquor while there is a horrible lack of facilities to assist—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have space for 150 and we would be very pleased to have it filled up. We just are not getting them because they are not properly motivated, and there is no use trying to give the impression that lots more people want help from us and cannot get it. We are very pleased, we have a very capable, dedicated staff who are spending hours and hours, many of them working 16 hours a day. They would love to have more people to help but we have to make sure they are properly motivated. We would have 5,000 people, perhaps, in there if we just asked them, "Do you want help?" They love to get into the clinic to get the special kind of treatment, because they figure it is softer treatment.

But our people are psychologists. Our treatment staff has to satisfy itself, having regard for the man's record and having regard for its psychological examination of him, that he is properly motivated and probably is someone who is amenable to doing something by way of treatment.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would rather they finished this topic.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that he take a Monday morning and attend "A" court at city hall and watch the $10 or 10 days for drunkenness, the group that goes through in the morning—any Monday morning. Monday morning is probably the best morning for the hon. Minister to go—it would take less time. He could fill up all his beds in one morning.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Over there they are talking about something else.

Mr. Singer: No. Mr. Chairman, I am talking and I am not going to be interrupted. It is a social problem that this government has to pay attention to and there is a problem of alcoholism. By the very nature of that disease, Mr. Chairman, it is not the people who say, "Please give me treatment." It is those hundreds and hundreds of people who go through our courts every morning and who are dealt with in a summary way and given no treatment and are sent back out onto the streets to continue to be alcoholics and this government apparently does not care. They are looking for people who—what was the hon. Minister's phrase?—who are properly motivated. But those hundreds of men who go through those courts in the morning and if they have the $10, and very few of them have, certainly have no motivations at all. They are alcoholics, they are pitiful alcoholics, and we have a duty toward them. We should have a duty; and we should not limit that duty to trying to seek out of this great vast tide of humanity which goes through our magistrates' courts, those who are properly motivated.

If we are going to do it at all, let us do it properly and let us not make any more pious speeches about it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It makes a good headline, but it does not make sense.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, earlier this afternoon the hon. Minister showed one side of the half house picture.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Half-way house.

Mr. Newman: Half-way house, pardon me. He was going to quote from a report dated 1951. I would like to present the modern version of the half-way house, and present the picture as it actually exists today. I am going to talk about the experiences we have had in my own community with a half-way house.

In my own community, Mr. Chairman, the Reverend T. N. Libby of All Saints Anglican church saw the need for rehabilitation work among ex-prisoners in the Windsor area. With guidance and assistance from groups of public-spirited citizens of all religious denominations, he was able to pilot the founding of a half-way house. This house is known as St. Leonard's House.

On May 8, 1962, St. Leonard's House opened its doors. One year ago I put in a plea to this government, and at that time the then Minister of Reform Institutions, sir, made reference that no desire or no request for assistance had been received from this half-way house. I had put in this plea to the Minister so that this institution could get firmly established.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, I would put in a similar type of plea to a new Minister. I know the present hon. Minister is very seriously interested in this problem. However, Mr. Chairman, may I first attempt to emphasize the reason why this government should go all out to assist this project, to make this project the pilot programme in a new outlook on ex-prisoner rehabilitation?

For the past two weeks the Detroit Free Press has been carrying articles concerning half-way houses and has been waging quite a programme showing their value.

Dr. William Wattenberg, a noted psychologist, and a director of the delinquency control training centre at Wayne State University in Detroit, now conducts a training programme for people who will be working with delinquents and for those who will be responsible for corrective programmes.

Dr. Wattenberg says—and these are comments less than one week old:

The half-way house is the most practical idea that has come into the field of juvenile delinquency control in this generation. Of all the things we have tried in the field of dealing with the potential career criminal, the half-way house is the most practical measure.

There are many difficulties that the individual must face when he is thrust back into society after leaving the institution. One of the most sincere is the finding of the right job and the holding on to it.

The individual must also find a way of working back in with the "good kids" while avoiding the troublemakers who will lure him back into a criminal career.

The half-way house is the place where he can get help when he runs into difficulties. It brings him over the hump.

The half-way house is not going to be 100 per cent effective all the time, but it is the best thing we have available now.

The interest in half-way houses is so great that Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy strongly endorses a state-wide programme of half-way houses similar to those successfully operated by the Justice Department in the United States.

The US government is enthusiastic over the half-way houses because of their proven rehabilitation value. They have cut parole violations by 50 per cent.

The St. Leonard's House in my own community is a hostel-type home, under the supervision of a trained resident director who receives a man upon his release from prison and fits him into a place in society.

Very few prisoners are fortunate enough to have anywhere to go when released on parole, and consequently find themselves back in jail because the environment they return to leads them back.

In the state of Illinois, recent statistics indicate that the repeater rate among the discharged prisoners is in excess of 80 per cent. In this same state the repeater rate among discharged prisoners who have been paroled to a half-way house is approximately 28 per cent, a spectacular saving of human material and the taxpayers' dollar.

The length of the stay varies from six weeks to a year. Employment is found as soon as possible for a half-way house guest and he is expected to pay his way in the house as soon as practicable, but employment and paying his way are not enough. The causes that put a man at odds with society in the first place are probed by a trained case worker and, to the extent possible, the parolee is made to understand his problem. When this is accomplished the case worker assigned to him undertakes the task of removing the feeling of institutional dependence that is the result of prison life and replacing it with the self-reliance necessary to fit a man for communal life.

Experience has shown that spiritual guidance is often, if not always, a necessary element in assisting a man through his difficult processes, but most of all a half-way house demonstrates to a discharged prisoner that someone does care for him. He also sees that others who had similar problems to his have been able to make the grade and take their place as useful citizens in the community.

To show you one year's experience with a half-way house and what it has done, I would like to read just one paragraph from a letter from the Reverend T. N. Libby who is the executive director of St. Leonard's House in Windsor:

I might add that we have had 48 men pass through the house as of this date and only seven of these have returned to prison on new offences sometime after they have left the house.

No man has been convicted of an offence while living in the house. This means that we have had a return rate to prison of less than 15 per cent, while the general return rate to prison is something between 75 and 80 per cent of all releases. I think this shows that when work of this nature is done with men who have served prison sentences, and particularly when they have been able to find suitable employment in the community and new social contacts, a good deal of money is being saved in prison costs. One can only imagine that if this were extended across the whole country, the savings would run into hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

Looking in the report of the department, I noticed that the cost per day per person is approximately $7.34. This would amount to roughly $2,500 a year. The half-way house in my own community has saved this province approximately $100,000 in one year's operation.

It has proved itself. We can readily understand it is only an experimental programme, but we would certainly appreciate this government assisting it all it could to further carry out this programme. Forty-eight people went through the house, only seven returned. Forty-one have been saved. If 41 had returned to jail it would have cost approximately $100,000.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think I should point out to the hon. member that no doubt the St. Leonard's half-way house is doing a good job in its field, but again we get into this area where we are talking about repeaters and so on. I think St. Leonard's has been in existence a little over one year and we are talking about repeaters.

Now with all due respect, surely this is no time to talk about their rate of recidivism or anything of that nature.

Further, about them saving us $100,000 a year; the hon. member did not point out whether they were parolees or ex-inmates of provincial or federal institutions. But I should also point out that under The Charitable Institutions Act, St. Leonard's House has been getting a grant from our government.

Mr. Newman: Does it matter whether the inmate is a parolee of the provincial or the federal institutions? Our desire here—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, but in the hon. member's calculation—

Mr. Newman: —is to help the individual so that he does not return and this, Mr. Chairman, is what this house is doing.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member was referring to how much it cost when they added it all up and saying it saved the province this much money.

Mr. Newman: Well, then, I will stand corrected and say they save two governments that amount of money.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have some comments that I wanted to make that would be appropriate either under institutions or general policy, but I think they relate to some of the earlier comments that have been made in some of the rather ill-assorted chapters of this afternoon's effort. I think they might most appropriately be made at this point.

Let me start by drawing the attention of the House to the portion of the report on page 54, the annual report, part one, of the reform institutions, where it gives a breakdown of the hon. Minister's clientele for the past year under various headings: sex, social conditions, habits, educational status, nationality, occupations and finally, ages.

I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that in the age group under 16 years there has been an increase, in the age group 16 to 20 years inclusive, there has been an increase. In every other age group there has been a decrease. In other words, these figures indicate that there is a growing proportion of the people who come under the jurisdiction of The Department of Reform Institutions who are under 20 years of age.

Now I do not think one needs to belabour that point to recognize that here is a rather disturbing bit of information. When you tie that to one aspect of the hon. Minister's introductory comments it left me a little discouraged after all the years. I refer to our failure to come to grips with basic reorganization of penal institutions and reform institutions in this country as between the federal and provincial governments. I am back now for a moment to the basic recommendation of the Fauteux commission report, that all offenders below six months should become a provincial responsibility and all those above six months should become a federal responsibility.

Now the hon. Minister has in effect said, without too much elaboration, that he is waiting for action from the federal government. We have been waiting action for years. I am hoping that now he has got a Liberal government in Ottawa that he will not feel that he has to approach them delicately. He can take the gloves off and really go after them, and perhaps he can take some of the speeches from the Opposition here, about how the Liberals would act, to arm himself, and get some action from the federal government.

But at least I will concede this to the hon. Minister, this is beyond his control. He cannot, if Ottawa does not want to move, he cannot do anything about it, any more than we in the Opposition can do anything about this government that will not move.

But there is something which is within this government's control and that is, even in anticipation of this basic reorganization or re-division of jurisdiction, you can start to do the job in the below six-months sentences and in your county jails.

Now let me come back to this very coy little exchange that we had from the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. Minister in which the hon. Minister was pleading that we should be rather careful and not confuse some rather delicate negotiations. The hon. Minister stated that he had gone down under the auspices of the John Howard Society and he had spoken to people from four different counties and they were moving—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not go—

Mr. MacDonald: Well, at least, he made a speech.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not go under their auspices. I combined a trip to discuss things with the municipalities with an engagement to speak at the John Howard Society.

Mr. MacDonald: He made a speech down in Kingston in which he expressed his views with regard to the possibility of what might be called the multi-county jail approach, or more accurately, in a more modern version, a sort of regional detention centre.

Now all I would draw the hon. Minister's attention to is this, and I am certain that this is still the view of the John Howard Society, that a year or so ago the John Howard Society put out a basic brief in which, in light of the new situation which we shall face with the implementation of the Fauteux commission report, they said that we cannot do the job in the province of Ontario unless you integrate the county jails in a very intimate way with the reform institutions of the province of Ontario.

The hon. Minister, if he wants to do a job in this department, might as well face this fact and face it squarely and not come to the House and say we do not want to encroach upon the autonomy of the local municipalities, or whatever it is.

In fact, the hon. Minister's revelation that the delicacy in the situation down there was in the competition as to where they were going to place the new building is the best point in itself to suggest the necessity of taking this out of the county area and bringing it in as part of the provincial Department of Reform Institutions. Because if we have to decide on where we will put a regional detention institution on a compromise basis to suit county X and county Y, and you come into a second best location for it instead of the best one, this is not the way to approach the situation.

I remember a year or so ago, with that genial former Minister of Reform Institutions who has moved on to mining, when the John Howard Society presented their brief with regard to their views on county jails his spontaneous reaction was that he did not know whether he could consider this kind of thing, he thought it would encroach upon the autonomy of the counties.

Apart from where they might put a building, I can think of few things that the counties would be less interested in retaining under their jurisdiction than looking after prisoners. Along with that is the idea that was introduced earlier in the debate, the fact that sometimes you have a very expensive prisoner who comes under their custody because he happens to have committed a crime in their area, although he may have come from Toronto. A city slicker from Toronto becomes a burden on the little municipality of Barrie, as was cited earlier.

All I am saying is that if we are approaching—and I trust it will be soon—a situation in which our responsibility is going to be for those under six months sentence, I suggest to the hon. Minister that his job is increasingly going to be dealing with younger people and almost confirmed alcoholics—people who are in and in and in, in the fashion that the hon. member for Sudbury spelled out. This is going to be his task.

I know there will be a few criminals or offenders who are beyond the age of 20, but your training schools and the growing number below 20 years of age represent the majority. This presents you with another desperate problem that you have got to face up to soon.

What can you do in six months? This is a tough one, because you are going to be faced with very severe limitations on the training or the rehabilitation that can be accomplished in the six-month period. I want to suggest to the hon. Minister, in general terms, that the answer to this is going to be training and rehabilitation that will have to be tied in with programmes that can increasingly be continued after the person gets out of the institution.

The hon. Minister indicated, for example, that they have made some progress in trades training. Now even in trades training, six months training with most trades is very inadequate. This is not going to give you any more than a sort of probationary slip to get into the trade and continue it.

So there has got to be the closest kind of integration between trades training and other kinds of training within the institution, with the hope that what you can do in the six months is to get some reorientation of the person, to get some alteration in his motivation so that when he gets the taste of trades training for six months he will go out and he will continue the rest of the trades training in some other institution, whether it be the provincial institute of trades, or wherever it is, so that he can complete his training and perhaps become a useful citizen who is going to live in accordance with our laws.

But the basic reason that I rose was to say that the hon. Minister can come in and lament to us about the Fauteux commission report not being implemented.

That is beyond his power, but there are some things that are within his power, and they are just as important—indeed it may be a bit more important, than the ultimate implementation of the Fauteux commission. That is the integration of our county jails system with The Department of Reform Institutions. You will reach the stage where you must get rid of these old Victorian buildings that are hopelessly inadequate. In fact, most of them are, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Minister of Health one time made a comment, when he was pleading as a back bencher for a more generous appropriation for a new jail in Ontario county. He referred to it in some pretty disparaging terms, about putting human beings in this kind of a building. He is right. It is the appropriate kind of reaction to our county jails. The sooner we can get rid of them all the better. Obviously what they should be replaced with—and the hon. Minister is taking the first faltering step—is a regional detention centre or whatever you want to call it. If you are doing that, it should be part of the reform institutions system.

I leave the matter rest there, because if the hon. Minister wants to make his mark in the four years, or the eight years, or whatever years he has got in this portfolio, this is the area where he can do so. It will be laying the foundations for some constructive development in the future.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to follow up on this point about integrating the county jails with reform institutions. There are, I think, over 63,000 people every year going into our jails and they are in there for a short time. The hon. Minister shakes his head but I am reading on page 61 of his reports.

There again, there may be some cases of individuals in there more than once. But certainly there are a good many thousands of people going into our jails. And if you are going to reach an individual before he gets into serious trouble, this is the place where you are going to reach him with the most effect—his first contact with the law. When this administration tries to ignore the people who are going into our county jails, they are ignoring the heart of the problem because The Department of Reform Institutions ends up with those individuals who are in difficulty and who have been in difficulty over long periods of time.

I also think this is why the attitude of our local police authorities is so important. I know you may argue that does not come under reform institutions, but certainly in this whole matter of trying to help those who are in trouble with the law, this problem begins with the time the individual is arrested by the authorities. In these county jails young offenders are thrown in with hardened, seasoned crooks while they are awaiting trial. There is certainly no proper screening, except in maybe the larger centres such as here in Toronto. But just to give you some idea of what the John Howard Society thinks of the local jails here in Ontario, it says this:

The present structures are in some cases very old and poorly adapted for modern use. They were built on a concept of penology in which secure custody was considered to be the basic criterion of a good jail and the only control function.

I know the hon. Minister regretted there was so little research done in this field, but certainly even he must be aware of the fact that today it is just impossible to try to reform people in jail and the problem starts in the local jail. I would say that it is a major policy that must be adopted by this government, that the reform institutions take over the county jails, and make them regional jails if you wish. It is the only way that they are going to get at the basis of the problem, because, Mr. Chairman, The Department of Reform Institutions as it stands today is a failure.

In 1960, 7.7 per cent of the people in reform institutions were there for the first time. In other words, Mr. Chairman, over 90 per cent of the inmates in our reform institutions were there more than once. Here we are trying to reform and we find that over 90 per cent had been there before. I think in 1960, approximately 46 per cent of the inmates had been in there three times or more, and yet in 1950, ten years before, this figure was just 35 per cent. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we are getting worse instead of better and I say that there is something very wrong with The Department of Reform Institutions.

I do not wonder that the morale of the civil service has been hurt, just by the way this department has been kicked around by the present administration. We have mentioned before that it seems to be the dumping ground for a Minister either on his way up or on his way out and I say this, as a whole, has hurt the administration of this department.

Again, there has been mention about the liquor problem. Over 60 per cent of the inmates of reform institutions are there because of booze. It is like a revolving door. They seem to keep going in and around and when the hon. Minister, as he has told us on this vote, says there are not enough people who are interested in going to the alcoholic clinic in Mimico, I would say that something is very seriously wrong.

Just to give you an illustration, I asked the hon. Minister for some information about an inmate in one of the institutions. I mentioned that this fellow had been in a mental hospital a couple of times and finally he went to jail for trying to rob a bank on Sunday. I tried to inquire if he had been given a mental examination. Evidently the doctor who examined him said there is nothing psychologically wrong with this man.

Well, the doctor could not have had very much time to examine that man, because he has got quite a record of mental disturbance. Obviously the inmates are not being reached and treated as they should be.

On this vote, Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing I would like to mention and it is this. I am glad to see that at long last the hon. Minister and the department are going to contribute $30,000 for a centre of criminology at the University of Toronto. Mr. Chairman, ten years ago, there was a committee made up of members of this House. The chairman was a former member for Parkdale, W. J. Stewart. One of its recommendations was to set up a chair on this subject at the University of Toronto and it has taken the government ten years to get around to it.

No wonder in the hon. Minister's speech, Mr. Chairman, he was disappointed, and there was so little information, he said, or lack of research. Here is one thing that has been crying for research and why this government has not got around to this sooner, I do not know. I know each time these estimates come up since I have been in the House, we have asked for this, but you move at a snail's pace. I think the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Paterson) suggested flags for Ontario and Canada. I think a good flag for this department would be a snail rampant on a field of red tape. This is the way they move. I think it is an indication of how you get things done.

Mr. Chairman, I hope with this chair being set up at the University of Toronto they will get some research done. The hon. Minister says he does not know what the figures are or what the rate of the repeaters is in the institutions, but I think that if he looks reasonably closely at what figures are even available now, he can get a good idea. You may disagree whether the number of repeaters is 90 per cent of the present inmates or 70 per cent; the truth of it is that the vast majority of them are repeaters and that this department is failing in its job. Another reason, sir, is that they sum up to The Attorney General's Department and sum up to this department that not enough is being done. Then of course they leave an awful lot to the county jails. It is an over-all problem and I repeat again that unless you get the offender at the time he is arrested, you are bound to have a continuous flow of men through this revolving door that the present institution seems to be.

I do hope the hon. Minister will have success at this post. I know it is a new one for him and perhaps we should not be too hard on him. But I will make a prediction, Mr. Chairman, that this hon. Minister will have no more success than the previous Ministers in this department, because I think the overall view of the administration in Ontario is that they do not care about The Department of Reform Institutions. It is the sick sister of the administration, and I think it is going to be treated that way by the Treasury board. But I do hope that the hon. Minister makes more effort than his predecessors in getting something done.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might be permitted to say a few words on this department's estimates, having had a lot to do with it over the years and the reform institution being very close to my heart.

I listen each year to the criticism which emanates from different places toward this department, but I wish that at some time they would try to give us constructive criticism of this department, and the field of correction which is so hard to administer.

Mr. Trotter: Take over the county jails! That is constructive.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Oh yes, that is one little facet. This whole field of correction is a big, big problem. One thing that I deplore is the constant criticism and the small amount of suggestions, that is, good suggestions, which come from all of us. And I am not only talking about the Opposition.

I also deeply deplore, Mr. Chairman, the attitude of the public toward the police in this province. These men are dedicated to their job, trying to keep the law, and what do we see? At times when some acts of destruction are taking place, or there is some shooting from criminals on our streets and the police are brought in to correct it, many of the public stand back and do not offer a hand. This criticism of our police is all right if it is constructive, Mr. Chairman, but certainly there should be some constructive measures offered and some praise given to departments of government such as Reform Institutions and our police forces.

I could mention many of the things which have been done. For instance, we have heard of AA—alcoholics anonymous. We all know what alcohol means if used to excess—the old saying about loss of memory, dimness of sight, insanity, then death is the eventual end. In a great many cases that is true, and in every part of your institutions today you have AA groups. You have counsellors, you have regular classes for instruction in the dangers of alcohol and the effort and means to correct these dangers. I have attended these meetings in many of our institutions, one which all the Reform Institutions staff know about where as many as 796 inmates are in attendance, trying sincerely to correct their alcoholism.

Now do not tell me that there—

Mr. Thompson: Did the hon. Minister say 796 had motivation in this group? That 796 had motivation to try to correct their disease?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I do not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry. I wanted to find out the number the hon. Minister mentioned. Did he say there were 796 in the group which had motivation to correct the disease?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, I cannot answer that all had motivation, but they were there at the meeting.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister just said a number, over 700.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes, we were at a meeting of over 700 inmates. I cannot understand what the hon. member is getting at.

Mr. Thompson: Well, it is very obvious the present hon. Minister of Reform Institutions cannot. He says there are only 48 who are motivated and this hon. Minister said he sat with 700.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: They were men who were at this AA meeting trying to secure information that may help them. How many were motivated I do not know, but they were all there of their own free will and accord.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister said they were sincerely motivated.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: One of their men, who had been a real liquor soak, told them about how he had served time in every one of our institutions in Ontario. He said to them:

I don't have to tell you who I am, you all know me. I have been here many times. Five years ago this same kind of meeting taught me the dangers and I reformed, and today I am handling a payroll of some $200,000 a month.

He continued and said to these men:

You're a bunch of goons. I have served time with you. The last time that I was sentenced I was standing in a courtroom in the city of Toronto with a rope around my waist for a belt, no shoes on, and my wife hanging on my arm crying. That was the time I made my decision to reform. Today I have a real job, through the policy of AA which was taught to me in this reform institution.

Mr. Chairman, I do not like this constant criticism about what we should do and what we are not doing. Personally, I have been in England's Wandsworth prison, Ley Hill, and many of their institutions. I have been all over this country, in institutions in other provinces. I have been down to the United States and visited their reform institutions. And I defy anybody, after a visit to those places, to say that the reform institutions in Ontario are not on a par, or better, than any I have seen in other countries. And I say that without fear of contradiction.

I am listening to men and I will ask them on that side: How many institutions have any of you been in?

Mr. Sopha: We obey the law.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: How many of you? And you are talking and saying how bad they are. Do not try to tell me because I know.

Mr. Singer: Better put his picture back in.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, it is all right, but I am talking about casting criticism without knowledge, decrying the efforts and so on of men who are sincere in this field.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister asked a question and I will answer it. I have been in a number of institutions—

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I know that. I agree, and I agree that the hon. member is a humanitarian. That is quite true, Mr. Chairman. And he has tried, even when I was Minister, to make suggestions to me, but he is one of the very, very few.

Mr. Thompson: I represent my party, sir.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, that may be. But honestly, Mr. Chairman, it rather makes me feel sad when I hear these constant criticisms. There is counselling of inmates in all Ontario reform institutions; there is a gentleman here in this legislative assembly today who is the chief counsellor for the groups of girls who unfortunately come to these institutions. He tries to teach them the dangers of drugs, the dangers of alcohol, the dangers of promiscuity, and all the other things that this path leads them to. He has these classes constantly.

It is not known to the public that all their counselling services are going on in all our institutions. Our reform institutions are sincerely trying to correct many of the things the hon. member was speaking about. There is money supplied to try to improve these conditions, and it ill behoves you and me to criticize destructively.

Mr. Trotter: Why is the situation getting worse?

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: It is not getting worse.

Mr. Trotter: It is.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: Remember your population is growing by leaps and bounds. When you talk about alcoholism, we are opening up more places to drink and this creates a situation where drinking will increase, but your reform institutions are trying to keep down alcoholism, so why criticize them?

I think, sir, that the hon. Minister and all his staff should be given the compliments of this Legislature and a little bit of praise sometime, instead of this constantly carping criticism.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: That is it. Give them a little applause. Thank you.

Just a minute now, I want to say a few more words. Somebody spoke of counselling and therapy. This therapy is used extensively in all our institutions. It is extended daily, by men and women who have knowledge, to all our inmates. It is a job that is carried out day after day, year after year. We have recidivists, it is true, but there is a percentage of cures, and a gratifying percentage.

I agree with what is mentioned about aftercare, to the extent that that is a slow process, Mr. Chairman, we all know, and deplore the fact. Medical science is available in all our reform institutions. Mental care—I have attended classes with inmates who were thought to be a little below average mentally. They are given treatment and care and go out of those institutions, certainly in better shape than when they went in.

Psychiatry is another thing that the reform institutions staff is looking after, and after-care in which we speak of finding them jobs on release. I wish I had $1 for every phone call I had made to employers to try to get jobs for the men who were in these institutions when I was there, and that is constantly going on by the staff of reform institutions trying to find employment, following discharged inmates to help them and to see if they cannot be permanently cured.

We talk about other countries. Let's talk about Ontario Reform Institutions. Here we have an advisory council made up of very knowledgeable people. We were talking a little time ago about the Fauteux report. One of the heads on our advisory council was the author of the Fauteux report and he is one of your chiefs on the advisory council of this very department you are criticizing.

I think we have one of the finest parole boards in this Dominion, in our Department of Reform Institutions. It consists of three knowledgeable men who are humane and are doing their best to see that those who are worthy of it, get paroled at the proper time.

We have a very close liaison with the Salvation Army, the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society and many others. All of these organizations if you ask them, gentlemen, would tell you that this is a department that works closely with them and helps them. I would say that the Salvation Army, the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society and these other humanitarian bodies are doing a great job. Their people are dedicated and do a majority of these things without any chance of remuneration and without ever asking for it.

I see the hon. leader of the NDP coming in and I want to pay him a compliment. He was of great assistance to me when I was Minister of this department and his wife is one of the greatest workers that the Elizabeth Fry Society has. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make these remarks because I do appreciate what he has done in the past and I imagine that he is still continuing to extend constructive help.

Mr. MacDonald: You are an old rascal, George.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: I do appreciate what he has done.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): You did not say that at the time, though.

Hon. Mr. Wardrobe: I thoroughly thank him for it.

Now let us not be carried away with the idea of criticism of these institutions, Mr. Chairman. Let us give a little praise. We have a staff here today that I worked with for some years—the deputy Minister and all these others who were sincerely trying day after day to make this department one of the leaders in the world in correction.

It is a day-to-day job. It is a tedious job. The former head of the Don Jail is here this afternoon, and if you do not think that that is a job that is not all enjoyment, go down to that jail as I often did on Sunday morning and see the line-up come in. If you think that that is a pleasant job and that it is one that anybody can easily take on and do, you are greatly mistaken.

There is sorrow in this work but there is also joy. These men are specially trained, and in my opinion are doing a great deal of good for the people of this province. So, gentlemen, I again ask you to see that it is not all criticism but that there is some praise when these estimates are coming up. I want to thank on my own behalf, and I am sure I should be extending thanks for every hon. member of this House, to the hon. Minister and all his officials for the tremendously good job they are doing in the correctional service in this province. Remember we have 6.5 million people of all nationalities, all types and all mental capacities and we will never cure all our crime but we should all try through the years to improve it. I assure you that is what this government is trying to do in The Department of Reform Institutions and every member in it has his part and is doing his or her work well.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister has the misconception that we are seeking to go out of our way on this side to criticize these officials in this department. I have not heard from this side a single syllable of criticism of people who work in The Department of Reform Institutions. On the contrary, any contact that I have had with them personally has been of the most courteous and amicable type. I always found them to be very helpful. In order that the record may be set straight, what we have said—several speakers from this party have spoken as well as our hon. friends of the New Democratic Party—is that we have come to a juncture in our history where perhaps the time is ripe for us to adopt some innovation in our attitude toward these offenders.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister was not here during the course of this debate. In order that he will not go away with the feeling that the theme of this debate is what he has heard in the last few remarks of the hon. Minister of Mines, let us say to him that we took the opportunity to point out this afternoon that most of the people spending the $20 million voted by this House for this department, are in the institutions because of alcohol.

Perhaps the time has come for this province to do a great deal more than it is doing in the spending of some $750,000 in alcoholism research, take a new direction toward the treatment of these offenders. Perhaps research will demonstrate that they ought not to be in institutions at all. We could close them up if they could be handled in another way.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is about $1.4 million.

Mr. Sopha: Fifty-six thousand passed through and the hon. Minister always wants to point out to us that these are repeaters, the same people. There are not really 56,000 individuals, he said, but the same people are going through to make a total. It is like the people who ride the subway. They ride from day to day.

However it may be of the 56,000, that 30,000 of them are there because of violations of the liquor statutes. We plead with this department and point to the annual report of the department and we cannot see any evidence of any research or any attempt to formulate general principles of a new approach toward—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What are you talking about? Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: Just a moment, I have the floor—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know if that is in order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has told us all this—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: On a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: Proceed, but not repetitions.

Mr. Sopha: That is all right. I am repeating it to their good advantage. I am repeating it because the hon. Minister of Mines took the opportunity to distort what we have said and I want to correct the record. That goes for the next four years until we meet the test at the polls again. We will be seeing the same people over and over again for four years, but finally some day the ray of light and understanding will shine on this department and it will become a viable and important department of government, which it is not now and has not been.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 2001 agreed to?

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I have not been on yet.

Since the hon. Minister of Mines has come into this, I was not going to speak but I have before me the Christian Science Monitor, and the headline is, "Crime Termed Major Challenge." Some of these statements I think should be put in the record.

An hon. member: Ah, ah.

Mr. Troy: What is the ah-ing about? It is the indifference, just as the hon. Minister of Mines has said, that we have in cases when policemen are attacked. People stand around, not doing anything, in fact encouraging the assailant to assault some policeman.

I can remember as a boy going to the aid of a policeman against quite a strong, husky man and I know it was quite an experience, but I would be willing to do it again if I had to. That is the great indifference that we have on the part of the public—kind, solid citizens who seem to think this does not touch them at all. But when you realize the more people who go to jail and the more people who go to reform institutions, the more taxes will have to be paid, it affects us all. When you realize too that in this city and across this country there are smut peddlers, and here in The Department of Treasury they allow these things without any sales tax to be put on the bookstalls, these things lead to crime. It is the indifference to the increase of it—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Troy: —and again we talk of juvenile delinquency; they are no longer delinquents at all, they are young criminals.

Mr. Chairman: Order. I think the member is debating in the Attorney General's area of responsibility with this subject matter. There has been considerable latitude this afternoon.

Mr. Singer: Good enough for the hon. Minister of Mines.

Mr. Troy: The people who are in our jails and in our reform institutions are there because they committed a crime! And can we not talk of crime then, the cause that puts them there? Is that not right? Ask the hon. Attorney General. He will agree, I think.

An hon. member: Sure they will agree.

Mr. Troy: Ask the hon. Minister!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, if you agree not to repeat the statement.

Mr. Troy: I have finished with this, sir.

In a speech earlier in this House I suggested that there should be a committee, in fact this committee on youth should be enlarged to a committee on study of family life, because it is the indifference of the parents, as Edgar Hoover points out when the question was asked: Do you believe parents share the responsibility of the increase in crime among the young people? The answer is yes.

The study of numerous cases from all parts of the nation showed this, and the same thing will apply in this country. As you very well know, the Roach commission saw the spread of organized crime into Canada and the increase of crime. Criminals owned bars, restaurants, race tracks, and all those things—we will have the same effect here.

It says further:

Too many parents have made the mistake of failing to teach their children the doctrine of individual responsibility. These parents substitute self-indulgence for self-discipline.

Possibly, if they got the same treatment as the hon. member for Simcoe East said that these youngsters should get, these young punks in cars—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What was that?

Mr. Troy: Read the Globe and Mail; I will not repeat it here, there are ladies present.

Mr. MacDonald: It was an edifying comment.

Mr. Troy: To continue:

These parents substitute self-indulgence for self-discipline by giving children too much, too soon. As a consequence, they create citizens who reach maturity with a warped sense of values.

Certainly all we have to do is read our newspapers, see our films and then go to our bookstalls, we find that each is one of the sources of crime.

Since I possibly, as you, Mr. Chairman, said, have wandered away—

An hon. member: You really got lost.

Mr. Troy: I should say that I know something about institutions, also.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I notice in vote 2001, item nine, staff training and development; under that item there are training fellowships to students in psychology and social work attending Ontario universities. Would scholarships be made available to students attending the University of Windsor? They have courses in sociology there.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Newman: They would, thank you, sir.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question under item 10.

I see the John Howard Society of Toronto is granted $20,000. I was wondering if he could advise me as to whether some of that money is then sent to the John Howard Society branch in Kingston, or whether the John Howard branch in Kingston receives any grant at all?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that this is all for the John Howard Society of Toronto, but it is up to that society whether they wish to funnel some of it to the Kingston branch. I am not too sure whether they give them a grant or not, but most of them are self-sustaining. I have an idea they do get some money from the Toronto branch.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Ottawa East.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, may I first say a few words about one of the private training schools which operates under grants from this department? This is under item 10, vote 2001.

As president of the lay advisory board of St. Joseph's Industrial School in Alfred, I have been in a position to see the wonderful work done by the Christian Brothers in that institution over the years under great financial difficulties.

Mr. Chairman, may I make a point there? The hon. Minister of Mines talked about criticism made in this House which was not constructive. I read back the Hansard of the previous years where this problem was brought to the attention of the hon. Ministers and, unfortunately the hon. Ministers in those years have not done anything to correct the difficulties that exist in that institution. This problem was brought to the attention of this House, as I said, many times in the past few years.

I understand, however, Mr. Chairman, that there has been a change in the attitude by the hon. Minister and that he might perhaps tell us what is being done for St. Joseph's and the other private schools so that they may continue to do their marvellous work on behalf of young delinquents in this province?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, we recognize in this department, of course, the wonderful work which is being done by St. Joseph's as is being done by the two other private schools operated by religious orders. They have had some difficulties with their financing in the past, both as to capital and current, at least two of them have, and we have in these past few months been conferring with them.

I think I can assure the hon. member that the result of these discussions will be mutually satisfactory to all concerned. I know that the boards of directors of the schools have expressed their satisfaction with the way things have been going in these conferences and I am sure the hon. member, being a member of the board, I think chairman of the lay board, has probably been informed of them.

Perhaps you would like me to read into the record a letter from them.

Mr. Racine: Yes, I would be very pleased, Mr. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not too good bilingually and there are quite a few French words here, I think somebody deliberately did this.

This is dated January 24, 1964. It is a letter which is directed to me from the Christian Brothers in Ottawa:

Dear Mr. Grossman:

On behalf of Les Frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes—

Is that it?

—of Ottawa, the Christian Brothers of Ottawa—

Mr. Racine: May I say it for you, Mr. Minister? Les Frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Thank you. The letter continues:

Both Brother Gilles and the writer would like to express to you and Mr. Graham, and the other members of the department, their very deep appreciation for the kindness and consideration accorded to us at the meeting on Wednesday, January 8th, 1964. We found the meeting of great help and we believe a basis has been established that will lead to great improvement in the operation of St. Joseph's and the attainment of our mutual objectives.

We shall co-operate in every way possible with the department in solving the many problems we face. In the meantime Mr. Levesque is working with your department officials to arrive at a solution which will be acceptable to the department and the three orders involved.

At the same time we can deal with our own current situation which, as you are aware, poses a problem in this year to meet our debt requirements. We look forward to discussing this further with you when the committee has reached a decision.

Yours very truly,

(Signed)

Brother Arsène, Superior.

I might add that at that meeting we appointed a sub-committee. They have met on a number of occasions with our officials and have submitted a report to us. We have it here and we will—as a result of this, as soon as the session adjourns, and we have the time to go into it—I think, come to a satisfactory and mutual arrangement with them.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister regarding these grants: Last night I mentioned that I felt that certain things ought to be done regarding building up staff and the hon. Minister of Mines got to his feet this afternoon and talked about the fine gentleman sitting over there. I think we all agree with him. All that we on this side of the House are anxious about is that these people get the kind of tools they need to work with.

I referred last night to the fact that you, sir, were very much like the chaps who were sent out by the pharaohs to make bricks without straw. We are asking our top staff in this department to do a job of reform without the psychiatrists, without the psychologists, without the social workers they need, and over this next period we must see that that staff is built.

Is there provision in these grants for our senior staff in the institutions to upgrade their ability, so that the people there can get the kind of psychiatric training and training in penology they need in order to do their job efficiently? Is there a large amount here for students who come up through this whole field of penology, so that in days to come they can take their places as key people in the whole institutional life of the province?

Hon. Mr. Crossman: We think there is sufficient here. As a matter of fact, if there appears to be any indication that there are other students interested, over and above what this allows for, we would be very happy to look after them.

Mr. Young: Could the hon. Minister tell us how many students might be involved here?

Hon. Mr. Crossman: In this $12,000?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, may we leave this until we resume the estimates?

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume these estimates and then go to the order paper and resume the Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 5.35 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree), as follows:

Has the government acted on the recommendation of the standing committee that an appropriate committee be established to review Bill No. 37, The Operating Engineers Act and its regulations? If so, who have been appointed to the committee and when will it meet?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, I introduced The Operating Engineers Act, 1964, for first reading early in February. And I pointed out that we expected that there would be representations and recommendations on this bill, and that I was anxious that every group that had an interest in the legislation should have ample opportunity to study it and make their views known. With this mind, and considering the recommendation of the standing committee and the matters discussed before it, I have taken the review of this legislation out of the hands of the branch officials responsible for its drafting and I have established a legislative committee under my own chairmanship. The other members of this committee are Mr. J. B. Metzler, deputy Minister of Labour, and Mr. T. Eberlee, assistant deputy Minister of Labour.

The committee met on Friday, March 6, with a delegation representing the committee for the protection of The Operating Engineers Act. The committee for the protection of The Operating Engineers Act, for example, is made up of: first, the Ontario Provincial Council of the International Union of Operating Engineers representing stationary and hoisting engineers; second, Universal Craftsmen Council of Engineers; third, the Institute of Power Engineers; fourth, the Canadian Union of Public Employees; fifth, the Ontario Hydro Employees Union; sixth, Canadian Union of Operating Engineers; seventh, United Packing House Workers; eighth, United Automobile Workers of America; ninth, United Steelworkers of America; tenth, International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers; eleventh, United Rubber Workers of America.

This group raised a number of matters pertaining to Bill No. 37 and its regulations. As a result certain principles were agreed upon. It is the intention of this organization to make a further written submission to be received by the committee prior to March 23.

Communications have been received from a number of groups and individuals, including the Institute of Power Engineers, in which they state their intention to submit briefs to this committee for our review and consideration. In addition I understand the Canadian Boiler Institute intends to meet with the committee next week to discuss their brief.

It appears that the organizations which have informed us of their intention to make presentation to this committee represent the major parties having an interest in the legislation.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my second question is to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts).

On page 2896 of Hansard for April 26 of last year the hon. Prime Minister gave an undertaking that he would investigate what the rules are with regard to franking privileges on sizable mailings. Is the hon. Prime Minister in a position to clarify those rules now for the future guidance of the members?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The difficulty is that in fact there are no rules. In our discussion of April 26 last this point was raised.

First of all, I think we should realize that it is not a franking privilege in this House, as it is in Ottawa. In other words, the federal government controls the post office and in Ottawa the mail is simply put in the box and the post office facilities are available to the member for nothing. In other words, no stamps are affixed. What happens in this House is that the mail of the members goes to the central post office and postage is paid in the usual fashion, but is paid out of the government account.

So there is a difference between the privilege we have in this House and the privilege in the House of Commons.

However, in reviewing what has happened over the years and trying to find some guide lines, I find there is nothing formal. What has happened over the years has been simply a matter of common sense on the part of the members.

Certainly this privilege is there to cover the large volume of mail the members have while the House is in session, and I think common sense would indicate that this privilege could be used for the distribution, within one's riding, of statements on issues of the day which the members might want to put into their ridings. I think it would be quite reasonable, too, for members to use this privilege to distribute various pieces of literature the government publishes which which might be of interest.

I am not referring specifically to the road maps, although that triggered this whole discussion, but I am thinking, as I have done in my day, of the distributing of various government publications that are of service. For instance, I have distributed government telephone directories to the legal fraternity in my own city so that instead of having to phone in here and go through a long procedure and tie up the switchboard, men who are in touch with the government frequently can just turn up the local directory. There are many publications from The Department of Health, for instance, that are of interest to people in the ridings.

I think really that what we have to do is use our common sense. This is the way it has functioned over the years, and apart from the odd discussion, such as we had last April and such as we had yesterday, these are the exceptions rather than the rule. If the privilege is abused, why then of course we will have to lay down, I suppose, some firm rules. I would hope that this would not be necessary. I think when the hon. members understand that it is not a franking privilege such as one has in Ottawa, I think they would agree that with a little common sense we can do what we want to do and service the people in our ridings and not take advantage of this for functions which perhaps are not necessarily associated with the business of this Legislature or the affairs of the government.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Prime Minister a supplementary question to try to clarify this. Does the hon. Prime Minister envisage a mailing to every constituent within a member's riding as within the bounds of common sense in using this privilege?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the difficulty. I do not know that I necessarily would, it would all depend on what the mailing was. I would think that any mailing of any material that referred to a political party rather than to the affairs of this Legislature would not be in order—even if one piece were mailed.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): What about a report, say, on what has gone on in the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think this might be reasonable. I do not think that it would be reasonable to mail to every householder in somebody's riding. I must look at what the ultimate effect of this would be, Mr. Speaker.

We have 108 members and this would mean, theoretically, that there would be 6.5 million pieces of mail. Taking the population of the province, not counting the children, theoretically we cover, in our membership in this House, every single individual in the province. Now let us say we all decide to send out a weekly report which we wrote ourselves. You can see immediately, Mr. Speaker, that we would end up in an impossible situation.

What I would like to avoid would be the necessity of saying arbitrarily it must be this number or that number. I think that members making speeches here might want to send out some sort of selective mailing list in their own riding, copies of a speech that might give their particular stand on the issues that we debate here. But I do not think it would be reasonable to expect the government to pay for a mailing to every individual in the member's riding, because as I say, carried to the ultimate that would amount to 4.5 million multiplied by five cents.

We would have to increase the postal facilities here in the Parliament buildings because they are not geared to handle that sort of thing.

If it is necessary to put fixed limits on this, we will simply have to do it. I would hope that we would not because circumstances will vary. I would think that one large mailing during a session, or possibly two, on issues would do. Of course, the government does not pay for the reproduction or for the envelopes and that sort of thing—the members pay for that themselves—but if we use some common sense I think we can work it out.

If we do not and if we cannot, then we will simply have to lay down some hard-and-fast rules on which we will all operate. For many years we have managed to function without those rules. I think that we will continue to do so.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to take the opportunity to inform the House of an important step being taken under The Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. This, I know, will be of considerable interest to all hon. members from rural constituencies, in view of the continuing shortage of water in some sections of the province, particularly in southwestern Ontario.

Following a survey of the province, our ARDA branch is recommending to the government of Canada that approval be given to the Whiteman's Creek project under a revised share of cost between the three levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal.

When this rural water conservation project was first submitted to the ARDA directorate in 1963, it was approved by the government of Ontario and the government of Canada on a cost-sharing basis of one-third provincial, one-third federal and one-third municipal—or equal contributions from all three levels of government.

In order that rural conservation programmes of this nature can be accelerated, due to the very serious drought situation in some rural areas, the government of Ontario is increasing its share to 37.5 per cent and requesting the government of Canada, through ARDA, to do the same. This will reduce the contribution of the municipalities to 25 per cent of the cost. This revised policy is in line with the federal-provincial policy of assisting municipalities in flood protection and water use.

The Whiteman's Creek project will provide for the establishment of three reservoirs and the acquisition of natural water storage areas in Brant and Oxford counties. Preliminary engineering studies have been carried out to determine the location of the reservoirs, and for the use of certain marsh lands as natural storage areas. The estimated cost of the project is placed at $1,116,000. I need not remind the House, Mr. Speaker, of the importance of this project, in view of the seriousness of the water shortage in areas which embrace most of our agricultural land.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I rise before the orders of the day to bring to the attention of this honourable House, two important days which are coming up. March 14, tomorrow, is Slovakia's independence day. Slovakia had a very brief existence as an independent nation. It came into existence on March 14, 1939. The second is Hungary's independence day, March 15.

Mr. Speaker, I bring this to the attention of the House because my riding has a fairly strong Hungarian community. I would like to briefly recall a bit of the history which led to this Hungarian independence day.

Mr. Speaker, the history of the Hungarian nation is a most colourful and stimulating one. It was during the reign of Hungary's first king, Stephen, in the early 1000's that the foundation of individual and national character was laid. The right of the individual to property, to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness, was recognized and protected. The characteristic aversion, the decided opposition of the Hungarians to conquest and the taking of other people's property, was definitely established and engraved into the minds of the Hungarians. To them, property must be protected from foreign invaders at all hazards.

In the ensuing 800 years Hungary fell on difficult days, and it was not until 1848 that the Hungarian poet, Alexander Potocky, wrote soul-stirring words which inspired young men, full of enthusiasm and intrepid energy, to follow that great freedom fighter and patriot, Louis Kossuth, to the fulfillment of another dream and desire, constitutional government for the Hungarian people.

This bloodless revolution of March 15, 1848 led to laws under which Hungary became a modern state. The government was vested in a ministry responsible to Parliament. All the inhabitants of the country were declared equal before the law. The privilege of nobility was abolished. The soil was declared free and the right of free worship was accorded to all. The utmost liberty of the press was obtained. The great mass of the people hailed with boundless enthusiasm this new government and the magnificent reforms.

Once again the Hungarian nation was reborn, with the doctrine that all men are equal, and the nation grew to its manhood with that doctrine as its guide. In its adherence to, and defence of, this doctrine, the Hungarian nation has struggled supremely and filled the pages of its history with brilliant deeds of valour and admirable patriotism.

Perhaps there is no other nation on earth which has struggled more and shed more blood than the Hungarian nation, for the principles of equality of man and the recognition of the rights of others.

During the 1000-odd years of her existence the Hungarian nation has never fought a war of conquest. The tragedy of 1956 still lives in the minds of many. It is with the fervent hope, that in the not-too-distant future Hungary will once again walk proudly with the free nations of the world, that I utter these words and bring them to the attention of this honourable House.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate the hon. members of the government and the hon. members on this side of the House with the words of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Here in the city of Toronto, indeed in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, are large numbers of many groups who come from all parts of the world. Two of the more significant groups are those of Slovakian descent and those of Hungarian descent. They will be celebrating in this community, perhaps with the largest rallies in the province of Ontario.

This evening, I shall be attending a gathering of the leaders of the Slovakian community who will meet at the beginning of a weekend of commemorative services. Slovakia is an outstanding example of a situation where the size of a nation is not the criterion for the desire of its people to be free. Slovakia, in terms of territorial size and in terms of population, is one of the smaller nations of the world. It has had a history of over a thousand years.

It was one of the cradles in the heart of Europe from which culture, language and literature spread to other parts. It has had a history of a desire of its people for freedom, which came about for a short period of time. Then, of course, as a result of the post-war period and events in Europe, the people there do not have the freedom now which they have striven for through the centuries. But their hope is the hope that has been expressed by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

In respect of the celebration of Hungarian independence day, I recall with some emotion the eventful days of November, 1956. This government under the then leader, the hon. Leslie Frost, really sparked a movement to assist, within the limits of our jurisdiction, those people who, as a result of the events which took place, the revolution in Hungary, had to flee their homeland. I recall having been sent by this government, on behalf of the people of the province of Ontario, to Austria, to within 100 yards of that border, where the Hungarian refugees were crossing in tens of thousands. One of the brilliant pages in the history of this province, indeed of this nation, was the fact that tens of thousands of Hungarians were able to settle in Canada, in this province of Ontario.

No country in the world, with a comparable population, did more. Indeed, we did as much in this province as the United States, with its 20-fold population did in respect of them.

Seven years have gone by. The refugees of those days have become citizens. They have children who have been born in this province and they are now taking their place side by side with members of their community who arrived prior to them and with all members of this community. Though they will be celebrating independence day primarily on Sunday, their thoughts will turn to those days of November, 1956, and to their kinfolk whom they would wish to have the same type of freedom, the way of free men, that we in this nation are privileged to have.

So, I join wholeheartedly with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some time ago questions were asked of me respecting the operation of the Ontario municipal employees retirement system and the board and I now have filed with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council the second annual report. I am bound by the legislation to present this report to you, sir, and to the hon. members of the House. At the present time the report is being printed in sufficient copies to be available to all the hon. members and also to the participants in the plan.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that The Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System Act, 1961-62, was given Royal Assent on April 18, 1962 and the regulation thereunder was filed on July 4 of that year. Under the regulation the board was authorized to accept participation in the system from municipalities and local boards as of January 1, 1963. A firm of actuaries and a firm of chartered accountants were engaged by the board to develop the necessary methods, procedures and practices required to administer the Act and the regulation.

To provide for the increase in the membership of the system and to secure efficient and acceptable methods of remitting contributions and for payment of benefits, the board has accepted the recommendation of its consultants that electronic data processing equipment be used on a service bureau basis to provide the actuarial and accounting requirements of the system.

Much effort has been expended by the management and the staff of the system to familiarize the elected and appointed officials of the municipalities and local boards with the terms and conditions of the Act and the regulation. A brochure explaining the terms and conditions of the Act and the regulations has been distributed throughout the province. During the past year the officers of the system carried on voluminous correspondence with municipal officials, visited 114 different municipalities and local boards and attended many municipal conventions. In addition, the officials of many municipalities which had passed bylaws to provide pension benefits for employees discussed problems associated with the discontinuance of such existing pension plans with the officers of the finance branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Now, sir, as at December 31, 1963, the system was in effect in 311 municipalities and local boards involving a total of 9,863 individual employees. An analysis of the municipalities and local boards indicate that every county and every district in Ontario is represented in the membership of the system, with the exception of the districts of Manitoulin and Rainy River.

The municipalities which elected to participate ranged from the city of Windsor with approximately 1,000 members, to townships, villages and local boards of one or two members.

Almost 50 per cent of the municipalities and local boards which elected to participate have fewer than ten eligible employees and it is reasonable to assume that without the Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System, the cost of corresponding pension benefits to such municipalities would have been prohibitive. Forty-eight per cent of the municipalities and most of the local boards which are in the system did not provide pension benefits to employees prior to the enactment of the Act and many municipal employees who were not participating in a pension plan because of age, service or the nature of their employment, have for the first time become eligible for pension benefits.

During the year 1963, Mr. Speaker, the system had an income of almost $5 million, within $3,000 of that figure.

Now analyzing the financial situation, of course in its first year of operation, with the high expenses of forming the system and of purchasing the necessary equipment and so on and so forth, we have not shown a profit. Of course, profits will eventually accrue in the years ahead.

The fundamental principle, Mr. Speaker, behind the structure of this OMER system is the provision of an adequate and uniform level of pension benefits to the employees of the municipalities and the boards—regardless of the size or the location of the employer, or the age, sex or occupation of the employee, at uniform and stable rates of employer and employee contributions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since the first of this year we have again added a considerable number of members to our plan and at the end of February, 1964, we had participation by 357 municipalities and local boards and we had a membership of 13,497. So that we have added about 3,500 members since the first of this year and from the comments which I have from the management of the system, I feel quite confident that before too long more of the municipalities and local boards of this province will take advantage of this very fine system of providing benefits for their employees.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: Fiftieth order: House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Johnston in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF REFORM INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Chairman: On vote 2001:

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Dovercourt): Mr. Chairman, in connection with vote 2001, I wonder if I could come again to the staff training?

I am thinking particularly of this training fellowship of $12,000—am I right in that, in looking at the estimates for 1964-65? As I understand it, the province in giving these fellowships in some cases—I understand there have not been too many applicants for the fellowships so there is no point in giving a large sum if you are not going to get people taking advantage of such a fellowship. The question I have—and I am sure the hon. Minister agrees with me on this—you can have all kinds of institutions, but it is a little like a ship, if you do not have a trained crew to sail the ship it is going to end up on the rocks or is not going to make very steady progress.

Several years ago we congratulated another Minister of Reform Institutions on initiating a programme of staff retraining. I recall from the last estimates the former Minister of Reform Institutions had reported that something over 100 of the staff were taking extension courses. I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us his plans for retraining and also for getting trained staff? I am sure that he feels, in fact in his opening remarks he mentioned that, this is one of the key questions in giving vitality to the department.

Could the hon. Minister perhaps outline this a bit further to us?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, I presume the hon. member is referring to getting some university-trained staff, is that what he is referring to?

Mr. Thompson: I am speaking of both. I noticed the hon. Minister had $12,000 on training.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: $12,000—bursaries for eight students.

Mr. Thompson: I am thinking of both university training to get university graduates to come into this field, as well as giving an opportunity to men who are already on the staff.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, yes, we have a very extensive in-service training programme. I do not think it is under this estimate, or under this vote, but we have an appropriation for the training of our own staff.

I was very much impressed, I might say, by the staff training courses which the department has been following. And briefly, training courses for male guards at our institutions and jails are conducted at the reformatory at Guelph. The courses are of five weeks' duration and accommodate 20 to 25 officers at a time. Since April 1, 1963, five courses have been completed and 123 officers successfully graduated.

Is that the information the hon. member wanted?

Mr. Thompson: That is part of it. I am just thinking of the whole broad concept of the hon. Minister on retraining and training. If I could just give some examples which I would think you might consider; I feel that, with your top officials, there might be an opportunity for a number of men to travel to other countries, for example. We should not only have Ministers going to other countries to study the procedures, but have top officials going there.

I would think that the hon. Minister might have some interchange in connection with probation—I have often felt that—probation services. The hon. Minister says they are not within his department? I admit that. Frankly, I am off this estimate a little bit but I am thinking of a department of corrections, because I see probation as being part of the integrated picture.

I am thinking of having people within institutions working outside the institution for a period, getting some understanding of what the parole officer or the rehabilitation officer does, and perhaps having a rehabilitation officer moving in to work within the institution for a period. In other words, let the personnel have a broad picture of what is being done in the rehabilitation treatment of each person.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I should say, of course, that I encourage every member of our staff to take these training courses; but I take it that the hon. member is making a specific point of having top officials travel to other jurisdictions and perhaps spending some time there.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned some five-week courses in the institution. I had wondered what his whole programme on this was.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Our whole programme, of course, is to get as many of our officials acquainted with what is going on in other jurisdictions. As a matter of fact there is constant flow of officials from other jurisdictions to Ontario, and vice versa. We are rather proud of the fact that the flow mostly is from other jurisdictions to study some of the new developments in our jurisdiction.

If the hon. member is suggesting—for example, I know that recently we made arrangements for three members of our top-echelon staff to go to Rutgers University to make a study there to find what they are doing by way of a cure for alcoholism. We had a couple of them up there a few weeks ago when we had our conference.

This is something which is constantly developing. Of course, it is a matter of time. We have certain programmes, in which all top officials of all the departments of government get together, I think it is, for two or three weeks to study each other's work and so on. I mean, there are certain limitations involved here. Certainly, wherever possible, we encourage every member of our staff, including top officials, to learn what is going on in other jurisdictions, and to exchange information.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask, so that we perhaps may get this a little more concrete, how many top officials last year went to conferences, and what conferences?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I could not give the hon. member that information right now. Obviously it is not a statistic we would keep on the record. I could tell him that there are quite a number of top officials who have.

Mr. Thompson: How many conferences in the past year, let me say in the past four years, outside this country, has the deputy Minister attended?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The deputy informs me that he has attended every one of them with the Minister, when the Minister has gone.

Mr. Thompson: How many has he attended outside of Canada in the past five years?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Four.

Mr. Thompson: I am making my point because—and I want to state this—of a misapprehension which perhaps might have been given. I do not think it was meant to be done intentionally on the part of the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope). Once again I would like to say, as have other hon. members of our party, that we have a great respect for the civil servants working in this department. Our interest is in trying to find out the philosophy which comes from the government, in order that members of your department can do the finest job.

Swinging again from this, we have raised the question of top members going to conferences. I will look forward to getting a more detailed report of the top officials. I appreciate that you cannot give it to me at this time.

I still come back, and we have raised this before, to the fact that there are such drastic needs for psychologists, for social workers, for psychiatrists. It seems such a paltry amount to me, to give fellowships of $12,000 when your total operation is over $25 million. Why is this?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that even those which have been offered have not all been taken up. Of course, my hon. friend will appreciate the fact that this is a situation which applies not only in our department, not only in other departments of this government, but in all social agencies. There is a great shortage of this type of academically-trained professional staff.

This exists all across the continent, as a matter of fact. The private agencies, for example, the social service agencies—as my hon. friend no doubt knows—have even taken to recruiting the help of volunteer workers to do social work as such, even though they are not academically trained for it. There are a great number of people doing this sort of work, lay people you might call them, who have learned to do this work and do a wonderful job in the field. We are doing everything we possibly can to get as much qualified staff as we can.

Perhaps at this time it would be just as well to point out that, because certain comments were made earlier, that perhaps the philosophy of our department does not attract people. Well, I want to assure the hon. members that if it is not attractive to people, it is not the philosophy of the department. It is because it takes a great deal of dedication to remain interested in our work. I should not say remain interested but remain in our work, because it has its depressing periods. If any hon. member of this House will just spend a few days travelling to our institutions and spending some time there, he will appreciate that it means that many of these workers have to move to a location where there is an institution and perhaps live in that area. They have to spend all their time with this particular type of people — with offenders.

I was talking to a psychiatrist who is very prominent in this country, just a few weeks ago, in the hope that I could recruit him as a director of psychiatry. We discussed this at some great length, and he told me that we would have difficulty getting someone to take this job full-time. He said the main reason is that a psychiatrist finds a great deal of interest working among the general population. He begins to develop a sort of rapport between himself and his patients, and they depend upon him to keep them on a level basis. It is very interesting work, and he says it will be very difficult to find psychiatrists who will dedicate their whole career to corrective work with penal institutions.

This is one of the problems. This we find is also all the way down the line, social workers and so on. This is all the more reason why the people we have doing this work in our institutions deserve a great deal of credit, because they can find—I do not like to use the words, more interesting work, because when you are helping people it is always interesting. They apparently find it satisfying when they know they are doing a good job, but it is not as varied or perhaps as colourful as they may find in other fields.

When I say this, I do not want to give the impression that I think the hon. members opposite have reflected upon the character or the ability of our staff. I do not mean this at all; but I do want to impress upon the hon. members that it is most important to give credit to those we can get, who are doing this job in spite of the fact that they do not find it, as I say, as interesting as they might if they were in private practice.

As a matter of fact, I think the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) mentioned the problems he had in this respect. Professional people usually like to be in a field where they can touch upon various aspects of life, rather than confine themselves to a particular area.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I would like to follow up on this. I think, first of all, that two of the real reasons you do not get people are: (1) because of salary; and (2) because of the atmosphere of custodial care. I have talked to people who had thought of going into the challenging work of reforming the offender, people who had actually started in your institutions and had left them. It is unfair of me to generalize from the few who have left; but if I was to generalize, the general criticism they had was about the suffocating atmosphere of custodial approach and the lack of freedom to carry out a professional approach looking at the individual's needs.

I would say, sir, that if you would look into this, perhaps through a questionnaire—and I raise this to you because I am sure that you are not going to be just satisfied in getting the fellowship grants of $12,000. Then, because people do not apply, you are not going to be satisfied with the answer that young Canadians do not have a crusading humanitarian spirit to accept the challenge and that is why they are not coming to your department.

I think you are the kind of man who is going to think deeper, to find out why they are not choosing this particular department. You can look to other jurisdictions I mentioned previously, where a man was brought in—I am thinking of B.C.—J. E. Stevens who had been a professor at a university. He was brought in to take up the challenge of one area of the corrective field, and was told he had permission to make his own dynamic approach to it.

He recruited graduates from the university and they came willingly. I might say that I was one of those graduates who went to work with him at that time. I enjoyed it, and there was variety in the work. There was a great variety, everything including the sort written in the sensational book: My Six Convicts. This is a most stimulating field to get into. The thing is: Are you giving sufficient salary to these people? Why not pay a bit more to them, over and above, because it is such a complete work? Why not pay a higher salary for the social worker, for the psychologist and other professional staff? Why not pay the psychiatrist even more than he would get in industry? And I know they get a great deal in industry.

I suggest, sir, if you look at the motivation of why people are staying out of this department; if you sent a questionnaire to a percentage of the social workers in Ontario, asking them to give reasons why they have not chosen this field; and again that you were providing better salaries; I think then that you would get an answer to what you must solve, the problem of not attracting trained staff.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, normally I would not bother commenting on this, because I think we can go on with this forever because one thing I have found out about The Department of Reform Institutions—one reason why it is always so controversial—is because you are generally dealing in philosophies. You are dealing in an inexact science. You could get 500 psychiatrists and 500 psychologists and 500 social workers, and you could get different opinions from every one of them on any particular subject. There is no use in the hon. member getting up and saying that he does not reflect upon the staff of The Department of Reform Institutions then, two or three minutes later, talking about the suffocating atmosphere and the custodial approach. This is what I do take exception to.

Mr. Thompson: That is from the point of view—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There is no custodial approach as far as I have been able to ascertain. Certainly most of my predecessors never did have that custodial approach. Most of the staff had never had it. Of course, there are many people within the treatment staff who will always feel that they would like to see less of a custodial—as they call it—and more of the reverse, but we must always keep in mind that the superintendent of an institution has a great responsibility to the public. If anything happens in that institution, it will not be the treatment staff who will have to take the responsibility; it will be the superintendent, who is worried about the security of his institution. This is generally—

Mr. Thompson: Why do you not make someone—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Now let me finish please. Just a moment now. This is the sort of dialogue which goes on in every jurisdiction — how much less custodial approach, or how much more of the reverse. I will say, having regard for what is being done in penology across this whole world, that Ontario can certainly never be regarded as having a department which has a custodial approach.

This is not the reason we are having difficulty getting some professional staff. I just pointed out earlier that every department of every government—

Mr. Thompson: How do you know?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: For the simple reason —this is what I am saying now—every social agency in North America, every department of every government, has difficulty getting this kind of staff because there is a shortage of trained staff. You just have to read the newspaper advertisements and the appeals at university levels and so on for this kind of staff.

We could not have this approach in our department, for example, when we get a person like Dr. Tadeusz Grygier who has been working doing research within our department. He has had the complete freedom of our department for three years. He has been working within the department in association with his work at the University of Toronto. Now he was going to leave Toronto to take a position in a university in the United States and when we offered him this job he was happy.

He said that the reason he took this job was because he found the atmosphere precisely the opposite to which the hon. member is referring. He liked the co-operation he got in the department. He liked the approach they took to modern penology, right from the guards up, and this was one of the reasons he was happy to come and work in our department. I am very happy that we were able to recruit him for this, but he did not hesitate for a moment when we offered him this position with our department and he could have gotten more money in the United States for taking the same kind of work or other kind of work. He liked the attitude of the department.

As a matter of fact it could be argued, and I am not saying this is so but it could be argued, that the constant reference to the so-called “custodial” atmosphere of The Department of Reform Institutions being publicized may in itself discourage a lot of people. It may discourage a lot of people, the constant reference to it.

Mr. Thompson: I would like the hon. Minister to find out.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, the hon. member has the privilege, as I invited all the hon. members of this House, to go to any institution without warning. All they have to do is to identify themselves as a member of this Legislature. They can live there for a week if they like and find out for themselves. There may be some—

Mr. Thompson: I might take you up on that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course, and quite welcome! The hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) has done it; the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) has done it. I do not say that they lived there, but they have been in and have asked questions and so on—

Mr. Thompson: As long as they would let me out again—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am sure they will. I take this opportunity of appealing to the hon. members to please do this, so once and for all we will stop putting the stigma of a “custodial approach” on the people of my department, because they will be pleasantly surprised. It is exactly the opposite, exactly the opposite.

You are doing them an injustice, really you are, and I would strongly urge that between now and the next session hon. members do this, and do it without warning. Go in and satisfy themselves. Sit down and talk with the guard or the superintendent or any of them there. It is not too difficult for an intelligent man and all hon. members of this House are intelligent.

Have lunch with them there at the institution, find out about our meals and so on. Hon. members will soon find out what the approach is. I have no doubt that we have members within our department and members of the custodial staff—we have to call them that, this is the designation for a guard and so on—I have no doubt that there are a few of them who we would prefer would have a better outlook on some of these things, but you cannot have perfection. However, our department certainly has anything but a custodial approach.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I think the point that I tried to make on Wednesday evening was this: that as long as we have the remnants, let us say—giving the hon. Minister credit for his attempt to get the institutions smaller—as long as we have the remnants of the large institutions the custodial emphasis must remain to a greater degree than the most of us would want to see it.

I think the key to getting clear of the custodial emphasis is in getting institutions into more viable form so that they are functionally in line with modern thinking. When this is done I think then we are on the way to getting the custodial emphasis eliminated and transferring entirely to the other emphasis which the hon. Minister would like to have.

Now following up the questions that have just been asked by the hon. member for Dovercourt, I would like to again emphasize what I emphasized on Wednesday night regarding this matter of staff.

I feel that at the head of each institution there must be an expert, just as we expect an expert to be at the head of each other kind of institution. I realize that this is not an easy thing to accomplish, but an expert working under a non-expert finds it a pretty frustrating business.

I am delighted to know that the school in Guelph is really stressing the upgrading of the qualifications of our staffs. I would hope that before too long the hon. Minister will be able to announce in this House that a qualified penologist or social worker, a person with proper qualifications, is at the head of every institution in this province. I know that the hon. Minister has this in mind.

In order to achieve this, the other thing that I mentioned as important—and I would like to know if the hon. Minister is thinking about it—is that while we admit the difficulty of getting qualified people, and also admit the shortage of such qualified people in this province and across the world, is the hon.

Minister seriously considering making university training available, free of cost, as far as it is necessary, to young people today, in order that they might qualify themselves for these jobs?

Now as I said before, it may be that a young person may have resources to take one, two or three years, whatever it may be, and then his resources may run out. But is the hon. Minister seriously thinking that if a young person is willing to enter this field, if he is willing to give a commitment that he will work year for year for the help given, is this department willing to grant these young people the expenses they need to get a full course in this field?

I have a couple of other questions, if I could get the answer to that one first.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to correct the wrong impression, the misstatement of fact which I made a few moments ago. I think I said that our bursaries were under-subscribed. That is not the case. Our bursaries, I am told, have always been over-subscribed and we expect they will be this year. In which case, of course, I will attempt to see that anyone who has applied for these bursaries will be satisfied.

Of course we have another problem with these bursaries. I think the hon. Minister of Health mentioned that it was the same problem that they have. Just offering somebody a bursary and asking them to give you year for year does not mean that they will give year for year after they have had their education and our help, because there is no way of tying them to it.

As a matter of fact, even if there were any way of legally tying them to giving service to the department which helped them financially, that sort of person would be no good for this work. One does not expect to get good work from a person who has been forced to carry out a commitment that he does not want to carry out.

As to the question of providing the complete cost of an education for a person from this department; well I do not think that is possible because of the setup. Every department cannot be doing this.

I have been informed that this discussion has been going on in the civil service in a broad way. It could not happen with any particular department, in a broad way, because of the overall shortage of trained staff.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in an area which is so vital as this one the time is here when special stress should be laid here. I realize there are shortages in other places; but so many of our graduates go into private occupations and we want to attract them here. Many of them come out of university with heavy debts which they must recoup.

It seems that where the greatest need is, the greatest stress must be made. Since this is true, I would urge the hon. Minister that even though other departments may have to be taken into consideration here, that he urge upon his fellow Cabinet Ministers that this is an area of special need and therefore must have special consideration. I think there is justification for this kind of assistance at the university level, provided that the young people so helped are willing in their turn to commit themselves for a reasonable length of service within the department. I think this makes sense.

Now the second problem I want to raise is this: the hon. Minister indicated that it is difficult to get people to go into outlying areas where certain need exists. I recognize that forest camps and institutions of this nature are vital.

I notice in the figures that people from forestry and fishing constitute the smallest number of inmates. Now maybe they constitute the smallest number in our population too, but it almost seems that this is a healthy kind of an occupation for these people to go into as far as therapy is concerned.

But outside of these specialized institutions, I wonder if the hon. Minister should not give greater thought to concentrating these institutions around the large centres of population. I have in my hand a representation from the Elizabeth Fry Society, which no doubt the hon. Minister has seen, a criteria for prison location. I am not going to read it here, but their point of view is expressed here and it is the point of view that these institutions should be located near large centres of population where the very thing that the hon. Minister has put his finger upon will no longer be a factor—where there is interaction with universities. I think that is in the mind of the hon. Minister. So I think this ought to be stressed.

Now the third thing that I want to ask about is whether there is integration, as far as staff training is concerned, between The Department of Public Welfare, which has undertaken a good deal of staff training, and this department. There certainly must be a great deal of interlocking as far as training needs are concerned. I am wondering whether there is co-ordination here and whether more co-ordination might be effected.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I am informed this is presently under discussion.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to come to something which I think should be included in these general estimates. I suggest this to the hon. Minister because, frankly, I was disappointed in the reports on this department by the press. The press has at times criticized the apathy on the part of government toward penal reform, suggesting that it is because the people in institutions do not have a vote. I would like to point a finger to the press itself. I have looked, for example, at the hon. Minister's report, on which obviously a great deal of time has been spent. The reports in the press, certainly in the Metropolitan press, hardly mention a word of this.

I think yesterday I got a line in one of the papers about this discussion on trying to rehabilitate men and women, in which the paper said Frost is responsible for bigger institutions or something.

It seems to me that there is a great challenge in this work, and again I say it requires dedication. Our job is to be critical but I want to say again that I personally, and I am sure every hon. member of my party and of the other Opposition party, have a real admiration for the men who have dedicated themselves to this kind of work. There is a story to tell about these men and I am suggesting perhaps it is up to the hon. Minister. He has no estimates for public relations, and the good Lord knows the other departments are generous enough in supplying McKim with work to do. I am not saying that it should be McKim's, but I am suggesting that here is an area where you could generate enthusiasm to participate, pointing out the challenge. Some of the people, such as the deputy and other people, could be written up in the work being done. If you had an item here under public relations, even it came under McKim, I would still, with reservations, say go ahead on it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I thank the hon. member for that and I am glad he made that remark.

Vote 2001 agreed to.

On vote 2002:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks concerning those persons who come before our courts charged with sexual offences.

These people, many of them are sick people, are tried before the courts and frequently sent to our provincial institutions or federal institutions as a punishment really. I think this is the only purpose—they are being punished for their illness. I think it is a most deplorable thing that we apparently have no facilities whatsoever to cope with this sort of sick person who can cause so much havoc in our society, both to innocent people who are attacked, and to himself and to his family.

The present procedure, as I understand it, is that if a man is charged with a sexual offence here can be a pretrial examination at one of the Ontario hospitals under the provisions of The Mental Hospitals Act. The individual is allowed to stay in that hospital for no longer than 60 days and he usually comes back with a note from the hospital that he is fit to stand trial and really little else is done.

They examine him, and in almost every case of which I have been made aware he comes back with a note advising that he is fit to stand trial. Then he is tried, and in those instances where the accused are found guilty, then they are sent off to one of the institutions.

There is the case, for instance, of a gentleman called Vladimir Hagland. He committed himself to an Ontario hospital in August of 1963, because he was concerned about the state of his mental health. The hospital came to the conclusion he was a dangerous man, but he was released. In November, 1963, his concern about himself was borne out, because he was charged with unlawful carnal knowledge of his daughter. Then he was recommitted at the request of his lawyer.

The same findings were made by the hospital and he was sent back again, with the same little note that he was fit to stand trial. He was sentenced to two years in the penitentiary and in the normal procedure he was released after 18 months from Kingston.

The facilities in Kingston, as I am advised, are no better than in any of our provincial institutions. There is one psychiatrist available in Kingston for half a day a week and there is supposed to be a full-time psychologist. My advice is that there is not a full-time psychologist.

At Millbrook there is supposed to be a psychologist, and my advice is that there is not one on the staff there. I am further advised that it was originally intended that Millbrook was going to be some sort of a treatment centre, but in fact Millbrook provides very little treatment to this type of sick person.

I have made substantial inquiries and I have been unable to find that there are any treatment facilities for this sort of person at Mercer, Burwash or at Guelph, or, in fact, in any of the provincial institutions.

I am sure the hon. Minister is aware that the Toronto psychiatric hospital has some 18 to 20 beds available for people to be examined. The occasional magistrate does bother to get a pretrial report, but there is a waiting list running into many hundreds, of people who want to get treatment at the Toronto psychiatric hospital.

I am sure the hon. Minister is aware, as well, of the outpatient portion of the Toronto psychiatric hospital, which is called the forensic clinic. The forensic clinic has a waiting list of some five months.

Usually, a magistrate before whom these persons are charged would be prepared not to commit this sort of individual to jail, or to one of the provincial institutions or to one of the federal institutions, if there was some basis for expecting that there would be medical treatment for these people.

Occasionally this has been arranged, where a special preference can be given for treatment under the forensic clinic. A magistrate can make an order and cut the waiting time short. I am advised by those people who have had substantial experience in this field, that where there is proper treatment given to this sort of person the recovery rates have been simply amazing.

When there is a conviction for one of these offences, usually the magistrate makes an order for treatment. It is my submission, Mr. Chairman, that the magistrate is just wasting his time, because no matter how seriously he believes treatment is needed there just are no facilities in this province to give this sort of person the kind of treatment he needs. There is no programme, there is no therapy, in any of our institutions.

There is the very serious problem of whether or not some of these persons should be released, whether the 18 months or two years does anything for them at all in these institutions. I am advised that there is no prerelease examination, so that no one really knows whether at the end of the term the individual concerned is any better than when he went in. As a matter of fact, most people who are aware of this situation really believe that many of these individuals are much worse than when they went in. After the expiry of the fixed period of time they are released; and they go back into society and can cause and do cause grievous harm to some of the people with whom they come in contact.

The best example of that, perhaps, is Dion, and certainly this is not the fault of any of the authorities in this province. This took place in the province of Quebec. But it is that sort of tragedy, Mr. Chairman, the Dion tragedy—I think most of us are familiar with some of the details of that. It was given substantial publicity. It is that sort of tragedy which, I think, should alert us here in Ontario to setting up some method of treatment for these sick people who can cause so much harm and suffering in the community. I echo the plea made by my hon. colleague from Dovercourt, that we need very substantial research facilities. We need more money, as much money as can possibly be found, to do research into this type of illness; and we need treatment within our institutions.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, we need a new system of law for this type of person, because it is not enough to let a magistrate determine, in relation to the gravity of the offence, that a man should go to an institution for a month, or six months, or 18 months, or a year, or five years. There is no point in sending this sort of person to one of these institutions at all unless we are able to provide some sort of treatment facilities.

As I said earlier, these people are mentally ill. Just incarcerating them for a period of time does nothing to help to cure them. It may well be that all sentences for this type of offence should be indeterminate, and that the real test for release should be whether or not the mental illness has been cured. Where, with competent advice, the authorities come to the conclusion that the mental illness is not cured, surely, Mr. Chairman, it would be good for society if these people were not released again.

The problem in this whole field is that these are nasty sort of things. Very few people are prepared to talk about these matters in public. Lawyers, magistrates, all our law enforcement people, parliamentarians as well, seem to want to shy away from something that is not clean or is not nice. It is not pleasant to talk about it in parlour society. But this is a problem of the world in which we live, and we have got to face up to it, Mr. Chairman.

There have been all sorts of reports in the newspapers concerning these matters. There is a story which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star written by Bill McGuffin, referring to the man I mentioned earlier, and to other men. A young lawyer who does a substantial amount of legal aid work, named Allan Minz, appearing for a man named Jenner in this sort of a matter, had this to say to the courts:

Facilities to treat these people just are not available in Ontario, and until they are the problem will continue to be a festering sore on society. This man Jenner was on his second time around in custody in the Don Jail, which has no facilities at all available to handle such an offence. He did not receive any treatment for his first offence.

The forensic clinic informed his solicitor that it could not examine Jenner in jail. The clinic staff is booked solidly until the end of February.

People given suspended sentences by the court in order to visit the clinic must wait three months for an appointment. In some cases where a court suspects mental problems the accused can be given a 60-day remand for study and treatment at the Ontario Hospital at 999 Queen Street West.

The solicitor knew that this avenue would not help his client, because, as I mentioned earlier in my remarks, the hospital merely certifies whether or not the accused is fit or unfit to stand trial. Most of these people are fit to stand trial, even though they are suffering from this type of serious mental illness.

After the case was over, Magistrate Addison also expressed his personal sympathy for the problems of sexual offenders and the need for treatment of people like Jenner. But what can I do, he asked helplessly.

"Magistrate Thoburn sent two sex offenders to jail yesterday" reads the heading from another article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram. As the lawyer for one defendant described it the inadequacy of the present law is frightening. It goes on in some detail as to the offence. I am not going to read the detail, but it is a pretty gruesome sort of an event:

The lawyer told the magistrate the man had been sent to the Ontario Hospital for psychiatric examination and was reported dangerous but legally sane. "All you can do," the lawyer said to the magistrate, "is send him to jail for a while and when he gets out society is again at his mercy."

And he went to the penitentiary for two years. The other man got a lesser sentence. He went to jail for 18 months, so he arrived in one of our provincial institutions.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order? Surely this is a matter to be discussed under the Attorney General's (Mr. Roberts') estimates?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with respect to my hon. friend, I cleared the way yesterday on this at the beginning of these estimates.

This is the sort of problem which falls athwart probably two or three departments—this department, The Attorney General's Department, and to some extent the department of the hon. Minister of Health. With the knowledge of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, I gave advance notice that I was going to make these remarks. The hon. Attorney General and I had a small chat on this as well. He said he did not mind where it was given, as long as it was not given twice—and I have no intention of delivering the same speech on two occasions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is very kind of the hon. Attorney General to agree that it is all right to discuss it under my estimates. I am sure he is much more capable than I, though, to discuss those aspects of it which really have to do with the courts.

I think the hon. member's points, insofar as treatment or lack of it in the institutions is concerned, are certainly in order; but if he is going to go on at any great length in this aspect which has to do with law enforcement and the courts, really I am not competent to discuss that at all. I would prefer it if he did get to that point where I said I would be very pleased to hear his comments on it.

I do agree that when he mentioned it to me I agreed that there were some parts of it which perhaps did intermingle, but not to the extent which he is doing now. He has really been, up until this moment, speaking practically, with some slight exception, all on the matter of the way the courts handle these cases.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to separate this thing. When you get this sort of person who has to have some treatment by society, two things have to happen if society comes to the conclusion that some sort of criminal offence has taken place: He has to appear before the courts, and then the courts dispose of him.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why do you not speak of it in the Budget debate, when you can go over the whole subject?

Mr. Singer: With great respect, I am three-quarters of the way through here, and I do not think there is any point in arguing over points of order. This is a matter which concerns us. Somewhere along the line I would hope that, as a result of my remarks and the remarks of many others who are concerned with this, a joint Cabinet committee could sit and concern itself with this problem. Three hon. Ministers, at least, should be in on this: The hon. Minister of Health, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, and the hon. Attorney General.

No one of them is going to be able to do it by himself, because it overlaps the other's department. In any event, the magistrate's remark was, in sentencing the second man, "All I can do is to give his family some protection for a short period of time." The man went to jail for 18 months, and the magistrate's remarks were that there was no treatment facility available, in the provincial institution, which was going to change this man; and at the end of 18 months he will come back out into society and be at least as great a danger as he was when he went in.

In relation to this man Hagland whom I referred to before, Dr. Donald Anderson, the psychiatrist at the Ontario Hospital, wrote a letter saying:

He suffers a form of emotional disturbance which is very difficult to treat and the future outlook is poor.

As long as he is outside the confines of an institution it is likely that he will return to drinking, in which condition he could be extremely dangerous to others.

The magistrate agreed he could kill someone the next time. He likened Hagland's condition to that of Dion, the man who committed these offences in the province of Quebec.

For the magistrate and for the defence counsel, it is obvious that Hagland cannot go free. He must be taken out of society, but for how long? Sooner or later, said his lawyer, he must be released from prison. Society cannot be protected then. All you can do is put him in jail but that is only postponing the problem. The magistrate says, "What are we supposed to do?"

I urge the hon. Minister, along with his hon. colleagues, to give some answer to these magistrates, and to these repeated pleas made by lawyers in this very serious type of case.

One more reference to a newspaper clipping I have here, and I think the point has been sufficiently stated. It was again before Magistrate Thoburn, where a man pleaded guilty to a charge of indecent assault on a young girl. He admitted he had been molesting other young girls. "What can we do with these people?" asked the magistrate. The lawyer suggested the accused be kept until social workers and psychiatrists could examine him. "Well, I'll do that", said the magistrate, "but I have never seen a report on a man yet that did not say he could be helped with some treatment. But what treatment, and who takes care of the victims?"

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the very serious problems we have in our society today. I would urge as strongly as I can to this hon. Minister and to his other hon. colleagues whose departments overlap this responsibility, that they spend some time, as quickly as possible, trying to work out a joint solution to one of the most tragic problems which faces us.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for confirming what I had stated in my comments prior to the presentation of the estimates.

At that time I did say that, and I quote:

We are conscious of the need for a therapeutic atmosphere; and in consequence we intend, as far as we are able, to extend our clinical complex to provide treatment for specialized groups of behaviour problems. There is need for the clinical treatment of those offenders with patterns of sexual deviation. Scientific knowledge of the treatment of this type of behaviour, while still limited, has now reached the point where a clinical programme within our department is feasible. Plans for a new approach are currently being considered.

Vote 2002 agreed to.

On vote 2003:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, there are questions I would like to raise here. In the first place, there is the matter of specialized institutions for disturbed children. There is a figure which has been given on the CBC, which I think I have correctly taken down, that 10 per cent of the disturbed children in our institutions occupy about 90 per cent of staff time and that 2 per cent of all inmates need specific psychiatric treatment regarding staff. We are told that there just is not time in Cobourg, and other institutions of this nature, for psychiatrists, in the time available to them, to do more than note and delineate the kind of treatment that is needed; they just do not have time to give the treatment.

I wonder if the hon. Minister would want to comment on what plans are being made for making specialized institutions adequate for this problem?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is the hon. member referring to our training schools?

Mr. Young: The training schools.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Unfortunately, or fortunately, depending upon the way the hon. members of this House look at it, my original comments, which I intended to make before this House, finally reached the massive proportions of about three hours. I was going to go into this aspect of it as well, but because of not expecting to keep hon. members interested for three solid hours, I cut it down to the proportions which I did.

I had, in my original comments, pointed out how, as you begin to get smaller in your group, you find even within that group a smaller group that should be segregated. In addition, in order to get to the particular group dealing with the same problem and, this is almost an endless process—I hope I am making myself clear?

If you start off with 200 children and divide them into five categories, then within those five categories you may even find another five categories; this is the problem we have. You could go on endlessly this way, and this is what we are working to—hoping to finally get the ideal group and the ideal number. Whether that is practical, whether it is feasible in many ways, has yet to be seen. But we are constantly progressing in this respect.

We try to look after disturbed children in a special way. We try to keep them in their own group, insofar as the treatment people feel it is necessary. They are educated at their own age level, but even this is a problem. What do you do if you only have, say, three youngsters who are 15 years old with an IQ of, say, a nine-year-old—could you put them together? How about the difference in size and their sophistication in many ways? It is a most difficult problem.

I can assure the hon. member that we certainly have this constantly in mind. This is the sort of classification treatment we usually give for girls at the diagnostic centre; and for the boys for whom we are now planning a new centre along the same lines. But we will never be finished with this. We will always have to be making these changes, hoping that we are accomplishing as much as we should be expected to accomplish within the four corners of these various problems.

Mr. Young: This may be true, Mr. Chairman, but there must be a cut-off place. I admit that there always is a border line, but there must be a cut-off place which can be established, where certain children should be segregated for this kind of specialized treatment. The matter of staff is the vital problem here, and I come back to my original contention that something should be done quickly to build up staff through various means. I am suggesting to the hon. Minister that he should again consider the matter of the payment for university courses for people who might be willing to enter this kind of field.

I would also like to ask the hon. Minister about the matter of children in foster homes. I am not just sure what the allowance is today—it was $1.85 plus medical care and clothing, and this certainly is not adequate. Is this figure still the figure?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Young: Then I would say that it is hardly adequate to look after this problem. I think the children's aid pays a bit more than this. Perhaps the hon. Minister should get together with the other department and try to work out more adequate payment for children's care.

I would like to say, in connection with this estimate, that I appreciate the statement of the hon. Minister that the apprenticeship training is being undertaken within the institutions. I think this is a step forward. I think all of us welcome that news and hope that it will move with all possible speed.

The other question I wanted to ask in connection with this estimate is the matter of Mercer Reformatory. We hear a great deal about the Mercer.

Some stories are, I think, a bit exaggerated. We hear about overcrowding there, about lack of fire escapes and other things. I have taken the trouble to check here and I find that it is not overcrowded. The hon. Minister gave us some figures the other day. And the fire escape problem, I think, is pretty well cured except for one small exception where, perhaps, there was some problem with the sewing room.

But the one thing that I think we want to know about is the speed with which Mercer is going to be replaced. I understand there are some plans for shifting the institution to some other location and bringing the 75-year-old institution up to date. I wonder if the hon. Minister would want to comment on the total situation regarding Mercer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I inform the hon. member, and I hesitate to do so, because this has been said before for a number of years and I do not want it to sound like a repetitive record, there are plans afoot. I am going to do everything possible to bring this to fruition this year, to replace this institution.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Is the Treasury board holding it up?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, I will say this, that the Treasury board, of course, holds up all departments in some of their programmes, else we would go broke in three easy stages in about six months.

I am corrected, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) says probably three months.

While I consider everything that we want to do is of utmost urgency and should get top priority, of course many of the other departments, if not all of them, feel the same way. The department of the hon. Attorney General, The Department of Public Welfare—well, all the departments.

You must produce a good case. I am trying to produce that case. I am trying to produce certain plans which may be helpful to bring this closer to fruition. That is all I can say at the present time.

Mr. Young: Well, then, the hon. Minister would not like to tell us, Mr. Chairman, that there is money in the estimates this year for what he hopes can happen. If there is no money there, then, of course, I would think his hope is just a hope and nothing else.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the plans I have in mind will not necessarily require the money to be in the estimates. It may be possible to do it in such a fashion that we can go ahead even though the money is not in the estimates for this particular fiscal year.

Mr. Thompson: I would like again to mention, just in connection with institutions, I am thinking of the remarks made by my hon. friend with respect to disturbed children. In my own riding there was a Dovercourt club which was working with emotionally disturbed children. I think the hon. Minister is probably personally aware of this. They were taking referrals from the courts.

It is a voluntary group similar to the children's village in Ottawa. What interests me was the very intensive work that had to be done with these young people and the very highly skilled staff required. I would just like to say again with respect to these young people who are emotionally disturbed, I know of a couple of cases where they were sent to an institution. Now, I know the problems of trying to get staff. It seems to me that you have to be branching out to find some way of encouraging more of these voluntary organizations, through substantial grants, to be doing this intensive work for you.

I would suspect that at your children's institutions there must be a number of emotionally disturbed children that really need intensive treatment, beyond just being kept in an institution. I only urge that you encourage the experiments that have been undertaken by voluntary agencies to work with these young people. It would certainly ease your load. I do not see how, in a big institution, you can possibly be doing this intensive work yourself.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Again, all I can say to the hon. member is that we are struggling with this. We know it is a problem, we are doing everything we can for the children.

It is very difficult, as the hon. member recognizes, it is always difficult in this field. But we are not giving up, we are advancing every year. I think you will find that within a reasonable time we will have advanced a few more steps in this respect.

But it will always be unsatisfactory, because there is so much to learn about human nature—motivations, behaviour, and so on. In the field of behaviour problems it is most difficult. We recognize the problem and we are going to do whatever we can.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to come to another area and that is in connection with people who are suffering from drug addiction. This is not so much the hon. Minister's concern, but with respect to drug addiction, it seems to me there is another drug on the market, and that is the drug of cigarettes.

There may come a time when we decide that this is going to be criminal. There is the same validity to make this criminal, in some ways, as the drugs which are now considered criminal.

However, I would suggest that really these people are sick, and it is most unfortunate that people suffering from drug addiction, are sent to custodial care. I appreciate that you are trying to start drug clinics for them. I also appreciate the terrible affliction that this is and the struggle to overcome it. The hon. Minister would say this is not his area, but I am thinking of the Don Jail, for example.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We do have a drug addiction clinic.

Mr. Thompson: I know you have a drug addiction clinic, but I have met with a group of people on several occasions who are trying among themselves to overcome the habit of drug addiction using the principles of AA. They have told me of some of the treatment they are getting in the Don Jail, where the treatment is just immediate, total withdrawal. The attitude there is that it is a crime to have a degree of withdrawal. There is no understanding of this being a disease, a physical disease for them. I am drawing attention to this concept in the criminal law, so we have to have emphasis of punishment with respect to drug addiction. It seems to me there will be a day when our society will look with embarrassment at the lack of facilities in connection with the treatment of social diseases.

I am thinking particularly of drug addiction. I am hoping, sir, that your Mimico experiment can be advanced a great deal. I wonder if the hon. Minister can report on the Mimico situation?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be interesting to the hon. member to know that our drug addiction clinic at Mimico—I will not go into all the details, but I think it would be interesting to know the following.

This clinic opened in 1956 and from the opening of the clinic to September 30, 1963, 370 patients were admitted. His colleague is not here, so I am safe to say you have to have some sort of motivation to get somebody prepared to take certain treatment for drugs.

This is one area where we were able to keep certain statistics which would help give us some facts. Of the 370, 31.1 per cent were considered free from addiction as of September 30, 1963. I think that is very hopeful. On 41.7 per cent, their addiction was confirmed, in other words they were still taking drugs. On 14.3 per cent, addiction was suspected and on 7.7 per cent their status was unknown—presumably they lost track of them. Three per cent had died and 2.2 per cent had been deported.

So of these 370 for the seven and a half years from January 8, 1956 to September 30, 1963, 31.1 per cent are considered, as of this date, cured. You never consider anybody cured until they die. You do not know what is going to happen. I think that is very encouraging.

Mr. Thompson: What is the staff situation?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It can accommodate 25 patients and is considered a pilot unit.

Mr. Thompson: Not the staff.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is capable of expansion if experience shows the need of it. It is self-contained, being a closed unit. Known drug addicts in our institutions throughout the province are screened by psychiatrists and psychologists for treatment. Professional staff consists of three psychiatrists, specializing in the treatment of addicts, three psychologists, one consultant specialist, one social worker, one medical officer and a nurse.

Mr. Thompson: They are not full time, are they?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The psychiatrists are not full time. We have the other figures if you want them.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, in checking over the hon. Minister's annual report, one figure here struck me as being unusual, and I would like the hon. Minister to explain it. That is, concerning the number of prisoners who have escaped from various institutions. Apparently the number who have escaped, and evaded capture from Burwash, seems to be out of line with those in the other institutions. Of a total of 151 in all institutions, 93 escaped from Burwash. Is there some reason why so many more seem to have no desire to remain there, their full length of time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, I am told that most of those at Burwash are the older and more experienced inmates. Many of them have been in federal penitentiaries before. Some of them escape in the knowledge they will be recaptured and then sent to Kingston, because of a particular legal peculiarity: If you get a certain sentence in Kingston penitentiary, of the same length of time you get in a reformatory, you could actually, with good conduct remission, serve less time than you do in a reformatory.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, do they prefer to change their place of accommodation; is that it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because of this particular aspect of it.

Mr. Newman: Now, in the public accounts I also—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Maybe they do not like our hotel.

Mr. Newman: In the public accounts I notice that approximately $500,000 is spent on textiles. Are tenders requested for the supplying of textiles to the various institutions? I noticed only three companies which supply, and each one supplies approximately $125,000 to $150,000 worth.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that tenders are called in all instances.

Mr. Newman: Is there anything in the tender requesting that this be Canadian-made textile?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, quite frankly, as a member of the government, I would be surprised if that were the case. We are not carrying on a vendetta against American products or other provinces' products. I am not speaking from information I have received. Presumably we would give preference to Canadian products, everything else being fairly equal. I know this is government policy.

Mr. Newman: One other question, Mr. Chairman, concerning sports equipment. The item is fairly small, it is only $9,000. When I asked the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) concerning the purchase of sports equipment, he told me he always was able to purchase it at the cheapest possible price and he listed a series of companies from which they were purchased. If the hon. Minister of Labour is able to buy it cheaper than this department, I think that this department should look into the hon. Minister of Labour's source of supply and purchase from that source, rather than the source indicated here.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Are you suggesting we are paying more for it?

Mr. Newman: I would assume that either one or other of the two departments is paying more, because they both cannot be paying the same amount.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Which vote are you referring to?

Mr. Newman: Well, this will be under 2003. I am referring to page T8 of your public accounts.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is the hon. member referring to a total figure and comparing it with what The Department of Labour purchased?

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister of Labour has assured me that he bought at the cheapest possible price. It is a different source of supply, so they both could not be the cheapest possible.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, well, I will look into that. It seems like a very good point.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned that there was certain preference for Kingston over Burwash. I wonder if he could state whether anything is being done about this, so that there would not be this desire to escape to be sent to Kingston?

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Mr. Chairman, this would also be a matter for the federal government. We could not do anything about it.

Mr. Braithwaite: Has the hon. Minister made any approach to the federal government on the matter?

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Not yet. This has come to my attention recently because of an article in a newspaper. I discussed this with my officials and got the information. As a matter of fact I have it tagged here, so that within a reasonable time I will get in touch with the federal department. There may be very good legal reasons with which I am not acquainted at the moment. But I intend to pursue this and find out about it.

Mr. Braithwaite: Just one final question. Would the hon. Minister know whether—a fact I have been told—serving time in Kingston is supposed to be easier than at, say, Burwash? I am wondering if the hon. Minister has any comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have heard that. I have not visited Kingston yet. I intend to do it and find out, although if it happens to be a fact that does not necessarily mean that we are going to make it so-called “easier” than another jurisdiction. We treat inmates as we think they should be treated, and of course we are not in competition for these customers to give them easier treatment.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Chairman, under this vote, about the institution at Elliot Lake. I find that I cannot speak about this institution without commending, to a degree, both this hon. Minister and the previous Minister of Reform Institutions. I have to mention—I certainly want to mention—that part of the success and efficiency which has been developed in this institution comes from their appointments and the people they have found to run this institution. A gentleman there who is well known to me, who is the superintendent, Mr. Blake Masecar, is a person of the stature that I mention. He is the type of person who should be in these institutions. In this case he is very admirable and a person of stature.

In connection with this, I might mention that two or three weeks ago I was at a meeting with him—and I hasten to say, for his protection, it was a church meeting. He had a phone call to the effect that two or three inmates had escaped. This threw the whole body of the meeting into quite a flurry, and the only person who was not excited was Mr. Masecar. I suggested that I take over the chairmanship of his meeting and he said, “Oh no, these guys will be home before I am.” Which is bearing out the remarks of the hon. Minister of yesterday to the effect that the minimum security arrangements in these institutions is working, at least, in Elliot Lake.

It also bears out something else. It bears out the idea that Elliot Lake is well suited to this particular type of institution. Along with those remarks, I would like to suggest that it has been very informative, since I have been in this House, to have a look back in Hansard and find some of the remarkable and outstanding speeches of the various Ministers having to do with efforts which were going to take place in their departments in connection with Elliot Lake.

I do not intend to read a great deal of Hansard into this record. I do not intend to dwell on it at all, but I would like to suggest that at one point I found a mention to the effect that the institution at Elliot Lake could develop into an institution which would house something like 250 people.

As hon. members have already heard, the institution at Elliot Lake can accommodate 52 people. At this point it is accommodating something less than that. I would like to point out, in this connection, that there are plenty of buildings, lots of room, all kinds of facilities there for more people, and for an extension of this institution's facilities. Along this line I will mention that I found, in The Department of Public Works estimates, a suggestion, and I will not—yes, I could read it. This is found in “New Quota Projects Requested”. For Elliot Lake—“request the purchase of buildings presently in use and to build additional buildings, construct sewage treatment plant.”

I would like to ask the hon. Minister in this connection if he has plans to enlarge this particular institution. Along with that I can only suggest that there never was a time or a place when an expression of support could be more important than right now in connection with Elliot Lake. A definite move along this line, which would result in expression of support for the town and municipality of Elliot Lake, could not happen at a more auspicious time, or under better circumstances than now.

I would like the hon. Minister to comment if he can.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his comments about the operation of the institution itself, but in so far as putting up a larger, newer building is concerned, I would refer the hon. member to some comments which were made by other hon. members on the other side of the House, and in my own speech.

The hon. member for Dovercourt, the hon. member for Yorkview, the hon. member for York South and some of the others, spoke on the advisability of locating institutions in the best places. That is, where they are near certain facilities like psychiatric hospitals and similar services, and also to keep institutions as small as possible. So, having this in mind, I would rather not give an opinion at this time.

It is my intention to visit Elliot Lake after the session, as I intend to visit many of the others with some of my officials and go into all these matters and come to a conclusion at that time.

Mr. Farquhar: Just one further small point, Mr. Chairman. I realize, as do the hon. members of the House, that we do not approach reform institutions on the basis of what the institution can do for a community. I hope I did not suggest that. We have to look at reform institutions on the basis of what a community can do for an institution, rather.

Further along this line, while it may not be within the terms of reference or within your plan to enlarge an institution, I would suggest that there are many other places within the same community in which another small institution could be placed.

I am sure that the hon. Minister is aware of the facilities there in large buildings, in large dormitories, in at least eight different mining properties. Just further from that, we, and I will speak for the citizens of Elliot Lake, will be tickled to death to entertain the hon. Minister on his visit there, and we will look forward to this. Thank you.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if, in view of what has just been said, I should just read into the record the recommendations of the Elizabeth Fry Society, which I mentioned and which at that time I did not take time to read into the record. We do find this point of view expressed from time to time. While the hon. member has just said that the inmate needs more consideration than the location or the town, at the same time

I think we are tending very often to ask that certain institutions be located within our own ridings, and perhaps to the detriment of the people to be treated.

This is a criteria for prison location which I would like to put on the record. It is signed by W. T. McGrath, executive secretary to the Canadian Corrections Association, and it has been circulated, as I said, by the Elizabeth Fry Society:

The urban location is desirable for these reasons. It is easier to attract and hold competent staff in this setting. Few senior people, or those with professional training, will choose to live in isolated locations. The urban setting prevents the staff from becoming in-grown.

There are opportunities for staff to get the stimulation for discussion with other experts in their own and related fields. Extension and similar courses can be arranged easily through the university, if there is one, or through the use of specialist staffs available in the urban setting.

Part-time staffs from the community can be utilized to supplement the work of the institutional staff. Community facilities such as clinics, hospitals, technical schools, universities and churches may be used for the inmates. Such facilities are becoming increasingly available in most areas.

The prison can be used for field placement of university students. Included would be students in medicine, psychiatry, social work, psychology, law, sociology, theology, architecture and dietary science. The institution and the university, if there is one, can work together conveniently in research.

Visiting by relatives of inmates is easier in the more accessible location. Many of the inmates will probably come from the city itself.

Community contact such as exchange visiting, employment interviews, sports, theatrical productions, and the use of institutional facilities by the community are facilitated. Prerelease planning is easier near the large centres, because many of the inmates will probably come from that city and because after-care, placement, and employment agencies are more accessible.

Although land costs may be higher, operating costs are likely to be less. For example, the cost of transportation of prisoners is less, since many of them will probably come from the city.

Supply and repair services are also much more available. These comments do not apply, of course, to reforestation and similar camps which must be located at the place where the work is being done.

I bring that to the attention of the House and I think it just makes sense, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would ask a question of the hon. Minister on the district jails. I wonder if the hon. Minister will tell us how his department fits into the operation of these jails and just what is meant by district jails?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: These are jails which are established in unorganized districts where there is no municipal organization to operate a city or a county jail, and the department takes this responsibility.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the definition of district jails, and I am wondering if they are of higher standard than the county jails. I think you will recall, about four years ago, that Munro Johnson had written in the Toronto Daily Star. He had done a survey of 500 county jails and he had shown that the salary for the guards was $1.50, I think it was $1.58½. I wonder what salary the hon. Minister provides for the guards in the jails, and I wonder what is the average educational background of these guards?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told the same qualifications apply in respect of staff, and the same salary schedule, as in all the other reform institutions.

Mr. Thompson: Could I just have that clarified, sir? What is the salary for a guard to start with?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think I gave that last night—$3,600 to $4,400.

Mr. Thompson: It would seem to me that the district jails are really the sort of out-runners at this time—for the hon. Minister suggest that delicate negotiations are taking place now in connection with some county jails. They are also probably the pioneer experiments for the change which will take place with the implementation of the Fauteux report, if it is implemented as we hope it will be. It is because of this, sir, that I am wondering, because you have the responsibility of these district jails, I presume, because of necessity, because of the fact that the northern areas at that time, or some time ago, could not afford to provide staff and facilities; and you have held on to them ever since. I think when the turnover takes place you may, I assume, be moving to take over the county jails.

I am wondering if you are doing any experiments with the district jails, such as classification and so on?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, we expect to experiment in all our jails, in all our institutions. We are constantly doing it. But I should point out one thing that the hon. member should keep in mind, that there is no financial assistance going to anybody in those unorganized territories for the administration of justice. All that sort of thing which goes to the counties to help them toward the cost of keeping the county jails. So it is not quite the same thing in so far as the financial problem is concerned.

Mr. Thompson: But the hon. Minister says experiments are being carried out. Could he give us some examples of what is being done?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I was not referring to district jails specifically. I was making a general statement to the hon. member that we were constantly experimenting and there are only so many things can be done in a 24-hour day. The matter of doing something about the district jails, quite frankly, has not occurred to me at this time. I shall keep what the hon. member said in mind and look into this. It is worthy of consideration.

Vote 2003 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: That completes the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 24th order; resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

ON THE BUDGET

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the burden of my Budget address was made earlier this week in the House and I shall be exceedingly, perhaps refreshingly, brief. Indeed I assure the hon. members that someone else will certainly adjourn this debate.

It is understood, I think, that before the Budget is passed in this House specific grievances of individual members should be attended to. The grievance to which I wish to refer is both specific, in my own case, and general and critical in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Mr. Speaker, I have been deluged by calls and letters from my riding, located in the municipality of Scarborough, on the hospital problem in Scarborough General Hospital; and equally deluged by letters from old age pensioners on their inability to pay the increase in the Ontario Hospital Services Commission premium.

I wish, therefore, in rapid summary, to make these remarks to the House.

Since the estimates of The Department of Health, which are now some three weeks past, statements of unchallengeable authority have been issued by doctors, specialist heads of departments of hospitals, the chairman of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, the chairman of boards of governors of all the major hospitals in the Toronto area, the superintendents of those hospitals; all of them enunciating a critical and growing shortage of hospital beds.

Second, there has been a survey of Metropolitan Toronto members of this Legislature, of all political parties, and I think it instructive to note that Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats alike voiced the urgency and expressed the wish for a solution.

Third, there has come to light actual individual cases of death and unnecessarily aggravated illness due to the hospital bed shortage.

Fourth, possible alternatives have been offered to this government; alternatives ranging from the utilization of residence nurses' living quarters, to the offer by the registered nursing homes of beds for convalescent and chronic care.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are dire predictions by hospital authorities of the increasing probability of loss of life—I cannot over-emphasize that—with each passing day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without wishing to be provocative, I think that in the light of all those facts over the last three weeks it is in order to ask the following questions:

When is this House to receive a statement from the hon. Minister of Health (Mr.

Dymond) or from the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts)? Surely this Legislature is entitled to such a statement, and surely it amounts to gross negligence contributing to great public anxiety, for the present silence to be maintained. I say that such irresponsibility is not the hallmark of responsible government action.

Second, why must we hazard an appalling human tragedy before the hospital bed jam is broken? Why is it necessary in this society to be motivated only by the most overwhelming crisis before the necessary measures are taken?

Third, Mr. Speaker, surely a solution of the present emergency lies now, and lies only, in the hands of the provincial government. Whatever sum is needed, and whatever percentage of overall bed cost that sum may form, must be granted by this government, and granted as soon as it is humanly possible to do so.

To that end, I have simply this proposition to make: There should be a meeting convened, within the next 72 hours at the latest, by the hon. Minister of Health, of the chairmen of all boards of governors of hospitals in the Metropolitan Toronto area, of representatives of the federal government and of the Metropolitan government, to draft an immediate plan and solution, and present it to this Legislature for approval, if possible, in the forthcoming week.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to expand upon the present system of legal aid in our province of Ontario.

As you are no doubt aware, in May of 1963 a series of resolutions was filed by the County of York Law Association, and certain recommendations were made in the brief presented to this government. One of the main recommendations in that brief was that a commission be appointed by this government to investigate the legal aid programme as presently constituted. A good example of how this Conservative government reacts to constructive suggestions is that on Monday of this week a joint committee to study the legal aid plan was begun. Since that time several briefs have been presented and the committee has started to decide on the briefs presented to it.

The legal aid plan, as presently constituted in Ontario, is woefully inadequate. The lawyers donate their services to the scheme, and perhaps they are not as responsible in their approach to the scheme as they might be. The other problem with the legal aid plan, as presently in force in our province, is that the means test is too restrictive. To qualify for legal aid one must earn less than $1,700 annually, if single, and $2,500 if married.

As a law student, I was quite active in the legal aid plan in the county of York and this activity continued after graduation. But there came a time, Mr. Speaker, when many of us who were active in the programme found that it was the same group each day and each week which was participating, whereas other lawyers were inclined to stand back and watch the proceedings, and point to the plan as being an overwhelming success, without participating in it.

It is not to be believed, Mr. Speaker, that the programme as presently constituted cannot be made effective. A good example of how effective a good programme can be under this system is in York North. In York North a series of lawyers cover the magistrates' courts in Richmond Hill and Newmarket. In conjunction with the magistrate, O. S. Hollinrake, these lawyers have decided that every day a criminal magistrate's court is held in this particular area, one of their members will be in court.

Before the proceedings begin, Mr. Speaker, the magistrate makes it known to all the accused persons in court that there is a legal aid solicitor available in the court, that he is there for their benefit, and if they have any problems or any concern as to whether they are eligible, they have the opportunity to request, of this solicitor, what their rights are. The fact that this magistrate makes such a statement is quite gratifying to see, because in our province at the present time, whether it is because some of these magistrates have an over-heavy workload or any other reason, they are very disinclined to make accused persons aware of what their rights really are, particularly directed to legal aid.

The example being set in York North, however, is the exception rather than the rule. I have spoken to several different lawyer members of this House and they have indicated to me that in their ridings the same problem is prevalent, and that the lawyers are not taking an active interest in the legal aid programme.

With reference to the county of York plan, I feel it would be remiss of me not to commend Mr. John Weisdorf, who is the assistant director of the Ontario plan and who personally has the problem of making sure that all the indigents in York county, who are eligible for legal aid, are represented by legal aid solicitors.

In 1962 in York county, legal aid solicitors defended 719 accused persons and Mr. Weisdorf personally defended 200 of these. This, then, is an average of some four cases a week, and no matter how eminent a counsel may be, this workload is too overwhelming. Perhaps if the profession would be a little more receptive to the legal aid plan, we would not have the problem with which Mr. Weisdorf is faced.

Having pointed out the major shortcomings, particularly the lack of participation by the profession and secondly the means test, what then are the answers to the problem? First of all, we could hope that all the lawyers in Ontario would say, "All right, we will take it upon ourselves to make the plan successful as it presently stands." However, I think that this is a rather forlorn hope, having regard to what has happened in the past.

So then we should make reference to some other plans which are in operation. The first plan that comes to mind is the New York City Legal Aid Society. It has a staff of 80 full-time attorneys whose job it is to represent indigents; and the means test in New York city refers to a single person who makes less than $3,400 annually and a married person who makes less than $4,400 annually. The society is managed by a board of directors, and these directors are nominated and elected by those who contribute through the plan itself.

In 1962, the legal aid society had a budget of some $750,000, of which $200,000 was contributed by lawyers themselves, a further $200,000 by public contribution and $100,000 by the city of New York. The society received good publicity. It was well recognized by all accused and indicated to them by the courts what their rights were under the plan, and the bulk of them took advantage of it. Sixty thousand criminal cases and 40,000 civil cases were handled by legal aid lawyers in New York in 1962.

The English system is another example of what can be done if the profession and the government work hand in hand. Criminal legal aid in England is provided by statute. The main forte of it, Mr. Speaker, is that every accused person, whether he is charged on the spot, or by summons, is given or has attached to the summons specific examples as to whether he would be eligible for legal aid. It is then brought forth and made known to the accused what his rights are under the plan, and he then must apply to the court to have him participate in the plan. If he in fact qualifies, the court then takes it upon itself to direct a lawyer to act for this person.

Since the costs are paid for by the government on a tariff plan whereby 85 per cent of the fee is guaranteed by the government, most solicitors and barristers are in the plan. The accused then has a good choice in selecting his own solicitor to act for him.

Mr. Eagleson moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, on Monday we will proceed with the estimates for The Department of Highways, to be followed by The Department of Energy Resources, to be followed by The Department of Travel and Publicity. We will have a night session Monday and Tuesday nights.

For the information of the hon. members, it does not appear to me that we will complete our tasks here by Easter. So I would think we would probably adjourn on March 25 to come back on April 6, which I believe is the Monday, or perhaps April 7, after Easter week.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.00 o'clock, p.m.
